She went on to say, "The ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds is to be locked early if there is no reason to do otherwise, and you are not to venture outside the premises. Ch'en Ching-chi also must be instructed not to go out, and to look after the front gate along with Manager Fu Ming. I will probably be able to return home by the end of the month."

On the morning of the fifteenth day of the ninth month, she burned paper money to convey her intentions to the gods, and that evening, after announcing her departure before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, shared a farewell drink with her fellow wives. She also turned the keys to the master suite and the storerooms over to Hsiao-yü and enjoined her to look after the premises carefully.
The next morning, she got up at the fifth watch and prepared to depart. The whole entourage led out the mounts they had hired, and her sister wives came out to the front gate to see her off.
It was late autumn, and the weather was cold and the days short. They traveled two stages each day, covering sixty or seventy li, and sought out village inns before dusk in order to spend the night, resuming their journey early the next morning. On their way:
The autumn clouds were austere,
The frigid geese were desolate,
The trees were shedding leaves,
The landscape had turned bleak,[2]
Their gloom was insurmountable.[3]
There is a poem that testifies to the way Yüeh-niang traversed the distant mountains and passes in order to fulfill the vow she had made on her husband's behalf:
For her entire life her determined fidelity will rival ice or frost;
Her little specimen of an immaculate heart[4] is able to move Azure Heaven.[5]
For her husband's sake she promised to go as far as the sacred mountain;
Along the thousand li of mountains and passes her name exudes fragrance.
To make a long story short, of the events of their trip there is nothing to tell. After traveling for several days, they arrived at T'ai-an prefecture and were able to contemplate Mount T'ai. In truth, it is:
The number one famous mountain under Heaven.[6]
Its coiling base is rooted in the earth;
Its peak rises into the heart of Heaven.[7]
It lies between the ancient states of Ch'i and Lu;
And emanates an atmosphere of precipitous majesty.
When Wu K'ai saw that it was getting late, he conducted them into an inn to spend the night.
The next morning, they got up early in order to begin their ascent and headed toward the Tai-yüeh Temple, or Temple of the Eastern Peak, which is located at the foot of the mountain.
Sacred rites were observed here dynasty after dynasty;
Feng and Shan Sacrifices were held here age after age.[8]
It was the premier temple in the realm. Behold:
The temple is located at the Eastern Peak,
The mountain that rules over the universe.
It is the most venerable of all mountains,
The presiding director of the myriad gods.
If you lean on a balustrade at the summit,
You can see as far as the River of Weak Water or the Isles of the Blest;[9]
If you climb the evergreens on the crest,
You will find yourself to be enveloped by the thick clouds and thin fog.
Towers and terraces soar aloft,[10]
As though ready for the gold raven to spread its wings and fly there;
Halls and galleries rise steeply,
As if prepared for the jade rabbit to leap aloft and come to visit.[11]
The temple features carved rafters and painted beams,[12]
And is enhanced with azure tiles and vermilion eaves.[13]
The translucent latticework on phoenix gates brightens the yellow silk;
From the tortoiseshell-patterned embroidered drapes hang brocade tassels.
Gazed at from afar, the sacred images,
With their nine-tasseled crowns, show the eyes of Shun and the eyebrows of Yao;[14]
Seen close up, the aspects of the gods,
Dressed in dragon robes, display the shoulders of T'ang and the back of Yü.
The Lord of Destiny of the Nine Heavens,[15]
Is adorned with a hibiscus cap, enhancing his robe of crimson silk;
Ping-ling, Duke of Awesome Transcendence,[16]
Is clad in a yellow robe, set off by a girdle of Indigo Field jade.
To their left are arrayed officers wearing jade pins and pearl-studded shoes;[17]
To their right stand officials with purple sashes and golden seals of office.[18]
The whole edifice exhibits an air of gravity,
Defended by three thousand armor-bearing generals;
The two corridors exude a martial atmosphere,
Protected by a hundred thousand ironclad soldiers.
Underneath the Hao-li Hill,[19]
The Assessor presides over the seventy-two bureaus of the underworld;
Within the White Mule Shrine,[20]
The tutelary god regulates the twenty-four terms of the solar year.
The iron-faced Defender-in-chief of the lakes of fire,
Day after day, shows off his powers;
The General of the Five Ways who rules life and death,
Year after year, reveals his potency.
The burning of sacred incense never ceases,
As the celestial spirits on their flying steeds convey their vermilion texts;
The sacrifices are celebrated on schedule,
As both old and young express their hopes for the granting of good fortune.
Within the Chia-ning Hall,
Propitious clouds hover densely;
Outside the Southern Gate,
Auspicious vapors swirl around.[21]
Truly:
A myriad citizens come to worship in the Temple of Iridescent Clouds; Within the four seas, all pay homage to the God of the Eastern Peak.[22]
Wu K'ai conducted Yüeh-niang to the Tai-yüeh Temple, where she proffered incense in the main hall and paid obeisance before the sacred image of the God of the Eastern Peak. A Taoist head priest stood beside her and intoned the text of her declaration. She then went on to burn paper money before the images in the two corridors and eat a vegetarian meal, after which, they embarked on the climb to the summit, ascending the forty-nine switchbacks, and:
Grabbing the vines and grasping the creepers,[23] to help them on their way up. The golden edifice of the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds seemed to be suspended in space, shrouded in clouds and mist, forty-five li above the foot of the mountain. From its vantage point, one could look down upon the wind-blown clouds and thunderstorms below. Yüeh-niang and her entourage had set out from the Tai-yüeh Temple at 8:00 that morning, and after climbing the switchbacks and reaching the summit it was after 4:00 P.M. before they arrived at the Golden Edifice of the Goddess, which was adorned with a vermilion plaque, with the three characters Temple of Iridescent Clouds inscribed in gold. They entered the temple and paid obeisance to the gilded image of the goddess. What did it look like? Behold:
On her head is coiled a nine-dragon flying-phoenix coiffure;
Her body is clad in a gown of red silk enhanced with golden threads.
From her girdle of Indigo Field jade is suspended a lengthy flap;
She lifts a white jade scepter between her variegated sleeves.
Her face resembles a lotus blossom,[24]
Her natural-looking eyes and brows enhance her cloudy locks;
Her lips are like gilded vermilion,
Her euphoric demeanor embellishes her snow-white physique.
She looks like the Queen Mother of the West feasting at the Jasper Pool;
It is just as though Ch'ang-o has come down from her palace in the moon.

The majestic quality of her immortal demeanor is impossible to depict;
The dignified bearing of her figure would be difficult to delineate.[25]
When Yüeh-niang had finished paying her obeisance to the image of the goddess, she noticed that the head priest of the temple was standing beside her. He looked to be about forty years old, was short in stature, and sported a three-forked beard, bright eyes, and white teeth. On his head he wore a Taoist cap, held in place with a pin, his body was clad in a crimson robe, and on his feet he wore a pair of shoes with cloud-patterned toes. Stepping forward, he proceeded, on her behalf, to intone the text of the declaration she had prepared in fulfillment of her vow, ignite the incense in a gilded brazier, and burn the paper money and imitation gold and silver ingots, after which, he told a young acolyte to accept the sacrificial offerings she had brought.
It so happens that this Taoist head priest was not the sort to abide by his lot. He was the principal disciple of Abbot Chin of the Tai-yüeh Temple at the foot of the mountain, and his name was Shih Po-ts'ai. He was an extreme example of:
The sort who are covetous of wealth and given to lust;
The kind who pander to the powerful and broker events.
In this area there was a character known as Year Star Yin, whose real name was Yin T'ien-hsi, who was the younger brother of the wife of Kao Lien, the prefect of T'ai-an. He was accustomed to leading a bunch of vagrants:
Sporting bows and flaunting arrows,
Along with their falcons and hounds, to engage in scrutinizing the hordes of female pilgrims from all quarters who were visiting the two temples, above and below. His reputation was such that no one dared to cross him. The Taoist priest Shih Po-ts'ai endeavored to curry favor with him by:
Disguising his iniquitous intent, and luring females into his abbot's quarters, where Yin T'ien-hsi was free to slake his lust on them in whatever way he liked.
When Shih Po-ts'ai saw that Yüeh-niang possessed:
An unusually attractive countenance, and was wearing a mourning cap, indicating that she must either be a woman from an official's family or a female member of a powerful household, and that she was accompanied by an elderly man with a gray beard, and two domestic page boys, he came forward and saluted them in the Taoist manner by touching one hand to his forehead, expressed his thanks for their offerings, and said, "Will you two benefactors not come into my abbot's quarters for a cup of tea?"
"Don't bother to trouble yourself," responded Wu K'ai. "We are about to go down the mountain."
"Even though you plan to descend the mountain," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "there is time enough yet."
In no time at all, he succeeded in persuading them to come into his abbot's quarters. The walls of the chamber were covered with snow-white plaster. At the head of the room stood a couch with a sesame flower design and willow-yellow brocaded curtains. Above an incense stand in a position of honor there was suspended a scroll painting that depicted the scene of Lü Tung-pin flirting with the courtesan White Peony.[26] To either side of it there hung scrolls with the two lines of a parallel couplet written in large characters of varying vividness that read:
Raising two sleeves swelled by a clear breeze
we posture like cranes;
Facing a chamber suffused with bright moonlight
we expound the scriptures.
When Shih Po-ts'ai asked Wu K'ai his name, he replied, "My surname is Wu, and my given name is K'ai. This is my younger sister, née Wu, who has come to fulfill a vow that she made on behalf of her deceased husband. But we should not impose on your exalted establishment."
"Since the two of you are related," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "be good enough to sit down together in the seats of honor."
He then sat down himself in the position of host and directed his disciples Shou-ch'ing and Shou-li to serve the tea.
It so happens that he had two disciples, one of them named Kuo Shou-ch'ing and the other Kuo Shou-li, both of whom were fifteen years old and naturally endowed with good looks. They wore black satin Taoist caps on their heads, their topknots were held in place by red cords with two floating ribbons dangling behind, on their bodies they wore black silk Taoist robes, and their feet were clad in sandals and white socks. From their bodies:
A fragrant aroma assailed the senses.
When guests arrived, they were there to:
Serve tea or serve water,
Pour wine and serve food;
while at night, they were available for Shih Po-ts'ai to hump from behind like a carrier hugging a trunk, using them to:
Assuage his lust and gratify his hunger.
Although ostensibly they were the disciples of the head priest, in actuality they were nothing more than the master's concubines. And there is yet another feature that is hardly mentionable, which is that each of them, when they took down their trousers, had a large sanitary napkin strapped over his crotch to prevent the leakage of urine.
Gentle reader take note: All families with good boys and good girls should be sure never to deliver them to Buddhist monasteries or Taoist temples to leave the family and become monks or priests, Buddhist nuns or Taoist priestesses. Once exposed to those:
Male thieves and female whores, nine out of ten of them are likely to be victimized. There is a poem that testifies to this.
For what purpose are Taoist sanctuaries and Buddhist temples established?
The Taoists worship their Heavenly Worthies,
the Buddhists worship Buddha.
They are beautifully landscaped in order to give a false sense of purity;
Providing for visitors and welcoming guests they engage in perverse doings.
Accoutering their disciples with attractive clothes and handsome outfits;
They make use of wanton wine and leisured tea in ravishing female beauties.
How sad that the tenderly nurtured offspring of respectable families;
Should be entrusted to such monastics only to serve as their concubines.
Before long, the two disciples, Shou-ch'ing and Shou-li, set up a table in the room and laid out a vegetarian repast including mouth-watering sweetmeats, pastries, steamed and fried vegetarian dishes, and an assortment of other delicacies that filled the entire surface of the table. The first-class Sparrow Tongue tea, brewed with sweet water, was served in cups of white Ting-chou porcelain, with silver teaspoons in the shape of apricot leaves. When they finished their tea and the utensils had been cleared away, a selection of delicacies to go with the wine was served in:
Large platters and large bowls, consisting of chicken, goose, fish, duck, and other such nonvegetarian fare.
Pouring amber-colored wine,
Into chased silver goblets.
The wine flowed in golden ripples.[27]
When the wine was served, Yüeh-niang wished to take her leave and called for Tai-an to come forward with a bolt of muslin and two taels of silver on a red lacquer tray and present them to Shih Po-ts'ai as an expression of their gratitude.
"We ought not to put your esteemed temple to so much trouble," said Wu K'ai. "These paltry gifts are merely an expression of our gratitude to Your Reverence. There is no need for you to offer us wine and food. It is growing late, and we must set out to descend the mountain."
This threw Shih Po-ts'ai into such consternation that he expressed no end of thanks, saying, "Untalented as I am, it is only thanks to the generous patronage of the Goddess that I am serving as the head priest of the Temple of the Iridescent Clouds here on the sacred peak, where I am dependent on the contributions received from the four quarters. Were I not to use these funds to entertain the donors from the four quarters, what should I use them for? And now, having offered merely these meager refreshments, I have put you to the trouble of presenting me with these generous gifts. You put me in a position in which it would be:
Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."
Only after repeatedly refusing to accept the proffered gifts did he finally direct his disciples to put them away.
Endeavoring to detain Yüeh-niang and Wu K'ai, he said, "Be so kind, whatever else you do, as to return to your seats for a little while, and imbibe three cups of wine. By so doing you would allow me to fully express my humble feelings."
When Wu K'ai saw how assiduously they were being pressed to stay, he felt obliged to sit down again with Yüeh-niang.
In no time at all, some heated delicacies were served, and Shih Po-ts'ai said to his disciples, "This wine is hardly worth drinking. Go and open that jug of lotus blossom wine with its penetrating fragrance that His Honor Prefect Hsü gave me the other day so we can share it with His Honor Wu."
Before long, his disciples brought in another heated flagon and poured out the warm wine, the first cup of which Shih Po-ts'ai offered to Yüeh-niang with both hands, but she refused to accept it.
"My younger sister is not accustomed to drinking wine," said Wu K'ai.
"My lady," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "You may encounter wind and frost along the way. Have a little. What harm can it do. Just drink a moderate amount."
So saying, he poured out half a cup for Yüeh-niang and another cup for Wu K'ai, saying, "Your Honor Wu, take a taste of this wine to see how you like it."
Wu K'ai drank a mouthful, and finding it to be:
Fragrant, sweet, and delicious,
With a robust and lingering flavor, said, "This is indeed a fine wine."
"I would not deceive you, venerable sir," said Shih Po-ts'ai, "but this wine was given to me by His Honor Prefect Hsü of Ch'ing-chou. His elderly lady, his daughter, and his son come to the Temple of the Eastern Peak every year to burn incense and sponsor a performance of the chiao rites of cosmic renewal.
Their relationship with me is extremely close.
Both his daughter and his son were brought here to undergo the ceremony of having religious names bestowed upon them under the aegis of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds. On seeing that I:
Possessed a placid disposition,
Was devoted to burning incense,
And was invariably trustworthy, they have shown me both respect and affection. In the past, half the resources of these two temples at the foot and the summit of the mountain have been subject to taxation, but in recent years, thanks to the benevolent patronage of His Honor Prefect Hsü, who has memorialized the throne to suspend these exactions, these resources are no longer taxed but are allowed to remain in the possession of the temples to be expended first of all on the worship of the goddess and secondly on the entertainment of incense-burning pilgrims from the four quarters."
While this parley was taking place in the abbot's quarters, down below, Tai-an, Lai-an, and the chair bearers who had brought them were provided with a place to sit down and were served soup, rice, and other snacks along with wine and meat in:
Large platters and large bowls,
until they had eaten their fill.
Gentle readers take note: Since Shih Po-ts'ai had concealed Yin T'ien-hsi on his premises and inveigled Yüeh-niang into his quarters with a view to giving him an opportunity to consummate a secret liaison with her, he could hardly fail to do whatever he could to play up to her.
After drinking several cups of wine, Wu K'ai saw that it was getting late and wanted to get up and go, but Shih Po-ts'ai said, "The sun is about to set, and it is already too late for you to make your descent of the mountain. If you are not unwilling to stay overnight in my quarters, it would be easier for you to go down the mountain tomorrow morning."
"It so happens that we have left some luggage in the inn," said Wu K'ai, "and I fear that our absence might give petty people an opportunity for mischief."
Shih Po-ts'ai laughed at this, saying, "There is no reason to worry about that. If anything untoward should occur, and it became known that you were on a pilgrimage to our temple, the inhabitants of the villages and inns would be scared to death. How do you suppose they would like it if the innkeepers were dragged into the prefectural yamen and given a taste of the squeezers to induce them to uncover the whereabouts of the culprits?"
Upon hearing this, Wu K'ai continued to sit in his place while Shih Po-ts'ai poured him another large goblet of wine. When Wu K'ai became aware how potent the wine was, he concealed it under his clothing, pretended to be drunk, and asked to be escorted to a bathroom, after which he expressed a desire to be given a tour of the temple sanctuary. Shih Po-ts'ai, accordingly, directed his disciple Kuo Shou-ch'ing to accompany him, gave him the keys needed to open the doors, and sent Wu K'ai off to explore the premises. Wu Yüeh-niang was physically exhausted and wanted to lie down on the bed for a nap. Shih Po-ts'ai responded by going outside to sit down and locking the door behind him.
This turned out to be one of those occasions on which,
Something was destined to happen.
No sooner had Yüeh-niang sprawled out on the bed than she suddenly heard the sound of a clatter as a man jumped out from inside the paper partition behind the bed. He had a pink complexion with a three-forked beard, was about thirty years old, wore a dark black hat on his head, and was dressed in a blouse and trousers of purple brocade.
Embracing Yüeh-niang with both arms, he said, "My name is Yin T'ien-hsi, and I am the younger brother of Prefect Kao Lien's wife. I have long heard that you are the spouse of a prominent official and are endowed with looks that entitle you to be called a national beauty. I have:
Thought about you for a long time,
And thirsted for a glimpse of you,
But have lacked a way to meet you.[28]
Now that I have encountered your memorable person:
Such good fortune would suffice for three lives;
I will find it hard to forget either dead or alive."
So saying, he forced Yüeh-niang back down on the bed and proposed to take his pleasure with her.

Yüeh-niang was panic-stricken at this and called out in a loud voice:
"The world is at perfect peace;
The universe is shining bright.[29]
How can you bring yourself to manhandle a decent person's wife this way?"
She attempted to make her escape, but Yin T'ien-hsi would not let her go and knelt down before her, saying, "My lady, pray be quiet, and favor me by complying with my urgent request."
Yüeh-niang responded to this by calling out for help, again and again, in an even more strident voice than before.
When Lai-an and Tai-an heard this, and recognized it to be Yüeh-niang's voice, they ran back to the sanctuary in a state of obvious agitation to look for Wu K'ai, calling out, "Brother-in-law, bestir yourself. Our mistress is in the abbot's quarters engaged in an altercation with someone."
Wu K'ai promptly made his way:
Covering two steps with every one,
back to the abbot's quarters and tried to push open the door but was unable to do so.
He heard Yüeh-niang shout out in a loud voice:
"The world is at perfect peace, what do you think you're doing trying to imprison a female pilgrim here?"
At this, Wu K'ai called out, "Sister, don't panic. I'm here."
So saying, he picked up a piece of rock and used it to smash open the door. When Yin T'ien-hsi realized that someone was on his way in, he promptly let go of Yüeh-niang and disappeared in a cloud of dust behind the bed. It so happens that Shih Po-ts'ai had set things up so that there were escape routes behind all the beds on the premises.
When Wu K'ai managed to smash open the door to the abbot's quarters, he asked Yüeh-niang, "Sister, did that rascal succeed in defiling you, or not?"
"He did not manage to defile me," said Yüeh-niang, "but the rascal got away from behind the bed."
Wu K'ai went out to look for Shih Po-ts'ai, but he had hidden himself away, merely sending his disciples out to deal with the situation. Wu K'ai was infuriated by these developments and ordered the servants who had accompanied him, including Tai-an and Lai-an, to smash up the doors, windows, and walls of the abbot's quarters. He then escorted Yüeh-niang outside the Temple of the Goddess of Iridescent Clouds, where they got into their sedan chairs and set off to descend the mountain.
It was dusk when they started out, and it took half the night before they reached their inn at the foot of the mountain before dawn and told the innkeeper, thus and so, what had happened.
The innkeeper:
Repeatedly expressed his dismay,[30] saying, "You ought not to have done anything to disturb that Yin T'ien-hsi. He is the younger brother of the wife of the prefect of T'ai-an and is known as Year Star Yin. After you have gone, he will take out his resentment by making trouble for us innkeepers. He will never be willing to call it quits."
Wu K'ai responded by giving him a tael more than the charge for their lodgings, collected their luggage, and, escorting Yüeh-niang's sedan chair, set off as fast as they could go. Behind them, Yin T'ien-hsi, who was reluctant to let them get away, came down the mountain in hot pursuit, at the head of a bunch of twenty or thirty idlers, armed with broadswords and short sticks.
Meanwhile, Wu K'ai and his entourage:
Covering two stages in the time for one,[31]
arrived during the fourth watch at a hollow in the hills, where they saw a light glimmering in the distance. When they approached closer, they found that it was a cavern in the rock in which an old monk was reading a sutra by candlelight.
Wu K'ai addressed him, saying, "Master, we had gone to the summit to burn incense when we were driven away by some ruffians and forced to flee down the mountain.
In the murky darkness of the night,[32] we have arrived here after having:
Missed the track and lost our way.[33]
Permit me to ask you, Master, what is the name of this place, and how can we get home from here?"
"You are on the eastern spur of Mount T'ai," the elderly monk responded, "and this cave is known as the Snow Stream Cave. I am called Ch'an Master Snow Cave, and my religious name is P'u-ching. [34] I have been engaged in religious practice here for twenty or thirty years. You have been fated to encounter me here, and you ought not to proceed any further tonight. There are innumerable:
Wild animals, tigers, and leopards,[35] on the lower slopes of the mountain. If you continue on your way early tomorrow morning, there is a highway leading straight to your home in Ch'ing-ho district."
"I fear those ruffians may still be pursuing us," said Wu K'ai.
P'u-ching took a look outside and said, "There is nothing to fear. Those ruffians, after coming halfway down the mountain, have already gone back where they came from."
He then asked Yüeh-niang her name, and Wu K'ai said, "This is my younger sister, the wife of Hsi-men Ch'ing. We came here in order to present incense on behalf of her deceased husband and have been fortunate enough to be rescued by you.
Your kindness will be amply rewarded.
We will never dare to forget it."
Thereupon, they proceeded to spend the rest of the night in the cavern.
The next day, during the fifth watch, Yüeh-niang got out a bolt of muslin and offered it to the priest, but P'u-ching refused to accept it and said, "Instead of that, why don't you allow me to induct a son of yours into the religious life so he can serve me as a disciple. How would you feel about that?"
"My younger sister," said Wu K'ai, "has only a single son and expects him to succeed to the family inheritance. If she should bear another son, she might be willing to let him leave the family and become a disciple of yours."
"My son is still an infant," said Yüeh-niang, "and is less than a year old. He is scarcely ready for anything like that."
"All you need to do is promise him to me," said P'u-ching. "I have no need for him at present, but ten years from now I may ask you for him."
As for Yüeh-niang:
From her mouth no word was uttered, but she thought to herself, "Ten years from now, I can decide what to do then."
Consequently, she agreed to promise her son to P'u-ching.
Gentle reader take note: She should never have promised to let her son leave the family and enter the religious life as a disciple of the priest. Ten years later, when:
The empire was in a state of disorder,[36]
Yüeh-niang took Hsiao-ko and fled to Honan province to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou, but she lost her way and encountered P'u-ching in the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where he spirited her son away into a life of Buddhist celibacy:
Taking the tonsure and becoming a priest.[37]
Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.
That day, Yüeh-niang and her entourage said good-bye to P'u-ching and proceeded on their way. After traveling all day, they came to a mountain that obstructed their path. This mountain was called Ch'ing-feng Mountain and presented a formidable appearance. Behold:
From all eight sides it appears towering;
From all four angles it looks precipitous.
Curious-looking pines adorn its summit with their coiled greens; Branches of ancient trees are tangled amid their hanging vines.
Waterfalls fly through the air, Assailing the senses with their chill[38] and causing hairs to stand on end;
Cliffs descend straight down, Reflecting bright light into the eyes and awakening the dreaming soul.
The gurgling of the streams is audible;
The sound of the woodman's axe is heard.
Peaks and summits rise up in profusion;
The cries of the mountain birds are sad.
Deer congregate in their swarming herds,[39]
Foxes connive together in their cliques;
Traversing the brambles as they leap their way back and forth, Seeking their prey with howls as they run forward and backward.
Standing on the grassy slopes,
As far as the eye can see there are no travelers' inns;
Traversing the mountain paths,
On every side there are merely the graves of the dead.
If this is not a place where Buddhist monks practice religion,
It must be a lair from which outlaws commit their atrocities.[40]
It so happens that this Ch'ing-feng Mountain had a stronghold called the Ch'ing-feng Stronghold located on it that housed three outlaw chieftains, one of whom was called the Brocade Tiger, Yen Shun; one of whom was called the Short-legged Tiger, Wang Ying; and one of whom was called the Palefaced Gentleman, Cheng T'ien-shou.[41] They had a troop of five hundred followers serving under them who devoted themselves solely to:
Housebreaking and highway robbery,[42]
Setting fires and killing people, so that no one dared to interfere with them.
On this occasion, as Wu K'ai and his entourage, riding their donkeys and escorting Yüeh-niang's sedan chair, proceeded to make their way into the mountain, the sun had already set, and:
In the darkness of the night, there were no villages or roadside inns to be seen. Just as they were becoming apprehensive about the dangers of their situation, a horse-tripping rope was thrown out that snagged Wu K'ai's mount and tumbled him into a pit.
It so happens that the brigands at the foot of the mountain had seen Yüeh-niang's sedan chair and Wu K'ai's entourage coming up the mountain slope and reported it to the three outlaw chieftains, who dispatched a bunch of brigands to seize their luggage and escort them all up to their stronghold. At the time, the three outlaw chieftains were having a drink with Sung Chiang, the hero from Shantung whose cognomen was Opportune Rain, and who had taken refuge there after slaying the singing girl Yen P'o-hsi.[43] The three outlaw chieftains had invited him to stay at their stronghold for a few days.
When Sung Chiang saw that Yüeh-niang wore a mourning cap over her chignon, was clad in plain white mourning garments, and that:
Her deportment was upright and correct,
And her countenance exquisitely shaped,[44]
he concluded that:
She was surely not the spouse of an ordinary person,
But must be the dependent of a well-to-do household.
He therefore proceeded to ask for her name.
At this, Yüeh-niang stepped forward, bowed to him, saying, "Many felicitations," and then addressed him with the words, "Your Highness, my maiden name is Wu, and I am the wife of the deceased Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing, for whom I am maintaining a chaste widowhood. When my husband became seriously ill, I swore an oath to come offer incense on his behalf at Mount T'ai; but when I was on the summit just a while ago I was assaulted by Yin T'ien-hsi, and we have been fleeing from him, all day and all night, in the attempt to make it safely home. How could we have anticipated that in the dark of night we would make the error of traversing the foot of this mountain of yours? We dare not expect to retrieve the saddlebags containing our luggage, but would plead with you to spare our lives. If we should succeed in returning safely home we will feel fortunate indeed."
When Sung Chiang observed the sad and moving tone of Yüeh-niang's words, he felt a degree of compassion for her and, bowing to Yen Shun, said, "This lady is the wife of an official who once presided over some colleagues of mine, and:
With whom I was slightly acquainted.[45]
She came here in order to offer incense on behalf of her husband and, because she was pursued by Yin T'ien-hsi, made the mistake of trespassing on the precincts of this mountain of yours. She is a woman of courageous virtue. If you will only consent to let her go for my sake, it will allow her to preserve her integrity."
To this plea Wang Ying responded, saying, "Brother, since I am so unfortunate as not to have a wife of my own, you should let me take her to serve as the matron of the stronghold."[46]
So saying, he directed his subordinates to seize Yüeh-niang and escorted her back to the interior of the stronghold.
At this, Sung Chiang turned to Yen Shun and Cheng T'ien-shou, saying, "Despite what I said, Brother Wang Ying is refusing to let me perform a good deed."
"This brother of ours," said Yen Shun, "is fine enough in most respects, but he is guilty of this one fault. Whenever he sees a woman possessed of feminine beauty, he lusts after her with fire in his eyes."
Sung Chiang refused to drink any more wine and accompanied the other two to the interior of the stronghold, where they found Wang Ying in the act of embracing Yüeh-niang and attempting to take his pleasure with her.
Sung Chiang strode right up to Wang Ying and, seizing him with one hand, dragged him back to the front of the stronghold, saying, "Worthy Brother, if you wish to play the role of a hero, to exhaust the very marrow of your bones [47] in sexual indulgence is not the way to enhance your stature. If you wish to seek a wife, let me act as a go-between on your behalf, and I'll secure a virtuous virgin for you, observing all the standard ritual practices, who will come and be your wife. What reason is there for you to lust after remarried goods?"

"Brother," responded Wang Ying, "why not let me have my way, for better or for worse, in this matter?"
"That won't do," said Sung Chiang. "I, Sung Chiang, will certainly undertake to provide my worthy brother with a suitable bride in the future. The fact is that if you insist on taking this woman today, you will become a laughingstock to the denizens of the rivers and lakes. As for that rascal Yin T'ien-hsi, should I fail to be accepted by the bandit lair in Liang-shan Marsh, that will be that; but should I be accepted at Liang-shan, I will see to it that his treatment of this woman is avenged."
Gentle reader take note: In later days, when Sung Chiang had arrived at Liang-shan and been chosen as the chieftain of the outlaw band there, because Yin T'ien-hsi tried to appropriate the garden of Ch'ai Huang-ch'eng, the Black Whirlwind Li K'uei was dispatched to deal with the situation and not only killed Yin T'ien-hsi but went on to wreak havoc at Kao-t'ang prefecture.[48] Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.
On that day, when Yen Shun heard what Sung Chiang had to say, he did not even ask for Wang Ying's consent but ordered the chair bearers to approach and carry Yüeh-niang down the mountain.
When Yüeh-niang saw that she was being set free, she stepped up to Sung Chiang and bowed in appreciation, saying, "Your Highness has done me:
The favor of saving my life."
"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Sung Chiang. "I am not the ruler of this mountain stronghold but am merely a sojourner from Yün-ch'eng district. It is these three chieftains to whom you should pay your respects."
When Yüeh-niang had finished paying her respects, with Wu K'ai escorting her, she left the mountain stronghold, got into her sedan chair, and proceeded past Ch'ing-feng Mountain along the highway to Ch'ing-ho district. Truly:
Breaking to pieces the jade cage,
the phoenix flies away;
Smashing apart the metal padlock,
the dragon breaks free.
A poem testifies to this:

In this world, the heart of man alone remains vile;
In all things demanding that Heaven show him favor.[49]
If the square inch of one's heart is devoid of evil;
Even amid wolves and tigers, [50]one can achieve success.

One day, Wu Yueniang sent for Uncle Wu and told him she wished to go and offer incense at the temple at Taianzhou. When Ximen Qing was desperately ill, she had promised to make sacrifice there.
"If you go, I must go with you," Uncle Wu said. They got ready offerings, incense, candles, and paper things, and decided that Daian and Laian should go with them. They hired three horses, and a sedan chair for Yueniang. Before they left, Yueniang told Meng Yulou, Pan Jinlian, and Sun Xue'e to look well after the house, and Ruyi'er and the maids to take care of Xiaoge. They were to fasten the doors early and not to leave the house.
"You must stay at home," she said to Chen Jingji, "and keep the gate with Clerk Fu. I shall make my offerings on the morning of the fifteenth, which means that I shall be back here at the end of the month."
On the eve of her departure, she took leave of Ximen Qing's tablet, and drank wine with the ladies. She gave all the keys to Xiaoyu. They started before dawn and, leaving the city, set out on the high road. It was the end of autumn: the days were short and the weather cold. Though they only halted once during the day, they could not cover more than sixty or seventy li; and, when the sun set, they went to an inn or the house of some villager to spend the night and started again early the next day. It was almost wintry weather, and the wild geese seemed chill and full of sadness. The leaves had withered on the trees; the countryside was bare and melancholy, and there was a great air of mourning everywhere.
After some days, they reached Taianzhou. From there they could see Taishan, the most renowned of all the mountains in the world. It stood deep-rooted in the earth, and its summit pierced the heart of the sky. It is between the states of Qi and Lu, and the very air about it is holy. Uncle Wu saw that it was late, and they went to an inn. The next day they rose very early and went up the mountain to the Daiyo Temple built upon the mountainside. Dynasty after dynasty had venerated this temple, and generation after generation had worshipped there.
Uncle Wu took Yueniang there. She offered incense before the principal shrine and visited all the sacred images. A priest read her declaration. She burned paper money in all the chapels and partook of monastic food. Then she went with Uncle Wu to climb to the highest peak of the mountain. They went up the forty-nine winding paths, clinging to the ivy and scrambling past the vines, and at last caught sight of the Palace of Niangniang far above them in the sky. They had still forty or fifty li to go. Wind and cloud, thunder and rain, were all beneath them now. It had been the hour of the Dragon[2] when they left the Daiyo Temple. It was the hour of the Monkey[3] when they came to the Golden Palace of Niangniang. There was a red sign over the entrance with these words emblazoned in gold upon it: "The Palace of Radiant Sunset." They went inside and gazed upon the figure of Niangniang.
Wu Yueniang made obeisance. A Daoist priest came and stood beside her. He was a short man, about forty years of age, with three wisps of beard. His eyes were very light and his teeth white. He wore a hat with a pin, and a purple gown. His shoes were embroidered in a cloud design. He read Yueniang's declaration; then they burned incense in a golden burner, and gold and silver papers, and a boy was told to take away the offering.
This priest was really a very bad man. He was the principal disciple of the Abbot of the Daiyo Temple, and his name was Shi Bocai. He was immoderately fond of women and money, and a fellow completely absorbed in the affairs of this world and the pursuit of power. In this district there was an outrageous scoundrel called Yin Tianxi, a brother-in-law of Gao Lien, the local magistrate. This scoundrel was the leader of a band of villains who haunted the neighborhood of the two temples, armed with bows and arrows, and accompanied by hawks and dogs. They preyed especially on women pilgrims, and nobody had the courage to complain about them. The priest, Shi Bocai, allowed them to use his place for their evil purposes. He devised all manner of schemes for getting women to his rooms, and then handed them over to the scoundrel Yin to do what he liked with. He saw that Yueniang was beautiful and that she was in mourning. She must be, he decided, a lady of good family and wealthy. She had only a white-haired old gentleman and two boys to protect her. So he went up, made a reverence to her, thanked her for her offering, and asked her to take tea in his room.
Uncle Wu thanked him. "It is very kind of you," he said, "but we must go down at once."
"There is still plenty of time," the priest said, and took them to his apartments.
The room he led them into was very white and clean. In the place of honor was a couch with embroidery of sesame flowers upon it, and yellow hangings. Over a small table was a picture of Dongbin playing with white peony flowers. On either side was a scroll. One bore the words: "The Pure Wind made his sleeves dance like storks," and the other "In the Moonlight, he discussed the Holy Scriptures." The priest asked their names.
"My name is Wu," Uncle Wu said, "and this is my sister who has come to make sacrifice for her late husband. But we must not impose upon your kindness."
"Since you are so closely related," the priest said, "perhaps you would not mind both taking the place of honor." He himself sat down in the host's place and told one of the novices to bring tea. There were two novices, one called Guo Shouqing and the other Guo Shouli. They were about sixteen years old and very handsome. They wore black silk hats and long gowns, light shoes, and white socks, and used a great deal of perfume. They served the visitors who came to the temple with tea, water, and wine, and the guests who stayed the night there were accustomed to employ them for the basest uses. These two boys closed the door and brought in a number of delightful vegetarian dishes. They offered Uncle Wu and Yueniang excellent tea made of spring water. When the tea had been cleared away, they at once brought wine and a host of dishes, chicken, goose, duck, and fish. They poured the golden wine into amber cups.
When the wine appeared, Yueniang decided that it was time to go. She called Daian, and upon a red lacquer tray the boy offered the priest a roll of cloth and two taels of silver. Uncle Wu begged him to accept them. "Do not trouble to offer us wine and food," he said. "It is late and we must go back."
The priest thanked them. "Only by the grace of Niangniang," he said, "am I in charge of this temple. I live upon the charity of others and, if I may not spend what comes to me upon entertainment, upon what shall I spend it? I have offered you the very simplest of fare, yet you give me valuable presents. I really don't know whether I can accept them or not."
When they urged him to do so, he told the boys to take the presents. "But you must sit down," he said, "and have some wine, so that I may show how kindly I feel towards you."
Uncle Wu could not refuse, and they sat down again. Hot dishes were brought. The priest said to the boys: "This wine is not good enough. Go and open that jar of lotus wine that his Lordship Xu sent me, and offer some to this gentleman."
The boys brought another jar and warmed some of the wine. The priest filled a cup and offered it with both hands to Yueniang. She was unwilling to take it, and Uncle Wu explained that she never drank wine.
"Lady," the priest said, "after so trying a journey you must take some." He then offered half a cup and Yueniang took it. He filled another and offered it to Uncle Wu, saying: "My lord, try this wine and tell me what you think of it."
Uncle Wu tasted it. It was very sweet and well bodied. "It is excellent," he said.
"It was given to me by Xu, the Prefect of Qingzhou," the priest said. "His lady, and his son and daughter, come to offer sacrifice here every year, and he is one of my most intimate friends. His daughter's baby has been placed under the protection of Niangniang. They regard me as a hardworking, plain fellow, but they appreciate my sincerity and love and respect me. You see the government has cut down the revenue of these two temples by half, but, fortunately, this excellent prefect wrote and arranged that the whole of it should be left to us. So we have money enough to burn incense to Niangniang, and what is left we spend upon the entertainment of pilgrims."
While they were talking, the two boys and the porters were entertained elsewhere. There was as much as they could eat. Uncle Wu drank a few cups of wine and then again prepared to take his leave. It was getting late.
"The sun has gone down," the priest said. "It is too late for you to go down the mountain now. Will you not spend the night here and start tomorrow morning? That will be much pleasanter for you."
"I have left some luggage at the inn," Uncle Wu said, "and I am rather anxious about it."
The priest smiled. "Don't worry about that," he said. "I give you my word that it will be perfectly safe. When the people in the villages know you are at my place, they will be afraid of me. I could very quickly get hold of anybody who might steal your property and bring them before the local courts."
Uncle Wu said no more. The priest offered him another large cup of wine, but, realizing that it was very potent, he excused himself, saying he was tipsy enough already and that he must go and change his clothes. He went to the back part of the building and looked around. Yueniang was very tired. She went to lie down on the couch and the priest closed the door and went away.
Suddenly Yueniang heard a noise. It was a man creeping through a little door behind the bed. His face was red and bearded. He was about thirty years old, and wore a black hat and a purple gown. He took Yueniang in his two hands.
"I am Yin Tianxi, at your service," he said, "the brother-in-law of Magistrate Gao. I heard that you were a lady of good birth and very beautiful, and I was anxious to make your acquaintance. Now I have seen you, I realize my good fortune. If you are kind to me, I shall never forget it."
He pressed her down on the couch and would have forced her. Yueniang was frightened and cried aloud. "In this world of peace and brightness, would you dare to assault a woman of good birth?" she cried. She tried to escape, but the man prevented her. He knelt down.
"Lady," he said, "do not make such a noise. Take pity on me, and listen to my urging."
Yueniang only cried the louder: "Help! Help!" Laian and Daian recognized their mistress's voice and dashed to the back to call Uncle Wu. "Uncle," they cried, "come at once. Our lady is fighting with someone in the priest's room."
Uncle Wu hurried as fast as he could. He pushed the door but could not open it. He could hear Yueniang crying: "Why are you trying to keep me here?"
"Sister, don't be afraid," Uncle Wu shouted. "I am here." He picked up a piece of rock and forced open the door. When Yin Tianxi saw that someone was coming, he released Yueniang and slipped quickly away through the back. There were many ways of escape. Uncle Wu came in. "Sister," he cried, "has he done you any harm?"
"No," Yueniang said, "but he has got away."
Then Uncle Wu tried to find the priest, but the priest eluded him and sent his young novices to face the trouble. Uncle Wu was terribly angry. He bade Laian and Daian break all the windows and doors in the temple, and then took Yueniang away. She got into her sedan chair and they went down the mountain as fast as they could. It was about sunset when they left the temple and midnight when they came to their inn. Uncle Wu told the people of the inn what had happened. They were greatly disturbed. "You should not have challenged that evil star, Yin," they said. "He is the magistrate's brother-in-law, and everybody knows his goings-on. When you have gone, we shall suffer. He will not let you go for nothing."
Uncle Wu paid the reckoning and gave the innkeeper an extra tael. Then all the luggage was packed up; Yueniang got into her sedan chair, and they set off posthaste.
Yin Tianxi was angry. He gathered twenty or thirty of his men, all armed with swords and clubs, and they raced down the mountainside. Meanwhile, Uncle Wu and his people went straight on. About the fourth night watch, they came to a clearing and saw, afar off, a light shining through the forest. They went towards the light and came to a cave in which an old monk was reading the sacred scriptures by candlelight.
"Venerable Teacher," they said to him, "we have been to offer sacrifice at the temple, and now evil men are pursuing us. We have lost our way in the darkness. Will you tell us where we are, and how we can get from here to Qinghe?"
"You are on the eastern spur of Taishan," the old monk told them. "This cave is known as the Xuejian Cave, and I am called the Holy Man of Xuejian, though my real name is Pujing. I have been here for thirty years, mortifying the flesh. It is good fortune that has brought you to me. Do not go farther. There are many wild beasts on these mountain slopes, and it will be better for you to start tomorrow. The high road to Qinghe is not far from here."
"But I am afraid those evil men may find us," Uncle Wu said.
The old man looked about him. "Do not let that trouble you," he said. "The scoundrels have gone home already." He asked Yueniang's name.
"She is my sister," Uncle Wu said, "the widow of Ximen Qing. She came to offer sacrifice for her husband. Venerable Teacher, you have saved our lives, and we can never cease to be grateful to you."
They spent the night in the cave. Before dawn, Yueniang offered the old monk a roll of cloth. He would not accept it.
"I want one of your sons to be my disciple," he said.
"My sister has only one child," Uncle Wu said, "and she hopes to bring him up to continue the family. If she had another son, she would certainly give him to you."
"My baby is still very young," Yueniang said. "He is not a year old yet. He cannot come to you."
"I don't want him now," the old monk said, "I only ask for your promise that I'll have him in fifteen years' time."
Yueniang decided that she would settle that when the 15 years were over. She made an indefinite kind of promise. Then they said goodbye to the old monk and set out along the high road to Qinghe.

108
Wu Yüeh-niang Surprises Chin-lien in the Act of Adultery; Auntie Hsüeh Agrees to Sell & Dismiss Ch'un-mei on a Moonlit Night

The trouble of bringing up daughters is bound to be disillusioning:[1]
To admit their husbands into the family is even more inappropriate.
They may address their in-laws as parents,
but without genuine feeling;
They may choose to play the part of sons,
but their acting is specious.
On entering your home they will complain of receiving inadequate love;
On leaving your household they are more likely than not to hate you.
If they feel that they are not receiving the treatment they deserve;
They can be counted upon to abuse their spouses at least once a day.
Wu K'ai escorted Yüeh-niang on her way back until the day that she arrived home. But no more of this.
To return to our story, ever since Yüeh-niang had left home, P'an Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi:
In both the front and rear compounds, carried on with each other at home as though engaged in:
The mating dance of a cock and a hen.
Not a single day elapsed without their getting together.
One day, Chin-lien noticed that:
Her eyebrows were drooping, and Her waistline was expanding;
all day long she suffered from:
Lassitude and drowsiness, and

Had no desire to eat anything.
Calling Ch'en Ching-chi into her room, she said to him, "I've got something I need to tell you. For the last several days:
My eyelids are reluctant to open,
My midriff is gradually expanding,
My belly feels quivering motions,
I don't feel like eating anything, and
My body feels extremely lethargic.
While your father-in-law was still alive I asked Nun Hsüeh for a fertility potion containing the afterbirth of a firstborn male child that would enable me to conceive, but nothing ever came of it. Now that he is dead, even though I haven't been involved with you for very long, I am already pregnant. It was in the third month that I last menstruated, and it has been only six months since then, but I already have half a bulge in my belly. In the past I have been quick to criticize the faults of others, but now it looks as though I am likely to become a target of criticism. You'd better not remain:
Still asleep in dreamland, but take advantage of the fact that the First Lady is away from home to go procure an abortifacient of some kind for me so that I can dispose of this fetus and be able to appear in public without embarrassment. Otherwise, if I have no alternative but to give birth to some benighted creature, I might as well commit suicide, for I won't be able to:
Raise my head and look people in the eye."
On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi said, "We have all kinds of pharmaceutical ingredients in our shop, but I don't know which of them might serve as abortifacients, and I lack any recipe for their concoction. But you can relax. It's not a problem. That Dr. Hu who lives on Main Street is proficient at prescriptions, both great and small, palpation of the pulse, and the treatment of female disorders and has been called upon by our household in the past. I'll go and obtain a couple of prescriptions from him which you can take in order to abort the fetus."
"My good brother," the woman responded, "you'd better get a move on if you want to save my life."
Ch'en Ching-chi, thereupon, wrapped up three mace of silver and went straight to the gate of Dr. Hu's house and called to be let in. Dr. Hu was at home and came outside, where he greeted him with a bow.
Recognizing Ch'en Ching-chi as the son-in-law of the prominent official Hsi-men Ch'ing, he offered him a seat, saying, "I haven't seen you for some time. May I ask what brings you to my humble abode, and:
What it is you would have me do for you?"[2]
"There is nothing else I would trouble you with," said Ch'en Ching-chi as he withdrew the packet of silver from his sleeve and offered it to him. "This is to defray the cost of the drugs. If I might prevail upon you to prepare a prescription or two for me:
It would serve to affirm your goodwill."
"In my family's practice of medicine," responded Dr. Hu, "with regard to the preparation of complex prescriptions, palpation of the pulse, gynecology, pediatrics, internal or external medicine, the Chia-chien shih-san fang (Thirteen alterative prescriptions), the Shou-yü shen-fang, (Divine prescriptions for the realm of longevity), the Hai-shang fang (Overseas panaceas [from the Isles of the Blest]),[3] and the various prescriptions for miscellaneous disorders, there is little that I have not mastered. I am also a specialist in the treatment of women both:
Before conception and postpartum.
Now blood is the fundamental element in female physiology. It is stored in the liver and flows out of the viscera, moving upward to form breast milk and moving downward to form menstrual emissions. It combines with semen to create the fetus. When a woman reaches her fourteenth year menstruation begins,[4] her conception vessel begins to flow, and her menses start to occur at their monthly intervals, which are normally thirty days apart. If her blood and vital energy are out of harmony, there will be an imbalance between her yin and yang. If there is an excess of yang, her menses will occur earlier than usual. If there is an excess of yin, her menses will occur later than usual. It is the nature of blood that if it is hot it will flow, while if it is cold it will stagnate. Either an excess or a deficiency may induce disorder. Cold tends to produce white, and heat tends to produce red. When cold and heat are out of harmony, it is likely to result in red and white vaginal discharge. Generally speaking, when the blood and vital energy are appropriately balanced, the yin and the yang will be in harmonious accord; the semen and blood will converge with each other; and the fetus will be conceived in the uterus. The two pulses emanating from the heart and the kidneys can be palpated to monitor this development. Should the semen predominate, the fetus will be male. Should the blood predominate, the fetus will be female.
This is a self-evident principle.
In the early stages of pregnancy the most important thing is to tranquilize the fetus. Unless suffering from some other ailment, the pregnant mother should avoid taking any drugs or medications. After the ten months of pregnancy, when the time for parturition approaches, special care should be taken lest postpartum problems should develop. Beware! Beware!"
Ch'en Ching-chi laughed at this disquisition, saying, "I am not looking for a prescription to tranquilize the fetus, but for an abortifacient."
"Between Heaven and Earth, Love of life is paramount," opined Dr. Hu. "Nine out of ten people only seek prescriptions that facilitate conception. How can you be looking for an abortifacient instead? I don't have any. I don't have any."
When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that he was objecting to his request, he added another two mace of silver to the sum he was offering and said, "There is no reason for you to concern yourself about it. Individuals have their individual needs. The woman in question does not expect to have a safe delivery and consequently wishes to abort her fetus."
Dr. Hu accepted the silver, saying, "It doesn't matter. I'll give you the prescription for a potion known as the Safflower Clean-Sweeper. If she takes it, in the time it would take her to walk five li the fetus will be discharged."
There is a lyric to the tune "Moon on the West River" that testifies to this:
Take Radix Achyranthis, Eriocheir Sinensis, and Radix Euphorbiae,
As well as Magnetite, Radix Knoxiae, and Daphnes Genkwa Flos,
Together with Cantharides, Hematite, and Sal Ammoniacum,
And dissolve them in a mixture of mercury and saltpeter.
Also add Semen Persicae, and Tetrapanax Papyriferus, Secretio Moschi, Adenophora Tetraphylla,
and Campsis Grandiflora,
And decoct them all in strong vinegar to make the Safflower Potion.
You can be certain that the fetus of the child will be discharged.
Ch'en Ching-chi, accordingly, purchased two doses of the Safflower Clean-Sweeper, bade farewell to Dr. Hu, and turned them over to the woman on returning home, explaining to her, word for word, what the doctor had said. That evening, she decocted the Safflower Potion and proceeded to swallow it. Almost immediately her entire abdomen became filled with pain and, lying down on the k'ang, she had Ch'un-mei press and massage her belly. Who could have anticipated that:
Strange as it may seem,
in no time at all, when she sat down on the commode, the fetus was excreted. Claiming it to be only a menstrual discharge, she had Ch'iu-chü wrap it up in grass paper and discard it in the privy. The next day, when the workman came to empty the contents of the privy, he observed that it contained the plump white remains of a little male fetus.
As the saying goes:
Good deeds seldom become known beyond the gate;
Bad deeds are quickly transmitted a thousand li.
Before many days had passed, the members of the entire household, both high and low, were all aware that Chin-lien had been carrying on an incestuous affair with her son-in-law and had aborted her illegitimate fetus.
One day, Wu Yüeh-niang arrived home after having been away for half a month on her journey to and from T'ai-an prefecture. It was already the tenth month when she came home, and the members of the entire household, high and low, came out to greet her, feeling:
Just as though she had fallen from Heaven.
Upon arriving home, Yüeh-niang first burned incense to the gods of Heaven and Earth and the Buddha and then paid obeisance before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, after which, she told Meng Yü-lou and her other sister wives, as well as the members of the household, high and low, all about what had happened to her at the temple on the summit of Mount T'ai and in the mountain stronghold. When she had finished, she couldn't help weeping profusely. When the members of the household, high and low, had finished paying their respects to her, Yüeh-niang saw that the wet nurse Ju-i had brought Hsiao-ko with her so that mother and son were reunited. After she had finished burning paper money and serving wine to entertain Wu K'ai before he left, that evening her sister wives provided a feast in Yüeh-niang's honor to welcome her home. But no more of this.
The next day, Yüeh-niang, having braved:
The wind and the frost on her journey, and been exposed to hardship and frightening events, found herself to be suffering from feelings of pain and lethargy throughout her body and continued to be indisposed for two or three days.
Meanwhile, Ch'iu-chü, having been exposed to:
An earful and a bellyful, of gossip about what Chin-lien and Ch'en Ching-chi had been up to, decided to go to the master suite and tell Yüeh-niang how the two of them had conspired to abort an illegitimate fetus and dispose of it in the privy, and how it had been discovered by the workman who came to empty the privy and consequently become public knowledge.
Because of the way her mistress had beaten and abused her, she could not contain her resentment, but when she went to the door of the master suite, Hsiao-yü, once again, spat in her face, boxed her ears, and cursed her, saying, "You lousy tale-telling slave! Get out of here. My mistress has just returned from a long journey and is feeling so unwell that she has not even gotten up yet. Get out of here at once. The last thing she needs is to hear something to upset her."
This abusive reception caused Ch'iu-chü to:
Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel,
Nodding in assent and choosing to withdraw.[5]
One day it was one of those occasions on which:
Something is destined to happen.
Ch'en Ching-chi came into Chin-lien's quarters to pick up some clothes that had been stored there by the pawnshop, and he and the woman proceeded to fall to it together in the Flower-viewing Tower on the second floor.
Ch'iu-chü took the opportunity to go back to the rear compound and summon Yüeh-niang to come see for herself what was going on, saying, "I have told you what they are up to at least two or three times, but you have not believed me. While you have been away the two of them have been getting together here at home:
Sleeping from morning to night,
And then from night to morning, and now they have actually smuggled out an illegitimate fetus. She and Ch'un-mei have forged an alliance with each other, and today he and she are up to their evil shenanigans once again on the second floor. I have not been telling lies to you. You should come see for yourself as quickly as possible."
Yüeh-niang promptly set out for the front compound. The two of them were just in the thick of things and had not yet come downstairs.
Who could have anticipated that the parrot in a cage hanging under the eaves in Chin-lien's room was capable of speech and called out in a loud voice, "The First Lady is here."
Ch'un-mei, who was in the room at the time, heard this and came outside where she saw that it was Yüeh-niang. Before she could call the woman down from the upper floor, Ch'en Ching-chi, with the clothes he had come to fetch in hand, came downstairs and headed for the door.
Yüeh-niang took him strongly to task, saying, "My child, have you lost your memory? What have you come barging in here for:
As if you didn't know any better?"
"A customer is waiting in the shop," explained Ch'en Ching-chi, "and there was no one else available to come get his clothes for him."
"I left clear instructions," said Yüeh-niang, "that in that case you should send a page boy in to fetch things. What excuse could you have to invade a widow's quarters for no good reason:
As if you didn't know any better?
Such conduct is utterly shameless."
These accusations caused Ch'en Ching-chi to flee outside, as though:
Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,
There was no place for him to hide.
Meanwhile, the woman was so embarrassed that she did not venture to come downstairs for what seemed like half a day.
When she finally did come down, Yüeh-niang gave her a real dressing down, saying, "Sister Six, from now on you had better not continue to carry on so shamelessly. You and I are now widows, and our status is not what it was when we had a husband. Though:
Everything may remain sweet smelling at home,
Our reputation will become malodorous abroad.
Even basins and jugs have ears.
What sort of shenanigans have you been up to with this youngster:
As if you didn't know any better?
You have given our servants reason to make unspeakably obscene allegations about you behind your back. As the sayings go:
If a man is untrustworthy,
He's as weak as untempered steel;
If a woman is unfaithful,
She's as pliable as sesame candy.
If one is upright,
One will achieve one's aims without giving orders;
If one is not upright,
Though one may give orders they will not be obeyed.[6]
If you were resolute and straightforward in your conduct, you would not give the servants any reason to criticize you behind your back. They have complained to me about you several times in the past, and I did not believe them. But today, I have seen what you are up to with my own eyes, and it is unspeakable. As I have admonished you today, you must form a resolution to protect our husband's good name in the future. Take my own case; while I was away on my incense-burning pilgrimage I was threatened with violence and coercion by those ruffians two or three times. If I had not been rigorous in protecting my honor, I might never have been able to make my way home."

When Chin-lien was subjected to this tirade of criticism from Yüeh-niang, she was so embarrassed that her face became a patchwork of red and white blotches, and she denied the charges a thousand times over, saying, "I was on the second floor burning incense, while our son-in-law Ch'en was in the storeroom nearby collecting his clothes. Whoever said so much as a word to him?"
At this juncture, Yüeh-niang, after disputing with her for some time, returned to the rear compound.
That evening in their quarters, Hsi-men Ta-chieh also took Ch'en Ching-chi to task, saying, "You lousy jailbird! You can hardly deny that you were caught red-handed with:
Irrefutable proof of your guilt, yet you continue to babble on about it. What sort of shenanigans were the two of you up to on the second floor? It goes without saying that the two of you have been up to mischief together while keeping me in the dark just as though you had:
Put a water crock over my head.
That whore has stolen my husband while still trying to keep me entrammeled with her specious words.
Like the bricks in the privy:
She is both hard and smelly, and seems to think she can still continue to ride herd on me. She's just like:
The ramshorn scallion that grows by the southern wall:
The longer it stays there the hotter it gets.
And you seem to think that you can still go on scrounging for food in this household."
"You whore!" retorted Ch'en Ching-chi. "While your family has hold of my money, you have the nerve to accuse me of scrounging for food off them."
So saying, he headed off for the front compound in a fit of pique.
From this time on, Ch'en Ching-chi kept to the front compound, no longer daring to enter the rear compound without some legitimate excuse. When it was necessary to get anything from the storeroom, either Tai-an or P'ing-an would come inside and go up to the second floor to fetch it. Food for the midday meal was no longer brought out to the shop from the rear compound, leaving Manager Fu Ming in his hunger no recourse but to take money and go out on the street and purchase ready-made noodles to eat. Truly:
When the dragon battles the tiger,
The one hurt is the innocent fawn.
All the doors and gates were closed while the sun was still high in the sky. As a result, the amorous relations between Ch'en Ching-chi and Chin-lien were interrupted once again. Ch'en Ching-chi's original family home had been looked after and occupied for some time by his maternal uncle, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, who had forfeited his office and was residing there in retirement. Ch'en Ching-chi resorted to going there for his meals, both early and late, and Yüeh-niang did not even bother to inquire about it.
The two of them were separated for as much as a month without even seeing each other. For the woman, all by herself:
Each day was like three months of autumn;
Each night seemed like half a summer.
How could she endure:
The seclusion of her deserted chamber,
Or the scorching flames of her desire?
To even catch a glimpse of him was:
As difficult as difficult could be,
and between the two of them:
All communication had been cut off.
As for Ch'en Ching-chi:
There was no way he could gain access to her.[7]
Suddenly one day, he caught sight of Auntie Hsüeh as she passed by outside the gate, and it occurred to him that he might be able to prevail upon her to deliver a note to Chin-lien on his behalf that would:
Express his concern about their separation,
And serve to reveal his innermost feelings.
One day, on the pretext of going to settle accounts with a creditor outside the city gate, he rode his mount straight to the home of Auntie Hsüeh, tied up his mule, raised the hanging screen, and asked, "Is Auntie Hsüeh at home?"
Her son Hsüeh Chi's wife, Chin Ta-chieh, was sitting on the k'ang with her baby son in her arms, in the company of two girls that people had entrusted to Auntie Hsüeh to offer for sale as maidservants. When she heard someone calling for Auntie Hsüeh, she came out and asked who it was.
"It's only me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, and asked, "Is Auntie Hsüeh at home, or not?"
"Uncle, please come inside and have a seat," responded Chin Ta-chieh. "My mother-in-law has gone to someone's place to collect payment on a few items of costume jewelry that she is offering for sale. What have you got to say to her? I'll send someone to call for her."
So saying, she hastened to pour out a serving of tea for Ch'en Ching-chi.
After he had sat there for a little while, who should appear but Auntie Hsüeh, who came in and greeted Ch'en Ching-chi with a bow, saying, "Uncle, what wind has blown you to my home here?"
Turning to Chin Ta-chieh, she said, "Pour out some tea for Uncle to drink."
"He has just finished a serving of tea," said Chin Ta-chieh.
"I would not have bothered to come for no reason," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but I have been entangled, thus and so, with the Fifth Lady for some time, and now, thanks to the wagging tongue of that maidservant Ch'iu-chü, our liaison has been disrupted, and both the First Lady and my wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, have decided to turn a cold shoulder to me. My relationship with Sister Six is such that:
We can never agree to be separated, but the two of us have been kept apart for some time now, and:
All communication has been cut off.
I would like to send a few words to her, but there is no one able to get inside for this purpose. That is why I have felt compelled to appeal to you in the hope that you might find some way, thus and so, to transmit a message on my behalf."
Reaching inside his sleeve, he brought out a tael of silver, and said, "This paltry gift is merely offered in the hope that you can use it to purchase some tea for yourself."
No sooner did Auntie Hsüeh hear him out than she fell to:
Clapping her hands and beating her palms, as she laughed out loud, saying, "Whoever heard of a son-in-law making out with his mother-in-law? Such conduct is unheard of in this world. Uncle, tell me the truth. Really, how did you ever accomplish such a thing?"
"Auntie Hsüeh," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "pray keep your voice down, and stop scoffing at me. I have brought a sealed note here with me, and I hope that, for better or for worse, you will be good enough to deliver it to her for me tomorrow."
Auntie Hsüeh took the note with one hand, saying, "Ever since your First Lady returned from her pilgrimage I haven't gone to pay a call on her, so if I go do so now I can kill two birds with one stone."
"Where can I expect to hear back from you," asked Ch'en Ching-chi.
"I'll go look for you in the shop and report to you there," replied Auntie Hsüeh.
When they had finished their conversation, Ch'en Ching-chi mounted his mule and returned home.
To resume our story, the next day, Auntie Hsüeh took her box of trinkets and made her way first to the master suite in Hsi-men Ch'ing's house to pay a call on Yüeh-niang. After sitting with her for a while, she also went to visit Meng Yü-lou, and only then went to Chin-lien's quarters.
Chin-lien, at the time, had set up a table and was eating her congee.
When Ch'un-mei saw that the woman was:
Feeling depressed and unhappy, she said, "Mother, you ought not to be so upset. Even the immortal maiden Ho Hsien-ku[8] was falsely accused of having daily trysts with a lover.
When gossip over pros and cons is overheard,[9]
If you pay no heed to it, it will disappear.
But even the immortals of ancient times were sometimes guilty of:
The moral deficiencies of petty persons,[10] not to mention the likes of you and me. Moreover, at present, Father is dead, and the First Lady has given birth to a posthumous son, who may also be said to be:
Of questionable origin.
Consequently, she is in no position to exert control over our private affairs. You might as well relax.
Even if the sky should be about to fall,
There are the four giants to hold it up.
For humans living in this world:
Every day that you enjoy is another day."
Thereupon, she poured out some wine and handed a goblet of it to the woman, saying, "Mother, drink a cup of this warmed wine in order to dissipate your depression."
Then, happening to notice that there were two dogs engaged in copulation beneath the steps, she said, "Since even animals enjoy this kind of pleasure, how can humans be expected to do otherwise?"
As they were drinking their wine, who should appear but Auntie Hsüeh, who came in, bowed in greeting, and said, "The two of you, mother and daughter, are certainly having an easy time of it."
Then, catching sight of the two copulating dogs, she laughed, saying, "What an auspicious omen for your house. As the two of you enjoy the sight, how could it help but relieve your depression?"
So saying, she proceeded to bow to them once again.
"What wind has blown you here today?" the woman asked. "And why has it been so long since you paid us a visit?"
So saying, she offered Auntie Hsüeh a seat.
"I don't know what has kept me so busy all day long," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but I just haven't had any spare time. When the First Lady returned from her pilgrimage to the summit of Mount T'ai I failed to visit her, and she expressed her disappointment to me just now. I also visited the Third Lady on the west side of the rear compound and she decided to purchase two pairs of turquoise ornaments and a pair of decorative pins to hold her chignon in place. She is inclined to handle things promptly and weighed out eight mace of silver for me on the spot. Unlike that Sun Hsüeh-o from the rear compound, who bought two pairs of velvet artificial flowers from me in the eighth month, which were worth two mace of silver, but claims that she is short of cash and refuses to pay me. She is really a stingy sort. But may I venture to ask, why were you not anywhere to be seen?"
"I have not been feeling too well the last few days," the woman replied, "and have not been up and about."
Ch'un-mei proceeded to pour out a goblet of wine and offer it to Auntie Hsüeh, who promptly bowed in response, saying:
"If one drinks a cup of wine on entering the door."
At which, the woman interrupted her, saying:
"You'll bear a bonny baby someday."
"I'm no longer able to do so," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "but my daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, gave birth to a son only two months ago."
She then went on to say, "Since the death of your husband, you must have been feeling lonely for some time now."
"Needless to say," the woman responded, "if he were only here everything would be fine. But at present, the two of us are being:
Alternately broken up and ground down.[11]
I won't deceive you, Auntie Hsüeh, but right now in this household:
When people are many, tongues are many.
Ever since the First Lady produced that son of hers, her attitude has changed, and our sisterly feelings are no longer as warm as they used to be. For the last few days, both because I have been feeling depressed and because I have been the target of malicious gossip, I have not gone back to the rear compound."
"It's all due to that slave of ours, Ch'iu-chü," explained Ch'un-mei. "While the First Lady was away from home, she made up an invidious story about my mistress out of thin air and dragged me into it as well, creating quite a disruption."
"So it was all the doing of that maidservant of hers," said Auntie Hsüeh. "How could she bring herself to betray her mistress that way? It goes without saying that:
If you don the black livery of a servant,
You must cling to even the blackest post.
That kind of conduct will never do."
At this, the woman turned to Ch'un-mei and said, "Go see what that slave is up to. I fear she may be eavesdropping on us."
"She's back in the kitchen picking up some rice," said Ch'un-mei. "That ruptured vessel of a slave serves in these quarters as:
Nothing but a leaky trough.
She habitually takes our private affairs and peddles them abroad."
"Since no one else is present," said Auntie Hsüeh, "we can hold a frank conversation. Yesterday, your son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi came to my place and told me, thus and so, what has been going on. So it turns out that she was the one responsible for exposing your affair. Ch'en Ching-chi told me that the First Lady has taken him severely to task, seen to it that all the doors are tightly secured, and prohibited him from coming inside to fetch clothes or pharmaceutical supplies. And that she has even gone so far as to move his wife Hsi-men Ta-chieh into the rear compound to reside in Li Chiao-erh's former quarters on the east side of the courtyard, and stopped sending food out to the shop for his lunch, so that he has been compelled to go to the home of his maternal uncle Chang Kuan for his meals. What sense does it make for her to refuse to trust her own son-in-law, but to put her trust in those page boys instead? He said that it has been some time since he has seen you and pleaded with me to deliver a note to you. He sends you his ardent regards and suggests that you should not allow yourself to be upset. After all, since your husband is dead, you might as well determine to go flat out and do what you want, no matter how much of a commotion it may cause.
What is there to be afraid of?
Rather than fearing that a stick of incense may produce smoke,
You might as well simply set it on fire and let it go at that."
Thereupon, she took out the sealed note that Ch'en Ching-chi had entrusted to her and handed it to the woman. When she opened it and took a look she found that it contained nothing but a song to the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers" that read as follows:
The fire in the Zoroastrian Temple[12]
burns my skin and flesh;
The Blue Bridge is flooded with water[13] right up to my throat.

Though we try to repress it, the word has been spread abroad.
Even if we should call it off, the damage is already done.
If we should consummate the affair
it would be romantic;
But if we should not, they will still contend that we did.[14]
After the words to the song, it read: "Addressed to the dressing table of Sister Six," followed by the inscription, "Presented with a hundred salutations by Ch'en Ching-chi."
When the woman had finished reading it, she tucked the note into her sleeve.
Auntie Hsüeh said, "He wants you to send a token of some kind back to him, along with a few words, so that he will know that I actually delivered his message."
The woman told Ch'un-mei to share a drink of wine with Auntie Hsüeh while she retired into her room. After some time, she came out with a white satin handkerchief along with a gold ring. She had inscribed a song to the tune "Red Embroidered Slippers" on the handkerchief that read as follows:
On your account, I have had to anticipate surprise and suffer fear;
On my account, you have gone so far as to neglect your spouse.
On your account, I have stopped putting on my rouge and powder;
On your account, I have had to disguise
my intentions before others;
On your account, I have had to resort to deception with my servants.
As a consequence, the pair of us have both become utterly distraught.[15]
When the woman had sealed these things up securely and handed them to Auntie Hsüeh, she said, "Convey my regards to him, and tell him that he ought not to let his temper get the better of him and persist in going to eat his meals at the home of his maternal uncle Chang Kuan. By so doing, he runs the risk of annoying his uncle to the point that he may complain, saying, 'You conduct your business at the home of your father-in-law but come to my place to eat your meals, thereby giving people the impression that both households are hard up.' If he doesn't have anything to eat, tell him to take some money from the shop and use it to buy snacks for himself and Manager Fu Ming. If you continue to let your temper get the better of you and refuse to come inside, who have you got to blame but yourself? It seems he is just an example of the adage that:
The thief suffers from a sense of guilt."
Auntie Hsüeh said, "I'll convey your message to him."
After the woman had also given her five mace of silver, Auntie Hsüeh said farewell, went out the door, and headed for the shop at the front of the compound to look for Ch'en Ching-chi.
The two of them went to a secluded spot where they could talk in private, and Auntie Hsüeh handed the sealed package to him and told him that the Fifth Lady had enjoined him not to let his temper get the better of him or express his resentment, but find a way to come inside when he wanted to; and to refrain from going to eat his meals at his uncle Chang Kuan's place, lest he give him cause for annoyance.
She then showed him the five mace of silver, saying, "This is the reward given me by the lady inside.
The holes in the water clock let it all spill out.[16]
There is no reason to doubt that the two of you will get together again in the future, and if she were to mention it to you without my having revealed it, I would be embarrassed."
"Auntie Hsüeh," said Ch'en Ching-chi, bowing deeply to her, "I am greatly indebted to you."
Auntie Hsüeh took a few steps on her way but then came back and said, "I almost forgot something. Just now, as I was leaving, the First Lady sent the maidservant Hsiu-ch'un to intercept me and invite me back to the rear compound. She asked me to return this evening and take Ch'un-mei away with me because she intends to sell her. She said that she had acted as a go-between for the two of you and colluded with her mistress in facilitating your adulterous affair. That is the reason she wants to get rid of her."
"Auntie Hsüeh," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "go ahead and take her to your place. I'll come pay you a visit someday soon, because there is something I want to ask her."
When their conversation was concluded, Auntie Hsüeh returned home.
Sure enough, that same evening, as the moon was rising, she came back to take Ch'un-mei away but went first into Yüeh-niang's quarters.
"Originally," said Yüeh-niang, "I purchased her from you for sixteen taels of silver, and now you can have her back for the same sum of sixteen taels of silver."
She then turned to Hsiao-yü, and said, "You go out front with her to take care of things, and see that she leaves empty-handed. Don't let her take any clothing with her other than what she has on."
Auntie Hsüeh then proceeded out front and told the woman, thus and so, "The First Lady has sent me to take Sister Ch'un-mei away. She told me that you and she had been:
Colluding in chicanery,
in order to facilitate your clandestine adultery, and that she:
Didn't care about the rights and wrongs, of the situation, but only wanted to recover the original price she had paid for Ch'un-mei."
When the woman heard that she was going to take Ch'un-mei away in order to be sold, she opened her eyes wide and was unable to say a word for what seemed like half a day.
Before she knew it, her eyes brimmed over with tears, and she said, "Auntie Hsüeh, you can see how hard it has been on the two of us to be without a man in our lives. And now, when our husband has been dead for such a short space of time, she wants to get rid of his former bedmates. How can the First Lady be so bereft of human-heartedness, benevolence, and righteousness? Only because she has given birth to this piddling bladder's spawn of hers, she feels she can ignore the rest of us, and:
Trample us into the mud.
That child of Li P'ing-erh's lived for less than a year and a half and had not even come down with smallpox, measles, chicken pox, or rubella yet. Who knows what Heaven may have in store for her, yet her self-confidence is great enough to block out the sun."
"Has her son developed smallpox, or not?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.
"No he hasn't," the woman responded. "After all, he's not even a year old yet."
"Ch'un-mei tells me," said Auntie Hsüeh, "that when Father was alive he took his pleasure with her."
"Took his pleasure with her indeed!" responded the woman. "That dead devil treated her as though she were as important to him as his vital organs.
She had but to say one thing,
And he would comply with ten.
Whatever she asked for, she received tenfold.
As a result, his legitimate wife who was in charge of the household had to take a back seat. If she wanted him to give a page boy ten strokes with the cane, Father would not venture to give him even as many as five."
"It's outrageous!" exclaimed Auntie Hsüeh. "The First Lady is making a mistake to act this way. To send off an attractive young woman who has been favored by her husband without allowing her to take a trunkful of her belongings with her, or even an outfit of clothing, but requiring her to leave empty-handed, will not seem right in the eyes of the neighbors."
"Did she actually tell you not to let her take even an outfit of clothing with her?" the woman asked.
"The First Lady," replied Auntie Hsüeh, "told Hsiao-yü to come with me and see to it that she does not take any clothes with her, other than those she has on."
When Ch'un-mei, who was standing to one side, heard that she was being sold, she did not shed a single tear; but when she saw that her mistress was weeping, she said, "Mother, what are you crying about? Once I am gone, try to get on as patiently as you can. Don't injure yourself by worrying too much. If you worry yourself to the point of falling ill, there will be no one to sympathize with you. Let me go if I must. If I am not permitted to take any extra clothes with me, so be it. It has always been true that:
A decent man does not consume
his inheritance;
A decent woman does not wear
her bridal clothes."[17]
As they were speaking, who should appear but Hsiao-yü, who came in and said, "Fifth Lady, you need not comply with the topsy-turvy instructions of my mistress. After all, the young lady has served you faithfully for all this time. I am prepared to:
Deceive my superiors but not my inferiors.
You ought to select two of the best outfits from her trunk, wrap them up, and entrust them to Auntie Hsüeh to take along for her, both as a memento of her years with you, and to assist her as she embarks on her new life."
"My good sister," exclaimed the woman, "you are actually exhibiting a trace of benevolence and righteousness."
"After all," responded Hsiao-yü:
"Who can be sure that nothing will ever happen to them?
Both the toad and the cricket,
Inhabit the same spadeful of earth.
When the hare dies, the fox is sad;
Creatures grieve for their fellows."
They then brought out Ch'un-mei's trunk and told her to pick out the kerchiefs and turquoise hairpins that she was accustomed to wear and take them with her. The woman selected two outfits of top-grade silk and satin garments, together with shoes and foot-bindings, and wrapped them up in a large package for her. She also gave her several of her own hairpins, combs, clasps, pendants, and rings. Hsiao-yü, too, pulled two pins out of her hair and gave them to Ch'un-mei. The remaining pearl necklaces, frets of silver filigree, and skirts and blouses of variegated and figured brocade, were all left undisturbed and carried back to the rear compound. Ch'un-mei then bowed good-bye, and the woman and Hsiao-yü bade her farewell with tears in their eyes. As she was about to go out the gate, the woman wanted her to go pay a farewell obeisance to Yüeh-niang and the others, but Hsiao-yü stopped her with a negative wave of her hand. Ch'un-mei then proceeded to follow Auntie Hsüeh, without even turning her head, as she nonchalantly and resolutely marched out the main gate. After the woman and Hsiao-yü had returned from seeing her out the gate, Hsiao-yü went back to the master suite to report to the First Lady, saying, "She left empty-handed, and her wardrobe has been retained, so she was not allowed to take anything with her."
Chin-lien made her way back to her quarters, where she was used to having Ch'un-mei's company. The 2 of them had been on intimate terms and were accustomed to sharing their innermost feelings with each other. But now that she had gone, her quarters seemed cold and desolate, and she felt so lonely that she commenced to weep aloud. A poem testifies to this:

Her intimate words remain,
But now their love is severed;
In her room she is not seen,
In silence her soul melts.

The wheel of passion turns and never stops
And those who watch are oft bewildered.
The fortune of a man is subject to many vicissitudes
And when it is all but attained
It comes to naught.
Man finds it hard to hold his head aloft
While strangers look on coldly
And there is none to sympathize.
All through the day
Her brows were knit in sorrow.
She leaned on all the railings
Knowing not what to do.
She can only hope that the moon still shines
Over the five lakes
She must have patience, the time will come
When she will realize the debt of love.
Pan Jinlian and Chen Jingji followed one another about like a cock and a hen. One day, Jinlian felt a sudden pain and realized that her belly was growing bigger. She felt languid and tired and disinclined to eat anything. She sent for Chen Jingji.
"These last few days," she said, "I have been hardly able to keep my eyes open. My belly is getting big, and I can feel something moving inside it. I have no appetite and my body feels very heavy. When your father was alive, I got some medicine from Nun Xue to make me have a child, and nothing happened. Now he is dead, and I have been carrying on with you only a short time, yet I am with child. It was the third month, I think, when I was last unwell, and that would make the child about six months on the way. Now I, who have always laughed at other people, look like being laughed at myself. Pull yourself together. The Great Lady has not come back yet. Go and get some medicine to get rid of it. If I have the child, it will be the end of me, and I shall never be able to lift my head and look people in the face again."
"We have all sorts of medicines in the shop," Jingji said, "but I don't know which is the right one. And I haven't any sort of prescription for that purpose. Doctor Hu, in the High Street, is a specialist in women's troubles. I will go to him and ask him for something to put you right. He knows us quite well."
"Well, be quick about it, Brother," Jinlian said. "You must do something to save my life."
Jingji took three qian of silver and went at once to see Dr. Hu. The doctor was at home. He knew that Chen Jingji was Ximen Qing's son-in-law and took the young man in.
"It is a long time since I last saw you," he said. "What can I do for you?"
"I have come to trouble you for an abortive," Jingji said. "Here is the money. Thank you very much."
"The people of this world," Dr. Hu said, "regard the saving of life as a very noble thing. Everybody comes to ask for medicine to help them to get babies. Why do you come and ask for the very opposite? I have none."

Jingji gave the doctor another two qian. "Don't let us talk about nobility," he said. "If I am asking for it, it is because I want it. A young woman I know would find it very awkward if she should have a baby, and she wishes to make sure that she does not."
"I will give you some of the medicine that people call 'Clear all out,'" Dr. Hu said, taking the money. "Let her take it and, in the time it would take her to walk five li, the child will come away."
He gave Jingji two doses. The young man said goodbye and hurried back to give the medicine to Jinlian. In the evening she took it with some hot water. Immediately she began to feel pain. She lay down on the bed, and Chunmei pressed her belly. In a very short time, she called for the pail, and the child came away. She told Qiuju that she had been unwell and bade her throw everything into the privy. The next day, when the privy cleaners came, they found a white, well-nourished infant. As the proverb says: Good news is never heard outside the door, but bad news travels a thousand miles. In a very few days, nearly everyone in the household knew that Jinlian had been carrying on with Chen Jingji and had had a baby.
When Wu Yueniang came back, it was the tenth month and she had been absent for a fortnight. She was welcomed as though she had fallen from the skies. She made obeisance to the gods and burned incense, then went to visit Ximen Qing's tablet. Afterwards, she told Meng Yulou and the others of her adventures at the temple. She sobbed as she did so. Then the people of the house came to see her, and Ruyi'er brought Xiaoge. Mother and child came together again.
When she had burned some paper offerings, she gave her brother food and wine and he went home. In the evening, the ladies entertained Yueniang. She was weary after her long journey and the fright she had had, and for two or three days was not at all well. Qiuju, who had heard about the relations between her mistress and Chen Jingji, was very anxious to tell Yueniang all about them. She came to Yueniang's door, but Xiaoyu spat in her face and boxed her ears.
"Get off at once, you scandalmongering slave!" she cried. "My mistress is not well after her long journey, and she is still in bed. If you make her angry, it will be the worse for you."
Qiuju swallowed her anger and went away.
One day, Chen Jingji came for some clothes, and Jinlian and he again amused themselves upstairs. While they were enjoying themselves to the utmost, Qiuju again went to the inner court, and asked Yueniang to come and see for herself.
"Lady," she said, "I have warned you several times, but you would not listen. When you were away, they used to sleep together from morning till night and from night till morning. She even got in the family way. She and Chunmei have both been at the same tricks. Now they are upstairs doing wicked things together. If you do not believe me, come and see for yourself."
Yueniang hurried to the outer court. The couple upstairs were busily engaged, but Chunmei happened to see Yueniang coming and rushed upstairs to warn them. They were greatly alarmed and could think of no place in which to hide. Jingji could only pick up some clothes and run downstairs.
"My son," Yueniang said, "what are you doing here? You seem to have a very poor memory."
"Someone is waiting in the shop and there was no one else to come and get the clothes," Jingji said.
"Didn't I give definite orders always to send a boy for the clothes?" Yueniang said. "What right have you in the room of this woman who has lost her husband? You are utterly shameless."
Chen Jingji ran away as fast as his legs would carry him, and Jinlian stayed upstairs, not daring to come down. At last, however, she did come down, and Yueniang scolded her severely.
"Sister," she said, "you must give up this shameless way of behaving. You and I are widows, and things are very different now from when our husband was alive. Even vases and jars have ears. Why do you associate with this young man? The servants are all saying the most terrible things about you. The proverb says that a man without character is like iron without any strength, and that a woman without character is as soft as honey. When we behave with proper decorum, people will do what they are told without our having to go to extremes, but, if we do not so behave, they will not obey, however severe our orders. If you were straightforward and conducted yourself decently, nobody would dare to say a word about you. I have been told this several times before, but I would never believe it. Now I have seen with my own eyes, and there is no choice left to me. Make up your mind that you will so live as to maintain our dead husband's good name. Take my own case. If I had been a wicked woman, I should never have come back here when that bad man assaulted me."
Jinlian flushed and paled in turns. She was full of denials. "I was burning incense upstairs when he came for some clothes, and I had no conversation at all with him."
There was a good deal of argument, and then Yueniang went away.
In the evening, when Ximen Dajie and Jingji were in their own apartment together, Ximen Dajie said to him: "You villain! Will you still dare to say that I have no proofs? Will you argue with me now? What were you doing upstairs with her today? I can't find words bad enough for you. The best thing would be to put you and her together in a big jar. And that whore, who has stolen my husband, swaggers about in my presence! She is like a tile out of the privy, hard and stinking. She always thinks she is better than anybody else. Do you think you will continue to have your meals here with me?"
"You whore!" Jingji said, in a fury, "isn't my money kept here? I'm not begging for food in this place." He went away in a very bad temper.
After that time, he always stayed at the shop and never came to get anything. Daian and Ping'an were sent to bring anything that was needed. Even the midday meal was served at the shop. Clerk Fu used to take some money and go to the street for noodles, then take them back with him. It was one of those cases where, as when there is a fight between a dragon and a tiger, the little wolf suffers. All the doors and windows were kept shut, even before the sun went down. And so the lovemaking between Chen Jingji and Jinlian was interrupted again.
There was a house belonging to Chen Jingji, which was lived in by his mother's brother. This was a man named Chang, who had no work to do and spent all his time at home. To him Jingji went night and morning for his meals. Wu Yueniang asked no questions. Pan Jinlian and the young man were separated for about a month. She was desperately lonely. Each day seemed like a whole season, and each night was like half a summer. She could not bear the loneliness, and passion raged within her. There was no way she could see him. She could not send out a message, and he could not come near her.
One day, the young man saw old woman Xue going past the door and it occurred to him that she might be able to take a letter to tell Jinlian how much he loved her and how greatly he was distressed by their separation. As soon as he had an opportunity, he pretended to be going out to collect some money, but actually he took a donkey and went to see the old woman. When he came to her door, he tied up the donkey and asked if the old woman was at home. Her son, Xue Ji, and his wife were sitting on the bed nursing their baby. There were two girls in the room, waiting to be sold. When the young woman heard somebody asking for old woman Xue, she went out to see who it was.
"I should like to know if Madam Xue is at home," Jingji said.
The young woman asked him to go in. "Mother has gone to change some ornaments and to collect some money," she said. "If there is anything we can do for you, I will send for her." She made tea for Chen Jingji.
After a while, old woman Xue came back. She made a reverence to Jingji and said: "What wind has blown you here?" She bade her daughter-in-law make him a cup of tea, but the young woman told her she had already done so.
"I would not trouble you," Jingji said, "except on a matter of some importance. You know I have been on very close terms with the Fifth Lady for a long time. Now Qiuju has been blabbing, and we cannot get a chance to meet. The Great Lady and my wife, too, are treating me very badly. I can't live without that woman, yet we have been parted all this time and have no way even of sending a message one to the other. I have thought of sending a letter, but there is no one I can trust it with. So I have come to you. I am sure you can help me."
He took a tael of silver from his sleeve. "This," he said, "may serve to buy you a cup of tea."
The old woman laughed and clapped her hands. "I never heard of such a thing," she said, "a son-in-law carrying on with his mother. Tell me, however did you manage to get her?"
"Sister Xue," Jingji said, "this is not a joke. Here is my letter. You must take it to her for me."
The old woman took the note. "I have not been to see the Great Lady since she returned. I will go to pay her my respects."
"When shall I expect the answer?" Jingji said.
"I will come to your shop and tell you there," the old woman said.
Jingji mounted his donkey and went back to the shop. The next day, old woman Xue took her box and went to Ximen's house. First she went to see Yueniang, then Yulou, and finally Jinlian.
Jinlian was eating some rice gruel and talking to Chunmei, who was trying to make her more cheerful. "Mother," she said, "don't let yourself be so upset. Right or wrong, let people talk if they feel like it. After Father died, the Great Lady had a baby. Did anybody suggest there was anything wrong about that? She cannot control the things we do in secret. Cheer up. If the skies fall, there is always one who upholds them to put them back again. So long as we're alive let us be as merry as we can."
She heated some wine and gave a cup to her mistress. "Drink this," she said, "and drown your sorrow."
Then she looked out into the courtyard. Two small dogs were there, seemingly glued together.
"There!" she said, "even animals must have their enjoyment. Why not we human beings?"
Then old woman Xue came. She made a reverence to Jinlian and again to Chunmei. "I see you are having some fun," she said. Then she saw the two dogs.
"A good omen for this house," she said. "When one sees a thing like that, one ceases to feel lonely."
"You have not been here for a long time," Jinlian said. "What has brought you today?" She asked old woman Xue to sit down.
"I don't know what I have been doing all the time," old woman Xue said, "but I am never idle. I wasn't able to come and see your Great Lady when she came back from her pilgrimage. I have just come from her, and she was quite annoyed with me. The Third Lady was there too. She bought a pair of ornaments and some ribbon from me. She is a good lady, that. She just handed me eight qian of silver. But the lady Sun Xue'e, who bought two pairs of flowers in the eighth month and still owes me two qian for them, doesn't want to pay me. So mean she is! But why were you not in the inner court?"
"I have not been very well lately," Jinlian said. "I didn't feel like leaving my room."
Chunmei heated a cup of wine and gave it to the old woman. Old Xue made a reverence and thanked her. "Ought I to take it, when I have only just come in?" she said.
"It will bring you a good baby," Jinlian said.
"No more babies for me," old woman Xue said, "but my daughter-in-law had one a little while ago. He is two months old. I expect you have been very lonely since your husband's death, Lady?"
"Naturally," Jinlian said. "We have to suffer now in all kinds of ways. There are too many talkers in this household. The Great Lady herself, since her child has been born, has been quite a different woman. We are not so friendly as we used to be. As I told you, I have not been well lately, but we had a quarrel and that is one reason why I have not been near her."
"It was all Qiuju's fault," Chunmei said. "When the Great Lady was away, that slave told a pack of lies about my mistress, and even dragged me into it. It is most provoking."
"She is your maid," old woman Xue said. "How dare she say things about her mistress? One who wears a black gown should stand by a black pillar. She ought not to do things like that."
"Go and have a look," Jinlian said to Chunmei. "She may be listening to us again."
"No," Chunmei said, "she is in the kitchen, picking rice. She is like a torn sack or a leaking manger, going about and telling everybody our business."
"Since there is nobody here, I have something to tell you," the old woman said. "Yesterday, Master Chen came to my house. He told me your maid Qiuju had got you into this pickle. He said that the Great Lady had scolded him, and that she kept the doors and windows tightly closed. He said he was no longer allowed to come here for clothes and medicine, and that his wife had gone to live in a room in the east wing. Nobody sends him anything to eat, and he has to go to his Uncle Zhang's for his meals. It is not right that the Great Lady should not trust her own son-in-law but put all her confidence in the boys. He told me it was ever so long since he had seen you, and that he is dying to do so. He sends this letter and his love. Don't worry, he says. Now that the master is dead, you would perhaps be wise to come out into the open. There is nothing to fear. Sometimes, we are afraid of the incense making too much smoke, but now there is no reason why it should not."
She took Jingji's letter from her sleeve and gave it to Jinlian. It was in the form of a poem written to the meter of "The Embroidered Scarlet Shoe."
The fires of hell consume me
The waters beneath the dark blue bridge are almost to my neck.
What we have to do, let us do quickly
For scandal spreads over the districts of the south
And there is no avoiding it.
Let us then complete the work of joy
For if we do it not, it is as though we did.
When Jinlian read this, she put it into her sleeve.
"He would like you to give him some token, or write a few words to him," the old woman said. "Otherwise, he will not believe that I have given you the message."
Jinlian told Chunmei to drink with old woman Xue and herself went to the inner room. She came back with a white silk handkerchief and a gold ring. On the handkerchief, she wrote a poem to express her love. When she had finished, she wrapped the handkerchief and the ring up together and gave them to the old woman.
"Give him my love," she said, "and bid him be patient. Tell him if he keeps going to his uncle's for his meals, his uncle may get tired of him and say: 'You are doing your father-in-law's business, why do you come here to eat?' It looks as though our people have not food enough to feed themselves. So tell him not to go to his uncle, but to take some money from the shop and spend it on food and cakes and things to eat with Clerk Fu. And tell him to come to the house as usual. If he does not come, it will look as though he were afraid of somebody here."
The old woman promised to tell him all these things. Then Jinlian gave her five qian of silver, and she went to the shop to make her report to Chen Jingji.
They found a quiet place, and old woman Xue gave him the things that Jinlian had sent. "The Fifth Lady says you must be patient," she told him. "Don't allow yourself to be drawn into a quarrel. Come to the house as usual and don't go to your uncle's for your meals. It may displease him."
She showed him the five qian of silver Jinlian had given her. "You see there are no secrets between us," she said. "I am sure things will go well with you, and I tell you about this money because, if she told you about it herself sometime, it would look bad for me."
"I am very grateful to you, old lady," Jingji said, and bowed low to old woman Xue.
She had hardly taken two steps away from him when she came back. "I nearly forgot one very important thing," she said. "When I came away, the Great Lady sent Xiuchun after me. She told me to sell Chunmei. She said that the maid, as well as the mistress, had been carrying on with you."
"Take her to your house," Jingji said, "and I will come and see her there."
The old woman went home.
That evening, when the moon was shining, old woman Xue came to take Chunmei away. First she went to Yueniang's room.
"We paid sixteen taels of silver for her," Yueniang said, "and I will take sixteen taels now."
Then she said to Xiaoyu: "Go and tell Chunmei. She is to go without her clothes."
Old woman Xue went to Jinlian and broke the news to her. "The Great Lady," she said, "has told me to take Chunmei away because she helped you to receive your lover secretly. She is only asking the price for which she bought her."
Jinlian opened her eyes very wide, but she could not speak. Then she began to cry. "Oh, Sister Xue," she said, "you see the kind of treatment we receive now that my husband is dead. It is only a few months since he died, yet now they mean to rob me of my maid. How utterly heartless the Great Lady is. She thinks that, now she has a child of her own, she can drag us all through the mud. But Li Ping'er's child died when it was only eighteen months old. Children have been known to die of smallpox, and we never know what Heaven may have in store for us. She will do well not to raise her hopes too high."
"I suppose his Lordship, when he was alive, took his pleasure with Sister Chunmei," the old woman said.
"'Took his pleasure' indeed!" Jinlian cried. "He treated her like part of himself. She had only to say one word and he believed ten. When she asked for one thing, he gave her a dozen. Even his wives were less considered than she was. If she suggested that he should give one of the boys ten strokes of the rod, he would not dare to give them five."
"The Great Lady is in the wrong, then," old woman Xue said. "You say his Lordship had taken his pleasure of her, yet the Great Lady is sending her away without boxes and without any clothes. She is to go just as she came. The neighbors will think that very strange, I'm sure."
"Did she tell you Chunmei was not to be allowed to take away her clothes?" Jinlian cried.
"Yes, that was her order. Xiaoyu is coming to see about it."
Chunmei heard the whole of this conversation, but she did not shed a single tear. When she saw how her mistress was crying, she said: "Mother, why do you cry? You must not worry about me when I have gone away. It would make you ill and, if you are ill, there will be no one to look after you. Let me go. I don't want any clothes. A good man will not eat food that other people throw to him, and a good girl does not wear her wedding dress."
Then Xiaoyu came. "Mother," she said, "surely you are not going to pay any attention to what the Great Lady says now. She is obstinate at the moment. Sister Chunmei has served you well. Take some of the best clothes, and let Madam Xue take them away for Chunmei as a parting gift from you. She is going away now, and there is no reason why we should say anything to the Great Lady about it."
"You are very kind," Jinlian said.
"Lady," Xiaoyu said, "we never know what is coming to us. We are like frogs and crickets living here. A fox is sorrowful when it sees a dead rabbit; creatures are always sympathetic with their own kind."
They filled Chunmei's box with the things like kerchiefs and ornaments that had belonged to her. Jinlian gave her 2 of her own best dresses and some socks, making a large parcel of them. She gave her pins, rings, and earrings. Xiaoyu took 2 pins from her hair and gave them to the girl. The pearls, headdresses, and embroidered clothes she took back to Yueniang. Chunmei said goodbye to Jinlian.
Xiaoyu cried. When they were on their way to the gate, Jinlian wanted her to go and say goodbye to Yueniang and the others but Xiaoyu advised them not to do so. Chunmei walked proudly behind old woman Xue and never turned her head. Jinlian and Xiaoyu went with her to the gate. Then Xiaoyu went back to Yueniang.
"She's gone now," she said, "and left all her clothes behind." Jinlian returned to her room. She had been accustomed to talking to Chunmei and now Chunmei was taken away from her. She was very lonely and cried bitterly.

109

Sun Hsüeh-o Instigates the Beating of Ch'en Ching-chi; Dame Wang Marries Off Chin-lien to the Highest Bidder & Pan Leaves the House of Ximen

Since there's no such thing in this life as complete satisfaction;
In one's way of coping with the world do not be too demanding.

It's a good thing always to pay heed only to the words of superior men;
When disputes arise never listen to the words of petty persons.
Only regard the customs of the age
as illusory performances;
While respecting the intentions of others
by keeping them at a distance.
If one were to address perceptive women with a word to the wise;
It would be, "Don't ever confide your troubles to your sweetheart."[1]

From the time that Ch'un-mei left the household, P'an Chin-lien suffered from depression in her quarters. But no more of this.

To resume our story, after breakfast the next day, Ch'en Ching-chi went out on the pretext of settling accounts with a creditor and rode his mount to Auntie Hsüeh's house, where she happened to be at home. She invited him in, and Ch'en Ching-chi tied up his mule, came inside, and sat down. Tea was served to him, and he drank it, but Ch'un-mei, who was in an inner room, did not come out.

Auntie Hsüeh knowingly questioned him, saying, "Son-in-law, what have you come here to talk about?"

"I am on my way to settle accounts with a creditor up the street," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and just happened to pass by here. "Is the young lady that you came to take away last night here with you?"

"Yes, she is here," replied Auntie Hsüeh, "but I haven't found a purchaser for her yet."

"If she's here," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "I would like to be able to see her, and say a few words to her."

Auntie Hsüeh deliberately put on a meretricious act, saying, "My dear son-in-law, yesterday your mother-in-law was insistent in telling me that because the two of you had been:
Colluding in chicanery, and produced this ugly scandal, as soon as I have taken her away, I must take precautions to prevent the two of you from meeting or speaking to each other. You had better leave at once. I'm afraid that she might send a page boy here who, on seeing you, would go home and tell her about it, with the result that I would no longer have access to the household."

Ch'en Ching-chi merely responded with an ingratiating smile as he groped a tael of silver out of his sleeve, and said, "You can buy yourself some tea with this for the time being. If you accept it, I will reward you further on another day."

As for Auntie Hsüeh:
Her eyes opened at the sight of money, and she said, "My good son-in-law, short of money as you are, you are willing to spare some for me, are you? The fact is, though, that during the twelfth month of last year I pawned someone's two pairs of embroidered pillow ends in your shop. It has been almost a year since then and, including interest, it would probably cost me some eight mace of silver to redeem them. Could you retrieve them for me by any chance?"

"That's not a problem," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "I'll retrieve them for you tomorrow morning."

Auntie Hsüeh, on the one hand, invited Ch'en Ching-chi into the inner room to get together with Ch'un-mei and, on the other hand, told her daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, to prepare a meal, saying, "I'll go buy some tea things and snacks, and pick up a jug of wine, some potted meat, and the like, for the two of them to eat."

When Ch'un-mei caught sight of Ch'en Ching-chi, she exclaimed, "Son-in-law, a fine man you are! You're just:
An executioner who likes to play with his victims, leaving my mistress and me in such a predicament that we are at a loss for what to do in any direction. You have been responsible for putting us in this situation in which:
The exposure of misbehavior arouses disapproval."[2]

"My sister," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "you have already been expelled from their household, and I do not intend to remain there much longer myself.
He and his wife, Chao Ying-ch'un,
Will each go their separate ways.[3]
You must urge Auntie Hsüeh to find a good place for you. As far as I'm concerned:
Marinated leeks cannot be replanted in the vegetable bed.
I plan to go to the Eastern Capital to consult with my father, and when I come back I'll not only divorce that daughter of theirs, but also demand the return of those boxes of valuables that my family entrusted to them."

Not long after he had finished speaking, Auntie Hsüeh came back with the tea things, wine, and other foodstuff that she had purchased, set up a bed-table on the k'ang, and laid out a repast so the two of them could drink wine and chat with each other. She also joined them for a cup or two. They carried on an animated dialogue for some time about Yüeh-niang's hard-heartedness.

Auntie Hsüeh said, "For her to expel such an attractive young lady as she is from the household without even allowing her to take any clothing or jewelry with her will not serve to enhance her value in the eyes of a future purchaser. And she asked for no more than the return of her original purchase price. Even when you pour clean water from one bowl into another, some of it is likely to be spilled. How mean-spirited can you get? When Ch'un-mei was about to leave, the maidservant Hsiao-yü did her a favor by inducing the Fifth Lady to provide her with two outfits of clothing. If she had not done so, what would she have had to wear when being looked over by a prospective purchaser?"

By the time they began to feel the effects of the wine, Auntie Hsüeh told her daughter-in-law, Chin Ta-chieh, to take her baby with her and go visit for a while with a neighbor so that the two of them would be at liberty to enjoy themselves in the inner room. Truly:
Just like male and female phoenixes amid the misty clouds,
Or like sporting mandarin ducks, diving beneath the waves;[4]
Signing a compact never to be separated
during this lifetime;
They agree to be happily bound together in the life to come.[5]

When the two of them had finished their encounter, they prepared to part but found it:
Difficult to separate and difficult to split.[6]

Auntie Hsüeh was afraid that Yüeh-niang might send someone to spy on them and hurriedly urged Ch'en Ching-chi to get on his way, so he proceeded to mount his mule and return home.

Less than two days later, Ch'en Ching-chi came to present two gold lamé handkerchiefs and two pairs of ankle leggings to Ch'un-mei and also returned the pawned pillow ends to Auntie Hsüeh. He then spent some silver to purchase wine and proceeded to share a drink with Ch'un-mei in Auntie Hsüeh's quarters.

Unbeknownst to them, while they were drinking together, Yüeh-niang sent the page boy Lai-an to find out why Auntie Hsüeh had not yet found a buyer for Ch'un-mei, and he happened to notice the mule tethered outside the gate.

When he got home, he reported this to Yüeh-niang, saying, "Your son-in-law is also there."

Upon hearing this, Yüeh-niang became enraged, sent people to summon Auntie Hsüeh again and again, and criticized her severely when she showed up, saying, "You took that slave away with you:
Promising today that you would do it tomorrow,
And tomorrow that you would do it the next day, while refusing to do your best to dispose of her as I commissioned you to do. It would seem that you are harboring her in order to exploit her propensity to engage in sexual affairs and thereby make some money for yourself. If you refuse to dispose of her, bring her back here. I'll get Old Mother Feng to sell her for me and will no longer patronize you in the future."

When Auntie Hsüeh heard this, with the loquaciousness of a go-between:
Wishing she had seven or eight more mouths than nature had provided, she exclaimed, "My Heavens! Venerable lady, you are mistaken in blaming me that way. Would you have me go after the God of Wealth with a stick? Under your patronage, venerable lady, how could I fail to do my best to dispose of her for you? Just yesterday, I took her to visit two or three potential purchasers, but none of them was willing to come up with the requisite sum. You asked me for the return of the original purchase price of sixteen taels of silver. But, as a mere go-between, how could I come up with such a sum out of my own pocket?"

"My page boy tells me," said Yüeh-niang. "that that seedling of the Ch'en family was drinking wine with her at your place today."

"Ai-ya! Ai-ya!" protested Auntie Hsüeh in consternation. "Here we go again. During the twelfth month of last year, I pawned someone's two pairs of pillow ends at your shop on Lion Street, which they have now paid to redeem. Today, your son-in-law brought the pillow ends back to me, and I offered him a drink of tea, but without even drinking it, he hurriedly mounted his mule and went his way. Since when did he come into my place to drink wine with anybody? It seems that this servant of yours is prone to:
Making up lies and telling tales."

This speech reduced Yüeh-niang to silence for a time, after which she said, "I am merely concerned that that seedling of the Ch'en family may have:
Developed ideas that induce depravity, and Allowed his thoughts to be led astray."

"Do you take me to be a three-year-old child?" expostulated Auntie Hsüeh. "If any such thing were taking place, how could I have been unaware of it? In view of your instructions to me, do you think that I am indifferent to the relative merits of:
Long-term profits, and
Short-term gains?
When he came to my place he did not:
Stick around or sit down for any time, but simply handed me the pillow ends and then departed without even drinking his tea. Since when did he have a chance to see the young lady from your household?
The only thing that ought to matter is the truth, yet you have seen fit to subject me to these accusations. The fact of the matter is that, at present, Commandant Chou Hsiu would like to purchase her in the hope of obtaining a son but is only willing to offer twelve taels of silver for her. If I can get him to come up with thirteen taels, I could then weigh out the silver and turn it over to you. It is said that His Honor Chou Hsiu, on previous occasions, when attending parties at your place, has seen the young lady and been impressed by the repertoire of songs she could sing, as well as her demeanor, and that is why he is willing to spend these few taels of silver for her, despite the fact that she is not a virgin. As for the other potential purchasers, none of them will offer to put up that much."

Auntie Hsüeh thus succeeded in hammering out an agreement with Yüeh-niang on the purchase price.

Early the next day, she got Ch'un-mei's things together and saw to it that she was properly dressed and made up. She sported a cloud-shaped chignon to hold her hair in place;
Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets;
she wore a blouse of red chiffon over a skirt of blue chiffon; and her feet were clad in a pair of shoes with upturned toes. Auntie Hsüeh then hired a sedan chair and escorted her to the home of Commandant Chou Hsiu. When Chou Hsiu observed that Ch'un-mei's countenance was:
Both redder and whiter, than it was before; that her stature was:
Neither short nor tall;
and that she had a pair of tiny bound feet; he was as delighted as could be and weighed out an ingot of fifty taels of silver as her purchase price. Auntie Hsüeh took this home with her, where she chiseled off a piece worth thirteen taels, took it to the Hsi-men residence, and gave it to Yüeh-niang.

She also brought out an additional tael of silver to show her, saying, "This was given to me by His Honor Chou Hsiu as a reward for my efforts. Venerable lady, will you not also give me a little something?"

Wu Yüeh-niang felt compelled to accede to this request and weighed out five mace of silver for her. As a result, Auntie Hsüeh made a profit of thirty-seven taels and five mace of silver out of the transaction. The fact is that nine out of ten go-betweens make the money to support their households this way.

To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi now found himself in a situation in which Ch'un-mei had been sold, he no longer had access to Chin-lien, and Yüeh-niang refused to pay any attention to him. She saw to it that the doors were tightly locked, personally came out every evening to check them by lantern light, and closed and locked the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds before going to bed at night. Because of this, he felt himself to be helpless and was extremely frustrated.

This led him to quarrel with Hsi-men Ta-chieh more than once, calling her a whore time after time, and saying, "Since I married into your family as a son-in-law I have scarcely been guilty of eating you out of house and home, and your family has possession of trunkloads of my family's gold and silver. You are my wife after all, but you not only fail to look after my interests but accuse me of scrounging for food off your family. Since when have I been eating off your family for nothing?"

He attacked Hsi-men Ta-chieh so severely that he reduced her to tears.

The twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month was Meng Yü-lou's birthday, and she prepared several saucers worth of hors d'oeuvres and snacks to go with the wine and told Ch'un-hung. with the best of intentions, to take them out to the shop on the street front of the residence for Ch'en Ching-chi and Manager Fu Ming to enjoy.

Yüeh-niang objected to this, saying, "There's no need to cater to that worthless creature. If you want to provide something for Manager Fu Ming, go ahead and provide something for him to enjoy, but there is no need to cater to that creature."

But Meng Yü-lou rejected this advice, and Ch'un-hung took what she had prepared out and set it down on the counter in the shop. The jar of wine she had provided was large but was soon emptied, and Ch'en Ching-chi told Lai-an to go back and ask for more.

Manager Fu Ming objected to this, saying, "Son-in-law, there is no need to ask for more wine. This amount is adequate, and I am not going to drink any more."

But Ch'en Ching-chi rejected this advice and insisted on sending Lai-an back to get some more.

They had to wait for quite a while, before Lai-an came back and reported, "There is no more wine to be had."

Ch'en Ching-chi was already half drunk on the wine he had consumed and tried to send him back again, but when Lai-an refused to budge, he went out and bought some wine with his own money.

He then berated Lai-an, saying, "You lousy little slave, you just wait. Since your mistress is unwilling to countenance me, you slaves have also started to defy me, refusing to so much as move when I tell you to do something. Since I entered your household as a son-in-law, it can hardly be said that I have eaten enough to deplete your supply of wine or meat. When your master was alive, how did you treat me? But now that your master is dead, you've had a change of heart and begun to ignore me, doing whatever you can to get rid of me. My mother-in-law has paid heed to the slanders of you slaves and started to act defensively toward me, entrusting everything to you slaves, and nothing to me. But let her do as she pleases. I'm:
Quite inured to such alarms."

"My good son-in-law," expostulated Manager Fu Ming, "don't continue to talk that way. If they don't respect you, who do they respect? I imagine they must be too busy in the rear compound, or they would scarcely have refused to supply you with wine. It's no big deal that you should scold them that way, but:
Walls have cracks,
Fences have ears, and someone is likely to say that you have been drinking too much."

"Venerable manager," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "you don't know what's going on. As for me:
Though wine is in my belly,
My concerns are on my mind.[7]
My mother-in-law is credulous enough to believe the slanders that petty persons have lodged against me and treats me as though I have been guilty of intercourse with someone who is not guilty of intercourse with me. What if I were to have carried on affairs with every woman in the household? If I were taken to court, it would only be a case of intercourse with my stepmothers-in-law, which would result in no more than a charge of misconduct.[8] At present, I might as well divorce that daughter of yours and then draft a complaint and take you to court. Or else, I may go to the Eastern Capital and submit a memorial to the throne inside the Myriad Years Gate. Your family has possession of trunkloads of my family's gold and silver, all of which were originally ill-gotten gains accumulated by Yang Chien and are subject to confiscation by the state. How would you like it if I were to succeed in getting these several damned houses of yours confiscated, and the women of the household all sold into servitude by the judiciary? It's not as though:
I were not out to catch fish,
But only to muddy the waters, for the fun of it. If she had any sense, she'd acknowledge me once again as her son-in-law and treat me as she did before, which would be for the benefit of all those concerned."
When Manager Fu Ming heard these threatening words, he said, "Son-in-law, you're drunk.
Wang Ten-plus-nine,
Let's sip our wine,
and set these wanton allegations aside."
At this, Ch'en Ching-chi opened his eyes wide and glared at Manager Fu Ming, saying, "You lousy old dog! How can you accuse me of making wanton allegations, or allege that I am drunk? It's not as though I've been drinking any wine of yours. Unworthy though I may be, I am the favored son-in-law in her family, and you are no more than a cashier employed by her household. Are you also trying to get rid of me? Don't worry, you old dog. You have made more than enough money off my father-in-law over the years, and have had more than enough to eat, and yet you want to join the cabal that is seeking to drive me out, do you? No doubt, you hope to be given sole charge of the business so you can skim off the cash to support your family. In the future when I lodge a complaint and take her to court I'll be sure to include your name in the indictment."
Manager Fu Ming was not a courageous man. When he saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, he put on his outer garments and, surreptitiously heading for home, disappeared in a cloud of dust. A page boy came out to collect the utensils and take them back to the rear compound, after which Ch'en Ching-chi collapsed onto the k'ang and fell asleep. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
The next day, early in the morning, Manager Fu Ming went into the rear compound to see Yüeh-niang and told her everything that had happened the night before. Weeping and wailing, he said that he wanted to quit his job and return to his original home, turn over his account books, and engage in trade no longer.
Yüeh-niang endeavored to dissuade him, saying, "Manager Fu, just relax and carry on your business as before. Don't pay any attention to that worthless piece of goods. He is as expendable as a piece of stinking shit. Originally, on account of the fact that his family was implicated in a legal proceeding, he was sent to seek temporary refuge in our household. There were no such things as gold and silver or other valuables involved. There were only several items from Hsi-men Ta-chieh's dowry, and the luggage that they brought with them. Meanwhile, his old man went into hiding in the Eastern Capital, while the members of our household were left in fear, day and night, that some petty person might inform on him and get us into trouble. When he came here he was no more than fifteen or sixteen years old, a mere fledgling, and he has had the good fortune to be supported by his father-in-law's family for all these years, and trained to be proficient in various enterprises. But now that:
His wing feathers are dry enough for flight,
he is:
Requiting kindness with enmity,
and:
Trying to sweep it all under the rug with a single stroke of the broom.
He's just a youngster whose words cannot be trusted. What does he understand of Heavenly principle? But, in the future, Heaven will not fail to observe his conduct. Manager Fu, just relax and carry on your business as before. Don't pay any attention to him. He will surely come to feel ashamed of himself."
In this way, Yüeh-niang succeeded in placating Manager Fu Ming. But no more of this.
One day it was one of those occasions on which:
Something is destined to happen.
The pawnshop was crowded with customers who had come to redeem their belongings, when who should appear but the wet nurse Ju-i, carrying Hsiao-ko, who had come to deliver a kettle of tea for Manager Fu Ming to drink. As she set it down on the table Hsiao-ko, in the wet nurse's arms, began to cry for all he was worth.
On seeing this, Ch'en Ching-chi, in front of the crowd of customers, addressed himself to the baby, saying:
Half facetiously but in earnest,[9]
"Little brother, my precious child, you stop that crying."
He then turned to the customers, and said, "This child behaves just as though I were his father, in that he does what I tell him to do. When I tell him to stop crying, he stops crying."
This remark stunned the customers, and Ju-i admonished him, saying, "Son-in-law, what kind of talk is that? You even went so far as to address him as your son. Just see if I don't report this to the First Lady when I go back inside."
At this, Ch'en Ching-chi ran up to her and gave the wet nurse a couple of kicks, saying in a jocular but abusive manner, "Why you crazy louse of a stinker! Go ahead and report it; but if you do, I'll kick your ass hard enough to produce a sounding fart."
The wet nurse, with the baby in her arms, promptly went back to the rear compound and wept as she told Yüeh-niang, thus and so, what Ch'en Ching-chi had said about the child in front of the crowd of customers.
If Yüeh-niang had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard it, while she was combing her hair in front of her mirror stand, she was rendered speechless for what seemed like half a day, and then:
Fell to the floor in a faint,[10]
Oblivious to human affairs.
Behold:
The jade from the Ch'u mountains is damaged;
Much to be lamented is Hsi-men Ch'ing's lawfully wedded wife.
The bloom in the jeweled mirror is withered;
Despite the ninety days of spring given by the Lord of the East.
Her flowery countenance looks dispirited;
Like the herbaceous peony in the West Garden clinging to the red railing.[11]
Her sandalwood mouth remains speechless;
Like the Bodhisattva Kuan-yin of the South
Seas engaging in meditation.
In the little garden last night the spring wind was disastrous;
Scattering the blossoms of the river plums
all over the ground.[12]
This threw Hsiao-yü into such consternation that she called together the members of the household, high and low, to help Yüeh-niang up into a sitting position on the k'ang. Sun Hsüeh-o then jumped onto the k'ang, administered artificial respiration for some time, and poured a dose of ginger extract into her throat, but it seemed like half a day before she regained consciousness. Yüeh-niang's breathing was obstructed at first, so that all she could do was choke, without being able even to sob out a sound.
The wet nurse Ju-i told Meng Yü-lou and Sun Hsüeh-o about the facetious remarks Ch'en Ching-chi had made about Hsiao-ko in front of the customers in the pawnshop and went on to say, "I endeavored to admonish him with the best of intentions, but he chased after me and kicked me a couple of times, nearly causing me to faint with anger on the spot."
Sun Hsüeh-o continued to support Yüeh-niang in an upright position until the others had left and then, while they were alone together in the room, quietly said to her, "Mother, there is no need to get angry. If you allow yourself to get so upset that:
Anything untoward should happen to you, that would be an even greater calamity. That youngster, because Ch'un-mei has been sold, and he can no longer have his way with that whore from the P'an household, has been frustrated enough to give vent to such allegations. Right now, one must either:
Refuse to do something;
Or not stop at anything.
Since Hsi-men Ta-chieh has already been married off, she is like a plot of land that has been sold, and there is not much we can do for her. As the saying goes:
All you get for raising toads is dropsy.
What's the point of keeping that youngster around the house anyway? Tomorrow, we ought to inveigle him into coming back to the rear compound, give him a real beating, and then drive him out the door to return to his own family. After that, we ought to summon Dame Wang. Since:
She is the one who produced this problem,
She should be the one who eliminates it.
We should get her to take that whore away from here and sell her off, just as one would dispose of dog shit or stinking piss. In this way the whole problem could be solved in a single day. What's the point of letting them continue to reside here, and thereby run the risk of their dragging us into the soup in the future?"
"What you say makes sense," responded Yüeh-niang.
They decided upon their plan there and then.
The next day, after the morning meal, Yüeh-niang arranged to have seven or eight maids and servants' wives lie in wait, armed with sticks and cudgels, and then sent the page boy Lai-an to trick Ch'en Ching-chi into coming into the rear compound for a talk.
Once he was inside, and the ceremonial gate had been closed behind him, she ordered him to kneel down in front of her and demanded, "Do you acknowledge your crime?"
Ch'en Ching-chi refused to kneel and exhibited as haughty an air as ever, while Yüeh-niang proceeded to interrogate him. There is a long set piece of parallel prose that testifies to this.
At the outset, Yüeh-niang did not offend him, but now her countenance altered.
After this, Ch'en Ching-chi, responding to her dressing down, raised his head, Saying, "You need not waste your breath with this incessant bickering.
I've got to arrive at some sort of an understanding with you."
Yüeh-niang said, "This is your father-in-law's private dwelling place;
It is not a Verdant Spring Bordello, or a Nest of Orioles and Swallows.
How can you have the effrontery to flirt with one of his womenfolk?
As your father-in-law's beloved concubine, she is living as a widow.
How can you feel yourself entitled to engage in flirtation with her?
And there is also that shamelessly wanton slave who has ensnared you.
From of old, if the bitch does not wag her tail, dogs will not engage her.
These are all offenses that besmirch the family, and are hard to forgive."
Ch'en Ching-chi cried, "By unleashing a horde of witches to bind Chung K'uei,[13]
You have sprung a trap so you could beat this culprit to your heart's content.
The cheeks of my bottom find this flagellation almost impossible to endure.
You maidservants, cease your agitation; First Lady, forgo your perturbation.
If you don't watch out, these pitiless sticks will end up breaking my back."
Yüeh-niang retorted, "You lousy nincompoop! Do you dare to give me your lip?

As they say, when the ice is three feet thick,
it is not due to one day of cold.[14]
You are guilty of such unpardonable acts that they are difficult to forgive.
You are lucky to be subjected merely to this flailing with stalks of reed.
But if you should have the temerity to think of doing any such thing again,
I'll cut off this perishable prick of yours and leave you celibate for life."

Yüeh-niang, at this juncture, directed the squad of women, including Sun Hsüeh-o, Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu, Lai-chao's wife "The Beanpole," Chung-ch'iu, Hsiao-yü, and Hsiu-ch'un, to proceed, hugger-mugger, to hold Ch'en Ching-chi down on the floor and give him a drubbing with their sticks and cudgels. Hsi-men Ta-chieh saw what was going on but merely withdrew and did nothing to save her husband.

They beat the young scamp until, in desperation, he tore off his pants and exposed his organ, which was standing up as straight as a stick. This so startled the women that they dropped their sticks and cudgels and fled in all directions.

Yüeh-niang, for her part, was both annoyed and amused by this display and berated him, saying, "What a fine phony of a cuckold's spawn you are!"

As for Ch'en Ching-chi:

From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
"Had it not been for this ploy of mine, how could I have escaped?"

Thereupon, he crawled to his feet, pulled up his pants with one hand, and fled out to the front compound. Yüeh-niang deputed a page boy to follow him and tell him to settle his accounts and turn them over to Manager Fu Ming. Ch'en Ching-chi realized that, under the circumstances, he could no longer remain there. After gathering up his clothes and bedding, without even saying good-bye, he proceeded to walk out of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in a huff, and head for his family's old home, now occupied by his maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, to find a place to stay. Truly:

It has always been true that gratitude for kindness and festering resentment;
Even in a thousand years or ten thousand years will never be allowed to gather dust.

When P'an Chin-lien heard that Ch'en Ching-chi had been beaten and expelled from the household, she felt:

Worry piled upon worry, and Depression augmented by depression.

One day, Yüeh-niang, inspired by Sun Hsüeh-o's suggestion, sent Tai-an to summon Dame Wang. Ever since Dame Wang's son Wang Ch'ao returned home from his apprenticeship to a merchant in the Huai River region, from whom he had purloined a hundred taels of silver entrusted to him for the purchase of stock, she had felt affluent enough to give up her business of selling tea. Her son had purchased two donkeys, a set of millstones, and a sieve frame, and set himself up as a miller. When she heard that she was being summoned to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, she promptly donned her outer garments and started off.

Along the way, she said to Tai-an, "Brother, I haven't set eyes on you for a long time, but I see that you're old enough to have started wearing your hair in a bun. Have you taken a wife already?"

"No I haven't," replied Tai-an.

"Since your master is dead," said Dame Wang, "which member of your household is it who is calling for me, and what am I wanted for? No doubt the Fifth Lady is about to bear a son and would like me to help with the delivery."

"The Fifth Lady is not bearing a son," responded Tai-an, "but she has been caught carrying on an affair with her son-in-law. The First Lady would like you to take her away and marry her off to someone."

"My Heavens!" exclaimed Dame Wang. "You see, it is just as I thought, that whore, on losing her husband, could not be expected to maintain her chastity. Just as:

Dogs cannot be trained not to eat shit, she's reverted to practicing her dirty tricks again. So it was with that son-in-law of yours, was it? What's his name?"

"His surname is Ch'en and his given name is Ching-chi," said Tai-an.

"I remember the occasion last year," said Dame Wang, "when I came to ask your master's help in that affair involving the younger brother of Ho the Ninth. Your master was not at home at the time, and that lousy whore not only failed to invite me to stay for a chat in her quarters but refused to come up with so much as a broken needle for me. All she did was to tell a maidservant to pour me a cup of plain tea, after drinking which, I left. I had thought that she would remain a member of his household for:

A thousand if not ten thousand years.[15]

Who could have anticipated that she is now going to be sent away. What a home-breaker of a whore she is. Quite aside from the fact that it was I had who arranged her marriage into such a prestigious household; even if it had been any ordinary person, she should not have been treated so skimpily."

"Because of the chaos she and our son-in-law have created," said Tai-an, "the First Lady almost died of anger yesterday and has already expelled him from the household. And now, she wants you to take her away as well."

"When she entered the household, she came in a sedan chair," said Dame Wang. "And she should be allowed to leave in one as well. She brought a trunkful of belongings with her when she came, and she should also be allowed to take one with her now."

"That goes without saying," said Tai-an. "The First Lady will decide what is appropriate."

As they engaged in this discussion, they arrived at the door of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, and Dame Wang went back to Yüeh-niang's quarters, where she bowed in greeting and sat down.

After they had finished the tea served by a maidservant, Yüeh-niang said, "Dame Wang, I would not have invited you here for no reason."

She then proceeded to spell out, thus and so, all of the preceding events involving P'an Chin-lien and concluded by saying, "Since:

You are the one who produced this problem,
You should be the one who eliminates it.
One guest does not trouble two hosts.

I would, therefore, prevail upon you to take her away again and either marry her off to someone else, or dispose of her in a way that allows her to continue:

Eating the bread of idleness.

Now that my husband is dead, I can no longer afford to maintain such people as this. Needless to say, that dead devil of mine spent vast sums of money on her; enough to cast a silver figurine to match her dimensions. If you give me back whatever you manage to marry her off for, I can use it to hold a sutra recitation for my husband, so some good may come of it."

"Venerable lady," said Dame Wang, "I understand that it is not the money that you are really concerned about, but the need to rid yourself of this troublemaker. I will not let you down."

She then went on to say, "Today is a propitious day for such an undertaking. I might as well take her away forthwith. But there is another issue. She brought a trunkful of her belongings with her and arrived in a sedan chair. She ought to be provided with a sedan chair for her departure."

"I'll let her take a trunk of her belongings with her," said Yüeh-niang, "but I won't allow her to go in a sedan chair."

"My mistress talks that way at the height of her rage," said Hsiao-yü. "But she will not fail to provide a sedan chair when the time comes for her to leave since:

Exposing her face to the public gaze, would only cause our neighbors to laugh at us."

Yüeh-niang did not say anything in response to this but sent the maidservant Hsiu-ch'un to the front compound to summon Chin-lien. When Chin-lien saw that Dame Wang was there in the room, her eyes opened wide with surprise, and she bowed in greeting before sitting down.

Dame Wang opened the conversation, saying, "You had better get your things together right away. The First Lady has instructed me just now to take you away with me today."

"How long has it been since my husband died?" said Chin-lien. "As for me:

What fault have I committed;
What offense am I guilty of?
Why should I be driven away for no good reason?"

Yüeh-niang[16] responded, "Don't you:

Feign being more silly than you are,[17]
Pretending to be both dumb and deaf.[18]

It has always been true that:

When a snake makes a hole for itself
it knows where it is.[19]

Whatever a person sees fit to do,
Is clear in the mind of the doer.

Chin-lien, you had better not:

Disguise your perfidy by playing dumb,[20]
Showing an innocent face to both sides.[21]
Praising here and faultfinding there.

In my hands you can dispense with your:

Clever words and deceptive phrases,
Apple polishing and favor currying.[22]

It has always been true that:

There is no party that does not come to an end.
The beam that projects is the first one to rot.[23]
Just as a man has his reputation,
A tree has its shadow.
Flies don't cluster on eggs unless they're cracked.

You had better not assume that you can continue to support yourself by committing adultery. And right now, I'm going to send you off to oblivion."

Chin-lien responded:

"If you hit someone, avoid hitting his face,
If you berate him, don't expose his faults.[24]

As the sayings go:

If one cock dies, another will crow in its stead.
He who works a sieve will have some grain to eat.[25]
Who can ever defend his head with an iron helmet?
Who can ever shield his eyes with bamboo matting?
Human beings are likely to meet each other again,
Just as fallen tree leaves return to their roots.

You ought not to:

Drive people out with bare hands and naked fists.[26]
In arguing don't heed the words of petty persons.

Truly:

A decent woman does not wear
her bridal clothes;
A decent man does not consume
his inheritance.
It is useless to complain that the weather is cold."

There and then, after Chin-lien and Yüeh-niang had wrangled for a while, Yüeh-niang accompanied her to her quarters and agreed to let her take with her two trunks worth of belongings, a table with drawers in it, four outfits of clothing, a number of clasps, combs, hairpins, and rings, and a set of bedding. She also stuffed the shoes and foot-bindings she was accustomed to wear into one of the trunks. She then ordered Ch'iu-chü to move back into the rear compound and put a lock on the door to Chin-lien's quarters.

Chin-lien proceeded to don her outer garments, bade farewell to Yüeh-niang, and wept profusely in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet. She also paid a visit to Meng Yü-lou's quarters. The two of them had been like sisters to each other, but now:

One fine day they were fated to part,[27] and they could not help shedding tears together.

Meng Yü-lou also gave her a pair of gold hairpins with bowl-shaped ends, a jacket of kingfisher-blue satin, and a red skirt, without Yüeh-niang's knowledge, saying, "Sister Six, from now on, you and I must:

Spend more time apart than together.

I hope you can find a good home, and go on to enjoy a good life. It has always been true that:

Though you erect a thousand li marquee,
There is no party that does not come to an end.

If you find a home, send someone to tell me, so when I go out I may be able to come see you, and thus fulfill our sisterly feelings."

Thereupon, they bade each other farewell with tears in their eyes.
As Chin-lien was about to go out the gate, Hsiao-yü escorted her and surreptitiously presented her with two gold-headed pins.
"Sister," Chin-lien responded, "it would seem you actually have some human feelings for me."
By the time Chin-lien got into the sedan chair at the gate, Dame Wang had already hired workers to carry off her trunks and the table that Yüeh-niang had allowed her to take. Only Meng Yü-lou and Hsiao-yü saw Chin-lien off in her sedan chair, after which they went back inside. Truly:
Of the ten thousand things that create grief in this human world;
Nothing exceeds the severance of death and separation of the living.
To resume our story, when Chin-lien arrived at Dame Wang's home, Dame Wang put her into her inner chamber, where she slept together with her at night. Dame Wang's son, Wang Ch'ao, had grown up to be a tall young man and had started to wear his hair in a bun, although he had not yet taken a wife. A bed had been provided in the outer room for him to sleep on.
The next day, P'an Chin-lien made herself up as usual with:
Exaggeratedly painted eyebrows and eyes, and stood behind the hanging door-blind gawking at the passersby. When she had nothing else to do, she sat on the k'ang, either:
Painting her brows and making up her eyes,
Or idly strumming her p'i-p'a.
When Dame Wang was not at home, she spent her time playing at cards or board games with Wang Ch'ao. Dame Wang, for her part, went about her business as usual, sweeping up the flour from the mill, or feeding the donkeys, without paying any attention to them. It was not long before, as:
The mornings and evenings came and went,[28]
she succeeded in seducing Wang Ch'ao. At night, after waiting till Dame Wang had fallen asleep, the woman would get off the k'ang, on the pretext of needing to urinate, go into the outer room, and get into bed with Wang Ch'ao.
As the two of them went at it together one night, they shook the bed until the creaking became audible enough to wake up Dame Wang, who asked, "Where is that noise coming from?"
"It's only the cat chasing a rat under the counter," replied Wang Ch'ao.
In her half dreaming state, Dame Wang muttered, "It must be because there is some bran and flour lying about the room that this annoying creature is keeping us awake during:
The third watch in the middle of the night."
Later, on hearing the sounds of movement as the bed continued to creak, Dame Wang asked again, "Where is that noise coming from?"
Wang Ch'ao replied, "The cat has caught the rat and is making a noise as he chews at it in the hole under the k'ang."
Dame Wang bent her ear to listen and, sure enough, it sounded like a cat worrying its prey in the hole under the k'ang. Only then did she cease asking about it. As soon as the woman and the young scamp had finished their business, she quietly climbed back onto the k'ang and went to sleep as before.
There are several lines of double entendre that describe this rat very well:
Your body is small, but your daring is great;
Your muzzle is pointed, and prone to mischief.
On seeing anyone, you hide yourself away;
But the squeaks you create can still be heard.
You disturb one's sleep in the middle of the night.
Unwilling to follow the rules of good behavior;
You are given to boring your way into cracks.
And there is another symptom of your knavery:
You can never abandon your taste for stolen sweets.
One day, Ch'en Ching-chi, upon learning that Chin-lien had been expelled from the household and was temporarily lodged in Dame Wang's home while being offered in marriage, took two strings of copper cash, along with some silver, and made his way to Dame Wang's home. When he arrived there, Dame Wang was engaged in sweeping up the donkey droppings in front of her door.
Ch'en Ching-chi stepped forward and greeted her with a deep bow, upon which Dame Wang inquired, "Brother, what do you want?"
"Would you please allow me to speak to you inside?" said Ch'en Ching-chi.
Dame Wang, accordingly, ushered him inside, whereupon Ch'en Ching-chi took off his eye shades and asked, "Is not the woman named P'an the Sixth from the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing lodging here while being offered in marriage?"
"What is your relationship to her?" asked Dame Wang.
Ch'en Ching-chi replied with an ingratiating smile, "I would not deceive you ma'am. I am her younger brother, and she is my elder sister."
Dame Wang appraised him by:
Looking him over from top to bottom,[29] for a while and then said, "Since when does she have any younger brother? I know nothing of such a one. Don't try to deceive me. I imagine you must be the son-in-law of the household, surnamed Ch'en, who has come here in the hope of pulling the wool over my eyes; but I won't let you get away with it."
Ch'en Ching-chi laughed at this and then pulled the two strings of copper cash out from his waist and laid them before her, saying, "These two strings of cash can serve you temporarily to defray the cost of a cup of tea. If you will only consent to let me see her, I will reward you more generously on another day."
When Dame Wang saw the money, she reacted more meretriciously than ever, saying, "Don't talk about rewarding me. The First Lady of the household ordered me not to let any riffraff look her over. But I'll demean myself so far as to make you a proposition. If you want to have a single interview with this woman, give me five taels of silver. If you want to see her a second time, give me ten taels of silver. If you decide to marry her, it will cost you a hundred taels of silver, in addition to which there will be a go-between's fee of ten taels of silver. I don't go in for idle negotiations. What's the point of offering me these two strings of cash that are:
Hardly enough to discolor the water?"
When Ch'en Ching-chi realized that the procuress was adamant in refusing the little he had offered, he plucked a pair of gold-headed, silver-shafted, pins out of his hair that were worth five mace of silver, knelt down on the ground:
Dragging his legs like a chicken on the chopping block, and said, "Dame Wang, pray accept what I am offering. I will bring you another tael of silver another day, without fail. Let me meet with her, and allow us to exchange a few words, that's all."
Dame Wang, thereupon, after accepting his hairpins and silver, said, "You go inside and see her, say what you have to say, and then come out again. I won't allow you to just sit there:
Ogling her with your hungry eyes.
And you must be sure to bring me the extra tael of silver you have promised tomorrow."
Thereupon, she lifted aside the portiere and let Ch'en Ching-chi into the inner room, where the woman was sitting on the k'ang engaged in stitching a shoe.
When she saw Ch'en Ching-chi, she put down the shoe vamp she was working on and complained to him, saying, "A fine man you are! Leaving me betwixt and between:
Unable to reach the village ahead,
Or make it back to the inn behind.
You may have what it takes to get started,
but you don't carry through.
You put me in a predicament in which:
The exposure of misbehavior arouses disapproval, while you disappeared without leaving a shadow behind and didn't even come back to see how I was doing. Ch'un-mei and I have been forcibly separated:
You to the east and I to the west.[30]
And whose fault was that?"
As she spoke, she clutched at Ch'en Ching-chi and began to weep bitterly. Dame Wang objected to her weeping, fearing that it would be overheard.
"My sister," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "on your account, I have been:
Skinned alive and cut to the quick;
while, on my account, you have:
Endured anger and suffered disgrace.
It is not that I have refused to come see you. Yesterday, I went to Auntie Hsüeh's place, where I learned that Ch'un-mei has already been sold to the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu. I also learned that you had been expelled from the household and were staying at Dame Wang's place, waiting to be married off. Today, I made a point of coming to see you in order to discuss matters together.
Our feelings are hard to disregard;[31]
We can never agree to be separated.
So what are we to do about it? At present, I have made up my mind to divorce my wife, the daughter of that household, and demand that the trunks of gold and silver that my family entrusted to them in the past be returned to me. If they refuse to do so, I will go to the Eastern Capital and submit a memorial, together with a legal complaint, to the Emperor inside the Myriad Years Gate. If they propose to return them to me after that, it will be too late. I can then, surreptitiously, using:
An assumed name and appropriated identity, pop you into a sedan chair and take you into my household, so that:
We can remain forever reunited, as husband and wife. There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme."
"Right now," said the woman, "my godmother Dame Wang is asking a hundred taels of silver for me. Do you have such a sum of silver to give her?"
"Why is she demanding so much?" asked Ch'en Ching-chi.
"Your mother-in-law," said Dame Wang, "says that your father-in-law, in the past, expended more than enough money on her to cast a silver figurine to match her dimensions. She insists upon the price of a hundred taels of silver. Not a bit less will do."
"I will not deceive you," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but the warm feelings between myself and Sister Six are such that:
We can never agree to be separated.
Will you not consent to lower the price by half, to something like fifty or sixty taels of silver? I can go to my maternal uncle Chang Kuan's place and rent two or three rooms from him, so I would have a home into which to take Sister Six as my wife.
That would constitute 'a fling in the spring breeze,' even though you would make a little less off the transaction."
"Quite aside from fifty taels of silver," said Dame Wang, "I would not let you have her even for eighty taels of silver. Just yesterday, Magnate Ho, the silk merchant from Hu-chou, offered me seventy taels of silver for her. And Chang the Second from Main Street, who is currently serving as judicial commissioner, sent two adjutants offering eighty taels of silver, duly weighed out in two packets, but it was not enough, and they had to take it back with them. You're just a youngster with:
An empty mouth uttering empty words.
And yet you have the nerve to try to take advantage of me. But I'm not about to let myself be fleeced."
There and then, she strode out into the street and called out in a loud voice, saying, "Just whose son-in-law is it who is brazen enough to propose to marry his mother-in-law, and has the nerve to come farting around my place in order to do it?"
Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into such consternation by this that he pulled the old woman inside with one hand, got down on his knees before her, and pleaded, "Dame Wang, pray be quiet. I'll accept the price of a hundred taels of silver that you demand. The only problem is that my father is in the Eastern Capital. I'll set out for the Eastern Capital tomorrow in order to get the money from him."
"Since you are doing this for me," the woman said, "don't you quibble over the price with my godmother, but go get the money as fast as you can. My only fear is that if you are too late, I may be married off to someone else and won't end up belonging to you after all."
"I'll hire a horse and travel by double stages, both day and night," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "I should be back in half a month, at most, or as little as ten days."
Dame Wang said, "As the saying goes: the first one to cook the rice is the first to eat. In addition, there is my go-between's fee of ten taels of silver. You must not come up short. I want to make that absolutely clear."
"There's no need to remind me," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "Your kindness will be amply rewarded; I'll never dare to forget it." As soon as they finished their discussion, Ch'en Ching-chi said goodbye, went out the door, returned home, and packed his bags for the trip. Early the next morning, he hired a horse and set out for the Eastern Capital to get the money he needed. The trip of his was truly a case of the Green Dragon and the White Tiger accompany each other; good fortune and bad fortune cannot be safely predicted.

Chen Jingji, one morning after breakfast, pretended that he had money to collect, took a horse, and went to old woman Xue's house. The old woman was at home and asked him to come in. Jingji tethered his horse outside and went in. After he had taken tea, the old woman said: "What can I do for you, Brother-in-law?"
"I was out collecting some money," Jingji said, "and thought I would call to see you. I hear the maid came to you yesterday. Is she still here?"
"Yes. I have not found a master for her yet."
"I should like to see her. May I have a word with her?"
The old woman pretended to hesitate. "Good Brother-in-law," she said, "the Great Lady gave me very strict instructions. She said that this maid was being sent away because she and you had been misbehaving yourselves. I wasn't to let you see her. So go away, please. She might be sending some of her boys here. If they came and saw you, there would be trouble for me when they went back and told the Great Lady. I should never be able to go there again."
The young man smiled and took a tael of silver from his sleeve. "Buy yourself a cup of tea with this," he said, "I will give you more, later."

Then the old woman agreed. "I am not in any need of money at the moment," she said. "Perhaps you will keep it for me and give it me some other time. But one thing I do want. At the end of last year, I pawned two pairs of embroidered pillow ends at your pawnshop. That is about twelve months ago and, including the interest, I should probably have to pay eight qian of silver. Will you get them for me?"
"You shall have them tomorrow," Jingji said.
The old woman asked him to go to the inner room, and there he found Chunmei. She told her daughter-in-law to cook something for them, and went off herself to buy cakes, wine, and meat for Chen Jingji and Chunmei.
"Brother," Chunmei said, when she saw Jingji, "a fine fellow you are! Nobody but a murderer would have brought my mistress and me to such a pass that we can neither rise nor fall. Now the secret is out, and you see how people hate us."
"Sister, you have finished with that household now, and I don't see why I should bother about it any more. In this world, we have to go our own ways. See that Madam Xue finds a good home for you. When the fruit of the fields has been dug up and taken away, it can never return whence it came. That is how it is with me. I shall go to the Eastern Capital to see what my father has to say. Then I shall come back and divorce my wife, and claim the boxes and things that those people have of mine."
Old woman Xue soon came back with the refreshments. A table was set and the pair sat down and drank together. Old woman Xue joined them, and they chatted together.
"The Great Lady is very unfeeling," the old woman said. "To a beautiful girl like you, she might at least have given ornaments and clothes. It will be very awkward when you have to go to a new master's house. And she asked the same money for you as she paid. It is like pouring clean water from one cup to another. Some is bound to be spilled on the way. Yes, indeed, she is very, very mean. When you came away with me, Xiaoyu asked your mistress to give you two dresses. Without them, you wouldn't have had a rag to put on when you go to your new home."
When they had had wine enough, old woman Xue told her daughter-in-law to take the baby away, and left them alone to amuse themselves.
She was afraid that Yueniang might send someone to see what was happening, so she would not let Jingji stay very long. He mounted his horse and went home. In a day or two he gave Chunmei two kerchiefs and two pairs of drawers, and got the pillow ends for old woman Xue. He gave the old woman some money to buy wine for him to drink with Chunmei. Unfortunately, Yueniang sent Laian to the house to find out why the old woman had not found a master for Chunmei. Laian saw Jingji's horse outside, and went back at once and told his mistress.
Yueniang was very angry, and sent one boy after another to fetch the old woman. When she came, Yueniang scolded her severely.
"You have the maid, yet you keep putting off finding a master for her. You think you'll make a little extra money for yourself by keeping her to carry on with some young rascal. If you can't attend to this business, let me have the maid back again and I'll give the job to old woman Feng. You'll never be allowed near the place again."
Then old woman Xue plied her go-between's mouth. "Heaven! Heaven!" she cried. "Your ladyship really must not blame me. Do you think I would chase the god of wealth away with a stick? You were kind enough to give me this job, and I should never have the boldness not to get on with it. Yesterday, I took the maid to several places, but I didn't succeed in selling her. You ask sixteen taels for her, but I haven't got money enough to pay for her before I sell her."
"The boys tell me," Yueniang said, "that young Chen has been hanging about your place drinking with the maid."
"Ai ya!" the old woman cried. "What a lie! He certainly called to see me because he had to bring me two pillow ends that I left at your pawnshop twelve months ago. Since he had done me that favor, I asked him to have a cup of tea, but he would not and rode away on his horse at once. He did not drink wine at my place. What stories your boys have been telling you!"
Yueniang did not say anything for a long time. At last she said slowly: "I should not be surprised if that young man's passion put wrong ideas into his head."
"I am not a three-year-old child," old woman Xue said, "and it was easy to see what the position was. You gave me your orders, and I had to carry them out. He didn't stay a single minute at my house, just handed me the pillow ends, and went away without even a cup of tea. He hadn't time to see the maid. Really, Lady, you must make sure of the facts before you blame me. Now, his Lordship Zhou wants a girl to ensure the continuance of his family, but he does not want to pay more than twelve taels. I might get thirteen taels out of him. His Lordship has been here to parties and seen her. He liked her appearance; she is beautiful and can sing sweetly, or he would not have offered so much. You must remember that she is not a virgin, and we can hardly expect so high a price from anybody else."
Yueniang agreed to accept this sum and, the next day, old woman Xue took Chunmei to Major Zhou's house. The girl was beautifully painted and wore a headdress of pearls and ornaments. She was dressed in a red silk coat and blue silk skirt. Her shoes were small and pointed. Major Zhou thought her more beautiful than ever. He gave the old woman a piece of silver worth about fifty taels.
Old woman Xue took the silver back to her own place, cut off a piece amounting to thirteen taels, and gave it to Yueniang. She brought another tael with her, and told Yueniang that Major Zhou had given it to her as a reward for her services. She asked Yueniang for something more, and was given five qian of silver. So, all together, she made thirty-seven taels and five qian from this deal. Such is the way of go-betweens, nine out of ten of whom make their living in this way.
Chunmei was lost to Chen Jingji, and Jinlian was out of his reach. Yueniang was very careful about doors and windows. Every evening she took a lantern, went around the whole house, and made sure that all the doors were bolted before she went to bed. Jingji was powerless, and it made him very impatient. He quarreled with his wife.
"Strumpet!" he shouted. "Let me tell you straight out that I am the son-in-law in this family. I'm not a beggar. I'm sick of the place, and your people are keeping all my chests full of gold and silver. You are my wife, but do you take my part? No, you talk about my begging my food here. Do I ever eat a thing without rendering service in return?"
His wife cried.
It was the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, Meng Yulou's birthday. She got ready some dishes and wine and, out of the kindness of her heart, told Chunhong to take it to the shop for Clerk Fu and Chen Jingji. Yueniang tried to stop her. "That young man is a scoundrel," she said. "Don't have any dealings with him. If you would like to send something to Clerk Fu, well and good, but don't give that young man anything."
Yulou did not pay any heed. She told Chunhong to take the things to them. The boy put down the food on the counter of the shop. When Jingji had finished the jar of wine, he was still not satisfied and told the boy to go back and ask for more.
"I have had enough," Clerk Fu said. "I don't think we need ask for any more."
But Jingji insisted, and Laian was sent to ask for more wine. Sometime later he came back. "There is no more wine in the inner court," he told them. Jingji was already half tipsy. He again told the boy to go and fetch more wine, but the boy did not move. Then Jingji took some of his own money and bought wine. As he drank it, he cursed Laian.
"You wait, you thievish slave! Your mistress treats me badly, and you, you slave, think you can look down on me too. You won't go and do what I ask you. You know I am the son-in-law in this family. I am tired of eating and drinking in this haphazard way. You know how they treated me when my father-in-law was alive. Now he is dead, they sing a very different tune. Nobody bothers about me any more, and all they want is to get rid of me. My mother-in-law believes every little story the slaves carry to her. She entrusts her business to slaves and has no confidence in me. Let her do as she likes: I have patience enough to endure this injustice."
Clerk Fu tried to cheer the young man. "You mustn't talk like that," he said. "If they don't respect you, whom do they respect? I am sure they must be busy now. It is not that they don't want to give you the wine. Your scolding the boy doesn't matter, but the walls have ears. If anybody hears you, they will say: "That young man is drunk again.' "
"Old friend," Jingji said, "you don't understand. I may have wine in my belly but I know what I'm talking about. My mother-in-law listens to every bit of tittle-tattle, and believes that everything about me is bad. She thinks that it is I who have made a fool of other people and not others who have made a fool of me. But if I amuse myself with every woman in that household, and she brings a case against me in the courts, it is no more than a case of carrying on with one's late father-in-law's women, and that is only a matter of imprudence. First, I shall divorce her daughter. Then I shall go to the courts myself, or else to the Eastern Capital, and I shall accuse her of detaining many chests full of gold and silver that ought either to belong to me or be given to the authorities, since they came from Yang Jian. If I do that, her house will be confiscated, and all the women will be sold. I am not hoping to catch any fish: all I wish is to stir up the mud. If she had any sense, she would treat me as her son-in-law as she used to do, then everything would be all right."
Clerk Fu did not care for the tone the young man was taking. "Brother-in-law," he said, "you are certainly drunk, and you are talking without thinking."
Chen Jingji opened his eyes wide and glared at Clerk Fu. "You thievish old dog!" he said haughtily. "Do you suggest that I am drunk, and don't know what I'm talking about? Well, it is not any wine of yours I'm drinking. Even if I am a scoundrel, I am still the honorable son-in-law of this household and you are a paid hireling. Will you dare to treat me badly too? You old dog! Wait! During the last few years, you have made money enough out of my father-in-law, and you have eaten his food. Now you have evil ideas in your head and you think, if you get rid of me as soon as you can, you will be able to make yourself the only man who can transact business here. If I send an accusation to the courts, you may be sure your name will be on it."
Clerk Fu was not a very brave man and, seeing that things did not seem to be taking a good turn, he put on his clothes and went home as fast as he could. The boy cleared the things away and took them to the inner court. Jingji lay down on the bed and went to sleep.
The next day, very early, Clerk Fu went to Yueniang and told her what had happened. There were tears in his eyes when he suggested that he should go away, give up the business, and hand over the accounts to her.
"Go on as usual," Yueniang said to him gently. "Treat that rogue as though he were some stinking offal, and don't pay the slightest attention to him. He came here because he was in trouble with the authorities, and only intended to spend a short time here. I should like to know where are all these treasures he spoke to you about. All I know of are my daughter's furniture and a few trunks. I remember how his father got away. We were terrified lest somebody should find out and spread the news about him. We were worried day and night. When he came here, he was only sixteen or seventeen years old and like a hunted animal. He has lived on my husband's kindness ever since, and everything he knows about business he has learned here. Now that his wings have grown, he means to repay our kindness by hatred, and to pay no account to all the things we have done for him. What a young man! He seems to have no conscience and to disregard the principle of Heaven utterly. I am watching, and I shall see whether Heaven prospers him or not. My friend, go on as you always have done, and pay no heed to him. The time will come when that young man will feel ashamed of himself."
One day, something seemed destined to happen. There were a number of people in the pawnshop redeeming their things. Ruyi'er came with a pot of tea for Clerk Fu, carrying the baby Xiaoge in her arms. The baby howled, and she put the pot down on the table.
"Baby," Chen Jingji said, "don't cry." Then he turned to the people who were there and said, with a half-serious air: "Doesn't it seem clear that he is my own child? When I tell him to stop crying, he stops."
Nobody made any answer.
"Brother-in-law," Ruyi'er said, "I suppose you think that is a clever thing to say. You don't know your place. I shall tell my mistress about this."
Jingji went over and kicked her twice. He laughed and said: "You thievish creature! So I had no right to talk in that way, hadn't I? Well, now I am kicking your backside so as to make a sound that people should listen to."
The nurse picked up the baby and went to the inner court and told Yueniang all about it. She cried. "That is how he talked about the baby before all those people," she said.
Yueniang was dressing her hair before a mirror. When she heard this, she could not speak. Suddenly she fell forward on the floor in a faint. Xiaoyu was greatly alarmed. She called for nearly everybody in the house, and they picked up Yueniang and put her on the bed. Sun Xue'e jumped on the bed and lifted her up and down. After a while they were able to pour some ginger water down her throat. At last Yueniang came around, but her breath came with difficulty. She sobbed, but could not cry out. Ruyi'er repeated Jingji's remarks to Yulou and Xue'e. "I reproved him," she said, "and he came and kicked me. I nearly fainted on the spot."
When the others had gone away, Xue'e stayed to look after Yueniang. "Lady, it is no use being angry with him," she said. "It would be most serious if you fell ill of anger. That fellow is annoyed because you sold Chunmei and because he cannot get here to see that strumpet Jinlian. That is why he says things of this sort. Now let us make an end of this business once and for all. Your stepdaughter is married to him. We have to regard her as a piece of land that has been sold, and we cannot help her very much. As the proverb says: when once the frog gets into the water, it must take the consequences. But why should we keep that young man here any longer? Send for him. Let us give him a sound drubbing and drive him away. Then send for old woman Wang to take that strumpet away and sell her to anybody who will buy her. When we have got rid of these evil elements, we may have peace. I see no reason why we should deliberately keep them there. If we do, we may all suffer in the future."
"You are right," Yueniang said.
They decided upon a plan. The next day, Yueniang gave her maids and women clubs, seven or eight of them altogether, and hid them about the place. Then she sent Laian to summon Chen Jingji. The second door was closed when the young man went in.
"Kneel down," Yueniang said.
The young man refused, and turned his head impudently away, without speaking.
"You know what you have done?" Yueniang said.
Jingji paid no heed.
Yueniang was furious. With Xue'e, Laixing's wife, Laizhao's wife, Xiaoyu, Xiuchun and some others, she caught hold of him and threw him to the ground. Clubs, long and short, descended furiously upon him. Ximen Dajie went away and never spoke a word to save her husband.
In desperation, the young man pulled down his trousers and displayed his manhood. This startled the women; they all threw down their clubs and ran in every direction. Yueniang was annoyed, but she could not help being amused. She called him a turtle with nothing to boast of, but Jingji was pleased with himself. "If I had not thought of that," he said to himself, "I should never have got away alive." He got up and ran away, holding his trousers up with one hand. Yueniang told some of the boys to go after him and see that he cleared his accounts and handed them over to Clerk Fu.
It was now clear to Chen Jingji that he could stay there no longer. He packed his clothes and his belongings and, without saying good-bye to anyone, left Ximen Qing's house in a very bad temper. He went to stay at his Uncle Zhang's.
When Jinlian heard this, she was more melancholy and depressed than ever. Yueniang did what Xue'e had suggested, and sent Daian for old woman Wang.
The old woman had given up her tea business since she had come into some money. Her son, Wang Chao, who had been to the Huai country with some merchants, had come back with a hundred taels that he had stolen. Old woman Wang bought two donkeys, millstones and sieves, and had set herself up as a miller. When she heard that Ximen's people wished to see her, she hurriedly dressed and went with Daian.
"Brother," she said, as they went along, "it can't be very long since I saw you last, but I see, from your hair, that you have now reached man's estate. Are you married yet?"
"No," Daian said.
"Why have they sent for me?" the old woman said. "Your father is dead. Is the Fifth Lady going to have a baby and wants me to be the midwife?"
"The Fifth Lady is not going to have a son," Daian said. "She has had rather too much of a son-in-law. The Great Lady is going to ask you to take her away."
"Heavens!" old woman Wang cried. "I was sure she would not be able to hold herself in check after your master died. Dogs can never get out of their habit of sniffing about the filth. So she has been misbehaving herself. I know the young man. What is his name?"
"Chen Jingji," Daian said.
"Oh yes, now I remember. Last year I went to see your master with old He the Ninth. Your master was not at home, and that strumpet took me to her room. She didn't give me a thing, not even a needle. All she gave me was a cup of tea. I came away. I thought she was settled there for a thousand years, and now she is to be sent away. Oh, what a splendid whore! It was I who arranged her marriage, and really she ought not to have treated me like that, even if I had been somebody else."
"She and the young man made such a scandal they nearly killed the Great Lady," Daian said. "Now he has been kicked out, and my mistress wants you to take this one away."
"When she came, she came in a sedan chair," the old woman said, "and she will have to leave in one. And she will have some things to take. I suppose they will give her some boxes?"
"Of course," Daian said, "but the Great Lady will tell you all about that."
So they came to the house. The old woman went to see Yueniang, made a reverence, and sat down. The maid brought tea.
"Old woman Wang," Yueniang said, "I should not have asked you to come except for a matter of some importance." She told her all about the business of Jinlian. "When she came here," she said, "you brought her. I didn't wish to bring anyone else into the matter, so I sent for you to take her away. I don't care whether she marries again or not, I only wish to see the last of her. My husband is dead, and I can't control so many people. I don't care how much my husband spent on her, but I think he must have spent enough to make a woman of silver. I leave the matter entirely in your hands. Give me whatever you get for her and I will spend the money on services for my dead husband. So perhaps some good will come of it."
"I see, Lady," the old woman said, "it isn't that you want the money. You are just anxious to get rid of the cause of so much trouble. I understand, and I will do what you desire. This is a good day, and I may as well take her with me now. But when she came, she had some property of her own and she came in a sedan chair. She must have a chair now."
"She may have her boxes, but she will get no sedan chair from me," Yueniang said.
"You say this because you are angry," old woman Wang said, "but you must let her have a chair, or, when the neighbors see it, they will laugh at you."
Yueniang said nothing. After a while she sent Xiuchun to fetch Jinlian.
When the woman saw old woman Wang there, she was excited. She made a reverence to Yueniang and sat down.
"Lady," old woman Wang said, "you must get your things together. The Great Lady has told me to take you away with me."
"My husband died only a short time ago," Jinlian said, "and I have done nothing wrong. Why should I be driven away like this without the slightest cause?"
"There is no use pretending you do not know what it is for," the old woman said. "When a snake goes through a hole in the wall, it knows what it's about. You know what you have done."
"Don't talk such nonsense," Jinlian said. "It is no use your using high-flown language with me. You are the very one who is always helping people to do things they should not."
There has never been a time when a feast did not come to an end. The beams that stand out are those that decay first. Trees cast their shadow, and each one of us has his own reputation to save. Flies cannot get into an egg if there is no crack in it.
Jinlian saw that things were in a bad way for her. She realized that now she must leave this house. "If you must beat a man," she said, "do not strike him on the face; and if you quarrel with anyone, do not talk about his faults. You have the upper hand now, but do not abuse your power. I have been here many years. Why should you drive me away without mercy, because you listen to the tittle-tattle of slaves and serving women? I will go. It is all the same to me. I warn you, though, that you and others will have to stay here to the ends of your lives. See that you don't bring scandal upon yourselves."
Yueniang went to her room. She got out two boxes, a small table, four dresses, a few ornaments, earrings and pins and a set of bedclothes. She filled up the boxes with shoes and socks. She told Qiuju to come to her, and Jinlian's room was locked up.
Jinlian dressed and said good-bye to Yueniang. Then she went to Ximen Qing's tablet and sobbed. Afterwards, she went to see Yulou. They had been sisters for a long time, and now, when they had to part, they both shed tears. Without saying anything to Yueniang, Yulou gave her a pair of gold pins, a light blue silk dress, and a red skirt.
"Sister," she said, "we shall have few chances to see each other in the future. Look for a good home and go forward. The proverb says: every banquet must come to an end, and now we must say good-bye. When you find a home, ask someone to let me know. When I go out, I may be able to come and see you. We love one another as sisters."
They left one another in tears. Xiaoyu went with Jinlian to the gate and quietly gave her two gold hairpins. "Sister," Jinlian said to her, "you are very kind." Old woman Wang had already found somebody to carry the things. Only Yulou and Xiaoyu saw Jinlian get into her sedan chair.
When the woman came to old woman Wang's house, she was taken to the inner room and they slept together during the night.

Wang Chao was now grown up and his hair was dressed as a man's. But he was not yet married, and slept in the other room. The day after her arrival, Jinlian dressed very daintily and stood looking out from behind the lattice. She had nothing to do and spent her time painting her eyebrows or playing the lute. When old woman Wang was not at home, she would play chess or dominoes with Wang Chao. The old woman busied herself feeding the donkeys and sifting the flour and did not pay much attention. So, in a few days, Jinlian was engaged in a love affair with Wang Chao. At night, when old woman Wang was asleep, Jinlian would pretend to get out of bed to make water, but really she went to the other room and sported with Wang Chao. Once the bed made such a noise that old woman Wang woke up.

"What is that noise?" she cried.

"The cat is catching a rat underneath the cabinet," Wang Chao answered.

Old woman Wang, half asleep, murmured: "Ever since I have had that wheat flour there, I have been worried about it. I can't even sleep at nights now."

After a while, the noise began once more, and the old woman again called out to know what was the matter.

"The cat has caught the rat and taken it under the bed."

The old woman listened attentively, and indeed the sound was like that of a cat worrying a rat. She said no more. Jinlian finished what she had begun, crept quietly into bed and went to sleep.

The rat is small
But bolder than it looks,
Hungry and eager, ready for any prank. When anyone appears,
It beats retreat and hides.
Its scufflings in the depth of night
Disturb good honest slumberers.
Oblivious of the rules of good behavior
It loves to find a hole in which to hide
And always takes the most delight
In stolen sweets.

When Chen Jingji heard that Jinlian had left Ximen's household and was now at old woman Wang's, he took two strings of coppers and went to call there. Old woman Wang was at the door sweeping up the donkey's droppings. Jingji bowed low.

"Brother, what can I do for you?" the old woman said.

"I should like a word with you," Jingji said.

The old woman took him into the house.

"I understand," Jingji said, "that the Fifth Lady of his late Lordship Ximen is here, looking for a husband. Is that so?"

"What is your relationship to her?" the old woman asked.

"I am her younger brother," Jingji said, smiling.

The old woman looked at him from head to foot. "I never knew she had a brother," she said. "Don't try to hoodwink me. Are you not Ximen's son-in-law? Your name is Chen, and you have come here to get her for yourself. You can't deceive me like that."

Jingji, still smiling, brought out the two strings of coppers and held them out to the old woman. "This may serve to buy you some tea," he said. "I only wish to see her for a moment. Later on, I will reward you more suitably."

When the old woman saw the money, she protested more strongly. "Don't talk about rewards to me," she said. "The Great Lady told me that nobody must be allowed to see her. If you really wish to speak to her, give me five taels of silver, and if you wish to speak to her a second time, that will be another five taels. If you wish to marry her, it will cost you a hundred taels with ten for myself. I shall not do this business for nothing. These two strings of coppers won't even make a splash if you throw them into the water."

Jingji saw that the old woman had a good deal to say, and that she would not accept what he had brought. He took from his hair a pair of silver pins with gold heads, worth five qian. He knelt down.

"Old Mother Wang," he said, "take this. I will give you another tael another day. Just let me see her for a moment. There is something I must say to her."

The old woman took the pins and the money. "Go in," she said. "Speak to her and then come out again. I can't have you sitting there making faces at her. And I must have the other money tomorrow." She pulled aside the lattice and allowed Jingji to go in.

Jinlian was sitting on the bed. "You splendid fellow!" she said to Chen Jingji, "you have brought me to such a pass that, if I go forward, there is no village ahead of me, and, if I go back, no inn where I can rest. I don't know what to do, and everybody has heard this scandal about us. You never came to see me. I am a poor, helpless woman with nowhere to go. Whose fault is it?" She clung to Jingji and sobbed. This annoyed old woman Wang very much. She was afraid someone might hear.

"Sister," Jingji said, "I have sacrificed my skin and flesh and suffered from anger and shame on your account. I would have come to see you if I could. Yesterday, I went to old woman Xue's place, and they told me that Chunmei had been sold to some military gentleman. It was there I heard that you had left Ximen's house and were staying here to find a husband. I came at once to see you. I want to discuss matters with you. We love one another and we cannot bear to be parted. Now, I propose to divorce Ximen's daughter, and then I shall go to them for the money and things they have of mine. If they refuse, I will go to the Eastern Capital and accuse them before the courts. If that business is ever taken to law, they will be done for, even if they give up the stuff. When I get the money, I will marry you. I see no reason why we should not be happy together for ever and ever."

"Old woman Wang wants a hundred taels," Jinlian said. "Have you got so much?"

"Why does she ask so much?" Jingji said.

"Your mother-in-law told me," the old woman said, "that when Master Ximen got this woman, he spent more money than would have built a woman of silver. She insists upon a hundred taels and not a penny less."

"Old Mother," Jingji said, "I am crazy about this lady. We cannot live without one another. I see we are at your mercy. I will give you half the money, fifty or sixty taels. Then I will go to my uncle and arrange to have a small house and marry the lady. It is a beautiful idea, and you must soften your heart a little."

"Fifty or sixty taels, did you say?" the old woman cried. "Even if you offered eighty, you would not get her. Yesterday, a silk merchant from Huzhou, a man called He, offered seventy for her. Then Zhang the Second of the High Street, who is an officer, sent two of his men and offered eighty. They brought the money with them, but I would not take it and they had to go away. You are only a boy. You don't know what you're talking about. You come here and think you'll make a fool of me. You know I am not likely to be hard."

She set out for the street. "Whenever did anybody hear of a son-in-law wanting his mother-in-law?" she said loudly. "He thinks he'll come farting here, does he?"

Jingji was alarmed and dragged the old woman back. He knelt down before her. "Old Mother," he said, "don't say another word. You shall have your hundred taels. You know my father is at the Eastern Capital. I will go to him tomorrow and get the money."

"You must be quick or you'll be too late," Jinlian said. "Someone else will get me, and I can never belong to you."

"I will get a horse and start at once," Jingji promised.

"I shall be back in less than a fortnight."

"Let me tell you this," old woman Wang said. "If you are the first to cook the rice, you will be the first to eat it. Remember, that doesn't include the ten taels for myself."

"Don't mention it again," Jingji said. "If you'll only help me, I'll never forget your kindness." Jingji went away. He went home, packed his luggage, and the next day hired a horse and set off for the Eastern Capital to get the money.

110

Dame Wang Hungers after Wealth & Receives her Just Reward; Wu Sung Kills his Sister-in-law & Propitiates/Avenges his Brother

If you devote your life to good works, Heaven will reward you;
If you insist on being tough, you will surely elicit disaster.
If you are gracious with your tongue, you will suffer no harm;
It is because your teeth are so hard that they suffer damage.
When autumn comes, the apricots and peaches have all fallen;
In the depth of winter, the pines and cypresses stay green.
Good and evil acts inevitably bring their appropriate results;
Though you fly high or travel far, [1]you cannot escape them.[2]

Ch'en Ching-chi hired a horse for himself, called for a servitor of Militia Commander Chang Kuan to accompany him, and set out early in the morning for the Eastern Capital. But no more of this.

To resume our story, the day after Wu Yüeh-niang had expelled P'an Chin-lien from the household, she sent Ch'un-hung to summon Auntie Hsüeh because she also wished to sell Ch'iu-chü.

While Ch'un Hung was walking along Main Street on this errand, he happened to run into Ying Po-chüeh, who called him to a halt and inquired, "Ch'un-hung, where are you headed?"

"The First Lady has sent me to summon the go-between Auntie Hsüeh," replied Ch'un-hung.

"What does she want with that go-between?" asked Ying Po-chüeh.

"She plans to sell the maidservant Ch'iu-chü from the Fifth Lady's quarters," explained Ch'un-hung.

"Why was the Fifth Lady expelled from the household?" Ying Po-chüeh went on to ask. "She is now at Dame Wang's place, and I hear that Dame Wang is looking for someone to marry her off to. Is all this really true?"

Ch'un-hung then proceeded to tell him, thus and so, "She was said to be having an affair with her son-in-law, and, when the First Lady found out about it, she first expelled the young lady Ch'un-mei from the household, after which she subjected her son-in-law to a beating and forced him to flee to his family home. It was only yesterday that she expelled the Fifth Lady from the household."

When Ying Po-chüeh heard this, he nodded his head and said, "So it turns out that your Fifth Lady was up to something with that son-in-law of yours. It's not easy to tell what people are capable of."

He then addressed Ch'un-hung again, saying, "My child, since your master is already dead, why should you want to remain in his household? There's no profit to be obtained by doing so. If you would like to go back to the south where you came from, why not look for someone here that might take you back there with him? What do you think?"

"It is just as you say," responded Ch'un-hung. "My master is already dead, and the First Lady has become extremely strict with us. She has closed up most of the businesses the master formerly engaged in, and sold off the premises where they were conducted. Ch'in-t'ung and Hua-t'ung have already left, and she is no longer able to support such a large number of people. I would like to be able to return to the south, but I don't know of anyone who would find it convenient to take me, and I don't know how to find anyone here in the city who would be willing to employ me."

"You silly child!" said Ying Po-chüeh.

"If one is not farsighted,[3]
One will never be secure.
To return to the south, you would have to traverse:
A thousand mountains and a myriad streams.[4]

What would be the point of that, and who would take you there? You are able to perform quite a few songs, and consequently you should have no trouble finding someone here in town to employ you. Let me recommend a possibility to you, namely, the household of His Honor Chang the Second on Main Street. He disposes of property worth tens of thousands of strings of cash, owns buildings with a hundred rooms, and has been appointed to replace your former master in his posts as judicial commissioner and battalion commander. And at present, he has acquired the Second Lady from your household as a concubine also. If I should take you to his place in order to seek employment, when he sees that you are adept at performing southern songs, I guarantee you'll:

Hit the bull's-eye with the first arrow.

If he retains you as a personal servant to wait on him, you'll be better off than you are in your current situation. He has a good disposition, is still quite young, is unrestrained in his behavior, and is attracted by good looks. You would be a lucky fellow to obtain such a position."

Ch'un-hung then proceeded to prostrate himself before him and said, "I would be indebted to you for your help. If I meet with His Honor Chang the Second and succeed in:

Advancing by so much as a single step,
I will purchase a present and come kowtow to you."

Ying Po-chüeh pulled Ch'un-hung to his feet with one hand and said, "Silly child, stand up. I always do whatever I can to help people succeed. I don't require any expressions of gratitude from you. Where would you get the money for such a thing?"

"If I should go with you," said Ch'un-hung, "I fear that the First Lady back at home will wonder where I have gone. What should I do about that?"

"That shouldn't be a problem," said Ying Po-chüeh. "I will ask His Honor Chang the Second to write a note to her and enclose a tael of silver. She probably won't dare to accept the silver but, no doubt, will end up by handing you over to him with both hands."

When they had finished their conversation, Ch'un-hung went on to Auntie Hsüeh's place and told her that she was wanted by his mistress. Upon meeting with her, Auntie Hsüeh led Ch'iu-chü away, after paying Yüeh-niang her asking price of a mere five taels of silver. But no more of this.

To resume our story, Ying Po-chüeh took Ch'un-hung with him to pay a visit to Chang the Second and, on seeing how good-looking he was, and hearing that he could perform southern songs, Chang the Second agreed to retain him as a personal servant. He then wrote out a note, sealed it up with one tael of silver, and sent someone to the Hsi-men household to collect his trunk of belongings.

That day, Wu Yüeh-niang was at home, entertaining Yün Li-shou's wife, née Su,[5] with a cup of wine. Some time before this, Yün Li-shou had succeeded to his elder brother's hereditary post as vice commander of the Ch'ing-ho Left Guard. Upon witnessing the death of Hsi-men Ch'ing, and the fact that Yüeh-niang was set on maintaining her widowhood and still had substantial means at her disposal, he could not help salivating with excitement at the prospect of profiting from the situation. That day, his wife had purchased eight trays of preserved fruit and come to call on Yüeh-niang. Knowing that Yüeh-niang had given birth to a son named Hsiao-ko, and having a daughter of her own who was only two months old, she intended to form a marriage alliance with Yüeh-niang by betrothing the two children to each other and formalizing the pact by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of their blouses.[6] She had also presented a gold ring as a betrothal gift.

At this point, Tai-an came in with the note from His Honor Chang the Second and the tael of silver and explained that Ch'un-hung had accepted a job as a personal servant in his household, and that he had sent someone to collect his trunk of personal effects and his clothes. Yüeh-niang felt that since Chang the Second now held the post of judicial commissioner she could hardly object to this arrangement, but she refused to accept the proffered silver and duly turned over Ch'un Hung's trunk of belongings.

Before this, Ying Po-chüeh had said to Chang the Second, "P'an Chin-lien, the Fifth Lady in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, is really attractive, is adept at playing the balloon guitar, and, when it comes to the standard repertory of popular songs, backgammon and elephant chess, there is little she has not mastered. In addition, she is literate and knows how to read and write. Because she is still young, she is unable to maintain a chaste widowhood, and she has been so at odds with the First Lady that she has been expelled from the household and is currently residing at Dame Wang's place waiting to be married off."

In response to this, Chang the Second had sent a servant with money in hand to Dame Wang's place, again and again, to size up the situation; but Dame Wang had insisted that, pursuant to the orders of the First Lady, she would refuse to accept anything less than a hundred taels for her. The servant had gone back and forth several times to bargain with her and had raised the offered sum to more than eighty taels, but Dame Wang still refused to give her assent.

Afterwards, when Ch'un-hung entered his household, and Chang the Second learned from him that the woman had engaged in adultery with her son-in-law, and that that was the reason why she had been expelled, he decided that he didn't want her.

"I have a fourteen-year-old son in my household," he told Ying Po-chüeh, "who has not yet reached puberty but is going to school and studying his books. What would I want with a woman like that in my home?"

Li Chiao-erh also told him, "Chin-lien originally poisoned her husband to death so that she could be taken into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. She later had an affair with a page boy and was also responsible for doing to death both the Sixth Lady and her baby son."

As a result, Chang the Second no longer wanted anything to do with her.

At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, when Ch'un-mei was sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and the commandant saw that she was naturally:

Both beautiful and clever, and Her deportment was enticing, he was utterly delighted and not only supplied her with a suite of three rooms to live in but also arranged for a young maidservant to wait upon her.

He slept in her room for three nights in a row. At the third day celebration after her marriage into the household, he had two outfits of clothing tailored for her, rewarded Auntie Hsüeh with five mace of silver on her departure, and purchased another female servant to serve Ch'un-mei. In addition, he formally designated her as the Second Lady in his household. His first wife was blind in one eye, restricted herself to vegetarian fare, devoted herself to reciting the Buddha's name, and:

Did not concern herself with ordinary affairs.[7]

Chou Hsiu also had a concubine named Sun Erh-niang, who had borne him a daughter and resided in quarters on the eastern side of the courtyard, while Ch'un-mei's quarters were on the western side of the courtyard. He entrusted the keys to all the doors in the house to Ch'un-mei and conspicuously bestowed his favor upon her.

One day, she heard from Auntie Hsüeh that P'an Chin-lien had also been expelled from the household and was residing at Dame Wang's place, waiting to be married off.

That evening, Ch'un-mei, wailing and weeping, addressed Chou Hsiu, saying, "My mistress and I kept each other company for many years, and she never so much as raised her voice in anger against me but treated me as though I were her own daughter. I knew that we had to separate but failed to anticipate that she, too, would now be expelled from the household. If you are willing to take her in marriage, the two of us could enjoy happy days together again."
She then went on to elaborate on her attractiveness, saying, "She can perform the lyrics and songs of a multitude of authors and is adept at playing the balloon guitar. She is:
Both quick-witted and elegant,[8]
just as clever as can be. She was born in the year of the dragon and is now only thirty-one years old. If she were to enter your household, I would be happy to cede my place to her and settle for the position of your Third Lady."
By so saying, she succeeded in arousing Chou Hsiu's interest, and he proceeded to dispatch his servants Chang Sheng and Li An to Dame Wang's place with two handkerchiefs and two mace of silver to look her over. Sure enough, they found her to be an exceptionally attractive woman. Dame Wang informed them at the outset that the First Lady from her former household demanded the sum of a hundred taels of silver for her. Chang Sheng and Li An bargained with her for what seemed like half a day and raised their offer to as much as eighty taels, but Dame Wang still refused to accept it. When they reported this to Chou Hsiu, he agreed to put up an additional five taels and sent the two of them back with the silver in hand to continue their bargaining with Dame Wang. Dame Wang, however, persisted in alleging that the First Lady would not settle for anything less than a hundred taels for herself, and that although her fee as the go-between might be negotiable:
Heaven would hardly condone letting her go unrewarded for her pains.
Chang Sheng and Li An had no alternative but to take the silver back with them and report the situation to Chou Hsiu.
He let the matter drop for two days but could not withstand the weeping and wailing of Ch'un-mei, who said to him at night, "If you would only offer a few more taels of silver, for better or for worse, and contrive to marry her so that we can be together again:
I'd be prepared to die if I must."
When Chou Hsiu saw that Ch'un-mei continued to do nothing but weep bitterly, he felt compelled, once again, to direct his senior servant Chou Chung, along with Chang Sheng and Li An, to take the silver in a felt bag and open it up for Dame Wang to see. The sum offered had been increased to a full ninety taels.
But Dame Wang responded more meretriciously than ever, saying, "If I had been willing to let her go for ninety taels, she wouldn't be here now, for Judicial Commissioner Chang the Second would have carried her off in a sedan chair."
This response annoyed Chou Chung, who told Li An to put the silver back in the bag and said, "Though a three-legged toad may be nowhere to be found, a two-legged woman can be found anywhere. This inveterate whore doesn't know who she's dealing with. What reason do you have to mention that official Chang the Second? Do you think my master the commandant is incapable of dealing with you? It is only because that newly married secondary wife of his is constantly pressing him to do so that he wants to marry this woman. What need does he have for her that he should put up all this money?"
"She has forced us to come back and forth two or three times," said Li An. "The lousy old whore! She is repeating herself more and more like a parrot."
So saying, he took hold of Chou Chung and said, "Brother, let's go home and report the situation to His Honor. How do you suppose she would like it if we had a jailer drag her into the yamen and give her a good taste of the squeezers?"
Dame Wang, however, was still looking forward to the profit she expected to make off Ch'en Ching-chi and let them threaten her without saying a word in reply.
Upon returning to his residence, they reported to Commandant Chou Hsiu, saying, "Even though we have raised our offer to ninety taels, she still refuses to accept it."
"In that case," said Chou Hsiu, "tomorrow, we might as well weigh out the sum of a hundred taels and go bring her back here in a sedan chair."
"Master," said Chou Chung, "even if you increase your offer to a hundred taels, Dame Wang will still demand a go-between's fee of an additional five taels. It would be better to drop the matter for a couple of days and then, if she still raises any objections, have her arrested and given a taste of the squeezers. Only then will she be appropriately fearful."
Gentle reader take note: For P'an Chin-lien, as for all of us:
Her place of birth and place of death
were predetermined.[9]
As a direct result of these few words uttered by Chou Chung, Chin-lien would find that:
Though her deeds were done in the past,
Today the chickens would come home to roost.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
In this life, although we are not endowed with foreknowledge;
The causes of disaster or good fortune are not to be sought elsewhere.
Good and evil acts inevitably bring their appropriate results;
The only question being whether they come early or come late.
Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment in order to speak of another person.
To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ch'ing had managed to have Wu Sung sentenced to military exile in Meng-chou, he was befriended by Shih En, the son of the warden of the prison camp. Later, when Shih En was engaged in a struggle with Chiang Men-shen for control of the Happy Forest Tavern, he was wounded by Chiang Men-shen and called on Wu Sung for help, upon which Wu Sung gave Chiang Men-shen a beating. Who could have anticipated that Chiang Men-shen's younger sister Chiang Yü-lan, who was a concubine of Military Director-in-chief Chang of Meng-chou, should collaborate with her husband in framing Wu Sung, subjecting him to a beating, and sentencing him to military exile in the An-p'ing Stockade. Upon reaching Fei-yün P'u, Wu Sung murdered the two guards who were escorting him and then returned to slaughter the entire households, old and young alike, of Military Director-in-chief Chang and Chiang Men-shen.[10]
After this, he escaped to the home of Shih En, who gave him a letter of recommendation and a leather case containing a hundred taels of silver and directed him to go to the An-p'ing Stockade and seek the patronage of his friend Liu Kao, the commander of the stockade. Who could have anticipated that, while on his way, he heard that an heir apparent had been designated to reside in the Eastern Palace, and that at the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven on the day of the winter solstice, a general amnesty had been issued to celebrate the occasion. Thus, on receipt of the amnesty, Wu Sung was able to return home to Ch'ing-ho district, where, on submitting his papers at the district yamen, he was allowed to resume his post as police captain.
On returning to his brother's home, he looked up his neighbor Yao the Second, who turned his orphaned niece Ying-erh back over to him. At this time Ying-erh was already eighteen years old, and he took her in to live with him.
Upon making inquiry, he was told, "Hsi-men Ch'ing is already dead, and your sister-in-law has been expelled from his household and is currently residing at Dame Wang's place where she is waiting to be married off."
When Wu Sung heard this:
His old resentment awoke in his heart.
Truly:
Though you wear out shoes of iron without finding what you seek;
In the end you may find it without making any effort whatsoever.[11]
The next day, he put on his turban, donned his clothes, went straight out the door, and headed to Dame Wang's place. Chin-lien was standing behind the blind that hung over the front door at the time, and when she saw Wu Sung coming, she promptly disappeared into the inner room.
Wu Sung lifted aside the blind and asked, "Is Dame Wang at home?"
Dame Wang, who was engaged in sweeping up the flour by the millstone at the time, promptly came out and asked, "Who is it that is calling for me?"
When she saw that it was Wu Sung, she greeted him with a bow, saying, "Many felicitations," and Wu Sung bowed deferentially in return.
Dame Wang said, "Brother Wu the Second, congratulations! How long have you been home?"
"On being granted an amnesty I have been able to return home," said Wu Sung. "But I only arrived yesterday. I am much indebted to you for looking after my brother's home all this time. I will demonstrate my gratitude to you on another day."
Dame Wang gave him an ingratiating smile, saying, "Brother Wu the Second, you look more impressive than before and have even begun to grow a stubble of beard. Your figure has also filled out attractively, and you have picked up a knowledge of etiquette while away from home."
She then offered him a seat, poured out a serving of tea, and shared it with him.
"There is something I would like to talk to you about," said Wu Sung.
"What might that be, Brother Wu the Second?" asked Dame Wang. "Go ahead and tell me what it is."
"I have heard," responded Wu Sung, "that Hsi-men Ch'ing is already dead, and that my sister-in-law has been expelled from the household and is currently residing here with you. I would venture to ask you to tell my sister-in-law that if she does not intend to remarry, so be it; but that if she does intend to remarry, now that Ying-erh has grown up, I would like to take her as my wife, so she could look after Ying-erh and, early or late, find someone to marry into our family as a son-in-law, so that we can:
Keep the whole household together, and live out our lives, without arousing the derision of others."
Initially, Dame Wang was reluctant to give her assent to this proposal and said, "It is true that she is living here with me, but I don't know whether she plans to remarry or not."
Afterwards, however, on hearing that Wu Sung intended to see that she was amply rewarded, she said, "Permit me to feel her out on the subject."
The woman, who was eavesdropping behind the portiere, heard Wu Sung say that he would like to marry her so she could help him look after Ying-erh. She also noticed that while away from home Wu Sung had grown bigger and taller than ever, had put on weight, and had learned to speak even more effectively than before.
Her former feelings had not altered, and
In her heart she thought to herself,
"This marriage affinity will enable me to end up in his hands after all."
Thereupon, without waiting for Dame Wang to call for her, she came out herself, greeted Wu Sung with a bow, and said, "If you would really like to marry me so I can help you look after Ying-erh, and find a husband for her, that would be splendid."
"But there is another issue," said Dame Wang. "The First Lady of her household is demanding a bride price of a hundred taels of 'snowflake' silver for her."
"Why is she demanding so much?" asked Wu Sung.
"His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing," said Dame Wang, "originally spent enormous sums of money on her; enough to cast a silver figurine of similar dimensions."
"It doesn't matter," said Wu Sung. "Since I would like to take my sister-in-law home with me as my wife, if it costs me as much as a hundred taels, so be it. In addition, I am willing to offer you five taels of silver as a reward for your efforts."
Upon hearing these words, Dame Wang was pleased enough to:
Fart ferociously and pee in her pants, and blurted out the words, "Brother Wu the Second, you have really acquired a knowledge of etiquette from your experiences out on the rivers and lakes the last few years. You've really turned out to be a fine man."
Upon hearing these words, the woman went into the inner room, poured a cup of strong tea flavored with melon seeds, and proffered it to Wu Sung with both hands.
"At present," Dame Wang went on to say, "the mistress of her household is anxious to have her disposed of as soon as possible; and there are also three or four persons of official status who are competing with each other to marry her. But I have refused their offers as insufficient. You had better come up with this money as fast as you can. As the sayings go:
The first one to cook the rice is the first to eat.
A marriage affinity between people a thousand li apart connects them by a single thread.
You wouldn't want her to end up in someone else's hands."
"If you really want to marry me," the woman said, "you must show some urgency about it."
"I'll come to weigh out the silver tomorrow," said Wu Sung, "and invite you to come home with me that evening."
Dame Wang was still somewhat incredulous that Wu Sung had the stipulated amount of money at his disposal but tentatively gave her consent and allowed him to go.
The next day, Wu Sung opened the leather case, took out the hundred taels of silver that Shih En had given him for Stockade Commander Liu Kao, wrapped up an additional five taels worth of loose silver, and went to Dame Wang's place, where he proceeded to weigh it out with a steelyard.
When Dame Wang saw the shiny display of silver that covered the entire tabletop:
From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself,
"Although Ch'en Ching-chi promised me a hundred taels of silver and has gone off to the Eastern Capital to get it, there is no way of knowing when he will return. No matter whether:
Things land right side up or upside down,
it would make no sense to:
Refrain from ringing the bell at hand,
In order to wait for one to be forged."[12]
When she realized that he was also offering her an additional gratuity of five taels, she promptly accepted the money and bowed to him repeatedly, saying, "Brother Wu the Second, you have really acquired a knowledge of etiquette, and:
Understand one's vicissitudes."
"Since you have accepted my silver," said Wu Sung, "I would like to invite my sister-in-law to come and cross my threshold today."
"Brother Wu the Second," expostulated Dame Wang, "you're in too much of a hurry. You're the type who:
Lets off fireworks behind the gate:
Unable to wait for evening.
You'll have to wait until I've gone to the First Lady's place and turned over the money before I'll relinquish her to you."
She then went on to say, "Today:
You'd better don shiny new headgear, for Tonight you're going to be a bridegroom."[13]
Wu Sung was unhappy about this, but Dame Wang, just as though she:
Didn't know any better,
continued to banter with him and sent him on his way.
"The First Lady from her household," she thought to herself, "merely told me to dispose of her without settling on a particular amount. Today, I might as well simply give her ten or twenty taels of silver. At the very least, barring any monkey business, I ought to be able to make off with more than half of the asking price for the support of my family."
She consequently chiseled off a piece of silver worth twenty taels and went to Yüeh-niang's place to settle accounts with her.

"Who has agreed to take her in marriage?" asked Yüeh-niang.
Dame Wang responded by saying:
"When the rabbit has done exploring the hill,
It will finally go back to its original hole.
She is being taken in marriage by her former husband's brother, so she will end up by:
Eating congee out of her old pot."
Upon hearing this, all Yüeh-niang could do was stamp her feet in resignation.
As the saying goes:
When two enemies meet each other,
Their eyes are clearer than ever.[14]
Later on, Yüeh-niang spoke to Meng Yü-lou about it, saying, "In the future, she is likely to die at the hands of her brother-in-law. He is the sort of man who:
Kills people without batting an eye,[15] and is hardly likely to spare her."
We will say no more for the moment about the way Yüeh-niang gave vent to her concerns back at home.
To resume our story, in the afternoon, after Dame Wang had returned home from turning over the silver, she sent Wang Ch'ao ahead to deliver the woman's trunks and her table to Wu Sung's place. Wu Sung, meanwhile, had already completed his preparations, buying wine and meat and appropriate foodstuffs for the occasion.
That evening, Dame Wang led the woman over to Wu Sung's place. She had abandoned her mourning garments, put a new fret on her hair, dressed herself in red clothing, and wore a veil over her head. As she entered the door, she observed that the parlor was brightly illuminated with lanterns and candles, and that Wu the Elder's spirit tablet was set up in a position of honor at the head of the room. This made her somewhat apprehensive, and she couldn't help feeling as if:
Her hair was being pulled, or
Her flesh was being hooked.[16]
When they had come through the door and entered the room, Wu Sung ordered Ying-erh to lock both the front and the back doors.
Upon seeing this, Dame Wang said, "Brother Wu the Second, I've got to go. There isn't anyone to be relied on at home."
"Venerable dame," said Wu Sung. "Please come inside and have a cup of wine."
Wu Sung then told Ying-erh to bring in the food and set it out on the table. In no time at all, the wine was duly heated, and he invited the woman and Dame Wang to help themselves to the wine. Wu Sung himself, however, did not proffer any wine to his two guests, but proceeded to pour himself four or five bowls of wine and drink them down one after the other.
When Dame Wang saw that he was getting himself nastily drunk, she said, "Brother Wu the Second, I've had enough wine. Permit me to go. The two of you can continue to enjoy drinking together."
"Dame Wang," responded Wu Sung, "you can cut out the nonsense. I, Wu the Second, have a score to settle with you."
All they could hear was a swishing sound as he proceeded to whip out from beneath his clothes a two-foot long, fine-edged, thick-bladed dagger, which he gripped firmly by the hilt with one hand, while holding it to her breast with the other.
As he:
Opened wide his weird eyes, and Caused his beard to bristle, he said, "Dame Wang, there is no reason for you to be surprised. It has always been true that:
For every injustice there is a perpetrator;
For every debt there is a creditor.
You had better not pretend to be:
Still asleep in dreamland.
It is you who are responsible for the death of my elder brother."
"Brother Wu the Second," exclaimed Dame Wang, "it's late at night, and you're drunk. This business of:
Brandishing knives and flourishing weapons,
Is not a laughing matter."
"Dame Wang," responded Wu Sung, "you can cut out the nonsense.
Even death itself does not frighten me.[17]
Wait until I have finished interrogating this whore, and I will then proceed to question you. Old pig and dog that you are, if you stir by so much as a step, I'll give you five or seven slashes with this blade."
So saying, he turned around to face the woman and reviled her, saying, "Listen to me you whore. Just how did you plot to do my elder brother in? If you:
Report the facts truthfully,[18]
I may forgive you."
"Brother-in-law," the woman responded, "why is it that:
The beans are popping in this cold pot?
It doesn't make any sense. The fact is your elder brother died of heart trouble. What does it have to do with me?"
Before she had even finished speaking, Wu Sung drove the point of his dagger into the tabletop with a chopping sound, gripped the woman's hair with his left hand, grabbed her bodice with his right hand, lifted her off the ground, and kicked over the table with one leg, knocking the cups and saucers to the floor, and smashing them to smithereens. The woman did not have the stamina to resist as her assailant lifted her lightly over the table and dragged her into the adjacent room to confront the stand on which his brother's spirit tablet was placed.
When Dame Wang saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, she fled toward the front door but found it to be locked. Wu Sung caught up with her in large strides, doubled her over on the floor, took off the belt around his waist, and tied her four limbs together in front of her in the position known as "The Gibbon Offering Fruit,"[19] so that she was completely immobilized.
"Captain," she called out, "there is no reason for you to get incensed at me. It is the lady herself who is responsible. I had nothing to do with it."
"Old pig and dog that you are!" ejaculated Wu Sung, "I know all about it. Who else are you trying to shift the blame onto? It was you who suggested to Hsi-men Ch'ing that he get me out of the way by contriving to have me sentenced to military exile. But today, it is I who have managed to return home, while that rascal Hsi-men Ch'ing is nowhere to be seen. If you refuse to speak up, I will first carve up this whore and then proceed to kill you, old pig and dog that you are."
So saying, he picked up his dagger and waved it a couple of times in front of Chin-lien's face.
The woman hastily called out, "Brother-in-law, forgive me. If you will only let me up, I'll tell you what really happened."
Wu Sung responded by jerking the woman to her feet, stripping her stark naked, and then forcing her into a kneeling position in front of the stand that held his brother's spirit tablet.
"You whore!" Wu Sung shouted at her, "You'd better start to talk immediately."
The woman was so frightened it seemed as though:
Her soul was no longer attached to her body,[20] and she felt compelled to confess the truth. She told him how, in taking down the bamboo blind over the front door, the forked stick in her hand had fallen onto the head of Hsi-men Ch'ing; how she had made up the burial garments for Dame Wang as part of the scheme to initiate their illicit affair; how Hsi-men Ch'ing had kicked Wu the Elder in the solar plexus and injured his heart; how Dame Wang had persuaded her to obtain arsenic from Hsi-men Ch'ing and administer it to her husband; how she had arranged for him to be cremated; and how she had been taken into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household. She gave a full account of what had happened, word for word, from beginning to end.
When Dame Wang heard this, all she could do was to complain bitterly to herself, saying, "What a simpleton you are! Now that you've told him the truth, how will I ever be able to cover up my own complicity?"
Wu Sung, for his part, held the woman down in front of the spirit tablet with one hand, while pouring a libation with the other, and burning some paper money.
"Elder Brother," he said, "hear me, if your departed soul be not too far away. I, Wu the Second, will now undertake to:
Avenge your wrong and assuage your resentment."[21]
When the woman saw that the situation had taken a turn for the worse, she was about to cry out loudly, but Wu Sung plucked up a handful of ashes from the incense burner and stuffed it into her mouth, so that she was unable to utter a sound, and then roughly doubled her over on the floor. The woman struggled so violently that the fret on her hair, and her pins and earrings, rolled off onto the ground.
Wu Sung was afraid that she might succeed in struggling free, so he kicked her in the ribs with his waxed boots and then stamped on her two arms, saying, "You whore! It is said that you're really intelligent, but I don't know what sort of a heart you have, so I'm going to take a look at it."
So saying, he pulled open her bodice with one hand, and then:
The telling is slow, but
What happened was quick;
he took the dagger and cut open her pale and fragrant breast with a single slash, producing a blood-filled cavity from which fresh blood gushed out. As for the woman:
Her starry eyes blinked half open, and her two feet kicked spasmodically. Holding the dagger in his teeth, Wu Sung then pulled open her breast with his two hands and, with a popping sound, tore her living heart and entrails, dripping with blood, out of the cavity, and laid them as a sacrifice before the spirit tablet. After which, with a single swipe of the dagger, he cut off her head, as a result of which:
The flow of blood inundated the ground.[22]
On seeing this from one side, Ying-erh, who was still only a young girl, was so frightened all she could do was to cover her face with her hands. It is clear that Wu Sung was truly a ruthless man, and that the woman had suffered a pitiable fate. Truly:
So long as one has three inches of breath,
one uses it a thousand ways;
But when the messenger of death shows up,
everything comes to an end.
She was thirty-one years old at the time of her death. Behold:
On falling into his hands, the springtime of her youth came to an end;
When his dagger fell, the pink-powdered beauty's life was terminated.
Her seven material souls have floated into the distance,
And have arrived at the Sen-lo Palace in the underworld.
Her three ethereal souls have vanished into invisibility,
And have doubtless reached the City of the Unjustly Dead.
Her starry eyes are tightly closed;
Stretched out straight, her body lies on the bare ground.
Her silver teeth are half-clenched;
Dripping with blood, her head lies fallen to one side.
It is just like:
The heavy snowfall of early spring,
Which breaks the golden threads of the willow branches;
Or the wild wind of the twelfth month,
That blows off the jade blossoms of the flowering plum.
As for this woman:
Who knows where her alluring beauty has vanished to;
Or whose home her fragrant soul has been reborn in?[23]
A poet of yore has left us a poem lamenting the gruesome nature of Chin-lien's death:
The grievous destiny suffered by Chin-lien was certainly pitiable;
As, stripped of her clothes, she knelt down before the spirit tablet.

How could she have known that Wu Sung would slay her with his dagger,
When she expected him to tie her up as Hsimen did in the Grape Arbor?
Past events tend to inspire sighs of regret,[24]
though ephemeral as a dream;
The present life is not even worth so much as half of a copper cash.[25]
In this world, every single life must be repaid with another life;[26]
Just retribution is clear and inescapable,[27] and occurs for all to see.

When Dame Wang saw that Wu Sung had killed the woman, she called out in a loud voice, "A murder has been committed!"

Upon hearing this, Wu Sung stepped forward and cut off her head as well with a single swipe of his dagger, after which he dragged her corpse to one side. He then took Chin-lien's heart and entrails and pinned them up with his dagger under the eaves at the back of the house. By then, it was the first watch of the night, and he proceeded to lock Ying-erh into the room.

"Uncle," complained Ying-erh, "I'm frightened."

"My child," Wu Sung responded, "there is nothing I can do for you under the circumstances."

Wu Sung then vaulted over the wall into Dame Wang's house next door, intending to kill her son Wang Ch'ao; but it turned out that Wang Ch'ao was not fated to die at this juncture. Upon hearing his mother's cry, he realized that Wu Sung was bent on wreaking havoc and tried unsuccessfully to open both the front and back doors. In a state of consternation, he ran out onto the street to find the head of the local mutual security unit. The neighbors to either side knew full well how violent and ruthless Wu Sung was, and none of them ventured to come forward.

When Wu Sung had vaulted over the wall and entered Dame Wang's house, he saw that though the lanterns were lighted, nobody was present. He then proceeded to open Dame Wang's trunks and scatter her clothing all over the floor. Of the hundred taels of silver he had paid her, she had turned over only twenty taels to Yüeh-niang, so there were eighty-five taels left over, together with a number of hairpins, earrings, and other head ornaments. Wu Sung wrapped all these things up into a bundle, picked up his sword, vaulted over the back wall, and waited until the fifth watch, when he was able to slip out through the city gate and head toward Shih-tzu P'o, where he hid out in the inn operated by Chang Ch'ing and his wife. He subsequently disguised himself as a Buddhist ascetic and went to join the band of outlaws in Mount Liang Marsh.[28] Truly:

If you do nothing in your lifetime to make people raise their eyebrows;
There should be no one in the world prepared to gnash his teeth at you.

My home is far away. In this harassed world
We are dispersed, some to the east some to the west.
They who still live seek to have news of one another
But the dead are become dust,
And the poor are ruined.
At last the hero returns
He has walked for long.
The road was deserted and at sunset
The air was full of sadness.
Foxes he met, both large and small, which glared at him,
Their hair on end.
But a good sword have I, and I can deal with them.

Chen Jingji took a horse and set out with one of his uncle's servants. The day after Wu Yueniang had sent Pan Jinlian away, she sent Chunhong for old woman Xue. She had decided to sell Qiuju. When Chunhong came to the High Street, he met Ying Bojue. The man stopped him and asked him where he was going.

"The Great Lady has told me to go for old woman Xue," the boy said. "Why?" Bojue asked.

"She is going to sell the Fifth Lady's maid Qiuju."

"Why did they send the Fifth Lady away?" Bojue said.

"She and my brother-in-law carried on together secretly, but the Great Lady found out about it," Chunhong said. "First, she dealt with Chunmei. Then, she gave the young man a beating and drove him away. And finally, she got rid of the Fifth Lady."

Ying Bojue nodded his head. "So there was something between the Fifth Lady and Master Chen," he said. "Really, there is no telling what people will do." Then he said to Chunhong: "My boy, now that your master is dead, why do you stay there? You will never do any good. I know you would prefer to be in the South. Why don't you go to your native place and get a job there?"

"You are right," Chunhong said. "Now that my master is dead, the Great Lady is very severe with us. Nearly all the businesses have been closed down, and several houses have been sold. Qintong and Huatong have gone, and, indeed, they don't need so many people about the place. I should have liked to go to the South, but I couldn't think of anyone who would take me there. And I don't know the people here very well, which makes it difficult for me to get a job in these parts."

"You silly boy!" Bojue said. "One who does not keep his eyes open will always be in difficulties. If you go to the South, you will have to cross ten thousand rivers and climb a thousand mountains. Why go there? You can sing, and there will be no difficulty in finding another master for you. I can tell you of one, straight off. There is his Lordship Zhang the Second of the High Street. He is very rich and now holds the office your master used to hold. Your Second Lady married him as his second wife. Let me introduce you to him. When he finds that you can sing the Southern tunes, I guarantee that he will take you on at once, and keep you as one of his most favored boys. He is very different from your old master, good-tempered and young. He is very generous and agreeable. You will certainly be in luck's way if you get him for a master."

Chunhong knelt down and kowtowed to Ying Bojue. "Uncle," he said, "I shall count upon your help. If I find a place with Master Zhang, I will buy you a present."

Bojue pulled the boy up. "Stand up, you silly boy," he said. "I am only too glad to be able to help people. I don't want any presents from you, for I know you haven't any money."

"If I go away, I expect the Great Lady will find out a number of things I have done wrong," the boy said.

"Don't worry about that," Bojue said. "I will go and see Master Zhang, and get a tael of silver and a card from him. If he sends them to your mistress, she will not dare to take any money. She will give you up for nothing."

The boy went on to old woman Xue's house. The old woman went to see Yueniang and took Qiuju away. She sold the girl for five taels of silver and paid the money to Yueniang.

Then Ying Bojue took Chunhong to Zhang the Second's house. When Zhang the Second found that the boy was intelligent and could sing the songs of the South, he told him to stay. He sent a tael and a card to Ximen's place and asked for the boy's luggage.

Yueniang was entertaining Yun Lishou's wife. Yun Lishou was now an assistant magistrate at Qinghe. After Ximen's death, knowing that Yueniang was a very rich widow, he struck up a friendship with her. That was why his wife had come to see Yueniang that day with eight presents. She wished to arrange a marriage between Yueniang's son and her own child who was two months old. They settled the matter as they were drinking together, and Mistress Yun gave Yueniang two gold rings as an engagement token.

Daian brought in Zhang the Second's card and the tael of silver. "Chunhong has gone to Zhang's place, and they have come to ask for his clothes."

Yueniang knew that Zhang the Second was now an officer, and she did not dare refuse to give up the boy. She would not take the money, and gave the boy's things to the messenger.

Sometime before all this, Ying Bojue had told Zhang the Second about Jinlian. "She is very beautiful," he said. "She plays the lute excellently, and she knows all about such things as poetry and games, and she can write. She is quite young and she won't like being a widow. Now I hear she has come out, after a quarrel with Ximen's first wife. She is at old woman Wang's place now."

One after another, Zhang the Second sent men to old woman Wang with money in their hands, but old woman Wang told them that Mistress Ximen would not take less than a hundred taels. They came again and offered eighty taels. Still old woman Wang would not agree. Then Chunhong came to Zhang's house and told his new master that Jinlian had been sent away because she had been carrying on an intrigue with her son-in-law. Zhang the Second gave up the idea of marrying Jinlian.

"I have a fifteen-year-old son," he said to Ying Bojue. "He is at school now. I couldn't do with a woman like that in the house."

Then Li Jiao'er told him that Jinlian had poisoned her first husband before she went to Ximen Qing, that she had misconducted herself with the boys, and murdered another lady and her child. Zhang the Second was even more determined not to marry Jinlian.

Major Zhou was delighted with Chunmei. He found her pretty, intelligent, and attractive. He gave her three rooms and a young maid, and stayed with her for three whole days. He had two dresses made for her. When old woman Xue went to see him, he gave her five qian of silver. He bought a maid for Chunmei and established her as his third wife. His first wife was blind. She ate vegetarian food, devoted herself to religion, and did not concern herself with household affairs at all. Chunmei lived in the western wing and Major Zhou, who was very fond of her, gave her all the keys.

One day, old woman Xue came and told Chunmei that Jinlian had left Ximen's house and was at old woman Wang's place. That night, Chunmei wept and said to Major Zhou: "My old mistress and I were together all those years and she never spoke a harsh word to me. I might have been her daughter. I believed that she and I would never see one another again, but now she too has left Ximen's house. If you marry her, we can live together most happily. She is very beautiful. She knows all about poetry and music, and she is clever and charming in every way. Her animal is the Dragon, so she is now thirty-two years old. If she comes, I will gladly take rank below her."

Major Zhou was impressed. He sent his servants, Zhang Sheng and Li An, with two handkerchiefs and two qian of silver, to old woman Wang's house to see Jinlian. They told him that she really was extraordinarily beautiful. The old woman still demanded a hundred taels, and Zhang Sheng and Li An discussed the matter with her for a long time. They offered eighty taels, but old woman Wang would not accept it. She declared that Mistress Ximen insisted upon a hundred taels. "You will have to pay the hundred," she said, "but you need not bother about my fee. Heaven will not allow me to go unrewarded for my pains."

Zhang Sheng and Li An took back the money to the Major, and he decided to let the matter rest for a day or two. But Chunmei cried every evening. "You must give a few more taels," she said. "If she comes here to live with me, I shall die happy."

So this time the Major sent his bailiff, Zhou Zhong, with Zhang Sheng and Li An. They offered the old woman ninety taels. This made her still more grasping.

"If ninety taels would have done, I could have sold her long ago," she said. "His Lordship Chang would have paid that."

This made Zhou Zhong angry. He told Li An to wrap up the money again. "Do you think that I, a three-legged frog, am not able to find a two-legged woman?" he said. "You old whore! You don't seem to realize whom you are dealing with. Would you talk about Zhang the Second to me? Do you imagine that my master cannot do what he likes with you? It is simply because his new wife has asked him to do this. He doesn't want the woman so much as all that."

"We have been here several times," Li An said, "and that seems to have made you get rather above yourself, you old whore."

He took Zhou Zhong's hand. "Come, let us go and tell our master," he said. "Let him get this old whore to his office and give her a beating."

But the old woman was still thinking of what Chen Jingji had promised and, in spite of all their abuse, she would not budge. The men went back to Major Zhou. "We offered her ninety taels," they said, "but she would not agree."

"Take a hundred taels and a sedan chair tomorrow," Major Zhou said, "and bring the woman here."

"Master," Zhou Chung said, "if you give her a hundred taels, she will certainly demand another five for herself. Leave her alone for a few days and we shall see if she is still so stupid. If she is, have her brought to your office and try the effect of the thumbscrews. Then she will be afraid of you."

We know not what life has in store for us
No one can tell what brings good fortune
And what brings evil.
But at last comes the reward alike of good and evil
Sometimes at once and sometimes long delayed.

We have now to speak again of Wu Song. When he reached Mengzhou, the place to which he had been banished, he was fortunate enough to come under the charge of Shi En, the son of the Chief Jailer. On a certain occasion this Shi En and a man called Jiang Menshen had trouble at a drinking house. Shi En was hurt, but Wu Song came to his aid and Jiang Menshen was beaten. Later, Jiang's sister became a concubine of General Zhang, and, when Wu Song was working for the general, he was accused of stealing and sentenced to serve as a soldier. On his way into this further banishment, Wu Song killed two officials at Feiyunpu. Then he went back and killed all General Zhang's and Jiang Menshen's people, and afterwards took refuge at Shi En's house. Shi En gave him a letter and a leather trunk containing a hundred taels of silver and told him to go to Anping fortress, and see the officer in command there, a certain Liu Gao. On his way, he heard that the Emperor's successor had been proclaimed at the Imperial Palace, and that the Emperor, besides making sacrifice to Heaven, had declared a general amnesty. So Wu Song came home.

When he came to Qinghe, he gave the officers his papers and was reinstated in his old position at the Town Hall. He went to see his neighbor Yao, who had been looking after Ying'er. The girl was now about nineteen years old. Wu Song took her and settled down. He heard that Ximen Qing was dead and that Jinlian was no longer living in that household, but had gone to old woman Wang's house, and was trying to find a new husband. Then Wu Song determined upon revenge.

He put on a hat, and dressed himself well, and went to see what he could see at old woman Wang's house. Jinlian was standing behind the lattice and, when she saw Wu Song, went at once to the inner room. Wu Song pulled aside the lattice and said: "Is old woman Wang at home?"

The old woman was busy preparing dinner. "Who is there?" she said. But, as soon as she had spoken, she recognized Wu Song and made a reverence to him. Wu Song bowed low in return.

"Brother Wu, when did you get back?" the old woman said. "I am delighted to see you."

"My offense has been pardoned," Wu Song said, "so I was able to come home again. I got here yesterday. Thank you for having looked after my brother's house. I will reward you later."

The old woman smiled. "Brother," she said, "you are even better looking than you used to be. There is hair on your lip; you have become quite stout, and you have acquired most elegant manners." She took him into the house and offered him tea.

"There is something I want to talk to you about," Wu Song said.

"What is it?"

"I hear that Ximen Qing is dead and that my sister-in-law is back with you again. Will you let her know that I should like to marry her? Ying'er is grown up now and needs somebody to look after her and find her a husband. So we shall avoid people's rude remarks."

At first, old woman Wang decided she would not tell Wu Song the true story. "She is here," she said, "but I am not at all sure that she feels inclined to marry again." But when she found that Wu Song was ready enough to pay, she said: "I will broach the matter to her gradually."

On the other side of the lattice, Jinlian heard all that was said. She heard Wu Song say that he wanted to marry her in order to have someone to look after Ying'er. She noticed that, after these years of absence, Wu Song seemed a more powerful man than ever. He spoke very agreeably. He seems to have given up his old ideas, she thought, and now is ready for marriage. So she did not wait for old woman Wang to call her, but came out of her own accord. She made a reverence to Wu Song.

"Am I right, Uncle, in understanding that you wish to take me to look after Ying'er and see about her marriage?"

"You must know," old woman Wang interrupted, "that Mistress Ximen wants a hundred taels."

"That seems a great deal," Wu Song suggested.

"Ximen spent so much money on her that he could have made a woman of silver with it," old woman Wang said.

"Well, we won't haggle," Wu Song said. "I want my sister-in-law, and I don't mind spending the money. And you shall have five taels for yourself."

This made the old woman so pleased that she farted and piddled with delight. "Brother Wu," she said, "I know no other man who has such intelligence as yours. You are a man, and you have been abroad a few years and seen the world."

Jinlian went to the inner room, made some strong tea, and offered it to Wu Song with both hands.

"Ximen's people are anxious to have the matter settled as soon as possible," the old woman said, "and there are four or five people falling over themselves to marry her. I refused them all because they would not pay the price. If you want her, you must let me have your money at once. As you know, the first man to cook the rice is the first to eat it. Heaven brings you together, so don't let anybody else do you out of such a good match."

"Yes," Jinlian said, "if you want me, you must not waste any time."

"I will bring the money tomorrow and take you away tomorrow night," Wu Song said.

Old woman Wang could not believe Wu Song had so much money. The next day he opened the leather trunk and took out the hundred taels that Shi En had given him. He added to it another five taels of his own and went to see old woman Wang. He asked for scales to measure the silver. When the old woman saw the table piled up with white silver, she said to herself: "That Chen Jingji promised me a hundred taels. But he has had to go to the Eastern Capital for it, and there is no telling when he will be back. Why should I not take the chance while I have it?" When the five taels for herself was produced, she accepted it and thanked Wu Song most profusely.

"Brother Wu," she said, "you know how to deal with me."

"Mother," Wu Song said, "take the money. I will take my sister-in-law today."
"Don't be in too much of a hurry, Brother," the old woman said. "You are like a man who lets off fireworks in some dark corner because he hasn't patience enough to wait for the evening. You must wait until I have paid the money to Ximen's people. Then you may take her. And what a fine bridegroom you are, with that smart hat!"
Wu Song grew impatient. Jinlian joked with him. When he had gone away, the old woman thought: "Mistress Ximen said I was to get rid of this woman and never said a word about the price. Now is my chance. I will give her twenty taels and keep the rest for myself."
She took twenty taels to Yueniang, who asked the name of the purchaser.
"Lady," old woman Wang said, "the hares scamper about over the hills but in the end they go back to their own holes. She is going back to the old food she used to eat: she is going to marry her husband's brother."
When Wu Yueniang heard this, she was sorry. She knew that when an enemy meets an enemy, they look closely one at the other. Afterwards, she said to Meng Yulou: "Jinlian will die at this man's hands. He is a man ready to kill for no reason whatever, and he will not spare her."
Old woman Wang went home and told her son Wang Chao to take Jinlian's belongings to Wu Song. The bridegroom had prepared a feast for them. In the evening, the old woman took Jinlian to him. She was no longer in mourning. She wore a new headdress, red clothes, and there was a veil on her head. When they came into the middle room, the candles were burning brightly.
Then they saw Wu Da's tablet on the table. This made them wonder. They felt as though someone were pulling out their hair and sticking knives into their flesh. When they had gone to the inner room, Wu Song told Ying'er to fasten all the doors.
"I must be going now," the old woman said. "There is nobody to look after my house."
"Stay and have something to drink, old Mother," Wu Song said. He told Ying'er to set the dishes on the table and heat some wine. Yet, when the wine was brought, he did not ask them to drink, but poured himself cup after cup and drank them all down.
"I have had quite enough to eat, Brother Wu," the old woman said, "I must go now and leave you two to enjoy yourselves."
"Old woman," Wu Song said, "don't be a fool. I, Wu the Second, have something to say to you." With a crash Wu Song drew out a knife, two feet long, with a very sharp blade. Grasping the knife in one hand, he seized the old woman with the other. His eyes were wide open and his hair stood on end.
"Old woman," he said, "you need not be surprised. Just as a debt finds out those who owe it, so hatred never fails to meet its object. Don't pretend to be a fool. It was your hand that ended my brother's life."
"Brother Wu," the old woman said, "it is getting late, and you are drunk. You shouldn't play with knives. It isn't funny."
"Be silent, old woman," Wu Song said. "I, Wu the Second, am not afraid of death. I will deal with that creature first, and with you, you old sow, later. Move a single inch, and you shall feel my knife."
Then he turned to Jinlian. "Listen, you whore," he said. "How did you murder my brother? Tell me the truth and I will forgive you."
"Uncle, don't be silly," Jinlian said. "How can you fry beans in a cold pan? Your brother died from heart trouble. I had nothing to do with it."
Almost before the words were out of her mouth, there was a crash. Wu Song banged the knife upon the table, seized the woman by her hair with his left hand, and grasped her breasts with his right. Then he kicked over the table. Dishes and cups crashed to the ground. Jinlian was not very strong. He lifted her like a feather from the other side of the table. Then he dragged her to the middle room, before the table on which Wu Da's tablet stood. Old woman Wang saw that he was in a mad rage and would have run away, but the door had been locked and Wu Song, striding after her, caught her. He threw her to the floor and, with his girdle, tied her up till she looked like a monkey offering a fruit. She could not get away.
"Oh, Sir," she cried, "don't be angry with me. This lady is responsible for the murder. It was all her doing. My hands are clean."
"You old bitch," Wu Song cried. "I know everything, and it is no use your lying to me. It was you who told Ximen Qing to have me banished. But I am here, and where is Ximen Qing?"
"I will kill you first," he said to Jinlian, "and then this old bitch."
He picked up the knife and brandished it twice before her face.
"Uncle, forgive me, and let me get up," she cried. "I promise I will tell you."
Wu Song picked her up. He stripped her of her clothes and made her kneel down before the tablet.
"Speak quickly, whore!" he shouted at her.
Now her spirit had left her. She told Wu Song everything; how, when she had been pulling up the lattice, the pole had struck Ximen Qing, how she had made clothes, and how the intrigue between them had begun. Then she said how Ximen Qing had kicked Wu Da in the chest, and old woman Wang had shown her how to poison him. Then, how they had burned his body, and Ximen Qing had married her. Meanwhile old woman Wang was sobbing. "Oh, you fool," she cried, "you have told him the truth. What can I do now?"
Wu Song, before the tablet, grasped the woman by the hair. With his other hand, he sprinkled wine upon the ground and set fire to some paper money.
"Brother," he said, "your spirit cannot be far away. This day Wu Song avenges you."
When Jinlian heard this, she was desperate and began to shriek. Wu Song took a handful of dust from the incense burner and threw it into her mouth so that she could not make any more noise. He tugged at her hair and threw her down upon the ground again. As she struggled with him, her hair was disordered and the pins and earrings fell out. Wu Song thought it possible that she might try to run away, and kicked her in the ribs. Then he stamped upon her arms with both his feet.
"You whore," he cried, "you make yourself out to be a very clever woman. I would like to know what sort of heart you have, and I will see."
He tore her arms apart, and thrust the knife deep into her soft white bosom. One slash, and there was a bleeding hole in her breast. Blood gushed forth. Now the woman's starry eyes were almost closed and her feet seemed to tremble. Wu Song took the knife in his teeth, tore open her breast with both hands, and dragged the heart and entrails from her body. The blood streamed from them as he set them on the table before the tablet. Then, with a single stroke, he cut off her head. The blood flowed over the floor.
Ying'er looked in, terrified, and covered her face with her hands.
A violent man, this Wu Song. And how sad, the case of this woman who, when the breath was still in her body, could use it in a thousand ways. Now she was powerless. She was only thirty-two years old. When his hand fell, her young life ended. The knife struck, and she was no more. Her spirit fled to the palace of the King of Hell, and her spirit vanished to the city of the dead. It was like the breaking of the golden branches of the willow by the snow in springtime, or the jade-like blossom rent and torn by the wild wind as the year goes out. We know not where her loveliness vanished that night, or where her sweet spirit went.
When Wu Song killed Jinlian, old woman Wang shouted, "Murder." Then he went to her, and struck off her head. He dragged away the body, then thrust his knife through the woman's heart, and pinned it to the eaves at the back of the house. It was the first night watch. He took Ying'er into the other room. "I am frightened, Uncle," she said. "My child," Wu Song said, "I can do nothing for you."
Then he jumped over the wall and went into old woman Wang's house. He wished to kill Wang Chao. But it seemed that Wang Chao's end was not to be yet. When he heard his mother's shrieks, he knew that Wu Song was killing her. He came to the front door but would not open it. He knocked at the back, but there was no answer. Then he rushed to the street to find a policeman. Meanwhile, the neighbors on either side knew that Wu Song was killing somebody, but none of them dared to interfere.
When Wu Song reached old woman Wang's room, he found a light burning, but there was nobody there. He opened her chest, took out the clothes and strewed them on the floor. Then he found the silver, about eighty-five taels, for the old woman had only given Yueniang twenty. But he took ornaments, pins and earrings. Then, taking his knife, he jumped over the wall at the back. About the fifth night watch, he left the city, and went to Shizipo, where Zhang Qing and his wife lived. Then he became a monk. Afterwards, he went to Liangshan and joined the bandits.

III

P'an Chin-lien Appears in a Dream in Commandant Chou Hsiu's Home; Wu Yüeh-niang Contributes a Gift to a Subscription-Seeking Monk & Chunmei Mourns for Pan Jinlian

Above, one is exposed to the scrutiny of Heaven;
Below, one is watched by the spirits of the Earth.
In the world of light there is imperial law[1]
to restrain one;
In the darkness there are ghosts and spirits to follow one.[2]
Loyalty and uprightness should be embedded in one's heart;
Joy and anger should be governed by one's vital spirits.
It is lack of integrity that causes one to lose one's home;
It is dishonesty that results in losing one's position.
You are urged to be vigilant about this throughout your life;
Lest you have cause to sigh, be alarmed, or become afraid.[3]

After Wu Sung had killed the woman and Dame Wang and taken their valuables, he went to join the band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh.
After Wang Ch'ao ran out onto the street to look for the head of the local mutual security unit, he noticed that both the front and rear doors to Wu Sung's house were locked, and that the valuables had been taken from Dame Wang's house and the clothing scattered:
Higgledy-piggledy, all over the floor. Upon realizing that Wu Sung had killed both women and made off with their valuables, he felt compelled to break open both the front and rear doors, only to find their two corpses dripping with blood where they lay on the floor, Chin-lien's heart and entrails pinned up with a dagger under the eaves at the back of the house, and Ying-erh locked up inside the room. When he asked her what had happened, all she could do was to weep bitterly.
The next day, at the early session of the court, he submitted a report to the district magistrate and laid the dagger that had been used as the murder weapon before him. The newly appointed district magistrate was named Li Ch'ang-ch'i and was a native of Tsao-ch'iang district in Chen-ting prefecture of Hopei province. On hearing that it was a case of homicide, he promptly deputed the docket officer on duty to round up the neighbors, the head of the local mutual security unit, and the family members of the victims, Wang Ch'ao and Ying-erh, so that the corpses could be carried out into the street for all to see while a formal inquest was performed as the law required. It was determined that the two victims, P'an Chin-lien and Dame Wang, had been murdered by Wu Sung in a fit of drunken rage, and this tentative conclusion was:
Duly drawn up as a file on the case.[4]
The local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit were ordered to arrange for the temporary interment of the two bodies and to keep watch over them. Public placards describing the fugitive were hung up announcing that officers were being deputed to pursue the culprit Wu Sung in all directions, and that a reward of fifty taels of silver was being offered by the authorities for anyone who could provide evidence of his whereabouts.
Meanwhile, Chang Sheng and Li An from Commandant Chou Hsiu's residence showed up at Dame Wang's place with a hundred taels of silver, only to find that Dame Wang and the woman had both been murdered by Wu Sung, and that the district yamen had sent people to perform an inquest on the corpses and apprehend the murderer. The two of them then returned and reported this at the commandant's residence. When Ch'un-mei learned that Chin-lien was dead, she did nothing but weep for two or three days and refused to partake of either tea or food. This threw Commandant Chou Hsiu into such a state of consternation that he sent someone out onto the street to hire an itinerant acrobat to come in and entertain her, but her sorrow was not assuaged. He also dispatched Chang Sheng and Li An every day to find out if the culprit Wu Sung had been apprehended and report back to him. But no more of this. Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment.
To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi had started out for the Eastern Capital in order to get the money needed to ransom Chin-lien, with whom he had set his heart on becoming man and wife. Who could have anticipated that when he was halfway there, he should run into his family's servant Ch'en Ting, who had set out from the Eastern Capital to tell him that his father was in a parlous state of health.
"My mistress sent me to ask you to come home," he said, "so she can turn over to you the responsibility for the future of the household."
No sooner did Ch'en Ching-chi hear these words than he set out faster than ever:
Covering two stages in the time for one,
and duly arrived, one day, at the house of his father's brother-in-law, Chang Shih-lien, in the Eastern Capital.
Chang Shih-lien had already died, so only his aunt was there, and he learned that his father, Ch'en Hung, had passed away about three days earlier, so the whole household was wearing mourning garb. Ch'en Ching-chi paid his respects before his father's spirit tablet and kowtowed to his mother, née Chang, and his aunt, née Ch'en, the elder sister of Ch'en Hung. His mother saw that he had already reached manhood, and the two of them, mother and son, wept together and then consulted with each other about the situation.
"Right now," his mother said:
"On the one hand, there is reason to be happy,
While on the other, there is reason to be sad."[5]
Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "What reason is there to be happy, and what reason is there to be sad?"
"The reason to be happy," his mother responded, "is that the Emperor has designated an heir apparent to reside in the Eastern Palace, and that at the Suburban Sacrifice to Heaven on the day of the winter solstice a general amnesty has been issued to celebrate the occasion. The reason to be sad is that your father has taken ill and died unexpectedly, your uncle has also died, and your aunt is maintaining her widowhood. Under the circumstances, for us to remain living here:
Is not a long-term solution.
That is why I sent Ch'en Ting to summon you. If we can arrange together to take your father's coffin back to his native place for burial, it would be a good thing."
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard these words:
In his heart he thought to himself,
"If I should have to be responsible for preparing the coffin, and loading the bulky belongings of our family and its dependents into carts for the journey, it is bound, at the very least, to hold me up for a considerable period of time and cause me to miss out on this opportunity to marry Sister Six. It would be better for me, thus and so, to propose setting out for home immediately with two carts loaded with trunks of valuables. It would not be too late for me then to come back and take care of my father's coffin after marrying Sister Six."
He then said to his mother, "At present, the roads are beset with bandits and are hazardous to travel. If we were all to set out together, with my father's coffin and our trunkloads of bulky household belongings loaded onto any number of carts and beasts of burden, it would be difficult to avoid arousing attention; and if we were to encounter a bunch of brigands along the way, what would we do?
It is better to be late than to be sorry.
I ought to set out for home right now with two carts loaded with trunks of valuables, and take care of getting the house in shape. You and Ch'en Ting, along with the other household dependents, can then accompany father's coffin, and return home during the first month, after the New Year's Festival is over. It will not be too late then to deposit the coffin in a temple outside the city walls, arrange a funeral ceremony and scripture recitation, and see that it is properly entombed."
His mother, being the woman that she was, though she ought not to have done so, allowed herself to be persuaded by Ch'en Ching-chi's artful arguments; set out to pack two trunks with valuables; and loaded them onto two large carts that bore banners identifying them as pilgrimage vehicles. He departed from the Eastern Capital on the tenth day of the twelfth month and arrived not many days later at the gate of the family home in the Ch'ing-ho district of Shantung province.
Upon his arrival, he told his maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, "My father is already dead, and my mother is going to accompany the cart with his bier and should arrive sometime in the near future. I have brought two cartloads of belongings with me and have come ahead to take care of getting the house in shape and sweeping it out prior to her arrival."
When his maternal uncle heard this, he said, "In that case, I had better move out and return to my own home."
He then, forthwith, told his servants to move his belongings and vacated the premises.
Upon seeing his maternal uncle move out, Ch'en Ching-chi was utterly delighted and said to himself:
"At long last my enemy has been removed from my sight, which will enable me to marry Sister Six and enjoy her here at home to my heart's content. Since my father is already dead, and my mother dotes on me, I can first divorce that whore of mine, and then lodge a formal complaint against my mother-in-law and have her haled into court in order to recover the things that my family originally entrusted to her. Under the circumstances, she is no longer in a position to say no to this demand, since the members of my family are no longer threatened with military exile."

Truly:
Though men may plan to do thus and so:
Heaven's principles may yet deny them.
Ch'en Ching-chi, as soon as he had succeeded in getting his maternal uncle to move out, put a hundred taels of silver into the wallet at his waist, and another ten taels into his sleeve as a gratuity for Dame Wang, and proceeded to make his way to the door of her house on Amethyst Street.
Strange as it may seem, what should he see but the temporary tombs of two corpses buried on the side of the street in front of her door, with a pair of spears crisscrossed above them, and a lantern suspended from them. On the door there hung a handwritten placard that read as follows:
Notice concerning a case of murder posted by the district yamen. The culprit, Wu Sung, has murdered the woman née P'an and Dame Wang. Anyone who is able to apprehend him, or provide information to the authorities, will be rewarded with fifty taels of silver.
Ch'en Ching-chi raised his head and gazed at it for some time.
What should he see at this juncture but two men who emerged from a temporary shelter and shouted at him, "Who are you? And why are you gazing at that placard? At present, the real culprit has not been apprehended. Who are you anyway?"
The two of them advanced toward him in large strides as though they wished to take him into custody. Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into such consternation by this that he fled from the scene as fast as he could go.
As he was passing by the tavern below the stone bridge on Lion Street, he ran into someone wearing a flat-topped cap and a black jacket, who came up behind him from under the bridge and said, "Brother, you're really foolhardy. What were you staring at back there for no good reason?"
When Ch'en Ching-chi turned his head to look at him, he saw that it was an old friend of his named Yang the Elder, nicknamed the Iron Fingernail.
After the two of them had exchanged greetings, Yang the Elder said, "Brother, I haven't seen you for some time. Where have you been?"
Ch'en Ching-chi told him all about his trip to the Eastern Capital and his father's death and then said, "That woman who was slain recently was a concubine of my father-in-law's, whose maiden name was P'an. I didn't know that she had been murdered. It was only on reading that placard just now that I found out about it."
"It was her brother-in-law Wu Sung who did it," explained Yang the Elder. "He had been serving a term in military exile but was able to return home as the result of a general amnesty. I don't know why he murdered the woman and also refused to let Dame Wang off. He has a young niece who was supported for the last three or four years by my maternal Uncle Yao the Second. The other day, when her uncle committed those murders and disappeared, who knows where, my uncle recovered the girl from the district yamen, and he is planning to look for someone he can marry her to. Right now, those two corpses have been buried in their temporary graves for some time and are a source of distress to the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, who don't know on what day, month, and year the culprit Wu Sung will be arrested."
When he had finished speaking, Yang the Elder invited Ch'en Ching-chi to join him for a drink in the tavern, saying, "It will serve to brush off the dust from your journey."
Ch'en Ching-chi was so distressed at heart by the death of the woman that he was unable to enjoy the wine, and after drinking a mere three cups or so, he got up, went downstairs, said good-bye, and returned home.
That evening, he bought a hundred sheets of paper money and made his way to a spot by the stone bridge, some distance from Dame Wang's house on Amethyst Street, and addressed the woman, saying, "Sister Six, née P'an, I, your younger brother Ch'en Ching-chi, am burning a hundred sheets of paper money on your behalf today. It is all because I arrived back a step too late that you forfeited your life.
While alive you were a human being;
Once dead you have become a spirit.[6]
Allow me to assure you that I will apprehend your enemy Wu Sung in order to:
Avenge your wrong and assuage your resentment.
Only when I see him dismembered on the execution ground will my aspirations of a lifetime be fulfilled."
When he had finished speaking, he wept and then burned the paper money on her behalf.
Upon returning home, Ch'en Ching-chi shut the door, entered his bedroom, and went to bed, whereupon:
Seemingly asleep yet not asleep,
Chin-lien appeared to him in a dream, dressed all in white, with her entire body covered with blood, and wept before him, saying, "My brother, I died a gruesome death. I had hoped that I would be able to spend the rest of my life with you, but unexpectedly you failed to show up, and I was murdered by that rascal Wu Sung. At present, the Underworld will not admit me, so that, by day, I can only:
Drift aimlessly about;[7] and, by night, I have to scrounge around everywhere in search of offerings made to the deceased. Just now, I received the hundred sheets of paper money that you burned for me, but that enemy of mine has not yet been apprehended, and my corpse is lying in a temporary grave on the street. If you are still moved by our old feelings for each other, you might buy a coffin, put my corpse into it, and see that I am properly buried, so that I will not have to lie there exposed for days on end."
Ch'en Ching-chi wept on hearing this and said, "My sister, needless to say, I would like to see you properly buried. But I am afraid that my mother-in-law, that bitch who is utterly devoid of benevolence or righteousness from the Hsi-men Ch'ing household, who has it in for me, would seize upon this pretext to do me harm. Sister, what you ought to do is go to the residence of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and ask Ch'un-mei to see if she can take care of having you properly buried."
"I have just been to the commandant's residence," the woman said, "but:
The Gate God and the Portal Sentinel,[8] blocked my way and would not let me in. I will have to go back and plead with them again however long it may take."
Ch'en Ching-chi wept on hearing this and reached out to take hold of her and discuss the problem further when he was assailed by the stench of blood from her body as she extricated herself from his grasp and disappeared. It turned out to be but:
A dream of the Southern Branch.
As he lay awake on his pillow he heard the watchman's drum sound the second period of the third watch and said to himself, "How uncanny! Just now, I clearly saw Sister Six in a dream. She shared her innermost feelings with me and asked me to take care of giving her a proper burial; but we don't know:
On what day of what year,[9]
Wu Sung will be apprehended. It's really distressing."
Truly:
Beset by limitless sorrow, communicated in a dream;
He sits alone in an empty room, weeping until dawn.
We will say no more for the moment about how Ch'en Ching-chi sought for information about the whereabouts of Wu Sung.
To resume our story, the authorities in the district yamen spent more than two months trying to locate and arrest Wu Sung but failed to apprehend him. Only then did they learn that he had fled to join the band of outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh. When the local constable, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, and the neighbors reported this to the authorities, it was decided that it would be appropriate to empower the relatives of the deceased to remove their bodies for burial. Dame Wang's corpse was duly taken away and buried by her son Wang Ch'ao; but there was no one to take charge of P'an Chin-lien's cadaver.
To resume our story, in the meantime, Ch'un-mei in Commandant Chou Hsiu's residence had been sending Chang Sheng and Li An to the district yamen every two or three days to find out if there was any news about the situation; and they had been reporting back that the culprit had not yet been apprehended, that the bodies of the victims were still temporarily interred under the surveillance of the local constable, and that under the circumstances no one would dare to remove them. This situation continued until some time in the first ten days of the first month of the following year.
Unexpectedly, one evening, Ch'un-mei had a dream in which Chin-lien appeared to her:
In an illusory and hallucinatory manner;[10]
With her cloud-shaped chignon disheveled,
And her entire figure covered with blood;
and called out to her, saying, "Young lady P'ang, my good sister, I died a gruesome death. I have been unable to come and see you, having been prevented by the Gate Gods who shouted so fiercely at me that I did not dare try to come in. At present, my nemesis Wu Sung has managed to escape, and my corpse has been exposed in the street for a long time:
Blown by the wind, drenched by the rain,[11]
And stepped on by the chickens and dogs, with no one to bury it. Since I am without any relatives to look to, if you can remember our former feelings for each other, like those between mother and daughter, bring yourself to purchase a coffin for me, and see to my burial:
Although I will be dead in the Underworld,
I will be able to close my mouth and eyes."
When she had finished speaking, she wept unceasingly. Ch'un-mei attempted to take hold of her, wishing to question her further, but she extricated herself from her grasp and disappeared, leaving Ch'un-mei to wake up and find that it was merely:
A dream of the Southern Branch.
Upon wakening from her dream in tears, she was:
Hesitant and uncertain what to do.[12]
The next day, she called in Chang Sheng and Li An and directed them, saying, "The two of you go to the front of the district yamen and see whether the corpses of that woman and Dame Wang are still buried there, or not."
Chang Sheng and Li An accepted her instructions and set off on their errand.
Before long, they returned and reported, "The perpetrator of their murders is still at large. It is not convenient for the local officials to continue keeping watch over the corpses any longer, so they have empowered the relatives of the victims to remove their corpses and bury them. The corpse of Dame Wang has been removed by her son, but no one has come forward to take charge of the other woman's corpse, which is still buried there on the street."
Ch'un-mei said to them, "In that case, there is something I would like to ask the two of you to do for me, for which I will see that you are amply rewarded."
The two of them knelt down and said, "Mistress, how can you say such a thing? If you are willing to put in a good word for us with the master, that will be more than sufficient.
Though we should have to go through fire and water, we would not refuse your request."
Ch'un-mei went into her room and came out with ten taels of silver and two bolts of muslin, which she turned over to the two of them, saying, "This murdered woman is actually a sister of mine, who married into Hsi-men Ch'ing's household but has been murdered upon leaving it. I would like the two of you, without informing the master, to take this silver, purchase a coffin with it, see that her corpse is encoffined, and then carry it outside the city and take care of burying it properly in some convenient spot. If you do so, I will see that you are amply rewarded."
The two of them responded, "That's no problem. We will do what you ask."
But Li An said, "I'm only afraid that the authorities in the district yamen will not let the two of us remove the corpse. It would be preferable if we could give them a note from the master authorizing our request."
Chang Sheng responded, "If we simply tell them that our mistress is a younger sister of the deceased who married into the Hsi-men household, the authorities in the yamen will not dare not to comply with our request. What need is there for a note?"
Thereupon, they took the silver and retired to the duty room, where Chang Sheng said to Li An, "I imagine that this murdered woman and our mistress must have lived together in the Hsi-men household and become intimate with one another. Otherwise, why should our mistress go to such pains on her behalf? I remember that when our mistress heard that this woman was dead, she did nothing but weep for two or three days and refused to eat, which disturbed our master to such an extent that he sent someone out onto the street to hire an itinerant acrobat to come in and try to entertain her, but her sorrow remained unassuaged. So, today, when there are no relatives to take possession of her corpse, how could our mistress fail to take care of having it decently buried? If we are able to carry this task out successfully, she is bound, sooner or later, to speak to the master on our behalf. Which means she will turn out to be our lucky star. At present, the master pays heed to everything she says and is:
Obedient to her every whim, while our First Mistress and Second Mistress have had to take a back seat."
When they had finished speaking, the two of them took the silver they had been provided with, went to the district yamen, and submitted a formal request that they be authorized to remove the corpse, explaining that their mistress, a member of His Honor Chou Hsiu's household, was the younger sister of the deceased and had entrusted them with this task. They then spent six taels of silver on the construction of a coffin, disinterred the woman's cadaver, replaced her heart and entrails in her abdominal cavity, employed thread to reattach her head to her body, wrapped the corpse in a shroud, and placed it in the coffin.
Chang Sheng then said, "We might as well take her out to be buried at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, our master's family temple outside the South Gate, where there are empty grounds available, and then report back to our mistress."
They then hired two men to carry the coffin out to the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where they explained to the abbot, Tao-chien, that the corpse was that of a relative of their mistress. The abbot, who did not dare to be remiss, chose a spot for the burial behind the temple, under a hollow-trunked white poplar tree.
Once the burial was completed, they returned home and reported to Ch'un-mei, saying, "There are still four taels of silver left over after buying a coffin and placing her corpse in the casket, which we hereby return to you."
"I have put the two of you to a lot of trouble," responded Ch'un-mei. "You should give two of the four remaining taels to Abbot Tao-chien, and ask him to arrange for the recitation of Buddhist sutras and litanies of repentance in order to ensure her rebirth in Heaven."
She then presented them with a large flagon of wine, a leg of pork, and a leg of lamb and said, "As for these two remaining taels of silver, each of you should take one of them home with you to help with your household expenses."
The two of them knelt down before her and refused to accept what she had offered, saying, "Mistress, if you will only put in a good word for us with the master, we will be more than adequately compensated. How could we accept payment in silver for such a meager accomplishment?"
"If I offer you a reward and you refuse to accept it," said Ch'un-mei, "you will only make me angry."
The two of them, consequently, felt obliged to kowtow to her and accept what she had offered before leaving her presence. As they drank the wine they had been given in the duty room, they expressed great appreciation for their young mistress.
The next day, Chang Sheng went to deliver the silver to Abbot Tao-chien and arrange for the scripture recitations. Ch'un-mei also spent five mace of silver to purchase paper money to burn on Chin-lien's behalf. But no more of this.
To resume our story, Ch'en Ting had conducted the coffin of Ch'en Ching-chi's deceased father, Ch'en Hung, and his dependents from the Eastern Capital to the outskirts of Ch'ing-ho district, where they proceeded to store the coffin temporarily in the Temple of Eternal Felicity until they could make the arrangements for scripture recitations, funeral rites, and the burial ceremony.
When Ch'en Ching-chi, who was living in the family home, heard that his mother, née Chang, their servants, and the carts with their belongings had arrived, and that his father's coffin had been placed in storage at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city, he proceeded to bring in the luggage, before kowtowing to his mother.
His mother was annoyed and asked him, "Why did you not come to meet me?"
Ch'en Ching-chi merely replied that he was depressed, on the one hand, and that there was no one to look after the place.
His mother then asked, "Why is your uncle not to be seen?"
To which he replied, "On hearing that you were coming home, he promptly moved out and returned to his own place."
"You should have told your uncle to stay a while," his mother said. "What need was there for him to move out so fast?"
Soon thereafter, his uncle, Militia Commander Chang Kuan, came to see his elder sister, and the two of them:
Embraced each other by the neck and wept.[13]
Wine was served and they proceeded to chat together, but there is no need to describe this in detail.
The next day, his mother sent Ch'en Ching-chi to deliver five taels of silver and several packets of paper money to Abbot Tao-chien at the temple outside the city gate, so he could arrange a scripture recitation on behalf of his deceased father. As he was riding his donkey along the street, he ran into two friends of his named Lu the Second and Yang the Elder and dismounted in order to greet them.
"Brother, where are you going?" the two of them asked.
Ch'en Ching-chi explained his errand, saying, "My deceased father's coffin is in temporary storage at a temple outside the city gate. Tomorrow, the twentieth, is the time for the final weekly commemoration of his death, and my mother has sent me to deliver some silver to the abbot so he can arrange for a funeral ceremony and scripture recitation on his behalf."
"The two of us did not know that your father's coffin had arrived," they responded. "We have been remiss in offering our condolences."
They then went on to ask, "When will the funeral procession and the burial ceremony take place?"

"They will take place in another day or two," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "After the scripture recitation has been held, he will be put to rest in the grave."
When they had finished their conversation, the two of them raised their hands in a gesture of farewell and started to leave, but Ch'en Ching-chi called them back and asked Yang the Elder, "How is it that the cadaver of my father-in-law's concubine, née P'an, that was temporarily interred in front of the district yamen is no longer to be seen? Who has taken it away?"
"About a fortnight ago," said Yang the Elder, "because the local authorities had not been able to apprehend Wu Sung, they petitioned the district magistrate to allow the relatives of the deceased to take their corpses away for burial. Dame Wang's cadaver was taken away by her son, but the body of the other woman was left where it was for another three or four days. In the end, someone from the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command purchased a coffin and sent people to carry the bier outside the city and bury it on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity."
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he realized that it must have been Ch'un-mei, who was now a member of the commandant's household, who had arranged for the burial of the body.
He then turned to Lu the Second and asked, "How many Temples of Eternal Felicity are there outside the city wall?"
"There is only the one Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate," replied Lu the Second. "It is the family temple of His Honor Chou Hsiu. How could there be more than one temple of that name?"
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he was secretly pleased and thought to himself, "So it's the same Temple of Eternal Felicity after all.
This coincidence was fated to occur.
It is fantastic that Sister Six is also buried there."
He then took leave of his two friends, whipped up his donkey, and made his way outside the city straight to the Temple of Eternal Felicity.
On meeting Abbot Tao-chien, he did not mention the scripture recitation for his father but asked the abbot, "Where is the grave of the woman from Commandant Chou Hsiu's household that was buried here recently?"
"It is underneath the white poplar tree behind the temple," the abbot replied. "They said that it was the body of the elder sister of the young mistress from the commandant's household."
Ch'en Ching-chi did not even bother to go look at his father's coffin but went first to P'an Chin-lien's grave with his paper money and sacrificial offerings.
After presenting the offerings and burning the paper money, he wept, saying, "Sister Six, your younger brother Ch'en Ching-chi has respectfully burned a packet of paper money on your behalf. May you:
Find an appropriate place in which to live;
And use the cash to cope with any problems."[14]
Only after he had finished sacrificing to her did he proceed to the abbot's quarters in order to burn paper money before his father's coffin and offer a sacrifice to him. He then presented the abbot with the money to pay for a scripture recitation and asked him to arrange for eight Buddhist monks to hold a scripture reading on the twentieth to mark the final weekly commemoration of his father's death. The abbot accepted the money offered for the scripture recitation and provided him with a vegetarian repast, after which Ch'en Ching-chi returned home to report to his mother.
On the twentieth, they all went to the temple to burn incense and select an auspicious day for the funeral procession. Later on, after his father's coffin had been transported to their ancestral graveyard and properly buried, they returned home, where mother and son continued to live together. But no more of this.
To resume our story, one day during the first ten days of the second month, when the weather was mild, Wu Yüeh-niang, together with Meng Yü-lou, Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and Hsiao-yü, made their way out to the front gate in order to observe the coming and going of the carts and horses, and enjoy:
The liveliness of the teeming crowds.[15]
While there, they happened to observe a throng of men and women following in the wake of a Buddhist monk, who had an imposingly corpulent figure, wore bronze effigies of three Buddhas on his head, and bore a number of lantern trees on his body.
The sleeves of his apricot-yellow gown ruffled in the wind;
While the ankles of his naked feet were immersed in the mire.
He claimed to be an itinerant monk who had been ordained at Mount Wu-t'ai[16] and had arrived here in the course of his wanderings in the endeavor to raise money and supplies for the erection of a Buddhist sanctuary there. An author of olden times has bequeathed us a few lines describing the virtues of such itinerant monks.
Assuming the lotus position to practice meditation,
Explaining the scriptures and expounding the Dharma,[17]
Raising their brows and blinking their eyes,
They struggle to attain the truth of the patriarchs.[18]
Relying on their religion to seek sustenance,
They propound the regulations of the Buddhist faith.
By day, they only sport their placards and rattle their bells;
At night, they manipulate their spears and flaunt their clubs.
Sometimes, they kowtow with their bald heads outside the gate;
When hungry, they give themselves loud slaps along the street.
Reality is vacuity, vacuity is reality;
But who has ever seen living beings escape the mundane world?
They may go and come, and come and go;[19]
But who have they managed to escort to the Western Paradise?
When the monk saw Wu Yüeh-niang and the other women gathered at the gate, he came forward and saluted them in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "You venerable lay bodhisattva-like benefactors, though you may inhabit:
Vast courtyards and secluded mansions, are all predestined to be present at the Dragon Flower Assembly.[20] I have come down from Mount Wu-t'ai in the hope of cementing our virtuous affinity by soliciting the funds to erect a temple to the Ten Kings of the Underworld and a sanctuary dedicated to the Three Jewels, The Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. The success of this effort is dependent upon the willingness of you bodhisattvas, and others of:
The patrons in the ten directions,
to:
Widely sow your fields of fortune,[21]
so that by disbursing your wealth you can:
Together achieve a major endeavor, and thus ensure:
A just reward in the life to come.
This humble monk is merely an intermediary."
Upon listening to his appeal, Yüeh-niang turned to Hsiao-yü and directed her to fetch a monk's hat, a pair of monk's sandals, a string of copper cash, and a peck of white rice from her room. It so happens that Yüeh-niang had always been given to:
Almsgiving, or providing vegetarian meals for monks,
so that during her leisure hours she devoted herself to making monk's hats and monk's sandals in order to give to them.
When Hsiao-yü brought these things out, Yüeh-niang said to her, "You go ask His Reverence to come forward, and bestow these things upon him."
Hsiao-yü, thereupon:
Deliberately adopting an arrogant air,[22] called out in a loud voice, saying, "You shaven-pated donkey of a monk, why haven't you come over here? My mistress is bestowing all these things on you, and you haven't even kowtowed in response."
Yüeh-niang rebuked her, saying, "You crazy, depraved little stinker! He is a monk, and a devoted Buddhist.
As though you didn't know any better, how can you bring yourself to abuse him that way? It's really outrageous. Little whore that you are, there's no telling how much evil karma you will have accumulated before you're through."
Hsiao-yü laughed at this and responded, "Mistress, as for this lousy monk, why is it that when I called him over, he devoted himself to:
Looking me over from top to bottom, with those furtive eyes of his?"
The monk, for his part, accepted the sandals, hat, cash, and rice with both hands, saluted Yüeh-niang in the Buddhist fashion, and said, "Many thanks for your largess, you venerable bodhisattva of a benefactor."
"This shaven-pated rascal is really discourteous?" remarked Hsiao-yü. "All of us are standing here, but he has only offered us two salutations. Why has he not offered one to me?"
"You little piece," said Yüeh-niang. "How can you:
Scramble black and white, so blatantly? He is a son of the Buddha, and you are not worthy of receiving his salutation."
"Mistress," responded Hsiao-yü, "if he is a son of the Buddha, who are the Buddha's daughters?"
"I imagine," said Yüeh-niang, "that it is ordained nuns who are the daughters of the Buddha."
"If you say that people like Nun Hsüeh, Nun Wang, and the abbess of the Kuan-yin Nunnery are all daughters of the Buddha," continued Hsiao-yü, "who are the sons-in-law of the Buddha?"
Yüeh-niang could not help laughing at this and reproved her, saying, "You lousy little whore! You've developed such an:
Oily mouth and a slippery tongue, that you constantly resort to vulgarity."
"Mistress," responded Hsiao-yü, "you're only directing your criticism at me, but this shaven-pated monk, with his:
Thievish looks and prying eyes, has been constantly ogling me."
"The fact that he looks at you that way," said Meng Yü-lou, "must be because he recognizes you as a candidate for salvation."
"If he really wants to save me," responded Hsiao-yü, "I'm willing to go along with him."
The gathering of womenfolk couldn't help laughing over this, but Yüeh-niang reproved her in a loud voice, saying, "You little whore! It seems that all you can do is persist in:
Blaspheming monks and profaning Buddhas."[23]
Meanwhile, the monk in question accepted the donations and proceeded nonchalantly on his way with the bronze effigies of three Buddhas on his head.
"Mistress," complained Hsiao-yü, "though you rebuked me for cursing him, as you saw yourself, that lousy shaven-pated rascal gave me another indecent look as he departed."
There is a poem that describes Yüeh-niang's proclivity to:
Cultivate her virtue by charity to monks.
Maintaining my widowhood and reading the sutras the years and months flow by;
Private dissipation and meaningless indulgence have long been anathema to me.
My person is just like the moon near the edge of the horizon;
That will not let itself be intruded upon by floating clouds.
As Yüeh-niang and the others continued their conversation by the gate, they suddenly observed that Auntie Hsüeh was passing by on the street with her box of trinkets in hand.
When she saw Yüeh-niang and the others she bowed to them, and Yüeh-niang asked, "Where are you headed? And why have we not seen so much as your shadow around here recently?"
"I hardly know what it is that keeps me so busy all day," said Auntie Hsüeh. During the last few days, the family of His Honor Judicial Commissioner Chang Mao-te who lives on Main Street has contracted a marriage between his son and the niece of Eunuch Director Hsü from the northern quarter, a match that was proposed by myself and Auntie Wen. Yesterday, as part of the 'third-day celebration,' they put on a lavish party, which kept me so busy that even though the young lady from your place who is now the mistress of Commandant Chou Hsiu's household sent for me, I was unable to go. Who knows how irritated with me she may be?"
"So where are you headed right now?" Yüeh-niang asked.
"There is something that I have respectfully come to tell you about," said Auntie Hsüeh.
"If there is something you want to communicate," said Yüeh-niang, "come inside and tell me about it."
So saying, she ushered Auntie Hsüeh back to the master suite in the rear compound and offered her a seat.
When they had consumed a serving of tea, Auntie Hsüeh said, "Venerable lady, you may not know about it, but last year in the Eastern Capital your son-in-law's father Ch'en Hung fell ill and died, and his wife called upon your son-in-law to come and help bring their dependents and his coffin home. They arrived here during the first month, and the scripture recitation, funeral procession, and burial ceremony have already taken place. I had assumed that you knew about all this, but if so, why did you not go burn some paper money on his behalf, or visit with your relatives?"
"If you had not come to tell us about it, how could we have known?" said Yüeh-niang. No one bothered to inform us. All we heard was that P'an Chin-lien had been murdered by her brother-in-law and was buried, along with Dame Wang, in a temporary grave. And we don't even know what her situation may be at present."
Auntie Hsüeh opined, "It has always been true that for P'an Chin-lien, as for all of us:
Her place of birth and place of death

were predetermined.
If the Fifth Lady's conduct had not caused her to be expelled from the household, everything would have been all right. But, for no good reason, since she:
Was not the sort to abide by her lot, she chose to engage in an ugly affair, and got herself expelled. If she had remained in the household, how would her brother-in-law have been able to murder her? After all:
For every injustice there is a perpetrator;
For every debt there is a creditor.
It is thanks to the young lady from your household, Ch'un-mei, who couldn't get over her intimate feelings for her former mistress, that someone was sent to purchase a coffin, take possession of her corpse, and give it a proper burial. Otherwise, it would still be exposed to the public gaze in the street. Her brother-in-law has not been apprehended, and there was nobody else concerned about her fate."
Sun Hsüeh-o interrupted from the sidelines, saying, "It hasn't been long since Ch'un-mei was sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu. How could her status have risen so quickly to the point that she was able to dispense the silver needed to buy a coffin for her? How could the commandant help being annoyed with her? Who does she think she is, anyway?"
"Ai-ya!" responded Auntie Hsüeh. "You may not know it, but the commandant has really become attached to her. He spends every night in her quarters.
She has but to say one thing,
And he will comply with ten.
No sooner did he take her into his household than he noticed how attractive and intelligent she was, provided her with a suite of three rooms on the western side of the courtyard, assigned a maid to wait upon her, and spent three successive nights in her room. He had outfits of clothing for the four seasons tailored for her and allowed her to put her hair up like a regular lady. At the party on the 'third-day celebration' he rewarded me with a tael of silver and a bolt of satin. His first wife is forty-nine years old, is blind in both eyes, restricts herself to vegetarian fare, and does not concern herself with household affairs. His concubine Sun Erh-niang resides on the eastern side of the courtyard and has borne him a daughter. Although she is theoretically in charge of the household, she has her hands full looking after her daughter. As a result, the keys to all the storerooms in the house, both large and small, have been entrusted to Ch'un-mei. The commandant responds favorably to every request she has to make. So how can you say that she would be unable to disburse such a sum of silver?"
With these few words she managed to reduce both Yüeh-niang and Sun Hsüeh-o to silence.
After sitting a while longer, Auntie Hsüeh got up to go, and Yüeh-niang said to her, "If you are willing to come back tomorrow, I will prepare an offertory table, a bolt of fabric, and a packet of paper money for the use of the dead, and impose upon you to escort Hsi-men Ta-chieh to her father-in-law's tomb in order to burn the paper money on his behalf."
"Are you not going to go yourself?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.
"Just tell them I have been feeling out of sorts," said Yüeh-niang, "and that I will pay a visit to them on another day."
Auntie Hsüeh agreed to these arrangements, saying. "Tell the young lady to get everything ready and wait for me. I will come by after lunch."
"Where are you off to now?" inquired Yüeh-niang. "If it is the commandant's place, forget it."
"If I don't go, they will be annoyed to death with me," said Auntie Hsüeh. "They have sent a young servant to summon me several times already."
"What are they summoning you for," asked Yüeh-niang.
"Mistress," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "you may not know it, but she is already four or five months pregnant. His Honor is utterly delighted and has probably summoned me in order to reward me."
So saying, she picked up her box of trinkets, said farewell, and proceeded on her way.
"What that old whore says is completely without any basis," remarked Sun Hsüeh-o. "How long has it been since she was sold into the commandant's household? Scarcely long enough to have developed half a wombful of child. That commandant, at the very least, has a number of concubines at his disposal. So why should he insist on favoring her? How can she overstate things so?"
"He already has a legitimate wife," said Yüeh-niang, "as well as a concubine who has borne him a daughter."
"It's outrageous!" pronounced Sun Hsüeh-o. "Just an example of the loquaciousness of a go-between.
Producing hundred-foot waves out of a foot's worth of water."
What Sun Hsüeh-o said that day was not without consequences. Truly:
Heaven has seen fit to bestow both the needle and thread;
That bring out discordant patterns from the fabric's ground.[24]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
One recalls the time when she was a servant
at her mistress's beck and call;
Who could have anticipated that today her prospects would be so different?
In this world, the infinite possibilities are all predetermined;[25]
Scoff not that, in this floating life one's efforts may prove vain.

For a moment he beheld her in a dream
But, when he woke, he knew that there was no one.
He turned and tossed and could not sleep
Then threw his clothes about him and paced the floor.
The morning breeze is sharp
The moonbeams dim.
He lies alone, wakeful, till morning breaks
But she of whom he dreamed
Does not return.
When Wang Chao and the police came to Wu Song's place, the doors were still fastened. In old woman Wang's house, money and things were missing and clothes were strewn over the floor. They realized that Wu Song had murdered the woman and gone off with the money. They forced the door and found the two bodies on the floor, covered with blood. The entrails of Pan Jinlian were pinned to the eaves at the back of the house, and Ying'er was still shut up in the room. She could only cry when they questioned her. The next morning they brought the matter before the notice of the magistrate and produced such evidence as they could get.
This magistrate had been recently appointed, and his name was Li Changqi. He was a native of Zaoqiang in the prefecture of Chending. When he heard of the murder, he sent his runners to summon the neighbors and the members of both families. So Wang Chao and Ying'er came before the magistrate. The house and the bodies were examined. The magistrate declared that Wu Song, when drunk, had killed the women Pan and Wang. He ordered the bodies to be buried temporarily, and issued a warrant for Wu Song's arrest, offering a reward of fifty taels of silver for his apprehension.
Zhang Sheng and Li An took a hundred taels with them and went to old woman Wang's house again. But when they got there, they found that the two women had been killed and that the local officials were examining the bodies and taking steps to arrest the murderer. They went back and told their master. When Chunmei heard the news, she wept for three days and would neither eat nor drink. Major Zhou was much disturbed and sent for all kinds of different entertainers to amuse her, but they could not assuage her grief. Every day she sent Zhang Sheng and Li An to see if Wu Song had been arrested.
Meanwhile, Chen Jingji had gone to the Eastern Capital to get some money so that he could marry Jinlian. On the way, he met Chen Ding, a servant of his family, who was coming to tell him that his father was very ill and that his mother wanted him to take up the responsibilities of the household. Then Jingji traveled with even more haste than before. At last he came to the Eastern Capital and hurried to the house of his uncle, Zhang Shilian. But his uncle was dead, and his aunt told him that his father had died three days before. They were all wearing mourning clothes.
Jingji made a reverence before his father's tablet, and kowtowed to his mother and his aunt. His mother realized that he was now a grown man, cried with him, and talked about the matters that needed to be decided. "I am happy and sad at the same time," she said. When Jingji asked her what she meant, she said she was happy because the announcement of the Emperor's successor meant a general amnesty for all prisoners, and sad because of the death of Jingji's father and uncle. "Your aunt is now a widow," she said, "and we shall not be able to stay here any longer. You must take your father's body and bury it at our old home."
If I take the coffin and all the other things, Jingji thought, it will mean a long and slow journey, and I shall be too late to marry. I had better take the chests and valuables and go and marry Jinlian at once. Then I can come back for the coffin, and I shall not be too late.
When he had thought the matter over, he said to his mother: "The country is overridden by bandits and thieves and it is not at all safe to travel. If I take both the coffin and the boxes at the same time, they are likely to attract attention, and what can I do if anything happens? I suggest we do things more gradually. To begin with, I will get two carts and take all these trunks and things and go and see about a house for you. Then I will come back and take you, Chen Ding, and the coffin, at the beginning of next year. When we are settled, we will put the coffin into a monastery and offer sacrifice, then build a tomb and bury it."
His mother, being a woman, was deceived by these smooth-sounding words. She let him take everything away, two cartloads in all. They put banners on the carts to make it seem as though they were pilgrims and, on the first day of the twelfth month, Chen Jingji left the Capital.
When he reached Qinghe, he went to tell his Uncle Zhang that his father was dead, and that his mother and his father's body were coming shortly. "I have brought these things," he said, "so as to make everything ready for my mother."
"In that case," his uncle said, "I must go back to my own house." He bade his servants make preparations at once for the removal.
When his uncle had gone, Jingji was delighted. "Now I have got rid of that old fellow," he said to himself, "I can marry Jinlian straightaway and have a good time. My father is dead and my mother treats me with every indulgence. I will begin by divorcing my wife, and then send an accusation against my mother-in-law. She has no hold on me now since my family is no longer under the ban."
People decide upon courses of action like this, but Heaven often thinks otherwise. Jingji took a hundred taels for old woman Wang, and went to Amethyst Street. But when he got there, there were two rough graves outside the door, each with a spear and a large lantern upon it. On the door itself was pasted a notice that said: "Murder! The murderer Wu Song has killed Pan and Wang. Anyone who arrests him, or gives notice of his whereabouts, will receive a reward of fifty taels of silver."
Jingji looked at the notice. He was as if rooted to the ground. Two men came out of a tent.
"Who are you?" they cried. "Why are you looking at the notice? We haven't arrested anybody yet. Who are you?" They looked as though they would lay hands on Jingji. He ran away. When he came to a wine house, not far from the stone bridge, he saw a man dressed in black coming towards him.
"What are you doing here, Brother?" the man said. "You seem very brave."
Jingji saw that it was a great friend of his, a man called Yang the Second, who was nicknamed Iron Claw. They greeted one another, and Yang the Second asked Jingji where he had been. Jingji told him that he had been to the Eastern Capital, and that his father had died. Then he said: "This woman who has been killed was my father-in-law's wife. This is the first I have heard of it. I have only just read the notice."
"It was her brother, Wu Song, who came back from banishment and murdered her," Yang the Second said. "I don't know why he did it. He even killed old woman Wang. I know Wu Song had a niece, for she has been living with my uncle, Yao the Second, for the last three or four years. Wu Song ran away as soon as he had murdered the two women, and my aunt got the girl away from the authorities and found a husband for her. The two bodies, as you see, are still here. The police will have a very difficult task looking out for Wu Song all the time, and I doubt whether he will ever be caught."
Yang the Second asked Jingji to go and drink with him in the wine house. Now that the young man knew his lover was dead, he was very much upset and could not drink much. He drank three cups or so and then left Yang the Second and went home. That evening he bought some paper money. Then he went to the stone bridge not far from old woman Wang's door. "Sister Pan," he said, "your young brother, Chen Jingji, comes to offer you this paper money. It was because my coming back was so delayed that you met your death. Now you are dead, you will become a goddess. Use your spiritual power to help those who seek to arrest Wu Song. When he is found, I will go to the place of execution to see him cut to pieces. Only then shall I be satisfied."
He sobbed and set fire to the paper money. Then he went home, shut the gate, and went to his own room. He went to sleep. Jinlian appeared to him, wearing a simple dress, and covered with blood. She said to him, with tears: "Brother, I died such a bitter death. I longed to live with you, but, alas, before you came back, that fellow Wu Song murdered me. The underworld will not take me in, so all day I must wander about, and all night I seek for shelter everywhere and try to beg a little water to drink. I thank you for burning paper money for me. My murderer has not been found, and still my body lies in the street. If you think of our past love, buy a coffin and bury me properly, that I may not lie there exposed any longer."
"Sister," Jingji said, "you know that I would gladly bury you, but I am afraid of my mother-in-law, that cruel, heartless woman. If she hears of it, she will seek to do me some evil, and this would be an opportunity. Sister, go to Major Zhou's place. See Chunmei and ask her to have your body buried."
"I have been there," Jinlian cried, "and I could not get in. The god of the gate stopped me. But I will go again."
Jingji still cried and tried to hold her hand and talk to her, but the smell of the blood on her body came to him, and she escaped from him. He woke up and found it was a dream. The night watchman's drum was sounding the third night watch.
"How strange!" he said to himself. "Did I not see my sister? Did she not tell me all about this tragedy and ask me to bury her? But I do not know when Wu Song will be arrested. It is a sad business."
Search was kept up for Wu Song, but two months passed and there was no sign of him. At last there came news that he had gone to Liangshan and joined the bandits, and the policemen told the magistrate. Then the magistrate gave orders that the bodies might now be taken away and buried by their families. Wang Chao took away his mother's body, but there was no one to bury Jinlian.
Chunmei had been sending Zhang Sheng and Li An nearly every day to the Town Hall for news. Each time they could only report that the murderer had not been caught and that the bodies were still there. The police were keeping watch over them and nobody dared move them. At the beginning of the first month, Chunmei had a dream. Pan Jinlian came to her, covered with blood and her hair in disorder. "Sister," the woman said, "I had such a sad death. It was hard for me to come and see you because the god of the gate would not let me in. Now my enemy, Wu Song, has escaped. My body still lies in the street, blown by the wind and drenched by the rain. Dogs and fowls come and stand over me. I have no near relations, and there is no one to take me away. If you still remember the friendship there used to be between us, buy a coffin and bury me somewhere. Then, in Hades, I can close my eyes and mouth in peace." As she said this, she cried bitterly.
Chunmei wished to take her hand and ask her many things, but Jinlian slipped away from her. She woke up and knew it was a dream. She was still crying.
She did not know what the dream meant until the next day. Then she said to Zhang Sheng and Li An: "Go and see whether the bodies of those two women are still there."
When they came back, the men told her: "The murderer has escaped and the two bodies could not lie there forever with the police keeping watch over them, so the magistrate has ordered the relatives to take them away. The old woman's son has taken away his mother's body, but the other woman is still there."
"Now," Chunmei said, "I am going to ask you two to do something for me. If you do it, I will see you are well paid for it."
The two men knelt down. "Lady," they said, "you need not talk of payment. If you will speak kindly of us to our master, we shall be grateful and, if you tell us to go through fire or water, we are ready to do it."
Chunmei went into her room and got ten taels of silver and two rolls of cloth.
"The dead woman was really my sister," she said to them. "She married Ximen Qing and, after his death, left his household. Then she was murdered. Don't say anything to your master, but go and buy a coffin with this money, put her body into it, and take her outside the city. Find a suitable place and bury her there. I will pay you well."
"We will go and do so at once," the men said.
"I am afraid the magistrate will not let us take the body away," Li An said. "We ought to have a card from our master to give him."
"Oh, we will tell him that the dead woman is our lady's sister," Zhang Sheng said. "I don't believe the magistrate will make any objection. We shan't need a card."
They took the money and went to the Town Hall.
"It is my belief that the dead woman must have been a friend of the master's young lady," Zhang Sheng said to Li An. "They probably lived together. That is why she is so concerned about this dead woman. Perhaps you remember that when the woman was killed, our lady cried for three or four days and wouldn't eat anything. The master sent for all sorts of people to come and amuse her, but they couldn't do anything. Now there is nobody to bury the woman and she wants to do it. If we manage this business, she will certainly say a kind word for us to our master. It is a stroke of luck for us, because he never refuses her anything. He considers her more than the other ladies."
They came to the Town Hall and sent in their petition. "The dead woman's sister is the Major's wife," they said. "It is by her orders that we have come to ask for leave to remove the body."
They paid six taels for a coffin. Then they dug up the body, put the woman's entrails back into it, and sewed up the gash with thread. Finally they wrapped her in a shroud and put her into the coffin.
"Our best plan," Zhang Sheng said, "will be to bury her at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where our master worships. There is room there."

They hired two men to carry the coffin to the temple and said to the Abbot that they would like to bury the body there, since it was that of their young mistress's sister. The Abbot pointed out a place behind the temple, near a poplar tree, and there they buried her. Then they went back and told Chunmei all they had done.
"We bought a coffin and buried her," they said, "and we have still four taels left."
"It is very kind of you," Chunmei said. "Will you take the four taels and give two to the Abbot and ask him to read a dirge to help her on her way to paradise?" She gave the two men each a tael and a present of food besides.
The two men knelt down. "We have done nothing," they said, "and we dare not take these gifts. We only ask that you should speak well of us to our master."
"I shall be angry if you do not." Chunmei said.
So the two men kowtowed and took the money. Then they went to drink, and said how kind their mistress was. The next day, Zhang Sheng took the silver and asked the Abbot to hold a service for the dead woman. Chunmei gave them five qian of silver to get paper money to burn for her.

* * *

Chen Ding reached Qinghe about this time. He brought with him Chen Jingji's family and his father's coffin. He set down the coffin at this same Temple of Eternal Felicity where, after a funeral service had been held, they proposed to bury it. When Jingji heard of their arrival, he brought in the luggage and kowtowed to his mother.
"Why did you not come to meet me?" she asked.
"I haven't been well, and there is no one to look after the house," he said.
"Where is your uncle?"
"When he found you were coming, he went back to his old house."
"You should not have allowed him to do so," Mistress Chen said. "He might just as well have stayed."
Then Zhang came to see his sister; they embraced each other and wept. Then they sat down together to talk.
The next day, Jingji's mother told him to take five taels of silver and some paper money and give them to the Abbot to hold a service for his father. Jingji set out on horseback. On the way, he met two of his friends, Lu and Yang. He dismounted, and greeted them. They asked him where he was going.
"My father's body is at the temple outside the city," Jingji told them. "Tomorrow will be the twentieth, and my father's last week's mind, so my mother has asked me to take some money to the Abbot for the ceremony."
"We are very sorry," the two men said. "We had no idea your father's coffin had arrived. When will the funeral be?"
"Not for a few days yet," Jingji said. "We shall not bury him until after this ceremony."
The two men bowed to him and were going on, but he called them back. "Yang," he said, "do you know who has taken away the body of that woman Pan?"
"About a fortnight ago," Yang said, "when it was clear that the police would not be able to lay hands on Wu Song, I told the magistrate, and the magistrate told the relatives they might remove the bodies. Old woman Wang's body was taken by her son, but the other remained for several days. Then somebody from Major Zhou's place brought a coffin and buried it at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city."
Then Jingji guessed that Chunmei had taken it. "Are there many Temples of Eternal Felicity outside the city?" he asked.
"There is only one," Yang told him, "the one where Major Zhou worships. How many would you like?"
Jingji was delighted. It seemed to him that it was by a special dispensation of providence that Jinlian should be buried there. They went their ways. Jingji mounted his horse and rode on to the temple. Before he mentioned the service for his father, he said to the Abbot: "I hear that Major Zhou's people have buried a woman here recently. Can you tell me where the grave is?"
"Behind the temple, under the poplar tree," the Abbot told him. "The dead woman was the young lady's sister."
Jingji did not go to his father's coffin, but took the paper money and other offerings to Jinlian's grave. There he burned the paper money for her. "Sister," he cried, "this is your young brother, Chen Jingji, come to make an offering to you. Find a pleasant place in which to live, and spend the money when you are in need of it."
Then he went to the place where his father's coffin rested and burned paper money there. He gave the money to the monks and said: "May we have eight monks on the twentieth, to perform the service for the last week's mind?" The Abbot took the money and went to see about preparing the necessary things. Jingji went home and told his mother.
On the twentieth day, they all went to the temple for the service. When it was over, they selected a day of good omen and buried the dead gentleman in his ancestral tomb. After this they went home and mother and son settled down in their house.
At the beginning of the second month it was very warm. Wu Yueniang, Meng Yulou, Sun Xue'e, and Ximen Dajie, with Xiaoyu, went and stood at the gate to look down the street. Everything seemed lively and busy. They suddenly caught sight of a crowd of people following a monk. He was very fat and tall; there were three bronze figures on his head, and lamps all over his body. His robes were apricot colored and had broad sleeves. His feet were bare, and his ankles splashed with mud.
He sits and gives himself to meditation
Expounds the sacred scriptures, preaches the gospel.
Broad shoulders, sunken eyes
Themselves exemplify the manner of the Buddha.
He begs his food and preaches
According to the rule of his religion.
By day he goes with staff and tinkling bell
At night brings out the spear and club.
Outside the door he beats his bald head to the ground
On the street he strikes his lips.
Reality is emptiness
And emptiness reality.
Who shall say what happens to this earthly life?
Some go, some come
Some come, some go.
But who has found a welcome
In the paradise of the west?
When he saw Yueniang and the other women standing at the gate, he came over to them and saluted them.
"Most charitable ladies," he said. "I see that you belong to an exalted family. This is a most opportune meeting. I have come from Mount Wu begging for alms, because I seek to build a temple for the ten Lords of Virtue and the Three Precious Ones. I rely entirely upon the charitable, who cultivate the field of generosity and give me alms. So this admirable work will be brought to a happy end, and a reward in the next life assured. I am but a wandering monk."
Yueniang told Xiaoyu to go and get a hat, a pair of shoes, a string of coppers, and a measure of white rice. She was always inclined to be generous to monks, and this one attracted her. She kept a store of hats and shoes especially for them. When Xiaoyu brought the things, Yueniang said: "Ask his Reverence to come and take them."
"You, monk, who will become a donkey in your next life," Xiaoyu said in her sweetest voice, "come here. My lady offers you these things. Why don't you kowtow to her?"
Yueniang scolded her. "You little scamp," she said. "He is a monk, a disciple of Buddha. You mustn't talk to him like that. It is his duty to ask for alms. You little strumpet, you will certainly be punished sooner or later."
Xiaoyu laughed. "That thievish monk!" she said. "What does he mean by letting his eyes roam over my body from head to feet?"
The monk accepted the gifts in both hands, made a reverence, and thanked them.
"Shaven rogue!" Xiaoyu said to him. "Where are your manners? There are several ladies here, as you see. Why do you content yourself with bowing twice to us, and why don't you make a reverence to me?"
"Do be quiet, you little rascal," Yueniang said. "He is a son of Buddha, and you have no right to expect a reverence from him."
"Lady," Xiaoyu said, "if he is a son of Buddha, who are Buddha's daughters?"
"The nuns are Buddha's daughters," Yueniang said.
"Oh, now I understand," Xiaoyu said. "Nun Xue and Nun Wang and the Abbess are all Buddha's daughters, are they? Well, I wonder who are Buddha's sons-in-law?"
Yueniang could not help laughing. "You little strumpet!" she said, "It is only lately you have learned to talk such nonsense. You are always being rude nowadays."
"You mustn't scold me only, Lady," Xiaoyu said. "That monk, with his thievish eyes, is looking at me all the time."
"If he looks at you," Yulou said, "I suppose it is because he wishes to make you give up the things of this world."
"Then I will go with him," Xiaoyu said.
They all laughed, but Yueniang said. "You are a little strumpet. You are always insulting monks and saying wicked things about Buddha."
The monk took the things and went away haughtily, the three images on his head. "Lady," Xiaoyu said, "that thievish monk had another look at me before he went away. Really, you shouldn't scold me."
As they were standing there, old woman Xue came to them, carrying her box of artificial flowers. She made a reverence to them.
"What have you been doing?" Yueniang asked. "It is a long time since I even saw your shadow."
"I hardly know myself what I have been doing," the old woman said. "A few days ago, his Lordship Zhang the Second, the new magistrate, was arranging a marriage with the Xu family. Xu's niece is going to marry Zhang's son. Old woman Wen arranged that. Yesterday was the third day and they had a splendid banquet. The young lady at the Major's place sent for me, but I was too busy to go."
"Where are you going now?" Yueniang said.
"I have come especially to see you," old woman Xue said. "There is something I want to talk to you about."
"Come in, then," Yueniang said, and took the old woman to her room. When she had had tea, the old woman said: "Lady, there is something you don't know. Last year, your kinsman Chen, at the Eastern Capital, died. His wife sent for your son-in-law to bring his father's body and the whole household here. They reached here in the first month, held a service, and buried the old gentleman. I thought that, if you had known, you would certainly have gone to burn some paper offerings for the old gentleman."
"But I would never have known, if you hadn't come to tell me," Yueniang said. "How was I to hear of it? I heard that Pan Jinlian had been killed by her first husband's brother, and that she and old woman Wang had been buried, but I have heard nothing of what happened since."
"If the Fifth Lady had not misbehaved herself and had stayed here, it would have been much better for her," the old woman said. "But she forgot her womanly virtue and behaved so badly that you had to send her away. If she had still been living with you, her brother-in-law would not have had a chance to kill her. Indeed, debts always demand that they who owe shall pay, and hatred never fails to find its victim. But Chunmei did not forget how she had loved that lady in the past. She bought a coffin and buried Jinlian, or the body would be lying there still. Wu Song has not been caught, and there was nobody else to care about her."
"Chunmei has only been at Major Zhou's house a short time," Xue'e said. "How comes she to be in such a position that she can afford to buy a coffin and bury the woman? Didn't the Major have anything to say in the matter? How does he treat her?"
"Ah! You can't imagine how fond he is of her," the old woman said. "He spends every night with her and obeys her slightest wish. As soon as she went there and he found how beautiful she was, he gave her three rooms and a maid. He spent three nights with her and had all the clothes she needed for a year made for her. On the third day he gave a feast and presented me with a tael of silver and a roll of silk. His first wife is now about fifty. She is blind, eats vegetarian food, and does not take any part in the management of the house. His second wife, Sun, has a little daughter and spends all her time looking after the child. Chunmei has all the keys. The Major does everything she suggests, and she never has any difficulty in getting money out of him."
Yueniang and Xue'e said nothing. When the old woman was preparing to go away, Yueniang said: "Come again tomorrow. I will get a food offering ready, a roll of silk, and some paper money, and you must go with my daughter to offer them to her dead father-in-law."
"Won't you go yourself, Lady?" the old woman said.
"Tell them I am not very well," Yueniang said. "I will go and see them another day."
"Then tell your daughter to have everything ready. I will be here about dinnertime."
"Where are you going now?" Yueniang asked. "Must you always be going to the Major's place?"
"If I don't go, they will be angry with me. They have sent for me several times."
"Why do they send for you?" Yueniang said.
"Lady, Chunmei is now four or five months gone with child and the Major is delighted. I shall certainly get a present when I get there."
The old woman went off with her box. "What a liar that old strumpet is!" Xue'e said. "Chunmei has only been there a short time. How can she be so far gone with child? The Captain has more than one wife already. Is it likely that he devotes himself entirely to her?"
"He has a first wife, and another lady who has a little girl," Yueniang said.
"These go-betweens," Xue'e said, "always talk about water a foot deep having waves ten feet high."

112

On the Ch'ing-ming Festival, the Widow Visits the New Grave; Wu Yüeh-niang Blunders into the Temple of Eternal Felicity & Meets Chunmei Again

Tossed by the wind, enshrouded in mist,
the brocade banner flutters;
During this era of great peace[1] the days
are beginning to grow longer.
Wine is capable of enhancing the courage of even a stouthearted hero;[2]
And is equally effective at alleviating
the depression of a beauty.
Deep within the three-foot-long branches
on the willow-lined bank;
The tavern's signpost rises at an angle
beside the apricot trees.
The stalwart who has yet to accomplish
his lifelong ambition;[3]
Is prone to sing haughtily as he enters the Land of Drunkenness.[4]

THE STORY GOES that the next day Wu Yüeh-niang saw to the preparation of an offertory table, replete with a pig's head and the three sacrificial animals, soup and rice, paper money for the dead, and the like, wrapped up a bolt of fabric, and directed Hsi-men Ta-chieh to get herself ready by donning plain white mourning garments, and taking her seat in a sedan chair. Auntie Hsüeh then took charge of the sacrificial offerings and preceded her along the way to the door of the Ch'en residence. What should she see when she arrived there but Ch'en Ching-chi himself, who happened to be standing in the doorway.
Auntie Hsüeh started to turn the sacrificial offerings over to a servant to take inside when Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "Where do they come from?"
Auntie Hsüeh greeted him with a bow and said, "Son-in-law, don't pretend that you don't know. Your mother-in-law has sent me to present these things as an offering to your deceased father, and also to return your wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to you."

"Some fucking excuse for a mother-in-law!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi.
"To paste up the effigies of the Gate Gods on the sixteenth of the first month,
Is to be half a month too late.[5]
Only after the corpse of the deceased has been buried in the grave does she bother to offer a sacrifice on his behalf."
"My good son-in-law," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "your mother-in-law points out that a widow is as helpless as a legless crab. It is only because she did not know that the coffin of her kinsman had been brought home that she has been late in her response. Don't hold it against her."
While they were speaking to each other, what should they see but Hsi-men Ta-chieh's sedan chair, which was being set down at the door.
"Who is that?" Ch'en Ching-chi demanded to know.
"Who else would it be?" responded Auntie Hsüeh. "Your mother-in-law is not feeling well. On the one hand, she is returning Hsi-men Ta-chieh to you, and on the other hand, she is respectfully offering to burn paper money on behalf of your father."
"Take that whore back where she came from forthwith!" Ch'en Ching-chi exclaimed abusively. "Better persons than she have died:
By the ten thousands and the thousands.[6]
What would I want with the likes of her?"
"As the saying goes," responded Auntie Hsüeh,
"To marry a husband is to accept a master.
How can you talk that way about her?"
"I won't have anything more to do with that whore!" said Ch'en Ching-chi. "Why aren't you taking her away?"
Seeing that the bearers of the sedan chair were just standing there without making a move, Ch'en Ching-chi stepped out and gave them a couple of kicks, saying, "If you refuse to take her away, I'll break the legs of you beggars and pluck out the hair on her temples."
When the bearers of the sedan chair saw that he was bent on kicking them, they felt compelled to pick up the sedan chair and head for home without delay.
By the time Auntie Hsüeh succeeded in calling out Ch'en Ching-chi's mother, née Chang, the sedan chair had already been carried away, and she had no alternative but to take up the sacrificial offerings and return to report the situation to Wu Yüeh-niang.
Yüeh-niang nearly fainted with rage on hearing about it and said, "What an unprincipled short-life of a jailbird! Originally, your family, because of its legal troubles, sent you here to hide out in your father-in-law's household, which has maintained you for all these years. And now you are:
Requiting kindness with enmity, and have the nerve to maintain that my dead husband was only bent on sequestering your valuable property. Having first created a scandal, you are now trying to:
Cast me in the role of a stinking rat,
while you persist in:
Letting off your hot stinking farts of protest."
She then turned to Hsi-men Ta-chieh and said, "My child, you have seen with your own eyes that neither his father-in-law nor his mother-in-law have shortchanged him in any way. But the fact is that:
While you live you are a member of his family;
If you die you will become his family's ghost.[7]
There is no way I can continue to keep you here. You must go back to him tomorrow. There is no reason to be afraid of him. He will hardly thrust you down a well. No matter how foolhardy he may be, he is not likely to kill you. One can scarcely allege that there is no imperial law to be applied to him in this world."
We will say no more of the events of that evening.
The next day, Yüeh-niang had Hsi-men Ta-chieh put into a sedan chair and told Tai-an to escort her to Ch'en Ching-chi's residence. Who could have anticipated that Ch'en Ching-chi was not at home at the time but had gone to the cemetery to add earth to his father's tomb in order to make a higher grave mound.
His mother, née Chang, was a woman of breeding and agreed to receive Hsi-men Ta-chieh, saying to Tai-an, "When you return home, convey my gratitude to our kinswoman for her sacrificial offerings, and ask her to make allowances for my son, who had too much to drink yesterday, which accounts for his rude conduct. I will do what I can, little by little, to admonish him."
So saying, she offered Tai-an some refreshments before gently inducing him to return home.
That evening, when Ch'en Ching-chi returned from the graveyard and saw Hsi-men Ta-chieh, he fell to kicking and beating her as he cursed her, saying, "You whore! What are you doing back here? Do you still have the nerve to accuse me of scrounging for food off your family? Your family still has possession of the trunks of valuables that we entrusted to you, and which enabled your family to achieve its considerable wealth, so how can they claim to have been supporting their son-in-law for nothing? Better persons than you have died by the thousands. So what would I want with a whore like you?"
Hsi-men Ta-chieh responded in kind, saying, "You shameless jailbird! You unprincipled jailbird! When that whore was expelled from the household and got herself murdered, you felt helpless to do anything about it and have been taking it out on me."
Ch'en Ching-chi reacted by grabbing hold of the hair on top of her head and beating her as hard as he could with his fists. When his mother came over and tried to intervene, he gave her a shove that knocked her onto the floor.
His mother, screaming with rage, shouted, "What a jailbird you are! Your eyes are so red you don't even recognize your mother."
That evening, Ch'en Ching-chi once again sent Hsi-men Ta-chieh back to the Hsi-men household, saying, "If you fail to recover your dowry and the trunks of valuables that my family entrusted to them, whore that you are, I will see that your life is put to an end."
Hsi-men Ta-chieh was so intimidated by this threat that she stayed at home and did not venture out again. There is a poem that testifies to this:
On first acquaintance, their mutual trust was not unmingled with doubt;
Though their feeling for each other seemed to be utterly without limit.
Who could have known that even the best of things are subject to change;
Even a single thought may turn out to be the harbinger of resentment.[8]
Hsi-men Ta-chieh remained so intimidated that she stayed at home, without daring to go out.
One day during the third month, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, Wu Yüeh-niang prepared incense and candles, imitation gold and silver paper money for the dead, offerings, including the three sacrificial animals, wine and delicacies, and the like, and had them put into two large food boxes to be carried to the family graveyard five li outside the city wall and presented at Hsi-men Ch'ing's recently created tomb. She left Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, and the maidservants behind to look after the house, while taking with her Meng Yü-lou, Hsiao-yü, and the wet nurse Ju-i, who was carrying the infant Hsiao-ko, as they proceeded in their sedan chairs to the site of the family graveyard. She also invited the venerable couple, her brother Wu K'ai and his wife, to accompany them.
As they emerged from the city gate, behold:
The suburban fields stretch into the distance;
A landscape replete with blossoming fragrance.[9]
The flowers are red and the willows are green;
Wellborn young ladies and wandering gentlemen,
Pass hither and yon in their unbroken streams.
Among the four seasons of the year,
None of them is superior to spring,
With its all-surpassing loveliness.
Its days are designated glorious days,
Its breezes are called genial breezes,
Expanding the willow buds,
Opening the flower hearts,
Blowing the fragrant dust.
When the weather is warm it is called genial;
When the weather is cool it is called chilly.
The horses ridden then are called rare steeds;
The sedan chairs are called fragrant vehicles;
The roads walked on are called fragrant paths.
The dust that ascends is called fragrant dust.
The thousands of flowers that begin to bloom,
And the myriad grasses that engender sprouts,
Are called the harbingers of spring.
The spring splendor shimmers,
Its pure vistas are pleasing.
The tiny peaches cluster,
Their visages decorated voluptuously;
The slender willows sway,
Their waists supple as palace ladies.
The warbling of the orioles,[10]
Breaks off one's midday dreams;
The chirping of the swallows,
Betokens their spring sadness.
As the days begin to lengthen,
Yellow goslings bathe in the warm streams;
As the waters start to spread,
Green ducklings cavort amid the fragrance.
Across the water one glimpses an estate of someone unknown;
Where a swing is suspended on high amid misty green willows.
Indeed, the springtime scene is truly marvelous. When the spring season arrives, the prefectures, subprefectures, districts, and circuits all see to it that every village, garrison, township, and market within their jurisdictions is provided with areas that are worth visiting.[11] There is a poem that testifies to this:
During the Ch'ing-ming Festival mists hover everywhere;
In the suburbs the breezes waft shreds of paper money aloft.
People laugh and people sing amidst the fragrant meadows;
Sudden clearing and sudden showers[12]
beset the apricot blossoms.
Amid the flowering crab apples the songbirds give voice;
Beside the willow-lined embankment
the drunkards snooze.
Red-rouged beauties compete for places on the painted boards;
Tugging the gaudy ropes they resemble immortals in flight.[13]
To resume our story, by the time the sedan chairs of Wu Yüeh-niang and the others arrived at the family graveyard at Wu-li Yüan, Tai-an, who had gone ahead of them with the food boxes, had already made his way to the kitchen and arranged for the fire in the stove to be lighted, and for the chef who had been hired for the occasion to prepare the foodstuffs. But no more of this.
When Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, Hsiao-yü, and the wet nurse Ju-i, who was holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, arrived at the country estate, they sat down in the parlor and consumed a serving of tea while they waited for Sister-in-law Wu to arrive, but she failed to show up. Meanwhile, Tai-an went to the sacrificial platform in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's tomb and set up the offertory tables replete with the meat of the three sacrificial animals, the soup and rice, and other ceremonial offerings and also laid out the paper money to be burned to the dead.
All they could do was to wait, but it turned out that Sister-in-law Wu had been unable to hire a sedan chair. It was not until around ten o'clock in the morning that she and her husband Wu K'ai, who had succeeded in hiring a couple of donkeys, finally arrived.
"If you were unable to hire a sedan chair, Sister-in-law," said Yüeh-niang, "there really must not have been enough of them available on this festival occasion."
After consuming a serving of tea, and changing their clothes, they proceeded to the front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's tomb to present their sacrificial offerings and sweep the grave. Yüeh-niang was holding five sticks of incense in her hand, one of which she kept for herself, one of which she handed to Meng Yü-lou, and one of which she gave to the wet nurse Ju-i, who was carrying Hsiao-ko in her arms. The other two she handed to her elder brother Wu K'ai and his wife.
After placing her stick of incense in the burner, Yüeh-niang bowed deeply before the tomb and said, "Brother:

While alive you were a human being; once dead you have become a spirit.
Today, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival during the third month, your devoted wife Wu the Third, your Third Lady Meng Yü-lou, and your infant son Hsiao-ko have respectfully come to burn paper money before your grave, in the hope that you will assure him a long life of a hundred years, so that he will be able to offer sacrifices and sweep your grave in the future. Brother, you and I were man and wife for all that time, and when I recall your looks, and the way you used to talk to me, I am overcome with sorrow."
Tai-an then set the paper money on fire. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:
As the paper money burns out,
I can't help stamping my little feet.
During the whole period I was your wife,
We never exchanged hostile words with each other.[14]
I really looked forward to living in harmony with you until our old age.[15]
Who could have anticipated that you would abandon me halfway?
Originally, the sentimental hopes for the future were mine,
But though you bequeathed us a fortune as solid as a brass ladle,[16]
Our child is still young,
And mother and son have been left a widow and orphan.
How will we manage to get by?
It is just like running into a rainstorm
during a journey,
Or encountering a windstorm halfway to one's destination.
The male and female mandarin ducks have been forced to part;
The exotic fruits have been plucked before they were ripe.
I cry out to my good-natured brother,
"On recalling your carriage and deportment,
How can I help sighing in distress?"
Continued to the tune "Every Step Is Captivating":
The ashes of the paper money I have burned swirl about,
But I do not see the face of my husband.
I cry out, "My young husband,
You have abandoned our delicate son,
And left me all alone.
If the two of us have no marital affinity,
How will we ever be able to see each other again?"
Meng Yü-lou then stepped forward, stuck her stick of incense in the burner, bowed deeply, and wept to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope":
As the paper money burns out,
My eyes are filled with tears.
I cry out to mankind and to Heaven,
You have abandoned me with no place to go.
I really looked forward to remaining with you until our hair turned white.
Who could foresee that en route the flowers would wither and the moon fade?[17]
The First Lady has a male child, so her future prospects are good;
But I have been abandoned so that the fallen tree no longer provides shade.
With whom am I to carry on?
To keep lonely vigil amid empty bed curtains,[18]
Is more than I can stand.
I'm unable to reach the inn ahead, or make it back to the village behind.
I suppose my fallen leaves have returned to the root,
And I must harvest my garden and reap my just reward.
I cry out to my youthful brother,
"If I ever see you again, it can only be an encounter in a dream.[19]
It's enough to grieve me to death."
Continued to the tune "Every Step Is Captivating":
I can only weep and wail until I am stupefied with grief.
Once gone there are no tidings of you.
You have left me with no future in sight,
no future in sight.
You were in the springtime of your youth,
And I was still captivating to behold;
How upsetting it is.
It has wasted my flowery visage and moonlike features.
After Meng Yü-lou had finished burning her incense, the wet nurse Ju-i, holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, also knelt down to present her incense and kowtowed; after which Wu K'ai and his wife proceeded to burn their incense in turn. When these formalities were concluded, they were ushered into the summerhouse on the country estate, where a table and mats had been set up, and food and wine prepared. Yüeh-niang arranged for Wu K'ai and his wife to occupy the positions of honor, while she and Meng Yü-lou sat along one side, and Hsiao-yü, the wet nurse Ju-i, and Lan-hua, the senior maidservant in the Wu household, sat on the other. The wine was then poured, but we will say no more, for the moment, about how they proceeded to drink it.
To resume our story, that day Commandant Chou Hsiu also went to visit his ancestral tombs. Before this, during the preceding night, Ch'un-mei had slept with the commandant and pretended to have had a dream from which she awakened in tears.
The commandant asked in consternation, "What are you crying about?"
Ch'un-mei replied, saying, "I dreamt that my former mistress came to me in tears and wanted to know why, since she had nurtured me so generously over the years, I was not planning to go and burn paper money on her behalf at the time of the Ch'ing-ming Festival and the Cold Food Festival. [20] That is why I wept on waking up."
"This is an example of your filial feelings of gratitude for the nurture you received from her," said the commandant. "Do you know where your former mistress's grave is located?"
"It is located behind the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the South Gate," responded Ch'un-mei.
"That's not a problem," said the commandant. "The Temple of Eternal Felicity is my family temple. Tomorrow, when we go to visit our ancestral graves, you can have the servants carry some sacrificial offerings to present to her, and burn some paper money on your mistress's behalf. That would be the right thing to do."
The next day, Commandant Chou Hsiu had his servants prepare food boxes, wine and appetizers, and sacrificial offerings and set out for his ancestral graveyard outside the South Gate. His estate was replete with a mansion, halls, and gardens, as well as a chapel and a sacrificial platform. His first wife, his concubine Sun Erh-niang, and Ch'un-mei all rode in sedan chairs borne by four bearers each, and preceded by orderlies who shouted to clear the way, as they set out on their excursion to the family graveyard.
To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang, with her older brother Wu K'ai and his wife, enjoyed their wine for a while, after which, fearing that it was getting late, she directed Tai-an and Lai-an to collect the food boxes and the remaining wine and appetizers and precede them along the Ten-li-long Embankment to find an elevated spot before the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village,[21] where they could set up a picnic table and await them, so they could enjoy:
The liveliness of the teeming crowds.
When they saw that Sister-in-law Wu did not have a sedan chair, they decided to walk and let the bearers carry their sedan chairs behind them. The group of men and women then set out on their way, tripping over the grass and enjoying the scenery, while Wu K'ai led the donkeys to bring up the rear.
After three li they walked past Peach Blossom Inn;
After five li they beheld Apricot Blossom Village.
Behold: Swarming along the roads to visit their ancestral graves:
The patrician youths and wellborn ladies,[22]
Amidst the red flowers and green willows,
Producing a tumultuous hubbub as they go,
Pass hither and yon in their unbroken streams.
On top of which:
The sun is warm and the breeze is gentle,[23]
so that those who:
Pursue fragrance and savor the landscape,
Are so multitudinous they cannot be numbered.
As they walked along, it turned out to be one of those occasions on which:
Something is destined to happen.
As they gazed into the distance, in the shade of the green locust trees, they perceived a temple of impressively fine construction. Behold:
The gate of the temple soars aloft;
The Buddhist sanctuary is secluded.
The characters on the imperial plaque are clearly inscribed;
The bearing of the guardian deities on either side is fierce.
The thirty-foot-wide front of the main hall,
Is roofed with serried rows of azure dragon-scale tiles;
The monk's quarters along the two corridors,
Are made of shiny tortoiseshell bricks inlaid with flowers.
In the front hall are graven gods that bring,

Favorable winds and seasonable rains;[24]
In the rear hall stand venerated effigies of,
The Buddhas of the past and the future.[25]
The bell and drum towers rise close together;
The sutra storage chamber is located on high.
The flagstaff soars aloft impinging upon the bluish clouds;
The sacred pagoda likewise encroaches on the azure heavens.
Wooden fish are horizontally suspended;
Cloud-shaped gongs are hanging on high.
The space before the Buddha is ablaze with lamps and candles;
Emerging from the burner the smoke of incense swirls about.[26]
Pennants are arrayed in endless numbers;
The hall of the goddess Kuan-yin is next to the chapel of the patriarchs.
Jeweled canopies are clustered together;
The effigy of Hārītī[27] is situated next to the gallery of the Arhats.
From time to time the Dharma-protecting gods descend;
Year in and year out the demon-quelling deities appear.[28]

"What is the name of this temple?" asked Wu Yüeh-niang.

"This is the family temple of His Honor Chou Hsiu," responded Wu K'ai. "It is called the Ch'an Temple of Eternal Felicity. In former days, when my brother-in-law was still alive, he donated a considerable sum of silver for the restoration of the sanctuary, which is why it is in such good shape today."

Yüeh-niang then turned to Sister-in-law Wu and said, "Let's go into the temple and see what it looks like."

Thereupon she led her group of men and women into the temple. It was not long before a young novice spotted them and reported their arrival to the abbot.

When he saw that there were a number of men and women, he came out of his quarters to welcome them, saying, "My bodhisattva and my benefactor, pray feel free to explore the premises."

What did this abbot look like? Behold:

His bluish, finely polished, pate is newly shaven,
And is evenly anointed with musk and pine seed oil.
His long blazing-yellow gown is newly tailored,
And is saturated with aloeswood and sandalwood.
His high-ridged sandals,
Have been dyed a deep black in Fu-chou;
His belt of silk braid,
Is of deep purple, imported from the West.
The slippery and furtive eyes of this monk,
Are solely devoted to ogling
alluring donors;
The sweet-sounding words of this bald rascal,
Are merely designed to tempt bereft young widows.
When his voluptuous feelings are stirred,
He proceeds to seek out nuns in their convents;
Whenever his lustful daring is turbulent,
He entices novices into his abbot's quarters.
When he observes immortal ladies
he seeks to bed them;
Upon beholding the Moon Goddess
he longs to seduce her.[29]

When the abbot saw Wu K'ai and Wu Yüeh-niang, he came forward and saluted them by pressing his palms together in front of his chest and bowing to them in the Buddhist fashion, after which, he promptly summoned a young novice and said to him, "You open up the Buddhist sanctuary and invite our benefactor and the bodhisattva to explore the premises. Meanwhile, this humble monk will see to providing a serving of tea."

The young novice, thereupon, opened up the sanctuary and conducted Yüeh-niang and the group of men and women accompanying her on a tour of the two corridors, front and rear. After paying their respects and looking around for a while, they returned to the abbot's quarters, where he hastened to pour out a serving of fine tea, brewed with sweet water, and served in snow-white cups.

Wu K'ai then asked the abbot for his religious name, and the abbot responded, with an ingratiating smile, saying, "This humble monk's religious name is Tao-chien, and this edifice is the family temple of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu. This humble monk serves as the abbot of the temple, and there are some hundred or more monks under my jurisdiction. The meditation hall located behind the sanctuary also houses a considerable number of itinerant monks who engage in continual meditation in order to requite the good deeds of the benefactors from the four directions."

He then proposed to provide a vegetarian repast in the abbot's quarters and invited Yüeh-niang to partake thereof, saying, "Will you bodhisattvas please be seated. This humble monk is unable to provide any more than this meager collation."

"We ought not to impose upon your sacred institution in this way," responded Yüeh-niang.

She then took out five mace of silver and handed them to Wu K'ai so he could offer them to the abbot, saying, "This is to compensate you for burning some incense before the Buddha."

The abbot, with an ingratiating smile, bowed in gratitude, saying, "This humble monk is not able to offer you any more than this scant refreshment. It is my hope that you benefactors and bodhisattvas will condescend to sit down for a while and partake of this meager collation, which is all that I can offer. What need is there for you to present me with a donation?"

In no time at all, a young novice set up a table and brought in a vegetarian repast and some pastries, while the abbot sat down beside them and raised his chopsticks in order to proffer Yüeh-niang and the others samples of the various dishes.

All of a sudden, they were interrupted by the appearance of two black-clad servants, panting and puffing, who broke in upon them like a clap of thunder and addressed the abbot, saying, "Abbot, why haven't you come out to welcome her? The young mistress from the commandant's household is on her way here to make a sacrificial offering."

This threw the abbot into such consternation that he hastily threw on his cassock, donned his Vairocana hat, ordered a young novice to clear away the utensils, and said to his guests, "Will you bodhisattvas please retire into a side chamber for the time being. It will not be too late to sit down together again after the young lady has burned some paper money, offered her sacrifice, and gone on her way."

Wu K'ai wanted to refuse, but the abbot insisted upon their staying, as though it were a matter of life or death, and would not let them go.

He then hastily ordered the striking up of bells and drums and went out the gate of the temple to receive his visitor, going as far as the turnoff where the entranceway to the temple met the highway to wait. What should he see then but a crowd of black-clad servants escorting a large sedan chair as it came flying toward him from the east. The chair bearers had been traveling so fast that:

Their faces were bathed in sweat,
And their clothes soaked through.

The abbot bent his body and saluted his guest in the Buddhist fashion, saying, "This humble monk did not know of your coming, young lady. I fear I have been remiss in not coming further to meet you. Pray forgive me."

Ch'un-mei, from inside the curtain of the sedan chair, merely said, "I am imposing upon Your Reverence."

Meanwhile, her servants had taken the offertory table to the back of the temple, where they placed it in front of Chin-lien's grave and set out the offerings and paper money upon it. When Ch'un-mei's sedan chair arrived, she did not go into the temple but proceeded straight to the site of Chin-lien's grave under the white poplar tree behind the temple, where she got out of her sedan chair, and her black-clad servants lined themselves up to either side.

Ch'un-mei then:

Neither hurriedly nor hastily,
made her way in front of the grave, stuck her stick of incense in the burner, kowtowed four times, and said, "My mistress, today your servant P'ang Ch'un-mei has come to burn a packet of paper money on your behalf.
May you find a pleasurable place in Heaven;
And use the cash to cope with any problems.
If I had only anticipated that you might suffer death at the hands of your enemy, I would have found a way, somehow or other, to have you enter the commandant's household, so that we could be together. It is I who have let you down, but my repentance is too late to be of any use."

When she had finished speaking, she ordered her attendants to burn the paper money. Ch'un-mei then stepped forward and commenced to weep out loud. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

As the paper money burns out,
I stamp my phoenix-toed shoes to pieces.
I call out to you, "Mother,
My liver and intestines feel ruptured.
Merely because you were so captivating, people turned against you,
And lost no time in seeing you expelled from the household;
Thereby opening the way for your enemy to ensnare you.
Situated as I was in a secluded mansion,
I was not free to act;
And you had no relatives, so there was no one to care about you.
I had hoped that we could share the same bed and a single pillow.
Who could have known that death would cut short your life,
And in such a pitiable fashion?"
I cry out to Azure Heaven, "How blind can you be?"
As the sayings go, the finest objects are difficult to preserve,

And the bolt of red silk is shorter than it ought to be.
We will say no more, for the moment, about how Ch'un-mei made sacrifices and wept before Chin-lien's grave.
To resume our story, Wu Yüeh-niang, in the side chamber of the monk's quarters, knew only that a young lady from the commandant's quarters had come, and that the abbot had gone out to receive her, though she had not been seen to come in.
She asked a young novice about this, and he explained, "An elder sister of the young lady was recently buried in a grave behind the temple. Because today is the Ch'ing-ming Festival, she has come to make a sacrifice, sweep the grave, and burn paper money on her behalf."
"I wonder if it might not be Ch'un-mei who has come?" remarked Meng Yü-lou.
"Since when has she had any elder sister that might have been buried here?" responded Yüeh-niang.
She then asked the young novice, "What is the surname of this young lady from the commandant's household?"
"Her maiden name is P'ang," replied the novice. "The other day she donated four or five taels of silver to the abbot to pay for a scripture recitation on her elder sister's behalf, in the hope that it might:
Promote her chances of rebirth in Heaven."[30]
"I have heard Father mention that Ch'un-mei's maiden name was P'ang," remarked Meng Yü-lou, "and that she was referred to as Miss P'ang. It must surely be her."
As they were speaking, what should they see but the abbot, who came in ahead of his guest and ordered a young novice to quickly prepare some fine tea. Before long, the sedan chair was borne past the inner gate of the abbot's quarters, where the passenger was allowed to descend. Yüeh-niang, along with Meng Yü-lou and the others, proceeded to look out through the door-blind of the room in which they were secluded to see what the young lady looked like. When they got a closer look, they saw that it was indeed Ch'un-mei, although, compared to her former appearance, she seemed to have grown:
Larger and taller in stature.
Her face was like a full moon,
and she appeared to be:
Modeled in plaster, carved of jade.
On her headdress:
Pearls and trinkets rose in piles;
A phoenix hairpin was half askew.
She was wearing a scarlet jacket with a floriate design, over a skirt with a wide border of kingfisher blue embellished with gold thread, suspended from which decorative pendants tinkled. She was adorned quite differently from the way she had been in the past. Behold:
Her chignon is of an imposing height;
Her phoenix hairpin is half askew.
Pearl earrings hang low beneath her ears;
Golden phoenixes jut behind either temple.
Her scarlet embroidered jacket,
Enhances her jade-white fragrant flesh;
Her kingfisher-patterned skirt,
Shows off her minuscule golden lotuses.
Whenever she moves,
It makes the jade pendants on her breast tinkle;
Wherever she sits,
The reek of orchid and musk assails the nostrils.
Her neck appears to be made of congealed powder;
Flowery ornaments artfully enhance her eyebrows.
Her visage is astonishing,
Her countenance resembles the rare beauty of a secluded flower;
Her deportment is elegant,
Her nature appealing and agreeable as the fragrance of orchids.
If she was not engendered in ornate quarters,
She has been raised in orchidacious chambers.
She looks just like:
The alabaster goddess from the Purple Elysium taking leave of the milky way;
An immortal of the Palace of Clustered Pearls[31] descending to the mundane world.
The abbot lifted aside the portiere and invited the young lady into the parlor in his quarters. A formal seat was placed all by itself in the place of honor at the head of the room, and Ch'un-mei sat down upon it. When the abbot had finished paying his respects, a young novice came in with a serving of tea.
The abbot then offered her some tea, saying, "This humble monk was unaware that anyone was coming from the commandant's household to visit the grave today, or that you would be arriving to present a sacrifice.
I have been remiss in welcoming you.[32]
Pray extend this humble monk your forgiveness."
"The other day," responded Ch'un-mei, "I put you to a lot of trouble reciting scriptures and praying for the salvation of the soul of the departed."
"How could this humble monk presume to accept such praise?" the abbot blurted out. "What effort did I expend sufficient to repay my benefactress for all the money for the recitation and other acts of beneficence you lavished upon me? This humble monk merely engaged the services of eight Ch'an monks to conduct the rites, recite the scriptures, and perform a litany of repentance. At the end of the day, they also prepared several coffers of paper money and burned them on behalf of the deceased. Only after the rites had been completed did I send the three servitors from your household back inside the city to report back to you."
When Ch'un-mei had finished drinking her tea, the young novice took the utensils away, and the abbot continued to engage her in an animated dialogue. This meant that Wu Yüeh-niang and her fellows were cooped up in their side room and did not feel comfortable about coming out. When Yüeh-niang saw that it was getting late, she sent the young novice to invite the abbot inside and told him that they would like to leave, but the abbot would not consent.
Instead, he went back into the parlor and said to Ch'un-mei, "There is something that this humble monk would like to mention to you."
"Your Reverence," responded Ch'un-mei, "Pray express yourself without constraint."
"Right now," the abbot explained, "there are several sightseeing ladies here, who were engaged in looking over the premises but did not know that you would be arriving. At present, they have expressed a desire to go home, but I do not know what you may feel about it."
"Your Reverence," said Ch'un-mei, "why not ask them to come out so we can meet each other?"
The abbot hastened to convey this request, but Wu Yüeh-niang was still reluctant to come out and said, "Your Reverence, there is no need for us to meet her. It is getting late, and we would like to be on our way."
The abbot felt embarrassed that he had accepted their largess without doing anything adequate to entertain them, and therefore he urged them repeatedly to come out. In the end, Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Wu K'ai's wife felt that they could hardly refuse any longer and consented to come out.
As soon as she saw them, Ch'un-mei exclaimed, "So it turns out to be you two ladies and Sister-in-law Wu."
So saying, she maneuvered Wu K'ai's wife into assuming the position of honor and proceeded:
Like a sprig of blossoms swaying in the breeze, to kowtow to her; which so affected Sister-in-law Wu that she hastened to return her salutation, saying:
"The present cannot be compared to the past.
You embarrass this old body to death."
"My good sister-in-law," said Ch'un-mei, "how can you say such a thing? I am not the sort of person who ignores distinctions of status:
Exalted or humble, above and below;
This is a self-evident principle."
Having kowtowed to Sister-in-law Wu, she then turned to Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou and proceeded to kowtow to them:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.
Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou were about to return the compliment, but Ch'un-mei would not let them and helped them to their feet.
After kowtowing to them four times, she said, "I did not know that you all were here. If I had known, I would have invited you out so we could greet each other."
"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "since you left us, you have been a member of the commandant's household for some time now, and I have been remiss in not coming to pay a call on you. Pray don't hold it against me."
"My good lady," said Ch'un-mei, "how could the likes of me presume to hold anything against you?"
Then, upon noticing that the wet nurse Ju-i was holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, she remarked, "How little brother has grown."
Yüeh-niang thereupon turned to Ju-i and said, "You and Hsiao-yü, come over and kowtow to your elder sister."
Ju-i and Hsiao-yü, accordingly, came over with ingratiating smiles and performed a half obeisance to Ch'un-mei, while Yüeh-niang said, "Sister, pray accept their salutations."
Ch'un-mei then proceeded to extract a pair of gold-headed silver pins from her hair and stick them into Hsiao-ko's cap.
"Thank Sister for her pins," said Yüeh-niang to Ju-i. "Aren't you going to pay her an obeisance in return?"
Ju-i thereupon, while holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, actually paid an obeisance to Ch'un-mei, which pleased Yüeh-niang no end.
"Sister," said Meng Yü-lou, "if you had not come to the temple today, we would not have had this chance to meet each other again."
"You are right," responded Ch'un-mei. "It is only because my venerable mother was recently buried behind the temple here that I came. After all, I served under her for all this time, and she:
Lacks either relatives or friends.[33]
If I were not to express my concern for her by coming and burning some paper money on her behalf, how would I be able to live with myself?"
Yüeh-niang said, "As I recall, your mother has been dead for quite a few years, but I did not know that she was buried here."
"First Lady," said Meng Yü-lou, "you don't understand what Sister P'ang is saying. She is referring to the death of P'an the Sixth. It was thanks to our sister that she was buried here."
When Yüeh-niang heard this, she was reduced to silence.
"Who could be kinder than you, Sister?" remarked Wu K'ai's wife. "You were unwilling to forget the favors you enjoyed from her in the past and have gone to the trouble to have her decently buried. And now, on this festival occasion, you have remembered her, and come to burn paper money on her behalf."
"My good lady," responded Ch'un-mei. "I could hardly help remembering the favorable treatment I received from her. In view of the cruel manner in which she died, and the way in which her corpse was exposed and abandoned, how could I fail to arrange a decent burial for her?"
As soon as they had finished speaking, the abbot instructed a young novice to serve them a vegetarian repast. Two large Eight Immortals tables were duly set up, and their surfaces covered with steamed shortcake, fried pastries, a variety of vegetarian dishes, and the finest golden-leaved Sparrow Tongue tea, brewed with sweet water. When they had finished eating, the utensils were cleared away. Meanwhile, Wu K'ai had also been entertained in one of the monk's quarters, but no more of this.
Meng Yü-lou then got up, intending to go pay a visit to Chin-lien's grave and burn some paper money there on her behalf, in memory of the sisterhood they had shared together. When she saw that Yüeh-niang was not going to follow suit, she got out five candareens of silver and asked a young novice to go buy some paper money for her.
"My Lady," said the abbot, "there is no need for you to buy any paper money. I have a supply of imitation gold and silver paper money here, and you are welcome to take some of it with you to burn on her behalf."
Meng Yü-lou turned her silver over to the abbot and then had the young novice lead her out to Chin-lien's grave under the white poplar tree behind the temple, where she found a three-foot-high grave mound of yellow earth, on which a few clumps of artemisia were growing.
Inserting her incense stick into the mound and igniting the paper money, she performed an obeisance, saying, "Sister Six, I did not know that you had been buried here. But today, your sister Meng the Third, having chanced to visit this temple, has come to burn a packet of paper money on your behalf.
May you find a pleasurable place in Heaven;
And use the cash to cope with any problems."
So saying, she groped out a handkerchief and commenced to weep out loud. There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:
As the paper money burns out,
My pearly tears drop helter-skelter.
I call out to you, "Sister Six,
I weep for you until,
There are barely two breaths left in my body.[34]
I recall how we never used to make distinctions between us,
During the sisterhood that we shared together.
We never allowed ourselves to get red in the face with anger.
Your temperament was forceful, and I often gave way to you.
But if we ever lost sight of each other,
If you did not look for me, I would go looking for you.

We were like the fish that swim in pairs,
with only one eye apiece,
Ardently sticking to one another;
Only to be suddenly blown apart
by a gust of wind.
Having been accustomed to perching
on the same tree,
One day we were forced to fly our separate ways.
I cry out to you, Sister Six, just try and listen to me.
What a pity that a person of your great intelligence,
Should end up today being buried under the ground."

The wet nurse Ju-i, on seeing that Meng Yü-lou had gone back to the rear of the temple, took Hsiao-ko in her arms, intending to go out for a look at the grave herself; but Yüeh-niang, who was still talking to Ch'un-mei in the abbot's quarters, said, "Don't take the child with you, I'm afraid he might find it frightening."

"Don't worry, Mistress," Ju-i responded, "I can handle the situation."

So saying, she took Hsiao-ko with her and went out to the grave site, where she looked on as Meng Yü-lou burned the paper money and wept, after which they came back inside.

Meanwhile, Ch'un-mei and Yüeh-niang had both adjusted their makeup and put their clothing to rights, after which Ch'un-mei directed her servants to open up the food boxes, and they proceeded to lay out a selection of appetizers on the two tables, including sweetmeats, delicacies of various kinds, and partitioned boxes of assorted dainties. Wine was provided, after being strained through a cheesecloth sieve, and laid out along with silver goblets and ivory chopsticks. Ch'un-mei invited Wu K'ai's wife, Wu Yüeh-niang, and Meng Yü-lou to sit down in the positions of honor while she played the role of host, and the wet nurse Ju-i, Hsiao-yü, and Lan-hua, the senior maidservant in the Wu household, were seated to either side. Wu K'ai was also provided with a table for himself in the monk's quarters where he was located.

Just as they were drinking their wine, they suddenly saw a pair of black-clad servants, who came in, knelt down, and reported, "His Honor is at his new estate and has sent us to invite the young mistress to come and enjoy the show he is putting on that includes tumblers and vaudeville acts. His First Lady and Second Lady are both there, and he would like you to come join them as soon as possible."

Ch'un-mei responded:
Neither hurriedly nor hastily, saying, "You can go back. I understand the situation."

The two servitors assented and withdrew but did not venture to depart, choosing to wait outside for her to finish entertaining her guests.

Wu K'ai's wife and Yüeh-niang felt that it was time for them to take their leave, saying, "Sister, we don't wish to impose upon you any longer. It is getting late, and you have something to do. We had better be on our way."

Ch'un-mei, however, was reluctant to let them go and, telling her attendants to proffer them large goblets of wine, appealed to them, saying, "We former members of the same household:
Spend less time together than apart,[35] and have gone our separate ways, but we ought not to break off our relationship. I also:
Lack either relatives or friends.
On the occasion of your birthday, Mother, I will come to pay you a visit."

"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "it is nice of you to suggest it, but I would not presume to put you to such trouble. Some day soon, I will come pay a call on you."

After drinking a cupful of wine, Yüeh-niang said, "I have had enough wine. Sister-in-law Wu does not have a sedan chair, and it is getting late enough to hinder our return."

"If Sister-in-law Wu doesn't have a sedan chair," said Ch'un-mei, "I brought some ponies along with me and can lend one of them to her to ride home on." As she prepared for her own departure, Ch'un-mei called for the abbot and had one of her servants bring out a bolt of muslin and five mace of silver, which she presented to him. The abbot bowed in thanks to her and escorted her out through the gate of the temple. Ch'un-mei exchanged farewells with Yüeh-niang and saw her, together with Meng Yü-lou and the others, into their sedan chairs after which she got into her own sedan chair, and the 2 groups went their separate ways. Ch'un-mei was accompanied by a crowd of attendants who shouted to clear the way as she made her way to her husband's new estate. Truly, if even the separate leaves of a tree may encounter each other, why should people, too, not sometimes meet with good fortune?

A beautiful woman's lot is grievous.
Alas, that one so exquisite
Should turn to a handful of yellow dust.
Is it that Heaven pays no heed,
That good and evil are but matters of chance?
It granted her beauty and intelligence
Then let her go as though she had been nothing. It seems unjust.
And when we ask the Heavens why it happens,
No answer is vouchsafed us.
It is sad.
The beauty of the earth combined with Heaven's fragrance
Passes like the seasons.
They are many who lie buried.
May we not ask where there is gaiety?
Yet there are palaces where people dance and sing,
Where people walk in springtime on the purple path,
And, in the evening, sit beside green-painted windows,
Graceful and exquisite.
Surely the life of man seems purposeless,
Now as in the days long past.

Wu Yueniang prepared the food offering and paper things, and Ximen Dajie, in mourning dress, went in a sedan chair to her husband's house, with old woman Xue in attendance. When they came to the house, Chen Jingji was standing outside the door. He asked the old woman where the things had come from. She made a reverence.

"Your mother-in-law has sent them as an offering to your late father," she said, "and your wife has come too."

"Curses on my mother-in-law!" Jingji cried. "She is half a month too late. It is as if she set up the god of the door on the sixteenth day of the first month. My father has been buried a long time, and she comes now with her tribute of respect."

"Good Brother-in-law, as your wife's mother says, now she is a widow she is like a crab without legs. She knew nothing about your father's coffin coming, and you must forgive her if she is late."

As they were talking, Ximen Dajie's sedan chair came up.

"Who is this?" Jingji said.

"Whom do you expect? Your mother-in-law is not well and she has sent your wife to come and burn paper offerings for your father."

"Take the whore away," Jingji said scornfully. "Better people than she have died by thousands. What have I to do with her?"

"You should not talk like that. When a woman marries a man, she does so to live with him."

"I don't want anything to do with the whore. Be off at once."

The chair men were standing by, and Chen Jingji went up and kicked them. "Take her away," he cried, "or I will break your beggarly legs and pull that whore's hair out.

The sedan-chair men could only take the chair away. By the time old woman Xue was able to speak to Jingji's mother, it had been gone for some time. The old woman could do nothing, so she gave the things to Mistress Chen and came back to tell Yueniang what had happened.

Yueniang was so angry that she nearly fainted. "The rogue is utterly unprincipled!" she cried. "He came here to escape the law, and his father-in-law kept him all those years. This is how he repays us. What a pity that my dead husband kept such a rascal in the place and so gave us all this trouble today. It puts me in the position of a rotten rat, and he dares to insult me."

"Daughter," she said to Ximen Dajie, "you saw with your own eyes that neither my husband nor I ever treated him badly. So long as you live, you belong to the Chen family, and, when you die, you will be a Chen ghost. I can't keep you here. Go to him tomorrow. Don't be afraid. I don't think he will be quite so desperate as to push you into a well. He dare not kill you, because, fortunately, law still has some force in this world."

The next day Yueniang told Daian to go with her daughter. The young woman went in a sedan chair. When they came to the house, Jingji was out. He had gone to his father's grave to put earth on the mound. His mother was a lady of breeding and received her daughter-in-law.

"Go home and tell your mistress that I am very much obliged to her," she said to Daian. "Ask her not to be angry with the young man. He had taken too much to drink yesterday and that is why he behaved so strangely. I will bring him around by degrees." She gave Daian something to eat and dismissed him.

In the evening Chen Jingji came back. The moment he saw his wife he began to kick her and curse.

"You whore!" he cried, "why have you come back? You told me I begged my food from your family. The real truth is that your people have stolen a lot of my property, and that is how they got their wealth. If your people won't keep a son-in-law for nothing, why should I keep you now, you whore? Better people than you have died by thousands, yes, and by tens of thousands."

Then his wife cursed him in return. "You shameless rascal, you unprincipled scamp!" she cried. "Just because that strumpet was murdered, why do you vent your spite on me?"

Jingji pulled her hair and struck her violently with his fist. His mother came and tried to separate them, but he pushed her away and threw her on the floor. The old lady cried. "You rascal! Are your eyes so red that you do not even know your own mother?"

That same night Ximen Dajie was sent back again. Her husband said to her: "If you don't make them give me back my things, I will kill you." This frightened her so much that she stayed at home and never again tried to go and see her husband.

At the Festival of Pure Brightness in the third month, Yueniang prepared incense, candles, paper money, and other things and went outside the city to offer them at her dead husband's grave. She left Sun Xue'e, Ximen Dajie, and one or two maids to look after the house. She, with Meng Yulou, Xiaoyu, and the nurse Ruyi'er carrying the baby, went to the grave in sedan chairs. She asked Uncle Wu and Aunt Wu to go and join them there.

When they came outside the city, everything looked beautiful. The willows were green and the flowers fresh. Hosts of people were celebrating the coming of Spring, for there is no season more delightful. Then the sun is beautiful and the wind gentle, as the eyes of the willow open and the hearts of the flowers are unfolded. The very earth seems perfumed. A myriad flowers seem to compete with each other for the prize of beauty; the herbs put forth new shoots. They are the message of Spring. The light is soft and bright; the scenery warm and perfectly harmonious. The little peach flowers have painted their faces a deep red; the young willows bend their slender waists, tender and narrow as the palace gates. Orioles sing a hundred melodies, and wake people from their midday dreams. Purple swallows sing, and the melancholy of early spring is banished. The sun makes the days longer and warmer, and little yellow ducks splash in the pools. Through the green duckweed they dash. Beyond the river on some estate, we know not whose, the swing hangs high among the mist of green willows.

It is the festival of Spring
And mist is everywhere.
Outside the town the gentle breeze blows away the paper money
And hangs it in the trees.
People laugh and sing on the tender grass.
It is the season of apricot blossom
When the rain comes suddenly
And suddenly is gone again.
The gentle oriole chatters in the cherry trees,
Under the willows, guests who have drunk their fill
Sleep on the riverbank.
Charming women are busy to the strains of music
They bring a rope and make it fast, Swing to and fro
Like a flight of angels.

Yueniang and the others came to Wuliyuan, where the grave was. Daian took the food boxes to the kitchen; they made a fire and the cooks prepared the dishes. Meanwhile, Yueniang, Yulou, Xiaoyu, and Ruyi'er with the baby, went to the hall. There they had tea and waited for Aunt Wu. Daian set out the offerings before Ximen Qing's grave, and still they waited for Aunt Wu. She was delayed because she had not been able to get a sedan chair, and it was almost noon before she came along with Uncle Wu, both on donkeyback.

"I don't know how you manage to ride a donkey," Yueniang said to her.

Aunt Wu drank some tea, then she changed her clothes and they all went together to make their offering. Yueniang took five sticks of incense, kept one for herself, and gave the others, one to Yulou, one to Ruyi'er for the baby, and one each to her brother and his wife. She first put incense in the burner and bowed before the grave. "Brother," she said, "when you were alive, you were a man; now you are a spirit. Today is the Festival of Spring. Your dutiful wife Wu, sister Meng, and your son Xiaoge, who is now a year old, have come to your grave to burn paper money for you. Protect your son's life, that he may live long and come to do worship at your grave. Brother, you and I were once husband and wife. I treasure in my memory the remembrance of your features and your way of speaking, and I am sad."

She covered her face and sobbed. Then Yulou came forward, offered incense, made a reverence and cried with Yueniang. The nurse, Ruyi'er, with the baby in her arms, knelt down. Uncle Wu and Aunt Wu also offered incense and made reverence. Then they went to the arbor and there had food and wine. Yueniang asked Uncle Wu and Aunt Wu to take the places of honor. She and Yulou sat opposite, Xiaoyu and Ruyi'er and Aunt Wu's old maid sat at the side.

That day, Major Zhou also went to visit his ancestral tombs. Before the festival, Chunmei slept with him. She pretended to have a dream and cried during the night. Zhou asked her what was the matter.

"I had a dream," Chunmei said, "and in my dream, my mother came to me. She cried and said to me that she had brought me up, yet I was not going to burn paper offerings for her at the Festival of Spring. Then I cried and awoke."

"If she brought you up, you must do your duty as a daughter. But where is she buried?"

"At the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the Southern Gate."

"Then you must not trouble any more," Major Zhou said. "That temple is my own place of worship. Tomorrow, I shall be going there to visit our family tombs and I will tell a servant to take something to the place where your mother is buried."

The next day, the Major told his servants to take food, wine, and fruit and go to his ancestral tombs outside the city. At the grave he had a large house with halls, rooms and a garden, a place for worship, and shrines. His two wives and Chunmei went with him each in a sedan chair carried by four men. Soldiers marched before them.

Yueniang drank wine with Uncle Wu and Aunt Wu. She was afraid it was getting late, and told Daian and Laian to clear everything away. They went to the village of Apricot Blossom. There was a hill near the village and a wineshop at the foot of the hill. Many people were strolling about, and she told the servants to take their food there. Aunt Wu had no sedan chair, so they all walked and the sedan chairs followed empty behind them. Uncle Wu came last, leading the two donkeys. They walked over the green grass for about three li; then came to the Peach Flower inn, and, when they had gone five li; saw the village of Apricot Blossom. The red and green dresses of the people seemed like masses of flowers and willows. They had all come to visit their graves. In the distance they could see a temple beneath the shade of a locust tree. It was a building of more than usual magnificence.
Yueniang asked what this building was called.
"It is the place where Major Zhou worships," Uncle Wu said, "and it is called the Temple of Eternal Felicity. Don't you remember how, when my brother-in-law was alive, he gave a great deal of money to repair the building? That is why it looks so new and beautiful."
"Let us go and have a look at it," Yueniang said.
Some of the novices saw them coming and went to tell the Abbot. When he saw a number of people coming, he came out to receive them. He made a reverence to Uncle Wu and then to Yueniang, and told one of the young monks to unlock all the shrines that they might see the different images of Buddha. When they had had tea, all the doors were opened. Yueniang and the others looked everywhere. Then they went back to the Abbot's apartments, and he offered them tea.
"May I ask your name in religion?" Uncle Wu said.
"My name is Daojian," the Abbot said, "and this monastery is the place of worship of his most generous lordship Major Zhou. Under my instruction are more than a hundred monks, and, at the back, is a place for the wandering monks who come here to meditate. They make intercession for the charitable." He asked them if they would not take something to eat.
"We must not put you to inconvenience," Yueniang said. She took five qian of silver and asked Uncle Wu to give them to the Abbot. "It is only a trifle to pay for incense to burn before the Buddhas," she said.
The Abbot made a reverence. "I have really nothing to offer you," he said, "but I should be glad if you would take a cup of tea. Thank you for this gift."
Novices set the table and brought vegetarian food and cakes. The Abbot sat down with them and took up his chopsticks to encourage them to eat something.
Suddenly two men in black clothes burst into the room and shouted in a voice like thunder. "Teacher, why don't you come out to welcome the young lady?"
The Abbot put on his robes and hat, told the young monks to clear everything away, and asked the ladies to go into a small room.
"I must go and see the young lady," he said. "When she has finished her worship, I will come back to you."
Uncle Wu suggested that they should leave, but the Abbot would not hear of it.
The monks, ringing bells and beating drums, went to the main gate to receive the visitor. A host of men in black clothes followed a large sedan chair, coming from the east like a flying cloud. The chair men's clothes were wet with sweat.
The Abbot bowed. "I did not know you were coming, Lady," he said. "I beg your pardon for not being ready to welcome you."
"Teacher," Chunmei said, who was sitting in the sedan chair, "I am sorry to put you to so much trouble."
The servants took the offerings and went to the back of the temple where Pan Jinlian was buried. They set out paper money and other offerings before the grave. Chunmei did not go into the temple but straight around to the back. There she left the sedan chair. The servants stood ready to do anything she might wish and, slowly and gracefully, she walked between them to the grave. There she offered incense and made reverence four times.
"Mother," she said, "I have come to offer paper money for you. I trust that you may rest in paradise and make use of this money when you are in need. If I had only known you would be killed, I would have made a plan to bring you to me. It is my fault that I was too late. Now I repent, but it is still too late."
She told the servants to burn the paper money, and sobbed loudly.
Yueniang, in the temple, only knew that some young lady had come and that the Abbot had gone to meet her. When he did not come back, she asked the young monk what was happening.
"A little while ago," the young monk said, "the young lady buried one of her sisters. It is the Festival of Spring today, and she has come to burn paper offerings."
"I should not be surprised if this were Chunmei," Yulou said.
"But she has no sister buried here," Yueniang said. "What is the young lady's name?" she asked the young monk.
"Her name is Pang," the young monk said. "A few days ago she gave the Abbot five taels of silver to hold a service for her sister."
"I remember our husband telling me that Chunmei's family name was Pang." Yulou said. "It must be she."
As they were talking, the Abbot returned and told the young monk to prepare tea. A sedan chair was brought to the second door and Yueniang and Yulou looked through the lattice to see what manner of young lady this might be. They recognized Chunmei. She was taller than before. Her face was like the full moon and she looked as exquisite as a figure of jade. Her head was covered with pearls and ornaments, and phoenix pins were thrust obliquely through her hair. She wore a crimson embroidered coat and a blue skirt with trimmings of gold, and little ornaments that tinkled as she walked. She was very different from the Chunmei they had known.
The Abbot set a large chair in the place of honor and asked Chunmei to sit down in it. The young monk made a reverence to her and brought tea. The Abbot offered it with his own hands. "Really," he said, "I did not expect you today. You must forgive me for not coming to meet you."
"I feel that I have been a great trouble to you," Chunmei said. "The other day I asked you to hold a service for me."
"That was nothing," the Abbot said. "I should have done it out of gratitude for the kindness you have shown. We had eight monks, and in the evening, when the ceremony was over, I burned paper offerings. Then I sent your servant away and bade him tell you all about it."
Chunmei drank tea, and the young monk took away the teacup. But the Abbot sat with her and talked, and Yueniang and the others could not come away. Yueniang was afraid because it was getting very late, and she bade the young monk go and tell the Abbot she would like to say goodbye to him. The Abbot would not hear of it.
"May I mention something to you?" he said to Chunmei.
"Say anything you like, Teacher," Chunmei said.
"There are a few ladies here who came to see the place. We did not know you were coming. Now they wish to go away."
"Teacher," Chunmei said, "why do you not ask them to come and see me?"
The Abbot went and told Yueniang what Chunmei had said, but Yueniang did not wish to go. "It is late and we must go home," she said. "We have not time to come and see her."
The Abbot was very much embarrassed. He felt that he had accepted Yueniang's money and had entertained her very inadequately. He implored them to go and see Chunmei. Then they could refuse no longer. Yueniang, Yulou, and Aunt Wu came out.
"Mothers and Aunt!" Chunmei cried. She made Aunt Wu take the place of honor, then, like a branch of blossoms, swaying in the wind, knelt down and kowtowed. Aunt Wu hastily greeted her in return.
"Sister," she said, "things are very different now. I dare now allow you to make such reverence to me."
"Good Aunt," Chunmei said, "you must not say that. I am not that sort of woman. I know the correct behavior of an inferior to a superior."
When she had kowtowed to Aunt Wu, she turned to Yueniang and Yulou. They wished to salute her, but she would have none of it. She kowtowed to them four times. They helped her to her feet.
"I did not know you were here," Chunmei said. "If I had known, I would have asked you to come before."
"Sister," Yueniang said, "since you left us, I have not been able to come and call on you. I am sorry."
"Lady," Chunmei said, "who am I that you should call on me? Why should you be sorry?"
Then she saw Ruyi'er with the baby Xiaoge. "The young master is quite big now," she said.
"Come here and make a reverence to your sister," Yueniang said to Xiaoyu. Then Xiaoyu and Ruyi'er, both smiling, came and made a reverence to Chunmei and she returned their greeting.
"Sister," Yueniang said, "you should accept their reverence."
Then Chunmei took a silver pin with a gold head from her hair and put it in Xiaoge's cap.
"You must thank your sister," Yueniang said. "Why don't you say something to your sister?"
Then, indeed, the baby did babble something. Yueniang was very pleased.
"Sister," Yulou said, "if you had not come here today, we might never have met."
"I came because my mother is buried behind this monastery," Chunmei said. "I lived with her for several years and she had no relatives of her own. The least I could do was to come and burn some papers for her."
"Now I remember," Yueniang said. "Some years ago your mother died, and you told us you did not know where she was buried."
"You don't understand, Sister," Yulou said. "She means our sister Pan. It is due to her kindness that Jinlian is buried here."
Yueniang said no more.
"Would anyone else have been as kind as you, Sister?" Aunt Wu said. "You did not forget one who had been your friend, and you gave her burial. And at this festival you have come to burn paper offerings for her."
"Lady," Chunmei said, "you know how well she treated me when she was alive. It was such a tragic end. Her body was lying there exposed. I could do no less for her than bury her."
The Abbot told the young monks to set the table again. They brought in two large tables with all kinds of vegetarian dishes and cakes. The tea was made with golden tea leaves as tiny as sparrows' tongues, and the purest of water. They enjoyed their food and, when they had finished, the things were taken away. Uncle Wu was entertained elsewhere by some of the monks.
Yulou rose and said she would like to see the grave of Jinlian. She wished to burn paper offerings too, for they had been as sisters. But seeing that Yueniang did not intend to go, Yulou took five fens of silver from her sleeve and asked one of the young monks to buy some paper money.
"Don't trouble to buy any, Lady," the Abbot said. "I have plenty. Take what you wish."
Then Yulou gave the money to the young monk and asked him to lead the way to the grave under the poplar tree. There she found a mound of yellow earth about three feet high and a few grasses growing on it. She offered incense and burned some paper money. Then she made a reverence, and said: "Sister, I did not know that you were buried here. By chance I came to this monastery, and now I offer you this paper money. May it be of use to you." She sobbed loudly.
When Ruyi'er saw that Yulou had gone to the back, she decided to go too. Yueniang, who was talking to Chunmei, said to the nurse: "Don't take the baby, you may frighten him."
"Don't be alarmed, Lady," Ruyi'er said. "I will see he comes to no harm."
Then she went to the grave, where Yulou was burning paper offerings and weeping as she did so.
The ladies changed their clothes and powdered their faces. Chunmei ordered one of her servants to bring a food box, and all kinds of dainties were set out on the table before them. Wine was heated. The cups were of silver; the chopsticks of ivory. She asked Aunt Wu, Yueniang, and Yulou to take the places of honor, and she took the hostess's seat. Ruyi'er and Xiaoyu sat at the side. Uncle Wu had wine in another room.
While they were drinking, two servants came in and knelt down. "Our master would like you to come and see some performers," they said. "The other ladies are there already, and he asks you to come at once."
Chunmei showed no sign of hurry. "Very well," she said, "you may go back to him."
The two men did not dare to go away, and waited outside the door. Aunt Wu and Yueniang rose. "Sister," they said, "we have troubled you long enough. It is late, and you have other matters to attend to. We must go."
Chunmei would not listen, and still told her servants to fill the cups with wine. "Ladies," she said, "it was not easy for us to meet, but now that we have chanced to come upon each other, I trust we may keep on good terms. I have no relatives of my own, and perhaps you will allow me to come and see you on your birthdays."
"Sister," Yueniang said, "it is extremely kind of you to suggest it, but I dare not put you to so much inconvenience. Will you not allow me to come to you first?"
Yueniang drank another cup of wine and then said she could drink no more. "Aunt Wu has no sedan chair," she said. "It will be very awkward if we are late."
"If she's no chair, I'll be glad to let her have one of my ponies," Chunmei said.
Aunt Wu thanked her and declined. They stood up again and made ready to go. Chunmei sent for the Abbot and gave him a roll of cloth and 5 qian of silver. He thanked her and went with all the ladies as far as the main gateway.
There Yueniang said goodbye to Chunmei. The girl watched Yueniang and the others get into their sedan chairs and then got into her own. The 2 parties went in different directions. Chunmei with her servants went to Xinzhuang.

113

Lai-wang absconds together with Sun Hsüeh-o; Sun Hsüeh-o Is Sold to Chou Hsiu's Household

Blossoms open and blossoms fall, [1]open and fall again;
Officials and commoners are wont to replace one another.
Prominent families cannot count upon remaining wealthy;
Poor persons are not necessarily doomed to remain poor.
If you assist people, they will not necessarily rise to Heaven;
If you abuse people, they will not necessarily end in a ditch.[2]
You are urged, in all things, not to be resentful toward Heaven;
Heaven's attitude toward mankind is neither generous nor stingy.[3]

Wu K'ai took charge of Yüeh-niang and the group of men and women that accompanied her as they left the Temple of Eternal Felicity and continued on their way under the tall trees on the long embankment. Meanwhile, Tai-an had already selected an elevated spot in the open air before the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village, from which they could enjoy:
The liveliness of the teeming crowds;
and set out their wine and appetizers:
Making a canopy of Heaven and a carpet of Earth.[4]
He had waited a long time before he saw the sedan chairs of Yüeh-niang and the others approaching.
Upon their arrival, he asked, "Why has it taken you so long to get here?"
Yüeh-niang responded by telling him all about how they had run into Ch'un-mei in the Temple of Eternal Felicity.
It was not long before the wine was decanted, and the group of them sat down to enjoy their drinks. As they did so, what should they see passing back and forth below the tavern in front of them but a stream of:
Perfumed carriages with decorated hubs,
Amid the discord of the teeming crowds.
The chariots and horses rumbled like thunder;
As the pipes and voices rose up tumultuously.[5]
Yüeh-niang and the others, standing on their elevated spot, looked on as the:
Mountains and seas of people, crowded around to watch the military instructors perform their equestrian acrobatics.
It so happens that among them was the son of the district magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, whose name was Li Kung-pi. He was about thirty years of age and was enrolled as a student at the Superior College of the National University. He had ever been:
As romantic and dashing as can be,
But too lazy to study the classics;
preferring instead to engage in:
Equestrian hunting with falcons and hounds,
Or playing at kickball and suchlike sports.

He was a habitué of the:
Three quarters and two alleys, of the pleasure precincts, and people referred to him as Bare Stick Li. That day, he was wearing an outfit of light glossy silk, with a small palmetto hat with a golden knob on his head, while his feet were clad in dark tan boots and embroidered stockings. Along with a clerk on the staff of the district yamen named Ho Pu-wei, he was leading a group of twenty or thirty stout fellows, equipped with slingshots, blowpipes, balls, and sticks, who congregated in front of the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village looking on as the military instructor Li Kuei performed his equestrian acrobatics; doing headstands on horseback, hanging on one side of his steed by grasping its belly bands, twirling his spear and flourishing his club. The considerable number of men and women gathered there were cheering vociferously.
This Li Kuei, whose nickname was Shantung Yaksha,[6] wore a flat-topped cap on his head, held in place with a hammered gold ring that floated at the back of his skull. His body was draped in a close-fitting purple gown, his waist was encircled with a gold lamé cummerbund, his shins were encased in patterned puttees, and his feet were clad in long-legged boots and variegated stockings with a flying fish motif. He rode on a steed with a silvery mane and held a gleaming vermilion-handled spear in his hand, from which there floated a commander's standard.
Vaulting into the saddle in the middle of the street, he went on to introduce himself in a loud voice, saying:
Martial arts instructors such as myself are rare in this world;
My name has been known on the rivers and lakes for a long time.
Blows with my two fists feel like being hammered with a mallet;
My two feet carry me forward as nimbly
as though in flight.
In the martial contests in the Southern and Northern Capitals,
And those in Kuang-tung and Kuang-hsi,
I am without a rival.
It is clear I am an adamantly boastful and big-mouthed sort;
Though the fact is that I am utterly devoid of any talent.
My skill with the Shao-lin quarterstaff,
Barely enables me to batter field frogs;
My mastery of the Yüeh school of boxing,[7]
Hardly equips me to terrify little dogs.
When confronted with a real match,
I scarcely dare make even a sound;
If there is no rival to deal with,
I am wont to utter boastful words.
The money I manage to swindle this way
I find hard to hold on to;
Because I am so given to plucking the "willows" in the quarter.[8]
I am obliged to Young Master Li Kung-pi from the Northern Capital, Who sustains me in his household, and views me as a bosom friend.
Dipped in fresh sauce, I enjoy consuming half a field of scallions;
Wrapped in thin pancakes, I stuff myself with half a load of leeks.
Your humble servant has always been addicted to intemperance;
And enjoys drinking wine throughout the time from 4:00 to 6:00.
Should my teeth hurt,
I only resort to grinding them;
Should my belly swell,
I merely resort to massaging it.
To sate myself, I have been known to consume three pecks of rice;
To amuse myself, I have been known to swill a large crock of wine.
I am exceedingly grateful to my patron,
but have no way to repay him;
In the life to come I will be reborn as a watchdog to guard his home.
Should a housebreaker show up and try to make a hole in his wall;
I will rise to the occasion by taking a bite out of his scrotum.
If you want to know why I would take
a bite out of his scrotum;
It is because I am not as expert at using my limbs as my mouth.[9]
On this occasion, no sooner did Li Kung-pi set eyes on Meng Yü-lou's tall and slender figure than, before he knew it:
His heart was agitated and his eyes disturbed.
It seemed to him that:
Such a vision is not exhaustible;
Such a view exceeds comprehension.
From his mouth no word was uttered,
In his heart he thought to himself,
"I wonder whose household that woman belongs to, and whether she has a husband or not?"
Turning to the "ball clubber" Trifler Chang, who was a member of his entourage, he called him over and whispered to him, saying, "You go over to that elevated slope and see if you can find out whose household those three women dressed in white belong to. If you succeed in discovering the truth of the matter, come back and report to me."
Trifler Chang, deferentially covering his mouth with his hand, assented and promptly flew off on this errand.
It was not long before he returned and proceeded to:
Whisper into his ear in a low voice, saying, "Thus and so, they are womenfolk from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing in front of the district yamen. The oldest of them is surnamed Wu and is his sister-in-law. The one who is petite in stature is his First Lady Wu Yüeh-niang. The one with the tall and slender figure and a few white pockmarks on her face is his Third Lady, whose name is Meng Yü-lou. The latter two of them have both chosen to remain in his household and maintain their widowhood."
When Li Kung-pi heard this, he felt particularly attracted to Meng Yü-lou and generously rewarded Trifler Chang for his efforts. But no more of this.
Wu K'ai, along with Yüeh-niang and the others, continued to enjoy the scene for what seemed like half a day until:
The sun began to be swallowed by the hills, when he directed Tai-an to gather up the food boxes and urged Yüeh-niang to get into her sedan chair and proceed home. Truly, it is the case that:
The young man grasps his brocade bridle and flaunts his silken sleeves in drunkenness;
The silk-clad young lady lifts aside the embroidered curtain the better to gaze at him.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
The shadows of the flowers under the willows hold down the dust on the road;
Each time one sets out to enjoy them one's pleasure is renewed.
Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li;
Those without affinities will not meet though face to face.
We will say no more, for the moment, about how Yüeh-niang and the others returned home.
To resume our story, that day, back at home, Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, having nothing else to do during the afternoon, went out and stood by the front gate. It just so happened that:
As providence would have it, a peddler unexpectedly came along shaking the clapper by which he alerted housewives to his presence. In those days, peddlers who dealt in cosmetics, ornamental trinkets, and mirror polishing all alerted housewives by shaking such clappers.
Upon hearing the sound of the clapper, Hsi-men Ta-chieh said, "My mirror is tarnished," and told P'ing-an to go stop the peddler so he could polish her mirror for her.
The peddler put down his burden and said, "I am not a mirror polisher but deal in gold and silver objects, head ornaments, and trinkets."
As he stood there in front of the gate, he stared fixedly at Sun Hsüeh-o:
Looking her over from top to bottom.
Sun Hsüeh-o responded by saying, "As for you, if you are not a mirror polisher, you can take yourself off. What reason is there for you to stare at me that way?"
The man then said, "Sister Hsüeh-o, and the young lady of the household, I guess you no longer recognize me."
"You look familiar," said Hsi-men Ta-chieh, "but I don't seem able to remember who you are at the moment."
"I am Lai-wang," the man replied, "whom the master drove out of his household."
"Where have you been all these years?" asked Sun Hsüeh-o. "Why haven't we seen you? You've managed to gain quite a bit of weight."
"Upon leaving the master's household," replied Lai-wang, "I returned to my native place in Hsü-chou but was at loose ends and unable to find regular employment. So I joined the entourage of a gentleman who was leaving for the capital to take up an official position. Unexpectedly, while we were en route, his father died, and he had to return home in order to observe the mourning rituals for his parent. I therefore sought employment in the jeweler's shop of Silversmith Ku, where I have been learning the craft of working with precious metals, engraving patterns on larger vessels, as well as head ornaments and other objects. These last few days, business has been slack, so Silversmith Ku has sent me out on the street with a carrying pole to peddle some miscellaneous objects. When I saw you all standing in the entranceway, I did not dare to accost you, lest you accuse me of venturing to:
Dawdle at your door or loiter at your gate.
If you had not called me over today, I would not have made myself known to you."
"Though I scrutinized you for what seemed like half a day," said Sun Hsüeh-o, "I failed to recognize you. As an old member of the household, what were you afraid of?"
She then went on to ask, "What sort of merchandise are you selling in that load of yours? Bring it inside so we can have a look at it."

Lai-wang then proceeded to carry his load into the courtyard and open up the coffers, extracting a variety of head ornaments and incised gold and silver artifacts from the boxes inside them. The patterns displayed upon them were works of exquisite craftsmanship. Behold:
A solitary wild goose holds reeds in its beak;
A pair of fish sport among the aquatic plants.
A peony blossom is artistically incised with specks of gold;
The chalcedony head of a hairpin is as lustrous as a flame.
There are also:
A pair of lions playing with a brocade ball,
And a file of camels bearing costly tribute;
Cap ornaments made to delineate the Palace of the Moon,
Hair clasps carved to represent the Peach Blossom Spring.
The pins holding the hair on left and right, Depict pears and persimmons[11] on one side and a clump of lychees on the other;
The pins worn on the part in front and back,
Depict the Goddess Kuan-yin sitting with her legs crossed on her Lotus Throne.
There are also:
Frigid sparrows contending for plum blossoms,[11]
And male phoenixes flirting with their mates.
Truly:
The chatelaines are studded with evenly spaced emeralds;
The cap buttons are fashioned from glaucous precious stones.
After examining these samples for a while, Sun Hsüeh-o said to Lai-wang, "If you have any other ornaments for sale, bring them out so I can see them."
Lai-wang then brought out another box containing artificial flower ornaments to be worn on the hair over the temples, cap ornaments of kingfisher blue in the shape of bird's wings, and an assortment of cricket-shaped stickpins. Hsi-men Ta-chieh picked out for herself two pairs of flower ornaments for the hair over her temples, and Sun Hsüeh-o selected a pair of emerald-green phoenix hairpins, and a pair of brooches representing the motif of goldfish pierced with willow twigs. [12] Hsi-men Ta-chieh then proceeded to weigh out the silver for her purchase and give it to him, but Sun Hsüeh-o, who owed him one tael and two mace of silver for the two items she had selected, requested that he come back early the next morning to collect her payment.
She then went on to explain, "Today, the First Lady is not at home, having gone to the family graveyard, together with her infant child and the Third Lady, in order to burn paper money at Father's grave."
"While I was at home last year," said Lai-wang, "I heard that Father had died and that the First Lady had given birth to a son. I imagine he must have grown somewhat bigger by now."
"The First Lady's child is only a year and a half old right now," said Sun Hsüeh-o. "The members of our household, both high and low, treasure him like a pearl on a piece of jewelry, and our future prospects are dependent on him."
As they were talking, Lai-chao's wife, "The Beanpole," came out and poured a cup of tea for him to drink. Lai-wang accepted the tea and responded to her with a bow.
Lai-chao himself also appeared and, after chatting with him for a while, said, "You ought to come back tomorrow in order to pay your respects to the First Lady."
Lai-wang then picked up his carrying pole and departed.
That evening, when Yüeh-niang and the others arrived home in their sedan chairs, Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh, together with the maidservants, all kowtowed to her. Tai-an felt unable to keep up with the bearers who were carrying the food boxes, and therefore hired a donkey for himself and took care of dismissing the bearers when they arrived home.
Yüeh-niang told Sun Hsüeh-o and Hsi-men Ta-chieh about their meeting with Ch'un-mei that day, saying, "It so happens that she had taken the trouble to arrange the burial of her mistress from the P'an family behind the Temple of Eternal Felicity, though we knew nothing about it. She came to burn paper money at her grave today, and we happened:
By some fortuitous fluke of fortune,[13] to run into her there, and renew our acquaintance. Before this, we had already consumed a vegetarian repast provided by the abbot, but afterwards, Ch'un-mei also had two tables set up and directed her servants to lay out the contents of forty or fifty partitioned boxes containing delicacies of every kind, and to decant the wine. It was more than we could hope to consume. When she saw Hsiao-ko, she also presented him with a pair of her own hairpins. She was as friendly as could be. When she got up to go, she was:
Attended by three or five servants, and rode in a large sedan chair, followed by a crowd of retainers. Moreover, she appears to have grown taller than she was before, and is whiter and plumper as well."
"She has also chosen not to:
Alter her normal demeanor or forget her former status," remarked Sister-in-law Wu. "In the days when she was employed in your household, I noticed that her conduct was more proper and her speech more dignified than that of the other maidservants, and that she seemed to possess the potential for better things. One can see today the truth of the saying that:
Good fortune serves to stimulate the intelligence, and may result in this kind of prosperity."
Meng Yü-lou also chimed in, saying, "Our elder sister may not have asked her about it, but I did, and it turns out that she is pregnant, not having menstruated for the last six months, and that her baby is due in the eighth or ninth month. The commandant is utterly delighted by this. Thus, what Auntie Hsüeh reported to us turns out to be true after all."
After they had talked about this for a while, Sun Hsüeh-o said, "While Mother was not at home today, Hsi-men Ta-chieh and I were standing at the front gate when we caught sight of Lai-wang. It turns out that he has been here learning the craft of working with precious metals and was peddling a load of gold and silver articles and costume jewelry, though we did not even recognize him at first. Upon realizing who he was, we bought several items of costume jewelry from him. He asked about you, Mother, and I told him that you had gone to burn paper money at your husband's grave."
"Why didn't you ask him to wait until I returned home?" asked Yüeh-niang.
"We told him to come back tomorrow," responded Sun Hsüeh-o.
As they were sitting there, and talking together, whom should they see but the wet nurse Ju-i, who came forward and said to Yüeh-niang, "Ever since I arrived home with the little child, for what seems like half a day, he has been in a coma from which he has not awakened. The breath coming out of his mouth is cold, while his body feels:
As scalding as boiling water and as hot as fire."
When Yüeh-niang heard this, she hastened in consternation to pick the baby up from the heated k'ang and give him a kiss. Sure enough, she found that he was covered with cold sweat, though his whole body felt feverishly hot.
Losing her temper, she took Ju-i to task, saying, "Whore that you are, you've let the child catch a chill in the sedan chair."
"I had him wrapped up tightly in a quilt," protested Ju-i. "How could I have exposed him to the cold?"
"If it wasn't that," continued Yüeh-niang, "you must have exposed him to a fright by taking him to visit that dead woman's grave. I told you not to take him there, but you ignored my instructions and insisted on taking him with you anyway."
"Luckily," responded Ju-i, "Sister Hsiao-yü can bear witness that I merely carried him with me to take a look at the grave and then came back. Since when did I expose him to any fright?"
"Don't give me any more of your lip," responded Yüeh-niang. "What need was there for you to go look at her grave in the first place, and thereby expose him to a fright?"
She then called in Lai-an and instructed him, saying, "Go at once and summon Dame Liu."
It was not long before Dame Liu showed up.
After taking his pulse, and feeling his body, she pronounced, "He is suffering from a colic brought on by encountering an evil spirit. I will leave you two doses of cinnabar pills which you should help him to wash down with some ginger extract."
She then directed the wet nurse to hold him in her arms and go lie down on the heated k'ang. It was halfway through the night before he broke out into a cold sweat and his fever began to abate. Dame Liu was then provided with a serving of tea, given three mace of silver as compensation for her services, and requested to return the next day to see how he was doing. What with the:
Opening of gates and closing of doors, the whole household was thrown into a state of consternation for half the night.
To resume our story, the next day, Lai-wang came back to the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence carrying his load of merchandise as before and bowed to Lai-chao, saying, "Yesterday, Sun Hsüeh-o selected a number of my products for herself and promised that if I would return today she would pay me the silver she owed for them, and also arrange a meeting with the First Lady."
"You had better leave for the time being and come back another day," said Lai-chao. "Yesterday, when the First Lady came home, her infant son had fallen ill, and they had to call in the medical practitioner Dame Liu to prescribe medicine for him. As a result, the household has been in a state of disruption and suffering from acute anxiety all night long. Only today does he appear to have gotten somewhat better. Under the circumstances, how could anyone have the spare time to weigh out silver for you?"
As they were speaking, who should turn up but Wu Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and Sun Hsüeh-o, who were in the act of seeing off Dame Liu and caught sight of Lai-wang as they came to the front gate. Lai-wang proceeded to kneel down on the ground and kowtow twice to Yüeh-niang.
"It's been some time since we saw you last," said Yüeh-niang. "Why haven't you come by to pay us a visit?"
Lai-wang told her what had happened to him during the interim and explained that although he had wanted to come, he had not felt comfortable doing so.
"As a former member of the household," said Yüeh-niang, "what were you afraid of? Moreover, your master is now dead. Originally it was simply because that whore from the P'an family engaged in:
Setting fires with one hand, and Pouring water on them with the other, fabricating tales about people behind their backs, that your good wife was driven to commit suicide by hanging herself, and you were framed for something you didn't do and condemned to be banished to your native place. But now, Heaven has refused to countenance her, and she is gone for good."
"It's not something I want to talk about," said Lai-wang. "It suffices that you understand it as well as you do."
After they had spoken for a while, Yüeh-niang asked him, "What kind of wares are you offering for sale? Get them out so I can take a look."
When he had done so, she selected several head ornaments for herself, the cost of which came to three taels and two mace of silver, and weighed the payment out for him on a scale. She then invited him to enter through the ceremonial gate into the rear compound and told Hsiao-yü to fetch a jug of wine and a platter of savories for him. Sun Hsüeh-o, who was in charge of the kitchen, personally saw to heating up a large bowl of pork and brought it out for him to eat. When he had had his fill of wine and food, he kowtowed to them in gratitude and went back out to the front gate.
When Yüeh-niang, Meng Yü-lou, and the others had returned to the rear compound after seeing him off, Sun Hsüeh-o surreptitiously whispered to him, "You should feel free to come back here as often as you like. What is there to be afraid of? If I have anything to say to you, I'll have Lai-chao's wife tell you about it. Tomorrow evening, I'll wait for you here inside the ceremonial gate in the little anteroom next to the crape myrtle hedge."
The two of them exchanged winks with each other, the meaning of which was not lost on Lai-wang, and he went on to ask, "Is this ceremonial gate closed at night, or not?"
Sun Hsüeh-o responded, thus and so, "When you come, go to Lai-chao's quarters first, and wait until nightfall, after which, you can scale the wall with a ladder, and then make your way along the other side of the latticework partition. I'll help you down on this side, and the two of us can get together again. There are some personal thoughts that I want to share with you."
When Lai-wang heard these words, truly:
Joy manifested itself about his temples;
Delight spread itself across his cheeks, and, saying good-bye to Sun Hsüeh-o, he proceeded to take up his carrying pole and go out the gate. Truly:
Without the help of an insider,
A household cannot be broached.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Idle, with nothing to do, while merely leaning against the doorjamb,
He encounters a lover with whom he once enjoyed a deeply felt affair.
Not daring to speak loudly enough to be overheard by anyone else,
She clearly reveals her ardor with the autumn ripples of her eyes.
Lai-wang proceeded happily on his way home. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.
The next day, he did not take up his carrying pole and go out to peddle his wares but slowly sauntered back and forth in front of Hsi-men Ch'ing's gate waiting for Lai-chao to come out.
When he did so, Lai-wang greeted him with a bow, to which Lai-chao responded by saying, "What a rare bird you are, Brother Wang. Long time no see."
"Having nothing to do," Lai-wang said, "I've dropped by for a visit. The young lady Sun Hsüeh-o from the rear compound owes me several mace of silver for some trinkets she purchased from me, and I have come by to collect the payment."
"In that case," responded Lai-chao, "come into my place and have a seat."
So saying, he ushered Lai-wang into his quarters.
"Why is my sister-in-law not to be seen?" asked Lai-wang.
"Your sister-in-law is on duty in the kitchen in the rear compound today," explained Lai-chao.
Lai-wang then groped out a tael's worth of silver and handed it to Lai-chao, saying, "These few pieces of silver should suffice to purchase a jug of wine for my brother and sister-in-law to enjoy with me."
"There is no need for that much," said Lai-chao.
So saying, he called over his son Little Iron Rod. Little Iron Rod, who had just recently put up his hair on reaching the age of fourteen, went out with a jug and came back with a large vessel of wine, after which, he was sent to the rear compound to summon "The Beanpole."

It was not long before "The Beanpole" showed up with a covered pewter pot of heated rice, a large bowl of boiled hash, and two side dishes, to go with the wine, saying, "How nice it is to see Brother Wang here."
Lai-chao then brought out the silver that Lai-wang had given him and showed it to "The Beanpole," saying, "Our brother has given this to us with which to buy a jug of wine for our enjoyment."
"The Beanpole" laughed at this, saying, "To enjoy something we have done nothing to deserve is hardly the right thing to do."
She then set up a bed table on the k'ang, invited Lai-wang to sit down at it, laid out the refreshments, and decanted the wine. Lai-wang promptly responded by filling a cup of wine to the brim and offering it to Lai-chao, after which, he poured out another cup and presented it to "The Beanpole."
Bowing deeply to them, he said, "It is some time since I have seen my brother and sister-in-law. These cups of watery wine are intended to show my filial respect for the two of you."
"We are hardly likely to accuse you of sponging off us," said "The Beanpole." "But:
When addressing sincere people,
You must not speak insincerely.
The young lady Sun Hsüeh-o in the rear compound appealed to us for help yesterday. She said that:
Your old feelings for each other remained intact,[14] and asked the two of us, thus and so, if we could help you to get together again. You had better not pretend to be:
Still asleep in dreamland.
If you want to find the route down the mountain,
You had better ask someone who has been over it.[15]
If you should find a way to be reunited, and gain anything in the process:
Don't try to keep it all for yourself; but Spare us a mouthful of leftover gravy.
After all, we are putting ourselves at considerable risk on your behalf."
Lai-wang responded by getting down on his knees and saying, "All I am hoping for is that my brother and sister-in-law will consent to help us get together again. If so:
I will never dare to forget it."
When they had concluded this exchange, they proceeded to enjoy their wine for a while, after which "The Beanpole" went back to the rear compound to tell Sun Hsüeh-o about it.
Upon returning, she said, "We have agreed that you should come back this evening and hide out in our quarters until the ceremonial gate has been closed for the night and the residents of the rear compound have gone to bed, after which, you can climb over the wall and:
Seize the opportunity to do what you want."[16]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Just retribution is absolutely devoid of bias;[17]
It follows as inevitably as shadows or echoes.
If you seek the causes of bad or good fortune;
Simply scrutinize the deeds that one has done.[18]
On hearing these words, Lai-wang went home and could hardly wait for the evening, when he slipped surreptitiously into Lai-chao's quarters and proceeded to share some wine with the two of them until late at night without anyone else being aware of his presence. After the main gate of the residence had been closed, and the crossbar had been locked in place on the ceremonial gate, the residents of the household, both high and low, all went to bed.
The two of them had arranged a secret signal, so as soon as Lai-wang heard the sound of Sun Hsüeh-o coughing, he proceeded to mount a ladder, crawl onto the plastered wall, and make his way along the other side of the latticework partition to the point at which Sun Hsüeh-o stood ready to help him down onto a bench.
The two of them then retired to the little anteroom on the western side of the courtyard that was used for storing saddles, where they fell to:
Hugging and embracing each other, as they went on to engage in the game of clouds and rain together. It was a meeting between a widower and a widow with:
The fire of lust in their hearts.
As for Lai-wang:
His tasseled spear was impetuous, and he worked it with all his strength for some time until his pleasure reached its height as his semen began to flow, and he:
Ejaculated like a geyser.
When they had finished their business together, Sun Hsüeh-o handed him a bundle containing some gold and silver head ornaments, several taels worth of silver, and two outfits of satin clothing and said, "You should come back again tomorrow evening. I still have some other valuables I can turn over to you then. You might as well start looking outside for a safe place for us to go. This household is no place for me to remain in the future. It would be better if the two of us could abscond together and find a place to stay outside where we could become man and wife. Since you have mastered the craft of a silversmith, there is no reason to worry about our being able to make a living."
"At the present time," responded Lai-wang, "there happens to be a maternal aunt of mine who lives on Polished Rice Lane outside the East Gate of the city. She practices midwifery and is well-known in the neighborhood as Midwife Ch'ü. It is an out-of-the-way location where we can safely escape observation. The two of us might as well seek refuge there for a while, and if we see that the coast is clear I can take you with me to my native place, buy a few acres of land, and plant some crops in order to support ourselves."
When the two of them had agreed on this plan, Lai-wang said good-bye to Sun Hsüeh-o, clambered back over the wall, and returned to Lai-chao's quarters, where he waited until the main gate was opened early the next morning and slipped furtively outside.
At dusk that day, he returned to the gate and slipped back into Lai-chao's quarters. That night, he climbed over the wall once again and made out with Sun Hsüeh-o. After this, as the mornings and evenings succeeded one another, he met with her in this way on more than one occasion. They also took advantage of the opportunity to make off with a lot of valuable objects, gold and silver utensils, clothing, and so forth. Lai-chao and his wife also fattened themselves by appropriating a share of these stolen goods, but there is no need to describe this in detail.
One day, in the rear compound, Yüeh-niang, who was feeling out of sorts because she feared that Hsiao-ko might be coming down with smallpox, went to bed earlier than usual. The maidservant in Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters at the time was Chung-ch'iu, who had originally worked for Hsi-men Ta-chieh but had been reassigned to Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters by Yüeh-niang because Ch'en Ching-chi had asked for Yüan-hsiao, who had formerly served in Li Chiao-erh's quarters. Yüeh-niang had complied with this request by reassigning Chung-ch'iu to Sun Hsüeh-o's quarters, and ordering Yüan-hsiao to work for Hsi-men Ta-chieh. That night, after Sun Hsüeh-o had made sure that Chung-ch'iu was asleep, she proceeded to assemble a large bundle of hairpins, earrings, and head ornaments in her bedroom, packed them in a box, wrapped her head in a kerchief, and put on her traveling clothes. She had previously arranged with Lai-wang that he should wait for her in Lai-chao's quarters so the two of them could abscond together.
Lai-chao said to them, "I have no problem with your making good your escape, but I am responsible for the front gate and cannot afford to let so much as a duckling get away. If the First Lady finds out what has happened and demands to know why I didn't stop you, what am I to say? It would be better if the two of you were to go out over the roof, and break a few tiles in the process, so there will be some evidence of how you got away."
"Brother," responded Lai-wang, "what you say makes sense."
Sun Hsüeh-o also gave them a silver ewer with a hinged lid, a gold earpick, a black satin jacket, and a yellow satin skirt to thank them for their assistance. They decided to wait until the fifth watch when the moon was dark before climbing over the roof.
Lai-chao and his wife poured out two large goblets of heated wine and offered them to Lai-wang and Sun Hsüeh-o, saying, "This will facilitate your escape, and serve to buck up your spirits on the way."
They continued drinking until the fifth watch, when the two of them, while holding sticks of incense, climbed up the ladder and helped each other onto the roof. As they moved across it:
Step by step,
they dislodged and broke a considerable number of tiles. When they had climbed as far as the eaves on the front of the building, they saw that there were still no pedestrians in the street, though they could hear the sound made by a patrolling watchman. Lai-wang was the first to jump to the ground and then helped Sun Hsüeh-o down by allowing her to stand on his shoulders and then lifting her the rest of the way.
The two of them made their way forward, but when they arrived at a crossroads they were stopped by a patrolman, who demanded to know, "Where are the two of you going?"
This had the effect of throwing Sun Hsüeh-o into a state of panic, but Lai-wang responded:
Neither hurriedly nor hastily, by pointing to the stick of government-grade incense in his hand, and saying, "We are a married couple, and are on our way to burn incense at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak outside the city wall. We are earlier than we should be but hope that you will not hold it against us."
"And what have you got in that bundle you are carrying?" the officer went on to ask.
"It is a supply of incense, candles, and paper money," said Lai-wang.
"If the two of you are going to burn incense at the Temple of the God of the Eastern Peak," the officer responded, "that is a worthy undertaking, and you may continue quickly on your way."
This was just the signal Lai-wang was waiting for. Taking Sun Hsüeh-o by the hand, he proceeded to fly forward as fast as he could go. When they arrived at the city wall, the gate had just opened, and, insinuating themselves into the crowd, they made their way inconspicuously outside the city wall. After turning down a number of streets and alleys, they arrived at Polished Rice Lane, which was an out-of-the-way place, occupied by only a few families, living in:
Low-lying houses and humble dwellings, that backed on the embankment of a large pond.
When they arrived at Midwife Ch'ü's house, she had not yet opened the door. They had to call out for what seemed like half a day before she got up to open the door, and caught sight of Lai-wang with a woman in tow. It so happens that Lai-wang's surname had originally been Cheng, so he was known to her as Cheng Wang.
"This woman is my newly acquired wife," he explained to her. "If you have the room to accommodate us for a little while, we can go on to look for a place of our own."
So saying, he handed her three taels of silver with which to purchase kindling and rice. When Midwife Ch'ü saw the gold and silver head ornaments they had with them, she realized that their provenance was suspicious.
Her son, Ch'ü T'ang, upon seeing that his mother had agreed to accommodate Cheng Wang and his wife, and that they had brought these things with them:
On seeing their value developed ideas.
Prizing open the door to their room, he made off with some of the valuables and went out to gamble with them but was apprehended, confessed to the circumstances, and was brought before the district magistrate. When District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i saw that they were stolen objects, and that the evidence of this was clear, he dispatched runners to take Ch'ü T'ang to his home and trussed Cheng Wang and Sun Hsüeh-o together with a single length of rope. Sun Hsüeh-o was so frightened that her face turned as sallow as wax, and she proceeded to change into her everyday clothes, put on a pair of eye shades, and tear the rings off her fingers to give to the runners. They were then escorted under guard to confront the magistrate. This event created something of an uproar in the neighborhood, and people came out onto the street to see what was going on.
Among them there were those who recognized them and said, "She is a concubine from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household who has run away with the servant Lai-wang. He was formerly driven into exile but has come back under the name Cheng Wang, fornicated with her, and colluded with her in running off with stolen property, in order to go live together somewhere else. Once there, they have been ripped off in turn by this Ch'ü T'ang, and now that their crimes have been brought to light, they are being taken to confront the magistrate."
There and then:
The news spread from one person to ten,
And then from ten persons to a hundred.[19]
The mouths of the pedestrians on the road cause stories to fly.[20]
Let us revert to the story of Yüeh-niang back at home. When Sun Hsüeh-o absconded, and her maidservant Chung-ch'iu discovered that the valuables and head ornaments in her cabinet were all gone, and that her clothes had been left:
Scattered about in a state of disorder, and reported these facts to Yüeh-niang, she was taken completely by surprise.
"Since you slept with her," said Yüeh-niang, "how could you have failed to detect the fact that she was bent on eloping?"
"She was in the habit," responded Chung-ch'iu, "of sneaking outside during the night, and only returning after what seemed like half a day. I did not know what she was up to."
Yüeh-niang also interrogated Lai-chao, saying, "Since you are in charge of the main gate, how could anyone have escaped without your knowing it?"
"The main gate is locked every night," responded Lai-chao. "She could hardly have gotten out unless she flew off like a bird."
Later on, it was only when the broken tiles on the top of the building were discovered that she realized she must have escaped by going over the roof. Yüeh-niang did not venture to send anyone out to look for her, deciding that she had better repress her feelings and put up with the situation.
Who could have anticipated that when the district magistrate undertook to hear the case he started out by subjecting Ch'ü T'ang to the squeezers, which resulted in the recovery of four gold head ornaments, three silver ornaments, a pair of gold earrings, two silver goblets, five taels worth of loose silver, two outfits of clothing, a handkerchief, and a box. From Cheng Wang he recovered thirty taels of silver, a pair of gold hairpins with bowl-shaped ends, a pin in the shape of a Taoist goddess, and four rings. From Sun Hsüeh-o he recovered a gold clasp for the top of the coiffure, a pair of silver bracelets, five sets of gold buttons, four pairs of silver hairpins, and a package of loose silver. From Midwife Ch'ü he recovered three taels of silver. The magistrate issued a tentative ruling that Lai-wang was guilty of the crime of a servant engaging in fornication with his employer and stealing her goods, that Ch'ü T'ang was also guilty of larceny, both of which were miscellaneous capital crimes, commutable to five years of penal exile, and that the stolen goods were all subject to confiscation by the state. He then sentenced Sun Hsüeh-o, Hsi-men Ch'ing's former concubine, as well as Midwife Ch'ü, to be subjected to the squeezers before the court. Midwife Ch'ü acknowledged her guilt and was released; but as for Sun Hsüeh-o, the magistrate directed runners from the district yamen to go to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household and request a formal document agreeing to resume responsibility for her.
Wu Yüeh-niang consulted with her elder brother Wu K'ai about what to do, and they concluded that since she had already created a scandal by her conduct, there was no point in taking her back, since her presence would only serve to further damage the family's reputation. They therefore paid off the runners and asked them to convey this message to the magistrate, who accordingly called in an official go-between and arranged for her to be put up for sale under judicial auspices.
To resume our story, meanwhile, in the commandant's quarters, Ch'un-mei heard it reported that Sun Hsüeh-o from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household had, thus and so, been abducted by Lai-wang, who had also made off with some valuables, and then taken her to live with him elsewhere; but that the matter had come to light, and she had been taken before the magistrate and was now being offered for sale under judicial auspices. No sooner did Ch'un-mei hear this than it occurred to her that she would like to purchase her and put her to work in the kitchen, so she could slap her in the face, and thus repay her for her former hostility.
She therefore said to Commandant Chou Hsiu, "This Sun Hsüeh-o is a skillful cook, capable of producing excellent fare. Why don't we buy her so she can serve us here at home?"
The commandant forthwith dispatched Chang Sheng and Li An to deliver his card to the magistrate and transmit this request. The magistrate, seeing this as a chance to curry influence by doing a favor, agreed to sell her for a mere eight taels of silver, and, after paying over the money, they brought her back to Chou Hsiu's residence and introduced her first to his principal wife, and then to his concubine Sun Erh-niang. Only after this was she taken to meet Ch'un-mei in her quarters.
Ch'un-mei had only just arisen from her bedstead with its incised gold ornamentation and its brocaded curtains, when her maidservants brought Sun Hsüeh-o in to meet her. Upon seeing that it was Ch'un-mei, all Sun Hsüeh-o could do was to bend low as she stepped forward, kneel down on the floor, and kowtow to her four times.
Ch'un-mei responded by opening her eyes wide, calling for the servant's wife who was on duty at the time, and ordering her, "Take charge of this worthless creature for me, strip off the fret from her coiffure, remove her outer garments, and drive her into the kitchen so she can light the stove and do the cooking for me."
On hearing this, Sun Hsüeh-o had no alternative but to groan to herself in silence. It has always been the case that:
The planks used in wall building are sometimes on top and sometimes on the bottom;
The servile sweeper of the rice will sometimes rise to become head of the granary.[21]
When confronted with low eaves,
How can we not lower our heads?
Upon finding herself in this situation, all Sun Hsüeh-o could do was to remove the fret on her coiffure, change out of her fancy clothing, and head for the kitchen with a sorrowful expression on her face. A poem testifies to this:

The Calico Bag Monk[22] has made his way as far as Ming-Chou;
With his walking stick and straw sandals, he wanders at will.
No matter how many myriad transformations you can perform;
Every incarnation must cope with its own burden of sorrow.

The dodder clings to the raspberry bush
Its tendrils are not very long.
To lose one's virtue at a rake's hands
Is worse than to be thrown out in the street.
In the night he is kind to me
But the mattress of my bed is not warm enough.
He comes in the evening and goes in the morning
Is this not too hasty of him?
I am going to my end
And the old pain stabs my heart.

Uncle Wu took Wu Yueniang and the others along the bank shaded by many great trees. Daian had already prepared for them at a small hill not far from the wineshop in the village of Apricot Blossom, where everything was busy and lively. He had been waiting for them a long time. Then the sedan chairs arrived with Yueniang and the other ladies, and the donkeys with Uncle Wu and Aunt Wu. He asked Yueniang why they were so late, and she told him of the meeting with Chunmei at the Temple of Eternal Felicity. Wine was served and they all sat down in the open air.

While they were drinking, they could watch the carriages with gaily decorated wheels, and people coming and going. From the hillock on which they were, the people in the street seemed like a sea or a mountain of human beings. Some were standing in a ring watching performing horses. Among them was the son of the magistrate, a young man called Li Gongbi. He was about thirty years old, and a student at the Imperial Academy of Learning. But he was a happy and dissolute young fellow, who cared more about hawks and dogs and horses than for the study of poetry and literature. He was always to be seen about the streets, and people called him Li the Wastrel. Today he was wearing a light silk gown, a palm hat with a gold button, and yellow boots. He was with a man named He Buwei, and they had with them a party of twenty or thirty lusty fellows with crossbows, blowpipes, balls, and quarterstaffs watching Li Gui putting the horses through their paces. Then they performed all sorts of tricks, fighting with spears and staves. The men and women standing by laughed and cheered.

This Li Gui was nicknamed the Demon of Shandong. He wore a hat with a swastika badge, a purple shirt, and an embroidered waistcoat, and was riding a silver-maned horse. He carried a shining spear with a red handle, and behind him were several streamers flying in the wind. He was displaying his skill for the benefit of the people in the street.

The young man Li was looking at this show when suddenly he raised his head and saw the ladies on the hill. One was rather taller than the others, and he could not take his eyes from her. He did not speak, but wondered to what family she belonged and whether she was married. Then he whispered to Little Zhang, one of the men with him: "Go and see who those three people in white are, standing on the hill. When you have made sure, come back and tell me."

Little Zhang hurried away. When he came back, he said: "They are members of Ximen Qing's family. The old man is Wu, the short woman is Yueniang, the first wife, and the tall one with pockmarks on her face, the third wife, Yulou. Of course, they are widows now."

Li felt particularly attracted to Yulou. He gave some money to Little Zhang.

When Yueniang and Uncle Wu had watched the show for some time, they told Daian to pack up the things, and the ladies went to their sedan chairs. Then they went home, as sunset was drawing near.

Sun Xue'e and Ximen Dajie had been left at home. They had nothing special to do, and about midday went to the gate and stood there. As Fate would have it, a mirror man came along. In those days, the people who sold powder, flowers and ornaments, and those who polished mirrors, all had a sign to show who they were.

"My mirror is very tarnished," Ximen Dajie said, and told Ping'an to fetch the man to polish it. He laid down his pack. "I am not a mirror polisher," he said, "I sell gold and silver ornaments and artificial flowers." He stood and looked hard at Xue'e.

"If you are not a mirror polisher," she said, "be off with you. What do you mean by staring at me like that?"

"Lady," the man said, "don't you remember me?"

"Your face seems familiar, but I can't quite remember you," Ximen Dajie said.

"I am Laiwang, who used to serve his Lordship," the man said.

"You have been away so many years you have grown fat," Xue'e said.

"When I left here, I went to my native place Xuzhou. But I could not get work there and took service with a nobleman who had an appointment at the Eastern Capital. I went there with him. On the way his father died and he had to go back again. Then I went to a silversmith and learned this trade. Business is very slack and my master told me to try and sell these things in the streets. I have seen you several times but felt shy about making myself known. If you had not stopped me today, I should not have dared to come to you."

"Now I know you," Xue'e said, "but I should not have known you if you had not told me. Why shouldn't you come? You are an old member of this household. What have you got there? Bring them in and let us see."

Laiwang took his boxes into the courtyard, opened them and, putting the gold and silver ornaments on a tray, showed them to the ladies. They were excellently made. When Ximen Dajie and Xue'e had looked at them, they said: "If you have any artificial flowers, we should like to see them too." Laiwang opened another box. He had all kinds of flowers, some to wear on the forehead, some large enough to make a complete headdress, others in the form of different insects. Ximen Dajie picked out two pairs of flowers for her hair, and Xue'e a pair of jade phoenixes and a pair of gold fish. Ximen Dajie paid for what she took, but Xue'e asked Laiwang to come another day for his money, one tael and two qian.

"The Great Lady and the others have gone to your master's grave to burn paper money," she told him.

"I heard last year that my master was dead," Laiwang said. "I suppose the Great Lady's baby is quite big now."

"He is eighteen months old, and the whole household treats him as though he were a pearl or some other jewel. The future of this house rests wholly upon him."

While they were talking, Laizhao's wife brought a cup of tea for Laiwang. He took the tea and made a reverence. Laizhao came out to talk to him. "Come tomorrow and see the Great Lady," he said. Then Laiwang picked up his boxes and went away.

In the evening Yueniang came back. Xue'e and Ximen Dajie and the maids kowtowed to her. Daian could not keep up with the men carrying the boxes, so he hired a donkey. When he reached home, the porters were dismissed.

"Today at the temple," Yueniang told her daughter and Xue'e, "we met Chunmei. Jinlian is buried at the back, and we never knew. Chunmei went to burn some paper money for her and we met her quite by accident. We were very friendly. The Abbot offered us vegetarian food, then Chunmei called for her servants, and they must have set out thirty or forty dishes. We could not drink all the wine she offered us. She looked at the baby and gave him some pins. She was most agreeable. And what a number of servants she had! She was in a large sedan chair with ever so many attendants following it. She is taller and stouter than she used to be, and her face seems whiter and fuller."

"She had not forgotten us," Aunt Wu said. "I remember when she was here, she was much more efficient and a much better talker than any of the other maids. She spoke so gently and quietly. Even then I knew she was a capable girl. Now she has been lucky her intelligence is more evident than ever."

"Sister," Yulou said, "she told me that she has not been unwell for six months. Her fortune is made. I understand she expects to have a baby in the eighth or the ninth month. The Major is delighted. So what old woman Xue said happens to be true."

"Today, while you were out," Xue'e said, "Ximen Dajie and I were standing at the gate and saw Laiwang. He is a silversmith now, and was selling gold and silver ornaments and flowers in the street. At first, I didn't recognize him. I bought a few things. He asked after you and I told him you had gone to the grave."

"Why didn't you ask him to wait for me?" Yueniang said.

"I told him to come again tomorrow." While they were talking, Ruyi'er came to them. "The baby has been asleep ever since we came in," she said, "and I can't get him to wake. His breath seems cold, but his body is as hot as fire."

Yueniang was frightened. She went to the bed and picked up the child. She kissed him and could feel a cold sweat on his body, though he seemed feverish.

"You wicked woman!" she said irritably to Ruyi'er. "He must have got cold in the chair."

"He could not," Ruyi'er said. "I had him well wrapped up in the bed-clothes."

"Well, perhaps when you took him to the grave he got a fright. I told you not to take him, but instead of listening to me you rushed off like a mad woman."

"Xiaoyu knows I had only had him there for a minute or two. How could he be frightened?"

"Don't argue," Yueniang cried. "Whether you had him there a short time or not, he is frightened now."

She called for Laian and sent him for old woman Liu. When the old woman came, she felt the baby's pulse and examined his body. "He has caught a chill," she said, "and would seem to have met an evil spirit." She gave them two red pills and asked them to give them to the child with ginger water. The nurse was told to put the baby to bed. During the night he began to sweat and his body became cooler. They gave the old woman some tea and three qian of silver and asked her to come the next day. The whole household was in a state of excitement. Some got up and some lay down, and they were running about half the night.

Next day, Laiwang came to the gate with his wares. Yesterday," he said to Laizhao, "Lady Xue'e bought something from me and told me to call today for the money. And I should like to see the Great Lady."

"Come another day," Laizhao said, "the young master is not well. They had to send for old woman Liu last night, and they were worried and busy all night. He is better today, but I don't think they will feel like seeing you."

As they were talking, Yueniang, Yulou and Xue'e came along with old woman Liu. Laiwang knelt down and kowtowed to Yueniang and Yulou.

"I haven't seen you for a long time," Yueniang said. "Why haven't you been to call on me?"

Laiwang told Yueniang of his adventures. "I felt shy about coming," he said.

"You are an old servant of ours," Yueniang said, "and your master is dead now. Your trouble was really due to that wicked woman Pan, who would carry fire to one place and water to another. Your good wife hanged herself and you were banished. But Heaven could not allow such a creature to live, and now she is dead too."

"I need not say anything, Mother," Laiwang said. "You understand so well."

When they had talked for a while, Yueniang asked what he had to sell. He showed her and she picked out ornaments to the value of three taels and two qian and paid him for them. Then she asked him to go to the second door, and told Xiaoyu to give him a pot of wine and some cakes. Xue'e went to the kitchen and herself gave him a large bowl of meat. When he had had a good meal, he kowtowed and prepared to go away. Yueniang and Yulou went to the inner court, but Xue'e stayed and talked to him.

"Come here as often as you like," she said to him. "There is nothing to fear. I will send you a message by Laizhao's wife. Tomorrow evening I will wait for you in the little room by the wall not far from this door." They exchanged glances, and Laiwang knew what the woman meant. He asked if the second door would be closed in the evening.

"Come to Laizhao's room," Xue'e said, "and, in the evening, take a ladder and climb over the wall. I will help you down on this side. I shall have something to tell you when we meet."

Laiwang was delighted. He said good-bye to Xue'e and took away his boxes.

The next day he did not bother to do any business. He came to Ximen's house and, when Laizhao came out, he bowed to him.

"I haven't seen you for a long time, Brother Laiwang," Laizhao said.

Laiwang smiled. "I would not have come except to ask Lady Xue'e for some money."

Laiwang took the man to his own rooms.

"Where is my sister-in-law?" Laiwang said.

"My wife is always in the kitchen during the day," Laizhao told him.

Laiwang gave him a tael of silver. "This is to buy a pot of wine for your wife and yourself."

"But a pot of wine doesn't cost so much as that," Laizhao said. He called his son, Little Iron Rod. The boy was now fifteen years old. He took a pot and went out to buy some wine. Then he went to the kitchen to see his mother.

Laizhao's wife came out with some hot rice and a large bowl of stew with two other dishes. "Oh, I see you are here, Brother Wang," she said.

Laizhao showed his wife the silver and said: "Our brother has given us this to buy some wine."

"I don't think we ought to take it," she said, smiling. "We have done nothing for you." She put a small table on the bed and asked Laiwang to sit down. Then she set out food and wine. Laiwang filled a cup and offered it to Laizhao, then he filled another and offered it to the woman.

"It is a very long time since we were last together," he said politely. "I fear this poor cup of wine is all I can offer you."

"I am not the sort of person who cares too much for wine and meat," Laizhao's wife said. "You are a friend, and you must tell me the truth. Yesterday, the lady told me that she and you still love one another. She has trusted my husband and myself to help you. There had better not be any pretence between us. As the proverb says: If a man wishes to find the track down the mountainside, he must ask a practiced guide. If you two meet here and you get anything out of it, don't keep everything for yourself, but let us have at least a taste of the gravy. We have to be responsible for you."

Laiwang knelt down. "Brother and Sister," he said, "if you help me, I will never forget." Then they had their meal. Laizhao's wife went to the inner court again and talked to Xue'e. Then she returned and told Laiwang to come to her rooms that evening. When the second door was closed and the people in the inner court had gone to bed, he would be able to get over the wall and join his beloved.

Laiwang went away. That night, he came again to Laizhao's rooms and bought wine for him and his wife. They drank until it was late, without anybody knowing that he was there. Then the gate was closed, the second door fastened, and everybody went to bed.

Xue'e and Laiwang had arranged a signal. When he heard a cough on the other side of the wall, he climbed up a ladder and got over the white wall in the dark. Xue'e had a bench waiting for him on the other side. They went to a small harness room near by. There they embraced and began to make love more earnestly. Neither had a mate, and their passion was ready to burst into flame. Laiwang's spear was hard and strong. They sported for a long time; then the moment of greatest happiness came to him, and he yielded to her.

Xue'e gave him some gold and silver ornaments, a few taels of silver, and two suits of clothes. "Come again tomorrow night," she said to him, "and I will have something more valuable for you. Take it and find a place for us to live. I know that this family can hardly prosper now. I will leave it, and we will get a house and marry. You are a silversmith and we shall not have to worry about a living."

"I have an aunt outside the East Gate," Laiwang said. "She is a famous midwife. Her place is out of the way, and I suggest that we go there. We will stay there a while until we know whether there is going to be trouble and, if not, I will take you to my native place. There I will buy a few acres of land, and we will work on that."

He climbed over the wall again and went back to Laizhao. There he stayed till dawn and slipped away as soon as the gate was opened.

The next evening he came again. He went as before to Laizhao's rooms, then over the wall, and they made merry again. So they went on for a long time. They stole a number of valuable things, gold, silver and clothes, and Laizhao and his wife had their share.

One day Yueniang was very depressed because the baby was ill again. She went to bed very early. Ximen Dajie's maid had been given to Xue'e, and Li Jiao'er's maid had been given to Ximen Dajie because Chen Jingji had wanted her. Today, Xue'e sent her maid to bed. She took a number of earrings, pins and ornaments and put them into a box. Then she covered her head with a kerchief. She had arranged with Laiwang that they should meet in Laizhao's place and run away.

"That is all very well," Laizhao said. "You can get away easily enough, but I am in charge of the gate, and how can I let you escape like a pair of wild ducks? The Great Lady is sure to find out, and what am I to say to her when she asks me about it? You had better get over the roof. Smash a few tiles, and then there will be something to show the way you went."

"That is a good idea, Brother," Laiwang said.

Xue'e gave Laizhao and his wife a silver cup, gold earrings, a black silk coat, and a yellow silk skirt. They waited until the fifth night watch, when it was very dark, and then climbed over to Laizhao's place. Laizhao heated two big cups of wine and gave one to each of them. "Drink this," he said. "It will strengthen you for what you are going to do."

At the fifth night watch, each of them took some incense, then they got a ladder and climbed out on to the roof. Step by step they climbed up, breaking a few tiles as they went. When they came to the other side, there seemed to be nobody about, no watchman in the street. Laiwang got down first, then helped Xue'e, who climbed down with her feet on his shoulders. When they came to the street a watchman stopped them and asked where they were going. Xue'e was alarmed, but Laiwang was cool enough. He held out the incense he had brought and said: "We are husband and wife going to offer incense at the temple outside the city. That is why we are up so early."

"What have you in those parcels? "the watchman asked them.

"Incense and paper money." Laiwang said.

"If you are husband and wife and are going to the temple, it is a good work and you may go," the watchman said.

At that, Laiwang took Xue'e's hand and they hurried off as fast as they could go. By the time they came to the city gate, it had just been opened. They went out, turned up one street and down another, and so came to the place where Laiwang's aunt lived. It was a very lonely place: there were only a few ramshackle houses. They came at last to the house of Midwife Qu. The door was shut, but they knocked and, after a while, the old woman, who had just got up, came and opened the door. There stood Laiwang with a woman.

Laiwang's real name was Zheng Wang. "This is my wife, whom I have lately married," he said. "Can you let us have a room? We should like to stay here for a few days while we look for a house."

He gave the old woman three taels of silver for expenses. When she saw the money, old woman Qu could not refuse to let them stay. But, one night, her son, Qu Dang, who had seen that Laiwang seemed to have a great deal of gold and silver, forced the door, stole the valuables, and went gambling. He was arrested and brought before the magistrate. The magistrate, Li, realized that the things must have been stolen and ordered runners to go with Qu Dang to the old woman's house. They arrested Laiwang and Xue'e. The woman was so frightened that her face became the color of wax. She put on plain clothes, covered her face with a veil, took off her rings, and gave them to the runners. Then they were taken before the magistrate, and people came to hear of the matter. Some recognized them and said: "Surely that is one of Ximen Qing's women. She has been carrying on with one of the servants, the fellow Laiwang, now called Zheng Wang. They stole some things and ran away. Then Qu Dang stole the stuff from them again and now they have to go before the magistrate."

One man told ten, and ten told a hundred, and so the news spread like wildfire.
When Xue'e had run away, her maid discovered that the most valuable ornaments had been taken away and that clothes were strewn about the floor. She went to tell Yueniang.
"You slept with her," Yueniang said, in astonishment: "how was it you didn't notice when she went away?"
"She said she wished to be alone," the maid said. "She went out quietly and then came back. I had no idea what she was doing."
Yueniang sent for Laizhao. "You are in charge of the gate," she said to him. "Why didn't you know that somebody was running away?"
"I have locked up the gate every night," Laizhao said. "She must've flown."
Then they discovered that some of the tiles were broken on the roof, and realized that Xue'e had escaped that way. They did not wish to send anybody to find out where she had gone, and made no fuss about the matter. In his court, the magistrate tried the case. First, he had Qu Dang beaten, and that young man gave up four gold ornaments, three of silver, a pair of gold rings, a silver cup, five taels of silver, two suits of clothes, a handkerchief, and a box. From Laiwang the magistrate took thirty taels of silver, a pair of gold pins, a gold figurine, and four rings. From Xue'e, he took a gold ornament, a pair of silver bracelets, five pairs of gold buttons, four pairs of silver pins, and some silver. From old woman Qu, he took three taels of silver. His verdict was that Laiwang had stolen these things and abducted a woman, and Qu Dang had stolen the stuff from him. The two men were sentenced to imprisonment for five years and the property confiscated. Xue'e and old woman Qu were beaten and the old woman confessed. The magistrate sent to Ximen's house to ask them to take Xue'e away. Yueniang sent for Uncle Wu and discussed the situation with him. They decided that, since everybody had heard about the matter, they would not take Xue'e back. She had disgraced the family and done injury to the reputation of her dead husband. So they gave something to the runners and asked them to get the magistrate to hand Xue'e over to the official go-between to sell. Chunmei heard that Xue'e had been carried off by Laiwang and all that had happened afterwards. She made up her mind to buy the woman and set her to work in her kitchen. Thus she would have her revenge. "This woman's a very good cook," she said to her husband. "She's clever at getting tea and meals ready and I think we might buy her."
Major Zhou sent Zhang Sheng and Li An to the magistrate with a card. When Li learned whom it was who wished to buy the woman, he asked for only 8 taels of silver.
The men paid the money and took Xue'e to Zhou's house. First, they presented her to the first and second ladies, then they took her to Chunmei. Chunmei was in her room, getting up from a gilded bed with silken curtains. The maids took in Xue'e. She recognized Chunmei, bowed her head, and kowtowed 4 times. Chunmei opened her eyes wide. Then she sent for the chief of the serving women. "Pull down this strumpet's hair," she cried, "and take off those clothes. Then let her serve in the kitchen, keeping up the fire, and cooking." Xue'e could only swallow her resentment. It has always been possible for one who begins by sweeping up the rice to become the governor of a granary. Xue'e realised her position. How she was standing beneath low eaves and must perforce bow her head. She took off her headdress and changed her clothes, and went to the kitchen sadly and bitterly.

114
Meng Yü-lou Is Happy to Marry Li Kung-pi; Li Kung-pi in a Fit of Rage, Beats Yü-tsan

Our hundred years of life pass by as though in flight;
Among them, the flowering seasons do not last for long.
When autumn congeals the white dew, the crickets cry;
At twilight during the late spring, the cuckoos weep.
Wealth, eminence, and luxury[1] are blights upon the body;
Renown and great achievements are specters in the eyes.
Spring dreams are phenomena created by humans themselves;
The retributions ordained by azure Heaven are not unjust.

One day, Ch'en Ching-chi heard from Auntie Hsüeh that Sun Hsüeh-o from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing had committed adultery with Lai-wang and absconded with him, along with a quantity of stolen property, to some place outside, but that their crimes had come to light, and she had been put up for sale by the district magistrate, and sold into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, where she was subjected to beating and abuse at the hands of Ch'un-mei both day and night.
Ch'en Ching-chi took advantage of this opportunity to send Auntie Hsüeh to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to say to Yüeh-niang, "I have heard 'wind-borne words' to the effect that Ch'en Ching-chi has openly announced that he no longer wants Hsi-men Ta-chieh as his wife; and that he has drafted formal complaints to submit to the grand coordinator and the regional inspector of the province asserting that Hsi-men Ch'ing, while still alive, had sequestered trunks of gold and silver and other valuables that his family had entrusted to him for safekeeping."
Yüeh-niang, first, because Sun Hsüeh-o had absconded with Lai-wang and made off with a quantity of valuables; second, because the servant Lai-an had run away; and third, because Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu had died, and her obsequies had only just been concluded, already felt herself to be overburdened with:
Seven of this and eight of that.
Consequently, when she heard what Auntie Hsüeh had to say, she was thrown into a state of panic and promptly hired a sedan chair in which to send Hsi-men Ta-chieh back to her husband. She also got together all the furniture, trunks, and other things that she had been provided with as her dowry and had Tai-an hire bearers to deliver them to Ch'en Ching-chi's place.
Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this by saying, "These are merely the things that she brought with her as her dowry. The trunkloads of valuables and gold and silver that my family entrusted to them must also be returned to me."
"Your mother-in-law," reported Auntie Hsüeh, "claims that when your father-in-law was still alive, he only took responsibility for accepting these articles from her dowry, and that she knows nothing of these other trunkloads that you refer to."
Ch'en Ching-chi also demanded that the maidservant Yüan-hsiao should be turned over to him.
When Auntie Hsüeh and Tai-an reported this to Yüeh-niang, she said, "I would prefer not to turn Yüan-hsiao over to him. This maidservant originally worked in Li Chiao-erh's quarters. Right now, I have nobody to look after Hsiao-ko, and I would like to keep her here for that purpose. I would be willing to let him have Chung-ch'iu, however, since she was originally purchased in order to serve Hsi-men Ta-chieh."
But Ch'en Ching-chi refused to accept Chung-ch'iu, and Auntie Hsüeh was obliged to go back and forth repeatedly to negotiate between the two households.
Ch'en Ching-chi's mother, née Chang, finally said to Tai-an, "Brother, when you return home please convey my respects to the First Lady, but since you have so many maidservants available in your household, how can she be so reluctant to relinquish this one on the grounds that she needs her to look after her child? Since she has been serving in Hsi-men Ta-chieh's quarters all this time, and her son-in-law has already deflowered her, how can she be so insistent on retaining her?"
When Tai-an went home and reported this to Yüeh-niang, she found herself:
At a loss for words,[2]
and felt compelled to deliver Yüan-hsiao to Ch'en Ching-chi.
Ch'en Ching-chi was delighted to receive her and remarked to himself, "So it turns out that, somehow or other, things have ended up going my way after all:
Though you may be as devious as any demon,
You'll drink the water I've washed my feet in."
Let us put this strand of our narrative aside for a moment and speak of something else.
To return to the story of District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i's son Li Kung-pi; ever since the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival on which he had caught sight of Wu Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou in front of the tavern in Apricot Blossom Village outside the city, when he had noticed that the two of them were similarly dressed and both good-looking, sent Trifler Chang to identify them, and thereby found out that they were womenfolk from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, he had fallen in love with Meng Yü-lou. He had observed that she had a tall and slender figure, and a face shaped like a melon seed, and though she had a few inconspicuous white pockmarks on her face, her demeanor was romantic and alluring.
It so happens that Li Kung-pi's wife had died, and he had been living the life of a widower for some time. He had engaged go-betweens to look for a suitable wife for him, but so far none of the prospects they came up with appealed to him. Now that he had encountered Meng Yü-lou, his heart was stirred, but:
There was no way he could gain access to her;
and he did not know whether she was prepared to remarry, or whether she would accept him or not. Unexpectedly, when Sun Hsüeh-o's case happened to come before the magistrate's court, and he learned that she had been a member of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, he exerted himself to see to it that the culprits were interrogated with the squeezers before his father's bench, and the stolen property duly retrieved, in the expectation that someone from the Hsi-men Ch'ing household would come to take possession of it. But Yüeh-niang was afraid and refused to send anyone to appear before the court, with the result that Li Kung-pi was disappointed, the stolen property was confiscated by the state, and Sun Hsüeh-o was put up for sale.
At this point, he consulted with his friend the clerk on the staff of the district yamen named Ho Pu-wei, and they decided to send Old Mother T'ao, the licensed go-between, to Hsi-men Ch'ing's place to see if a match could be arranged; promising her that if she succeeded in bringing it about, she would no longer be required to report for duty at the yamen and would be rewarded with five taels of silver.
Old Mother T'ao was delighted by this proposition and set out forthwith:
Running as fast as though she had wings, straight to the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence.
Lai-chao was standing there at the time and saw Old Mother T'ao come forward, greet him with a bow, and inquire, "Brother, is this the residence of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing?"
"Where have you come from?" asked Lai-chao. "This is the home of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing, but His Honor is deceased. What have you come for?"
"I would trouble you," said Old Mother T'ao, "to go inside and report my arrival. I am the officially licensed go-between of the district yamen, and my name is Old Mother T'ao. The young squire, the son of the district magistrate, has informed me that there is a lady in your household who wishes to be married, and I have come to respectfully propose a match between them."
"You old baggage!" Lai-chao shouted at her. "How unreasonable can you get? His Honor, the head of this household, has been dead for more than a year, and there are only two of his ladies left, who are both bent on preserving their widowhood, and are not about to marry anyone. As the saying goes:
Even to escape wild winds and violent rains,
One should not seek to enter a widow's door.[3]
How can a go-between like yourself:
As if you didn't know any better, barge in to propose such a match? You'd better get out of here. If the ladies in the rear compound find out about it, you're likely to get a good beating for your pains."
Old Mother T'ao merely laughed at this, saying, "Brother, as the saying goes:
Even if the order of an official or clerk is wrong,
The person deputed to carry it out is not to blame.[4]
If the young squire had not sent me on this mission, I would hardly have ventured to come on my own initiative. No matter whether she is willing to remarry or not, I would trouble you to go inside and convey the proposal so that I can report back on my mission."
"So be it," responded Lai-chao.
"To do someone else a favor,
Is to do a favor to oneself.[5]
If you will wait a little while, I will go inside and convey your message. Of the two ladies of the household, one of them has a son, and the other does not. Which of the two ladies do you think might be willing to remarry?"
Old Mother T'ao responded, "The young squire from the district yamen said that he had seen her out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival, and that it was the lady with a few white pockmarks on her face."
When Lai-chao heard this, he went back to the rear compound and reported, thus and so, to Yüeh-niang, saying, "The district yamen has sent an official go-between to come here, and she is waiting outside."
This caught Yüeh-niang by surprise, and she exclaimed, "Not even half a word of what goes on here in our household is ever leaked abroad. How could anyone outside know anything about it?"
"The young squire from the district yamen," responded Lai-chao, "caught sight of the lady in question out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival. He says that the lady in question is the one with a few white pockmarks on her face."
"It must be Sister Meng the Third that he's referring to," said Yüeh-niang. "It would seem that:
Even during the twelfth month the frozen heart of the turnip is capable of being moved.[6]
All of a sudden, she wants to better her condition by marrying someone, does she? Truly:
In this world even the depth of the ocean may be gauged;
It is the human heart alone that is difficult to measure."[7]
So saying, she went into Meng Yü-lou's quarters, where she sat down and said, "Sister Meng the Third, there is something I would like to ask you about. There is a go-between out front, who says that the young squire from the district yamen claims that he saw you on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival, and that you would like to better your condition by getting married. Is there any truth to this?"
Gentle reader take note: On that occasion:
Without coincidences there would be no stories.
It has always been true that:
A marriage affinity connects people by a single thread.
On that day, out in the suburbs, when Meng Yü-lou observed that the young squire possessed a handsome demeanor, was:
As romantic and dashing as can be,
and that the two of them were about the same age, as well as the fact that he was adept at horsemanship and archery:
Their mutual feelings were visible in their four eyes,[8]
There was no longer any need to express them in words.
The only problem was that she did not know whether he already had a wife or not.
From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she figured to herself,
"My husband is already dead, and I have not borne a child of my own. Although the First Lady has a son, when he grows up in the days to come, since:
Everyone cares the most for his own flesh and blood, he is sure to cling to his own mother, and I will face the fact that:
The fallen tree no longer provides shade, and that I will be obliged to:
Try to dip up water with a bamboo basket.
I have also observed that since Yüeh-niang gave birth to Hsiao-ko, her disposition has changed, and she does not care for me as much as she used to. I might as well take a step forward on my own, and seek a refuge where:
The fallen leaves can return to the root.
Why should I insist on foolishly preserving my widowhood here, only to end up:
Squandering the springtime season of my youth,

And forgoing the pleasures of my early years?"
She had just been engaged in pondering this question when Yüeh-niang unexpectedly came in and spoke to her about it. Thus it turned out to be the very gentleman that she had been attracted to out in the suburbs on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival that was expressing an interest in her.
She was both delighted and embarrassed by this development, but although she responded by saying, "First Lady, don't believe any such nonsense, I never expressed such a wish," the blood flew to her cheeks.
Truly:
Suppressing her embarrassment, she is disinclined to open her mouth in public,
Tidying the hair over her temples, without a word,
she only adjusts her tresses.
"This is the sort of question it is up to the individual to decide," said Yüeh-niang. "I can't be bothered by such things."
So saying, she called in Lai-chao and told him, "You go out and invite that go-between to come inside."
Lai-chao, accordingly, went out to the front gate and called for Old Mother T'ao to follow him back to the rear compound into the parlor in Yüeh-niang's quarters, where Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet was displayed in the position of honor at the head of the room. When Old Mother T'ao had finished exchanging the customary amenities with her host, she sat down, and the young maidservant Hsiu-ch'un poured her a serving of tea.
When she had finished her tea, Yüeh-niang asked, "Go-between, what brings you here?"
Old Mother T'ao responded by saying, "As for me:
If I did not have a reason to do so, I would not visit the Hall of the Three Treasures.[9]
I have come at the behest of the son of the district magistrate, who asked me to respectfully report that there is a lady in your household who wishes to be married, and to propose a match with her."
"Even if there were a lady in the household who wished to be married," responded Yüeh-niang, "no word of this has been noised abroad, so how did the young squire find out about it?"
"The young squire told me," reported Old Mother T'ao, "that on the day of the Ch'ing-ming Festival, out in the suburbs, he had observed the lady in question with his own eyes, and seen that she had a tall and slender figure, and a face shaped like a melon seed, and that there were a few inconspicuous white pockmarks on her face. That is the lady he is interested in."
When Yüeh-niang heard this, needless to say, she realized that he was referring to Meng Yü-lou.
Thereupon, she ushered Old Mother T'ao over to Meng Yü-lou's quarters, where they sat down in the parlor, and waited for some time before Meng Yü-lou, after performing her ablutions and putting on her makeup, came out to receive them.
Old Mother T'ao greeted her with a bow and said, "So this is the lady in question. Sure enough:
The story is not untrue.
Her caliber is outstanding,[10]
Without peer in this world.
She is clearly fit to be the legitimate wife of the young squire. Just look:
If scanned from top to bottom,
Her glamour is incomparable;
If surveyed from head to foot,
Her glamour runs downward apace."
Meng Yü-lou laughed at this and said, "Mother, don't talk such nonsense. Just tell us the present age of the young squire, whether he is married or not, whether he has any concubines at his disposal, what his name is, the location of his native place, and whether he holds any official position or not. Be sure to tell us only the truth, without lying about anything."
"My Heavens," protested Old Mother T'ao, "I am the go-between officially appointed by the district magistrate and am not given to lying like the others may do.
If I've got a sentence,
I'll say that sentence, without any falsification. His Honor the district magistrate is more than fifty years old, and the young squire in question is his only offspring. He was born on the twenty-third day of the first month at eight o'clock in the morning during the year of the horse, so this year he is thirty years old. He is currently enrolled in the Superior College of the National University and is destined soon to become a provincial graduate or a holder of the chin-shih degree. He not only:
Commands a bellyful of literature,[11]
but is also:
Adept at archery and horsemanship.[12]
As for the works of the hundred schools, there is little that he has not mastered. His wife died some two years ago, so all he has at his disposal now is a maidservant who entered his household as part of his wife's dowry and doesn't amount to anything. That is why he is looking for a wife to take charge of his household but has not so far found one of:
Appropriate social and economic standing.[13]
That is why I have respectfully come here to propose a match on his behalf. I have been promised that if the marriage is successfully arranged, I will no longer be required to report for duty at the district yamen and will receive a substantial reward to boot. If the mistress of your household agrees to this match, His Honor has also promised that in the future the household will be relieved of any requirements for corvée labor, or land taxes on your family graveyard; and that if anyone should try to take advantage of you, all you need do is report it, and he will have the culprit arrested and subjected to punishment before the bench."
Meng Yü-lou responded by asking, "Does the young squire have any male or female children, and where is his native place? I fear that when his father's term of office expires, I may be made to traverse:
A thousand mountains and a myriad streams.
My relatives are all here, but I would probably have to leave them behind in order to accompany him."
"The young squire has fathered no male or female children," responded Old Mother T'ao. "He is quite companionless. He is a native of Tsao-ch'iang district in Chen-ting prefecture in the vicinity of the Northern Capital, which is no more than six or seven hundred li north of the Yellow River. The wealth of his household is such that:
The paths run crisscross between the fields,
The mules and horses compose teeming herds,
And the male dependents are without number.
The memorial arches spanning the horse path, bear placards inscribed by the grand coordinator and the regional investigating censor, with an inscription by the Emperor himself standing above them all. It is all:
Resplendent enough to impress anyone.
Now if he should succeed in taking you into his household as his legitimate wife, and go on to obtain an appointment as an official in the future, you would then be entitled to receive a patent of nobility inscribed on patterned damask, to ride in a carriage embellished with seven aromatic spices, and to be addressed by the honorific title of lady. Is that not an appealing prospect?"
Meng Yü-lou was so impressed by this single speech of Old Mother T'ao's that she expressed herself to be:
Willing a thousand times if not ten thousand times.
She then summoned her maidservant Lan-hsiang and had her set up a table and provide tea and snacks for the go-between, saying. "Please don't take offense at the fact that I have insisted on asking so many questions, but the number of you go-betweens who resort to telling falsehoods is extremely great. You start out by eloquently describing things as if:
A flurry of flowers were descending from Heaven,[14]
Or golden lotuses were bursting from the ground;[15] but when they are concluded, they don't amount to anything at all. I have, myself, had the experience of being grievously deceived."
"My good lady," protested Old Mother T'ao, "you must evaluate each case individually.
The clear is ever clear,
The turbid ever turbid.
The reputation of the good is often damaged by the bad. I do not purvey falsehoods but try my best as a matchmaker to bring about good matches for people. If you agree to accept the proposal, give me a card stating the year, month, day, and hour of your birth, so I can report back to the young squire with it."
Meng Yü-lou, accordingly, got out a piece of scarlet silk and had Tai-an take it out to Manager Fu Ming in the shop upfront so he could inscribe it with the eight characters that determined her horoscope.
Wu Yüeh-niang then said to her, "Originally, it was Auntie Hsüeh who arranged your marriage into the household. At present, it would be appropriate to send a page boy to summon Auntie Hsüeh, so the two go-betweens can proceed together to deliver the card with your vital statistics, and arrange the match between you."
Shortly thereafter, they sent Tai-an to summon Auntie Hsüeh, and when she saw Old Mother T'ao, she greeted her with a bow, in the way that:
Fellow professionals acknowledge each other;
and the two of them set out together with the card in hand, going out the gate of Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence and heading for the district yamen in order to report back to the young squire.
One of them was the matchmaker from this side;
The other was the go-between from that side.
With their two mouths, they had a total of forty-eight teeth between them.
On this mission, they could be counted on to boast that:
The Goddess in the Moon, Ch'ang-o,[16]
is looking for a mate;
The Goddess of Witch's Mountain[17] is wedding King Hsiang.[18]
As they went their way, Old Mother T'ao asked Auntie Hsüeh, "So you were the original go-between for this lady, were you?"
"That's right, I was," replied Auntie Hsüeh.
"Originally," asked Old Mother T'ao, "what family was she a daughter of, and was this marriage that you arranged for her a second marriage?"
Auntie Hsüeh responded by giving her a full account, word for word, of how Hsi-men Ch'ing had originally married her as a widow from the Yang family.
Old Mother T'ao, on noticing that the card with the eight characters that determined her horoscope stated that she was a thirty-six-year-old woman who was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, said, "I fear that the young squire may consider her to be too old for him. What are we to do about that? He is only thirty years old at present, so she is six years older than he is."
"Let's take this card," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "and show it to a fortune-teller along the way, so he can calculate whether her horoscope presents any obstacles or not. If there are any problems with it, we would not be overstepping the bounds if we were to make her out to be a few years younger than she is."
As they continued on their way, they did not encounter any itinerant fortune-tellers sounding their clappers in the street, but in the distance, on the south side of the road, they saw a fortune-telling booth of blue cotton fabric, on which there were displayed two columns of large characters that read:
Tzu-p'ing[19] will predict your fate,
be it noble or base;
The iron brush will determine your success or failure.
Whoever should come to have their fortunes foretold;
Will be dealt the truth without any prevarication.
Within the booth a table had been set up, behind which there sat a practitioner who was:
Adept at calligraphy and quick at calculation, named Master Ling. The two go-betweens approached him and bowed in greeting, at which he asked them to be seated.
Auntie Hsüeh addressed him, saying, "We would trouble you, sir, to calculate the fortune of a certain woman for us."
She then reached into her sleeve and pulled out three coins in lieu of a fee, saying, "Pray don't disdain this meager sum, but deign to accept it for the time being. We happened to be passing by and did not have any more money with us."
"If this relates to a marriage proposal," said Master Ling, "tell me the eight characters that designate the horoscope of the person in question."
Old Mother T'ao then handed him the card with this information on it, so he could evaluate her age and the eight characters of her horoscope.
Master Ling said, "So this does concern a marriage proposal."
He then:
Calculated on the joints of his fingers, gave his abacus a shake, and proceeded to pronounce, "The horoscope for this woman indicates that she is thirty-six-years-old at the present time, and that she was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month; that is to say, in a chia-tzu year, in a ping-tzu month,[20] on a hsin-mao day, during the keng-tzu hour, which calls for the analysis of the horoscopic category 'seal ribbon.'[21] Working backwards, as one does with female horoscopes, she is now in the 'decennial period of fate' designated by the combination ping-shen. When the stems ping and hsin occur in the same horoscope, it indicates that in the future she is sure to hold a position of authority and enjoy the prestige of a principal wife. In the 'four pillars' of her horoscope the 'husband star' occurs more than once. Although this prosperous portent indicates that she is fated to benefit her husband, gain wealth, and enjoy her husband's favor, eventually she is sure to suffer some adversities. Has she met with any such setbacks, or not?"

"She has already lost two husbands," responded Auntie Hsüeh.
"If that is so," continued Master Ling, "in the future she will find a husband who was born in the year of the horse."
"Will she bear any sons in the future?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.
"Her horoscope indicates," said Master Ling, "that it will not be until she is forty-years-old that she will bear an only son to support her in her old age. She will be blessed with good fortune for the rest of her life, and enjoy incomparable wealth and honor, glory and luxury."
Taking up a brush, he then proceeded to compose a poem of eight lines about her future prospects, which read as follows:
The time when flowers and fruits have bloomed and been harvested is noteworthy;
She is delighted to marry a husband with the prospect of attaining high office.
Her seductive appearance has lost nothing of the loveliness of the river plum;
She will doff her bridal veil thrice and let two husbands paint her eyebrows.[22]
Holding each other's hands, they will embark along the way to the jade palace;
Hiding her bashfulness, she will undertake to proffer the golden wedding goblet.
Looking forward to the day when the horse's head will ascend into the heavens;
She will consent to abandon the tiger's skin
so she can opt for something better.
Auntie Hsüeh questioned him, saying, "Sir, what is the meaning of the two lines:
Looking forward to the day when the horse's head will ascend into the heavens;
She will consent to abandon the tiger's skin
so she can opt for something better?
We don't understand their significance. Pray be good enough to explain them to us."
"As for the horse's head," said Master Ling, "the lady in question is about to marry a husband who was born in the year of the horse, which is an auspicious star in her horoscope, indicating that she is fated to:
Enjoy a life of glory and luxury.[23]
The tiger's skin refers to her deceased husband who was born in the year of the tiger. Although he did care for her, she was only a concubine in his household. In the future, her husband will have a successful career, and she will live to the age of sixty-seven, with a son to look after her, before her life comes to an end.
Husband and wife will grow old together."[24]
The two go-betweens, upon receiving this statement of her prospects, went on to say, "It is true that the man she hopes to marry was born in the year of the horse, but we fear that the match may be rejected on the grounds that she is too old for him. It would look better if you could alter the horoscope to make her two years younger than she is."
"If you want to change it," Master Ling responded, "I'll alter the year of her birth from chia-tzu to ting-mao, which would make her out to be thirty-three years old."[25]
Auntie Hsüeh went on to ask, "Will this alteration of her horoscope accord with that of someone born in the year of the horse, or not?"
Master Ling responded, "The stem ting is associated with the element fire, and the stem keng is associated with the element metal. When fire is employed to smelt metal a superior vessel may be produced. It should be propitious."
Thereupon, he altered the horoscope to make her thirty-three years old, and the two go-betweens took their leave, exited the fortune-telling booth, and headed straight for the district yamen.
The young squire was sitting inside at the time, and the gate-keeper went in to announce their arrival. After a time, the two go-betweens were summoned before him, knelt down on the ground, and kowtowed.
"Where does that other woman come from?" the young squire inquired.
"She is the go-between who negotiated her former marriage," replied Old Mother T'ao.
She then proceeded to recount the progress they had made, saying. "The lady in question is a person of incomparable caliber, but she is a little older than you are, and I did not have the presumption to act on my own. In order to let Your Honor decide, I have acquired a card with her horoscope for your perusal."
So saying, she handed the card to him.
When the young squire, Li Kung-pi, saw that it stated that she was thirty-three years old and was born at 12:00 A.M. on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, he said, "It doesn't matter if she is two or three years older than I am."
"Your Honor is an experienced observer," interjected Auntie Hsüeh. "It has always been true that:
When the wife is two years older,
Yellow gold never molders;
When the wife is three years older,
Yellow gold piles up like boulders.
As for this lady:
Her caliber is outstanding.
She is:
Good-natured and agreeable in disposition;
and as for her familiarity with the works of the hundred schools, and the ability to take charge of a household:
That naturally goes without saying."[26]
"If she's as good as all that," the young squire responded, "and I've already had a chance to look her over, there's no need to arrange a formal viewing. We can have the yin-yang master select a propitious day and hour for the wedding, and go to her place to perform the tea-presentation ceremony."[27]
The two go-betweens asked, "When shall we come back to receive your instructions?"
"There is no reason to delay," the young squire replied. "The two of you can come back to check with me tomorrow, and then return to her place to settle matters."
He then instructed his attendants, saying, "Give each of them a tael of silver as a reward for their efforts."
The two go-betweens were pleased at this and went happily on their way. But no more of this.
When the young squire, Li Kung-pi, realized that the match was going to take place, he was so delighted he could scarcely contain himself and called in his friend on the yamen staff, Ho Pu-wei, to consult about it. He informed his father, District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, of his intentions and sent for the yin-yang master, who selected the eighth day of the fourth month for the betrothal ceremony, and the fifteenth day of the month as a propitious day and hour for him to bring the bride over his threshold. He then weighed out a quantity of silver and commissioned Ho Pu-wei and Trifler Chang to purchase the tea, auspicious red ornaments, wine, and other gifts for the occasion, but there is no need to describe this in detail.
The next day, the two go-betweens, after ascertaining the proposed dates, went to Hsi-men Ch'ing's household to report back to Wu Yüeh-niang and Meng Yü-lou on their mission. Truly:
Marriage affinities are determined in one's former life;[28]
During which jade has been planted in the Indigo Field.[29]
On the eighth day of the fourth month, in the district yamen, on the young squire's behalf, there were prepared sixteen trays of preserved fruit, tea and pastries, a headdress of gold filigree, a set of gold head ornaments, a girdle with an agate buckle and seven tinkling pendants, gold and silver bracelets and bangles, and the like. In addition, there were two robes of palace-style crimson brocade, four outfits of figured clothing, and thirty taels of silver as a bride-price. What with all the muslin, cotton, and silk fabrics, there were more than twenty loads of gifts. The two go-betweens accompanied them, and Ho Pu-wei from the yamen staff took charge of the procession, as they made their way to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence and performed the ceremony of presenting the betrothal gifts.
On the fifteenth, the district yamen dispatched a bunch of couriers and idlers who had been hired for the purpose to carry Meng Yü-lou's beds and curtains along with the trunks in which her trousseau was packed. Yüeh-niang looked on and directed them to remove all the furnishings from her quarters. Originally, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was still alive, he had taken one of the gilt lacquer beds with retractable steps that had been part of Meng Yü-lou's dowry and given it to Hsi-men Ta-chieh as part of her trousseau. Yüeh-niang now took the bedstead of inlaid mother-of-pearl from P'an Chin-lien's quarters and turned it over to her to make up for it. Meng Yü-lou proposed to take her maidservant Lan-hsiang with her, while leaving Hsiao-luan behind to assist Yüeh-niang in looking after Hsiao-ko.
Yüeh-niang objected to this, however, saying, "How could I be justified in retaining one of the maidservants from your quarters? After all, Hsiao-ko already has Chung-ch'iu, Hsiu-ch'un, and the wet nurse to take care of him, which is more than enough."
Meng Yü-lou merely chose to leave behind a pair of silver flasks of Mohammedan manufacture for Hsiao-ko to play with, and to serve as a keepsake, while taking all the rest of her belongings with her.
That evening, the district yamen dispatched a large sedan chair borne by four bearers and four pairs of red silk lanterns encased in networks of steel wires, accompanied by eight lictors, to come fetch Meng Yü-lou. She was wearing a gilt-ridged cap:
Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, along with pearl earrings, her body was clad in a scarlet full-sleeved robe, fastened at the waist by a girdle with an agate buckle in a gold setting and seven tinkling pendants, over a willow-yellow skirt sprigged with flowers. She first performed a farewell obeisance before Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet and then kowtowed to Yüeh-niang.
"Third Sister Meng," said Yüeh-niang, "you are cruel. Once you have gone, I will be left alone, all by myself, with no one to keep me company."
The two of them held hands and wept together for a while, after which, the members of the household, both high and low, accompanied her to the front gate, where she donned her bridal veil of gold-flaked red gauze with the help of the two go-betweens and took the golden "precious vase" [30] in her arms. Since Yüeh-niang was preserving her widowhood, she did not feel that she should venture abroad but invited Meng Yü-lou's elder sister, the wife of Han Ming-ch'uan, to escort her to the district yamen, riding in a large sedan chair, wearing a gown of figured scarlet material, over a kingfisher-blue skirt, while:
Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets.
The people along the street remarked to each other, "This is the Third Lady of the official Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, who is marrying the son of His Honor the district magistrate. Since this is a propitious day and hour for the wedding, she is on her way to be carried over his threshold."
There were some who had favorable things to say about it,
As well as those who had critical things to say about it.
Those who had favorable comments to make said, "Originally, His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing had a position in society to maintain, and now that he is dead, his First Lady is the only one of the women in his household who is determined to preserve her widowhood, which is truly admirable. She has given birth to a son, and her household is no longer able to support such a large number of people, so she has allowed the others to go their own way, which is an appropriate attitude to take."
Those who had critical comments to make, when:
Gossiping in the streets and discoursing in the alleys, pointedly remarked, "This is the third concubine from the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing who is now about to remarry. Originally, while that rascal was still alive, he was:
Defiant of both Heaven and principle,[31]
Covetous of wealth and given to lust, and guilty of seducing other peoples' wives, and now that he is dead, the women in his household are absconding with his property.
Some are marrying other people,
Some are plundering his wealth,
Some are taking furtive lovers,
Some are resorting to thievery.
The feathers of the pheasant are being plucked one by one.
As the saying goes:
Retribution may take place as much as thirty years hence;
But here, retribution is taking place before our very eyes."
The people on the sidelines all expressed their uninhibited views along these lines.
When Meng Yü-lou's elder sister had escorted the bride to the district yamen and seen that the beds and curtains and so forth in her trousseau were properly displayed, she remained there to enjoy the wedding feast before returning home. The bridegroom Li Kung-pi then summoned Auntie Hsüeh and Old Mother T'ao before him and rewarded each of them with five taels of silver and a length of festive red silk, before sending them on their way. That night the bride and groom consummated their marriage:
Emulating the pleasures of fish in the water, and Exhausting the felicities of connubial bliss.
The next day, Wu Yüeh-niang sent the ritually prescribed gifts of tea and food to celebrate the consummation of the marriage. Aunt Yang was already dead, but Meng the Elder's wife, Meng the Second's wife, and Meng Yü-lou's elder sister also sent ritual gifts of tea to the district yamen. Li Kung-pi, for his part, sent replies to his newly acquired female relatives, inviting them all to come and participate in the "third-day celebrations," including the erection of a tower of variegated bunting in the shape of a mountain, and a feast where they were to be entertained by musicians and singing girls from the licensed quarter, who would greet them with martial music, and perform pieces from the southern-style plays known as hsi-wen.
On that day, Wu Yüeh-niang went to the district yamen in a large sedan chair to participate in the "third-day celebrations" and attend the feast.
Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, while her body was clad in a scarlet full-sleeved robe, a flower-sprigged skirt, and a gilded girdle. As she was drinking wine in the rear hall, the district magistrate's wife came out to keep her company.
On Yüeh-niang's return home after this event, she remembered the way the company had enjoyed themselves:
Amid clustering blossoms and clinging brocade;

whereas, when she arrived home, the courtyard in the rear compound was deserted, and there was no one to welcome her. This reminded her of how she and her sister wives had enjoyed things together in former days, when Hsi-men Ch'ing was still alive. In those days, when she came home from a social engagement, they would all come out to welcome her, and even a long bench would prove insufficient to seat them all; whereas now, there was nobody there. Happening to bump into Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, she was overcome with grief before she knew it and started to weep out loud. Only after she had wept for some time did her maidservant Hsiao-yü succeed in persuading her to stop and dry her eyes. Truly:

The innermost feelings of one's life[32] are known to no one else;[33]
Only the bright moon shining through the window discerns them.[34]

We will say no more, for the moment, about Yüeh-niang's grief.

To resume our story, Li Kung-pi and Meng Yü-lou, being:

A woman of beauty and a man of talent,
enjoyed each other:
Like fish sporting in the water.
They fit together as closely as the lid on a lamp-oil jar.[35]

Every day, he:

Enjoyed himself with his new wife, remaining with her in the nuptial chamber, and:
Not straying a step from her side.[36]

When he contemplated Meng Yü-lou's face, it seemed to him that:

Such a vision is not exhaustible;
Such a view exceeds comprehension.

The more he gazed at her the more he was enamored by her. He also appreciated the fact that she had brought with her as part of her dowry two maidservants, one of whom, Lan-hsiang, was seventeen years old and could play musical instruments and sing, while the other, Hsiao-luan, was fourteen years old, and beautiful as well. He was:

Delighted in his heart,

by this to such an extent that he scarcely knew what to do with himself. There is a poem that testifies to this:

How praiseworthy are this woman of beauty and this man of talent;
Heaven has devised this marriage affinity[37]
as propriety dictates.
Amid the twelve peaks of Witch's Mountain[38] clouds and rain mingle;[39]
Their mutual feelings will surely sustain a lifetime of bliss.[40]

It so happens that Li Kung-pi's deceased wife had left him with a senior maidservant, about thirty years of age, named Yü-tsan, who was given to:

Putting on makeup and applying powder, and was a past master at mischief making. She did up her hair in two curled knots on either side of her head but covered it with a kerchief, held in place with a gold lamé headband so that it looked like a gentlewoman's fret, and studded it with brass pins and waxen ornaments that looked like fallen leaves and withered flowers. Her ears were adorned with a pair of muskmelon-shaped pendants. Her body was clad in a skirt and jacket of an off-shade of green and a strange shade of red that revealed glimpses of her undergarments in front and her posterior behind, so that she appeared to others like nothing so much as a rat dressed in lotus leaves. On her feet she wore a pair of cut-velvet moccasins that were:

Oil-stained inside and out,
Mortifying even to Liu Hai,[41]
Resembling a pair of boats,
Manifesting four apertures, and as much as a foot and two inches in length. She smeared her face with lead powder so that it displayed:

A spot of white on the east,
A blotch of red on the west, looking for all the world like the surface of a fresh winter melon. In front of people, she gave vent to:

Simpleminded and officious foolishness,
Putting on airs and assuming attitudes.

Before the young squire took Meng Yü-lou into the household as his wife, she devoted herself every day to boiling his soup and cooking his rice, waiting upon him assiduously.

Though not spoken to, she forced herself to speak,
Though not smiled at, she forced herself to smile;

exhibiting a wealth of feeling. But after he married Meng Yü-lou, and she observed that he slept with her every night, that he was so close to her that they were:

Like glue and like lacquer, and that he no longer paid any attention to her, this maidservant began to give vent to fits of anger.

One day, when the young squire was in his study reading a book, this Yü-tsan prepared a cup of fine tea, flavored with fruit kernels, brought it to his study on a tray which she held with two hands, and smiled ingratiatingly as she lifted aside the portiere and took it inside to present to him. Who could have anticipated that the young squire, after reading his book for a while, had lain his head down on his desk and fallen asleep.

"Father," Yü-tsan called out to him, "who else is as fond of you as I am? I have taken the trouble to prepare this cup of fine tea for you, while that new wife of yours is still fast asleep under her bedclothes. Why has she not bothered to get one of her maidservants to bring you a cup of tea?"

On seeing that the young squire was taking a nap, she went up to him and called out again, but he did not respond, whereupon she exclaimed, "You old beggar! You labored so hard on your nocturnal business last night that you wore yourself out, did you? And now, you are dozing and nodding off in broad daylight. You had better get up and drink your tea."

She managed to wake him up, and when he saw who it was, he blurted out at her, "You crazy uncouth slave! Put the tea down, and get out of here."

Yü-tsan's face turned red with humiliation, and she dumped the tea down on the desk in a fit of pique and left the room, saying,

"You wouldn't know a favor if you saw one.

I went out of my way with the best of intentions to bring you a cup of tea early in the morning, only to be railed at this way. As the saying goes:

An ugly woman is a jewel in the household,[42]
A lovable one is only a source of trouble.

If I am so ugly, you must have been blind from the beginning, since no one had to persuade you to take me on. That better-looking one is hardly worth as much as my juicy cunt."

When the young squire heard this, he caught up with her and kicked her twice, as hard as he could, with his leather boot.

On leaving his presence, Yü-tsan put on a long face, as high as the rafters. From that time on, she no longer applied makeup to her face, and no longer boiled tea or prepared meals. She refused to address Meng Yü-lou as mistress but insisted on employing the pronouns you and I with her. When no one else was around, she would park her posterior on Meng Yü-lou's bed just as if it were her own, but Meng Yü-lou simply ignored her.

She also endeavored, behind Meng Yü-lou's back, to establish her superiority over Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, saying to them, "You should not address me as sister, but as aunt, since I and your mistress are of roughly equal status in the household."

She also went on to admonish them, "But only address me that way in private, and not in front of your master. You must do as I tell you every day, and perform your tasks conscientiously. If you refuse to obey my instructions, I'll put you to work with the coal shovel."

Later on, after she felt that the young squire had pointedly ignored her several times, she began to get lazy, sleeping until the sun was high in the sky before getting up, and refusing to prepare meals or sweep the floor.

Meng Yü-lou, consequently, instructed Lan-hsiang and Hsiao-luan, saying, "You had better not depend on Yü-tsan any longer. The two of you should go to the kitchen yourselves to prepare the meals and serve them to the master."

This only had the effect of angering Yü-tsan further, and she proceeded to:

Lose her temper and become abusive,
Throwing plates and saucers around.

She would go into the kitchen and strike Hsiao-luan and curse Lan-hsiang, saying, "You lousy little slave, and you little whore:

Even when using the pestle and millstone to hull grain and grind it,
One must come first and then the other.[43]

Was it your mistress who came first, or was it me? Since the three of you have usurped my place, I don't feel like exerting myself any longer. Formerly, that mistress of mine who has passed away never had the discourtesy to address me by my given name as Yü-tsan; but within a few days after the three of you moved in, you have taken to addressing me by my real name. Do you take me to be no more than a servant of yours, or what? Before the lot of you moved in, Father and I enjoyed the pleasure of:

Sharing the same bed and a single pillow; and there was seldom a day when we did not sleep until breakfast time before getting up. The two of us were so fond of each other, we were:

Like sugar mixed with honey;[44]
Like honey stirred with butter.

And there was scarcely anything in the household that did not pass through my hands. But ever since you arrived, you have:

Appropriated my honey jar,
And smashed it to pieces.

As a result, my marriage affinity has been forcibly disrupted, and I have been relegated to sleeping in the parlor on a cold bench, as though I were in a public shelter, and am no longer able to get so much as a taste of that thingamajig of my master's. I have no way of expressing the resentment this has caused me. Originally, when you were in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, you were merely his third concubine and were known by your personal name as Yü-lou, as if I didn't know all about it. Now that you're here:

You know it and I know it, and it would be better for everyone if you were to slack off a bit, instead of behaving officiously, putting on meretricious airs, or:

Summoning this one and calling for that.
Since when was I bought by you, and thus subject to your control?"

She did not realize it, but Meng Yü-lou in her room overheard this tirade and nearly fainted with anger, her face changing color and her hands trembling, but she did not venture to protest, or to tell the young squire about it.

One day, when the weather was hot, it turned out to be one of those occasions on which:

Something is destined to happen.

In the evening, the young squire proposed to have Yü-tsan heat some water in the kitchen and bring a bathtub into the bedroom so he could bathe with Meng Yü-lou.

"Have Lan-hsiang heat the water for us," objected Meng Yü-lou. "Don't have her do it."

But the young squire refused to agree to this, saying, "I am making a point of having her do it because I don't want to pamper that slave any further."

When Yü-tsan saw that the young squire wanted the water so he and his wife could:

Bathe together in the orchid-scented bath,
Emulate the pleasures of fish in the water, and Exhaust the felicities of connubial bliss, she was not in the best of moods.

Carrying the bathtub into the bedroom, she plumped it down on the floor and then went back to heat a large cauldron of boiling water, while muttering to herself, "Whoever saw the likes of this wanton whore? What with her impulsive capriciousness she is always imposing on me. Though it's only that wantonly juicy cunt of hers, she never lets three days go by without requiring water to bathe it with. When I used to sleep with the master, I would let months go by without exposing mine to so much as a drop of water and never felt that my Buddha's eye had been contaminated; whereas this whore has imposed on me two or three times already."

This tirade of hers commenced while she was leaving the room, and Meng Yü-lou overheard it but did not respond. When the young squire heard it, however, he became enraged. Without finishing his bath, while still stark naked, he slipped on his sandals, picked up a stick from the head of the bed, and headed after her.

Meng Yü-lou tried to stop him, saying, "Let her curse away. While you're enraged this way, I fear that while your body is all hot, if you expose yourself to the breeze, you may come down with a chill. It's hardly worth the risk."

The young squire would not be appeased, however, and said, "Don't you interfere. This slave is guilty of gross impropriety."

So saying, he went forward, grabbed her by the hair with one hand, pulled her over onto the floor, lifted up his stick, and unleashed a series of blows that fell on her like rain. Despite the fact that Meng Yü-lou tried to restrain him from the sidelines, he delivered twenty or thirty strokes to her body, which threw the maidservant into a panic.

Getting to her knees, she appealed to him, saying, "Father, don't beat me any more. I have something to say to you."

The young squire castigated her, saying, "You lousy slave! Go ahead and say it then."

There is a song to the tune "Sheep on the Mountain Slope" that testifies to this:

Father, suppress your rage and abate your anger.[45]
Listen attentively to what I have to say to you.

Originally, you spent eight taels of silver as a bride-price for me;
Acquiring me so that I could take charge of your household,
And deal with its sesame oil, salt, soy sauce, and vinegar.
Every serving of food or tea
that you consumed,
Was prepared and cleaned up by me.
After my mistress passed away,
You promoted me to the position of a stand-in for her.
The two of us came to share the same coverlet and the same bed,
And had wonderful times together.
It was only because you put me in charge that I consented to do this.
How could I know that you would deceive me, saying you would not remarry;
Only to come up, today, with this nefarious scheme of yours,
Obliterating our past love, as if it had never happened?
I call out, "Father,
You are too cruel at heart.
I will no longer remain in your household,
But am prepared to marry
another husband.
When the young squire had heard her out, he grew even angrier and gave her another few severe strokes with the stick.
Meng Yü-lou remonstrated with him, saying, "As long as she is willing to go, there is no need for you to beat her any further. Don't let yourself get worked up into such a state."
The young squire, accordingly, ordered a servant to summon the go-between Old Mother T'ao to take Yü-tsan away, sell her off, and come pay him back. But no more of this. Truly:
When a mosquito gets slapped with a fan,
It is for hurting people with its mouth.
A poem testifies to this:

When most kinds of birds chirp, people are happy to hear them;
But when the crows start to caw, how do people react?
Those who see them are vexed, and those who hear them spit;
Only because they are much too garrulous in front of them.

One day, Chen Jingji heard of this business of Sun Xue'e from old woman Xue. He sent the old woman with a message to Wu Yueniang.
"Your son-in-law says he does not mean to have anything more to do with your daughter. He is going to the Provincial Governor to say that, when your husband was alive, he had a number of chests of gold and silver left with him by old master Chen."
This was one more worry for Yueniang. Xue'e had run away with Laiwang; the boy Laian had run away; Laixing's wife had died and the funeral was only just over. When she heard the message old woman Xue had brought, she was alarmed, sent at once for a sedan chair, and told Ximen Dajie to go to Chen's house. Daian and other servants carried all the things belonging to her to Chen Jingji.
"These things were her dowry," Jingji said. "The things I am asking for are those I gave into their keeping."
"Your mother-in-law told me," old woman Xue said, "that in her husband's time these were the only things they had. She has never seen anything else."
Then Jingji claimed his wife's maid. Old woman Xue and Daian went back to Yueniang and told her. She refused to give up the girl. "She was Li Jiao'er's maid," she said, "and now she is looking after my baby. If he must have somebody, he may have Zhongqiu. She has been my daughter's maid."
Jingji refused to have Zhongqiu, and old woman Xue was kept going backwards and forwards between the two houses. At last Jingji's mother said to Daian: "Brother, go and tell your mistress that she has several maids. Why does she insist on keeping that particular one to look after her baby? And I don't see why she should keep Zhongqiu either, since Zhongqiu was my daughter-in-law's maid and was made a woman by my son."
Daian went and told Yueniang. Then she gave way and sent Yuanxiao. Jingji was very pleased with himself. "It is settled on my own terms after all," he said.

* * *

We now return to Magistrate Li's son. He had seen Wu Yueniang and Meng Yulou outside the city at the Festival of Spring. They were both beautiful and dressed alike, and he knew that they had been Ximen Qing's wives. He liked Yulou because she was tall. Her face was like a melon seed and she seemed charming and gay.
This young man's wife had died sometime before, and he had been looking about for a wife but could find no one who pleased him sufficiently. He was greatly taken with Yulou but did not know how to approach her. Besides, he did not know whether she wished to remarry.
Then he heard that Xue'e had been brought before his father's court. She was one of Ximen's wives also. He succeeded in persuading his father to return all the stolen property to Ximen's people. But Yueniang was afraid to have anything to do with the courts and would not send a man to claim the things. The young man was disappointed. The stolen goods were confiscated and Xue'e was sold. Then he talked over the situation with one of the officers called Yu.
"Why don't you send old Tao, the go-between, to Ximen's house to arrange the matter?" Yu said. "Tell the old woman that, if she brings the matter off, she shall have five taels of silver and be freed from her official work."
The young man spoke to old woman Tao, and the old woman was so delighted that she ran to Ximen's house as if she had had wings. Laizhao was at the door. The old woman made a reverence to him. "May I know if this is Ximen's house?" she said.
"Who are you?" Laizhao said. "What do you want? My master is dead."
"Will you kindly go and tell the lady that I am Tao, the official go-between. My young master tells me that one of the ladies is thinking of remarrying, and I have come to see about it."
"Old woman," Laizhao shouted, "you seem to have lost your manners. My master has been dead more than a year now. There are two ladies here, and neither of them wishes to remarry. You know the proverb: Howling wind and driving rain do not beat upon a widow's door. You are trifling and talking nonsense about marriage. Be off with you, and quickly. If the ladies hear of this, you may get a beating."
The old woman smiled. "The governor may be wrong," she said, "and his deputy too, but the messenger is always right. I should not have come if my young master had not sent me. Whether they wish to marry or not, kindly go and tell them. Then I will go back and let my young master know what they say."
"To do something for others is sometimes advantageous to oneself," Laizhao said. "Wait here, and I will go and tell them. One of the ladies has a baby. The other has not. I have no notion which it is you want."
"My young master told me that he saw her in the country at the Spring Festival. She has a few marks on her face."
Laizhao went and told Yueniang that the official go-between wished to see her. Yueniang was startled. "Nothing that is said here ever goes beyond these walls," she said. "What do they know of us?"
"The woman says they saw a lady with a few marks on her face, at the Festival of Spring."
"That is Sister Meng," Yueniang said. "I shall never remarry."
She went to Yulou. "Sister," she said, "I have something to tell you. A go-between has come, and she says Magistrate Li's son saw you at the Festival of Spring. She says you would like to remarry. Is that true?"
Now, as chance would have it, Yulou had noticed the young man that day and thought how happy and handsome he seemed. He was about the same age as herself, a good horseman, and skilled with the bow. When they looked at each other, they seemed to establish an understanding. But she had not known whether he was married or not. She had said to herself: "My husband is dead, and I have no child of my own. The Great Lady has a son, but, when he grows up, he will do his duty by his own mother and I shall be like a fallen tree that gives no shade, or as if I drew water in a bamboo basket. Since Yueniang has had this child, she does not behave to me as she used to do. It will be well for me to take a step forward and make sure of a home in which to spend my old age. Why should I be so foolish as to stay here? There is nothing here for me, and I am wasting my time."
She was thinking exactly this when Yueniang came and spoke to her. The man whom Yueniang mentioned was the very young man she had seen at the Festival of Spring. She was pleased but also a little ashamed. She said to Yueniang: "Don't believe a word of it. I have never even thought of remarrying." But she blushed.
"It is a matter entirely for you to decide," Yueniang said. "I have no authority over you." She told Laizhao to bring the go-between to the inner court.
Old woman Tao made a reverence to Yueniang and sat down. A maid brought tea, and Yueniang said: "What can I do for you?"
"I should not come to such a magnificent palace as this unless I had something of great importance to say," the old woman said. "I was ordered to come by his Lordship. It is said that there is a lady here who would like to marry again."
"It is possible that the lady may care to remarry," said Yueniang, "but she has never spoken of the matter to anyone. How did your young master come to know of it?"
"He only told me that he saw a lady at the festival. She was tall and had a face shaped like a melon seed, with a few white marks upon it. I think this must be the lady."
Then Yueniang understood that it must be Yulou. She took the woman to Yulou's room. There they sat down and, after a while, Yulou came out to them beautifully dressed. The old woman made a reverence to her.
"This is the lady," she said. "She is unusually beautiful and well worthy to be my young master's first wife."
Yulou smiled. "Don't be silly," she said. "Tell me how old the gentleman is. Has he been married before? Has he any women in his household? What is his name and what his position? Don't waste time. Tell me the truth."
"Heaven!" the old woman cried. "I am the official go-between. I'm not like the rest of them. I never tell lies. I say what I know and nothing else. The magistrate is over fifty, and this is his only son. The young gentleman's animal is the Horse, and he is now thirty-one. He was born at the hour of the Dragon on the twenty-third day of the first month. He is a student at the Imperial Academy of Learning and will shortly take his degree. He has a bellyful of literature, and is very skilled at archery and horsemanship. There is nothing about philosophy he doesn't know. His wife died two years ago, and now he has only a young girl to look after him. She is quite a common sort of girl, and he wants a wife to manage things. He has sent me here especially to ask you to marry him. If you are willing, my master says you shall be excused from paying taxes on your land, houses and property, and if anyone harms you in any way, you have only to point to him and he will be arrested and punished at once."
"Has the young gentleman any children?" Yulou asked. "And what is his native place? I ask this because when their term of office here expires, they will probably go away, and I do not wish to go very far. All my people live here."
"He has no children," old woman Tao said, "and his home is in the Zaoqiang district of Zhengdingfu. It is about six or seven hundred li on the other side of the river. They own miles and miles of land, have herds of mules and horses, and a host of people. The Imperial sign stands over all the arches. It is a splendid and glorious place. If you become his first wife, and he gets an official appointment, you will wear ceremonial dress and drive a carriage like a lady. Is that not good enough for you?"
Yulou made up her mind. She told Lanxiang to bring the old woman tea and cakes. "I must apologize for asking so many questions," she said, "but really go-betweens are such clever liars, and I did not wish to be deceived."
"Lady," the old woman said, "you should look carefully. Then you would see that the pure are pure and the foul, foul. Only too often the bad ones bring disrepute upon the good ones. I never lie, I have always set out to be an honest go-between. If you have made up your mind, please write a note and I will give it to the young master."
Yulou found a piece of scarlet silk and told Daian to take it to the shop and get Clerk Fu to write her eight characters upon it.
"When you came here," Yueniang said, "old woman Xue acted as your go-between. We will send for her, and then she and Madam Tao together can take your eight characters. That will look more dignified."
After a while, old woman Xue came. She made a reverence to old woman Tao. As they belonged to the same profession, it was arranged that they should take the note to the Town Hall together.
On the way, old woman Tao said to her companion: "Did you arrange this lady's marriage on the previous occasion?"
"I did," old woman Xue said.
"What family did she come from? Was she a virgin?"
"She is a Yang," old woman Xue said.
Then old woman Tao noticed that the characters on the silk showed that Yulou was born at the hour of the Rat on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, so she was now thirty-seven years old.
"I am afraid my master will think she is rather old," she said. "He is only thirty-one, and she is six years older. Had we not better go to a fortune-teller and find out whether the parties are suited to one another? If the dates don't work out, we will make her a little younger. I shan't consider that anything wrong."
The two women went on, but they did not meet any fortune-tellers in the street. But from a distance they saw a black tent to the south of the road. Outside it were two signs. They bore the inscriptions: "I foretell good and evil fortune as Zi Ping. With an iron pen, I determine whether honor or ill-fame will come. To all who come to have their fortunes told, I tell the truth without fear and without favor." In the tent there was a table, and beside it sat a man who could write and tell fortunes. They went to him and he asked them to sit down.
"We have come to ask about the destiny of a woman," old woman Xue said, taking from her sleeve three fen of silver. "This is only a trifle, but please take it. I have very little money with me."
The man asked the eight characters. Tao gave him the card, on which the eight characters were written.
"I see this is a marriage," the man said. Then he began to calculate on his fingers and set out the counters on the abacus. "The woman is now thirty-seven years old," he said. "She was born at the hour of the Rat, on the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month. The month is Jiazi, the day Xinmao and the hour Gengzi. She is an honorable woman. Working backwards, as one does with the life of a woman, we find that she is now at the period Bingshen. Bing comes in conjunction with Xin, which shows that she is destined to enjoy power and dignity and to be a lady. She has several husband stars, yet her influence is always happy for her husbands and they will love her. In these two years there seems to be an adverse influence. Has anything happened?"
"Two husbands have died already," old woman Xue said.
"That is good," the man said.
"Will she bear a child?" old woman Xue asked.
"Not yet. She will not have a child until she is forty-one. Then she will have a son who will comfort her declining days. Her fate seems to be excellent. She will be very rich and of high rank." He took a brush and wrote four lines.
Her charm is worthy to be compared with the beauty of the plum.
Three times the red silk is taken away, and twice she paints her brows.
We shall see the day when the horse's head is raised in victory
Then she will cast aside the covering of Yin and be free.
"Master," old woman Xue said, "what do you mean by those two last lines? We don't understand. Would you mind explaining?"
"I spoke of the 'horse's head' because the lady is going to marry a man whose animal is the Horse. Afterwards, she will live a life of ease. By 'the covering of Yin' I make reference to the man whose animal was the Tiger. That man is dead, and though he loved her, she was only a concubine in his household. From now onward, she will have a happy life. She will live to be sixty-eight and her son will close her eyes. Husband and wife will live together till they die."
"The man she is going to marry has indeed the horse for his animal," the old women cried, "but we are afraid he will think her too old. Can you make her a few years younger?"
"I will make her thirty-four," the man said.

"If you do that, will that fit in with the Horse?" old woman Xue said.
"Yes," the man said, "the Ding fire meets the Geng gold. From the gold melted in the fire, a precious jewel is made. It will be all right." He put down Yulou's age as thirty-four. The two old women went on to the Town Hall. There they were taken to the young man. He asked who old woman Xue was.
"She is the go-between of the other party," old woman Tao said. She told the young man the result of her visit. "The lady is very beautiful," she said, "but she is slightly older than you. I did not venture to settle the matter without your consent. Here is the card."
Li looked at it. "Born at the hour of the Rat, the twenty-seventh day of the eleventh month, thirty-four years of age," it said.
"That is all right," the young man said. "She is only two or three years older than I am."
"Yes, my lord," old woman Xue said hastily, "and doubtless you remember the proverb: When the wife is two years older than her husband, his wealth will be increased, and if she is three years older, she will be like a mountain of gold. The lady is very beautiful and has a perfect disposition. I need hardly say that she knows how to read and can manage a household very economically."
"You need say no more," the young man said. "I have seen her myself. "We must select a day of good omen for the betrothal."
"When shall we come to receive your orders?" the old women said.
"We will not waste any time. Come two days from now."
He gave each of them a tael of silver for her pains, and they went off in high spirits.
Li was very pleased that his marriage was now so far advanced. He consulted with He Buwei and then told his father. Then he sent for the Master of the Yin Yang, who selected the eighth day of the fourth month for the betrothal and the fifteenth for the wedding. He made a handsome present to He Buwei and Little Zhang to buy tea and wine and other things. The two go-betweens went to Ximen's place and told Yueniang and Yulou the days that had been selected. On the eighth day of the fourth month, sixteen dishes of fruits and cakes, a gold headdress, a set of gold ornaments, a cornelian girdle, a set of little bells, gold bracelets and silver pins, two scarlet ceremonial cloaks, four embroidered dresses, thirty taels of silver, rolls of silk and cotton, were made into twenty separate parcels. He Buwei and the two women took them all to Ximen's house.
On the fifteenth, a number of servants from the Town Hall came to take Meng Yulou's things away. Yueniang made them take everything that had belonged to Yulou. Ximen Qing had given his daughter one of the lacquer beds, and now Yueniang gave Yulou the bed decorated with mother of pearl that had been in Jinlian's room. Yulou wished to take Lanxiang with her and leave the younger of her maids to Yueniang. But Yueniang would not agree.
"No," she said, "I will not take your maid. I have Zhongqiu and Xiuchun and the nurse to look after the baby, and they are all I need."
Then Yulou sent all her things away, leaving two little silver pots as playthings for the baby. That evening there came for her a sedan chair carried by four men, with eight men from the Town Hall, and four pairs of red lanterns to attend her. Yulou put on her golden headdress, ornaments, and pearls. Then she dressed in a straight-sleeved scarlet gown. First she went to say farewell to Ximen Qing's tablet; then she kowtowed to Yueniang.
"Sister Meng," Yueniang said, "you are cruel. You are leaving me here alone, and I have no friend left." They held each other's hands and cried.
All the household went with her to the gate, and there an old woman put a veil of red silk on her head and gave her a golden vase to carry. As Yueniang was a widow, she did not go out, but asked Aunt Meng to take Yulou to her new husband.
"That is Master Ximen's third lady," the people in the street said to one another. "Now she is marrying the magistrate's son. This is the wedding day." Some said it was good, and some that it was bad. Those who considered it good said: "Ximen Qing was a very pleasant fellow. He is dead now, and his first wife lives on at his home as his widow. She could not possibly manage the household if it remained so big, so she lets the ladies go their own way, and all is as it should be."
Those who considered it bad said: "Now, even Ximen Qing's wives are remarrying. He was a most unprincipled fellow. He lived for money and to seduce other people's wives and daughters, and, now he is dead, his wives remarry and take his property with them. Some have married; some have run away; some have carried on intrigues with impossible people; some have even descended to theft. They are like the feathers of a chicken, all scattered to the winds. As the proverb says: we may have to wait thirty years for our reward, but, in this case, we see the reward today."
Aunt Meng came with the sedan chair to the Town Hall. The beds and furniture were all in their proper places. She was asked to take wine and then went home. Li gave the two old women Xue and Tao each five taels and a roll of silk, and they went home too. The young couple became husband and wife that same night and enjoyed each other as fishes enjoy water. Next day, Yueniang sent tea and food to Yulou, since Aunt Yang, who would have done it, was now dead. The three Aunt Mengs also sent tea. Then they received an invitation from the Town Hall asking them to go on the third day of the wedding. There was a very grand dinner; musicians and singing girls were present to perform plays and music. Yueniang dressed in pearls and put on a scarlet cloak, an embroidered skirt, and a girdle with a gold buckle, and went in a large sedan chair to the Town Hall. The ladies were entertained in the great hall and the magistrate's wife was there to receive them.
When Yueniang got home after this very lively feast, she went to the inner court. It was so quiet that not a sound could be heard. She remembered how busy all the ladies had been in Ximen Qing's lifetime, and how, when she had come back from a party, they had all come to welcome her home. Indeed, one long bench had not been enough for the ladies to sit on. Now they were all gone. She went to Ximen Qing's tablet and sobbed.
Young Master Li and Yulou, both very lively by nature, were delighted with each other. They were so much attracted one to the other that they found it hard to separate even for a moment. The young man looked closely at Yulou and, the more he looked at her, the more he loved her. And her two maids were very pretty too. Lanxiang was now eighteen. He was so delighted he did not know what to do with himself.
The young man's first wife, when she died, left an old maid called Yuzan. She was now about thirty years old. She painted her face till she looked like a demon. She used to dress her hair in a number of knots, then, around it, she put a handkerchief, and tied it with a gold ribbon as if it had been a hairnet. She wore the strangest green and red clothes and shoes like boats, with four eyes. Each of them was at least one foot two inches long. When she was in the presence of anyone, she shivered and shook, talked in a quavering voice, and behaved in the queerest manner. Before the young master had married again, it was she who served him every day with food and tea. She was very industrious, and smiled and talked even when she did not mean to. When Yulou came, and her young master attached himself so firmly to her, it was a very great trouble to Yuzan. She was furious.
One day, when the young man was reading in his study, she went to the kitchen and made a special cup of tea. She put the teacup on a tray and took it to the study. She put on a smiling face, pulled aside the lattice, and went to offer the tea. But the young man, after reading a while, had gone to sleep on the table.
"Master," she said, "nobody cares for you as I do. I have made you such a nice cup of tea. Your newly married wife is still comfortably asleep in bed. Why don't you order her maids to make some tea for you?"
The young man was half asleep and did not answer. "You old beggar," she said, "you have been so busy all night that you are tired out now. That's why you go to sleep in the daytime. Wake up and have this cup of tea."
Then the young man woke up and saw the maid.
"Put down that tea and go away, you dirty slave," he said.
Yuzan flushed, put down the tea, and went out in a bad temper. "You don't appreciate my kindness," she said. "I had the best of intentions when I made you this tea, and yet you shout at me. I may be ugly, but as the proverb says: an ugly person is a jewel in the household, but the beauty is a source of trouble. I may be ugly, but you used to like me well enough."
The young man kicked her. Yuzan pulled a face long enough to reach the ceiling. She never painted her face again, nor did she make any more tea. When she saw Yulou, she never addressed her as "Lady," but just said "You" and "I." She used to seat herself on Yulou's bed. Yulou said nothing.
Then she said, one day, to her mistress's two maids: "Don't call me Sister, call me Aunt. I am only slightly inferior to your mother and you must call me Aunt when your father is away. You must do what I tell you and work hard. If you don't obey me, you shall have a taste of my shovel."
She tried very hard to make up to the young man but he would have nothing to do with her. Then she was annoyed and would not get out of bed until noon. She refused to cook and would not scrub the floors.
"Don't bother about her," Yulou said to her maids. "Go yourselves to the kitchen and do the cooking and take the food to your master."
Yuzan was terribly jealous. She used to go to the kitchen, break the plates, and curse and beat the maids. "You thievish little whores!" she cried. "you must know that I was here before any of you. Your mother was not here before I was. Now you get hold of everything and don't exert yourselves in the least. The First Lady never used to call me Yuzan, but although you have been here only a few days, you have the audacity to call me by my name. I am not your servant. Before you came, I used to sleep with the young master. We slept together every night and did not get up till breakfasttime. We were like sugar and honey together, and I managed everything. Now you have come and smashed the honey jar and broken the relations between us. I am driven to a cold room where I have to put benches together to make a bed. I never enjoy my master's weapon any more. Indeed, I've forgotten what it is like. There is no place where I can say what I think. When she was in Ximen's family she was only the third lady, and I know she was called Yulou. I know it. And now that she comes here, she ought to control herself a little instead of boasting and ordering people about."
Yulou heard all this. It made her angry but she would not speak to her husband about it. One day, when it was very hot, the young man ordered them to heat some water and bring the bathtub so that he could take a bath with Yulou.
"Tell Lanxiang to go and do it." Yulou said. "Don't ask your own maid."
"No," the young man said, "it is her business to do it. I can't have her going on like this."
When Yuzan heard her master asking for water so that he could have a bath with his wife, she was very annoyed. She brought the tub and plumped it on the floor. Then she heated a great cauldron of water.
"I have never seen such a strumpet," she grumbled. "Always trying to harm me in some cunning way. What a strumpet she must be, washing herself nearly every day. Look at me! I slept with my master for months and months and never used a drop of water. But I didn't offend the eyes of Buddha. This whore has been trying to quarrel with me for a long time." She cursed all the way from the kitchen to the bedroom. Yulou heard her and said nothing, but the young man heard her too, and he was very angry. Though he had no clothes on, he picked up a stick and went out. Yulou tried to stop him.
"Don't be angry with her," she said. "It will be more trouble than it is worth if you go out now, when you are so hot, and catch a chill."
But the young man found it too much. "No," he said, "the ill-mannered slave!"
He went out and seized her by the hair. Then he threw her to the ground, and blows fell from his stick like raindrops. Yulou tried to get him to stop, but she did not succeed until the maid had received thirty blows. Then the maid knelt down before him. "Don't beat me any more, Master," she said. "I know you don't want me any more, and I will go away."
This made the young man angrier than ever and he struck her again. "Since she's ready to go away," Yulou said, "don't beat her. And don't let yourself get into such a state." The young man sent for old woman Tao to take the maid away. She was sold for 8 taels of silver and old Tao gave the money to the young man.

115

Meng Yulou Outwits Ch'en Ching-chi who is Entrapped in Yen-chou Prefecture; Wu Yüeh-Niang Creates a Stir in the District Yamen

As the summer fades and winter comes,[1] spring turns into autumn;[2]
As the evening sun sinks in the west,[3] the rivers flow eastward.[4]
Although one's wealth and distinction are determined by destiny;
When one's luck runs out, the ensuing poverty has its own roots.
If one meets with an opportunity, one should take advantage of it;
When one has occasion for self-esteem it is time to repent.[5]
The general and his fighting stallion[6] are no more to be seen;[7]
The prairie grasses and wildflowers[8] veil the soil in grief.[9]

On that day, after the young squire Li Kung-pi had given Yü-tsan a beating, he summoned Old Mother T'ao to take her away, sold her for eight taels of silver, and used the proceeds to buy a seventeen-year-old maidservant named Man-t'ang to take charge of the kitchen in her place. But no more of this. To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ta-chieh returned to Ch'en Ching-chi's residence and brought with her the beds and curtains, the items from her dowry, and the trunkloads of other goods:
Every third day they squabbled, and Every fifth day they quarreled.
Ch'en Ching-chi approached his mother, née Chang, to ask if he could borrow some money from her as capital with which to start a business for himself. His maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan had also borrowed fifty taels of silver from his mother, with which to seek a new position for himself. Ch'en Ching-chi, while drunk, got into a shouting match over this at the door of his uncle's residence, which so upset his uncle that he went elsewhere to borrow the money he needed in order to seek a new position and returned the money he had borrowed to Ch'en Ching-chi's mother. This had the effect of upsetting his mother, née Chang, to such an extent that she fell ill and took to her bed, taking medications all day long, and calling in doctors to treat her. Finding herself unable to resist his obstreperous demands, she finally weighed out two hundred taels of silver and turned it over to him so that he, with the help of their servant Ch'en Ting, could open up two rooms on the street-front of their property in which to launch a piece goods store.
Every day, he got together with his cronies Lu the Second, Yang the Elder, and other:
Foxy fellows and doglike companions,[10] who forgathered in the shop to strum the balloon guitar, play at dominoes or backgammon, and drink until late at night, with the result that his capital was gradually diminished. Ch'en Ting told his mother, née Chang, that he was drinking and wasting his money every day, and she believed him, so that she trusted her son no longer. Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this by claiming that Ch'en Ting, who was responsible for getting the fabrics dyed, had been embezzling the money entrusted to him and forced him and his wife to leave the household and reside elsewhere. He then engaged Yang the Elder to be his manager.
This Yang the Elder, whose formal name was Yang Kuang-yen, and whose nickname was Iron Fingernail, was a past master at:
Peddling ephemera, like the wind and rain;[11]
Telling falsehoods, fabricating fantasies, and getting hold of other people's money in order to spend it on himself. He was a native of Nobottom ward in Carryoff village of Makebelieve district in Nonesuch prefecture. His father was named Yang Pu-lai, or Poor-parent Yang, and his mother's maiden name was Pai. His younger brother was called Yang Erh-feng. He acquired the art of lying from the Taoist master known as the Barefaced Adept from the Fire Dragon Monastery in the Obdurate Grotto of the Vacuous Mountains. His wife was known as Miss Died-of-fright because his propensity to lie had literally frightened her to death.
Those to whom he makes promises, end up
Catching at shadows and clutching the wind;
And bilking others of their due, he finds
As easy as groping for something in a bag.
Ch'en Ching-chi prevailed upon his mother to come up with an additional three hundred taels of silver, making a total of five hundred taels worth of capital, and trusted Yang Kuang-yen enough to propose that they go together to the canal port of Lin-ch'ing to purchase piece goods for their business.
Yang the Elder went home to collect his luggage, including a bottomless shoulder bag, filled with soft currency and "elm-pod cash."[12] Carrying a black-handled decorated bow, and riding a haughty high horse, he joined Ch'en Ching-chi in setting out for the dock at Lin-ch'ing in the hope of acquiring some hard-to-find goods.
After three li they fared by Nonesuch district;
After five li they came to Makebelieve village;
eventually arriving at Lin-ch'ing.
The large dock area of this river port of Lin-ch'ing was a bustling and flourishing place, where traveling merchants came and went:
A site at which river boats congregated;
An area where transport wagons gathered.
There were:
Thirty-two lanes lined with sporting houses; and Seventy-two taverns featuring singing girls.[13]
Ch'en Ching-chi was still a young man and allowed himself to be led by this Iron Fingernail, Yang the Elder, into:
Visiting brothels, and Exploring taverns;
Sleeping by daylight, and Dissipating at night;
while neglecting the purchases they had come to make.
While visiting a brothel one day, he encountered a painted face named Feng Chin-pao:
Whose demeanor was both romantic and alluring, and Whose beauty and talent approached perfection.
When he asked how old she was, the procuress said, "She is my own daughter, and my only source of livelihood. This year, she is just seventeen-years-old."
Ch'en Ching-chi no sooner set eyes on her than:
His heart and eyes were entranced, and he proceeded to pay the procuress five taels of silver for the privilege of spending several nights in a row with her. When Yang the Elder saw that he was infatuated with the painted face, and reluctant to leave her, he persuaded him with flowery words from the sidelines to take her home with him. The procuress started by demanding a hundred and fifty taels of silver for her but allowed herself to be bargained down to a hundred taels, whereupon he paid her the silver and took her home with him. She was carried the whole way in a sedan chair, while Yang the Elder and Ch'en Ching-chi escorted their cartload of merchandise:

Flourishing whips and prancing on their steeds,[14]
with satisfaction. Truly:
The sweetheart from the Swallows' Belvedere,[15]
Turns round her head in vain along the road.
He is carrying off an immortal from Wu-ling,[16]
To make her into a loving phoenix companion.
When his mother, née Chang, saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had not purchased much in the way of merchandise but had used his capital to buy a singing girl instead, she became so upset that:
Alas and alack;
She stopped breathing and died.
Ch'en Ching-chi had no alternative but to purchase a coffin, see that her corpse was dressed for burial, hold a scripture reciting ceremony, arrange for her to lie in state until after the first weekly commemoration was over, conduct a funeral procession to the ancestral graveyard outside the city, and bury her in the same grave with her husband. His maternal uncle Militia Commander Chang Kuan, out of consideration for his mother, chose to make allowances for him.
When Ch'en Ching-chi came home after performing the ceremony of revisiting the grave three days after her burial, he set up her spirit tablet in the center of what had been her three-room suite and turned the other two rooms over to Feng Chin-pao to live in, while relegating his wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, to a side chamber. He also purchased a maidservant named Ch'ung-hsi to wait on Feng Chin-pao, put Yang the Elder in charge of the shop on the street-front of the residence, and indulged himself and the singing girl with:
Unlimited quantities of meat and wine.
Every night, he slept with the singing girl and no longer paid any attention to Hsi-men Ta-chieh.
One day, he learned that Meng Yü-lou had married Li Kung-pi, the son of District Magistrate Li Ch'ang-ch'i, and taken a good deal of property with her; and that on the expiration of Magistrate Li's three-year term of office he had been promoted to the position of assistant prefect of Yen-chou prefecture in Chekiang and had taken his credentials and set out along the internal waterways to assume his new office.
This reminded Ch'en Ching-chi that on a former occasion he had picked up a hairpin of Meng Yü-lou's, that it had been taken from him by P'an Chin-lien while he was in his cups, that she had later returned it to him, and that he still had it in his possession. It occurred to him that, using this hairpin as a piece of evidence, he could take it with him to Yen-chou and claim that Meng Yü-lou had had an affair with him and given him the pin as a gift; and that the property she had taken with her on the occasion of her marriage to Li Kung-pi included the trunkloads of gold and silver that had been entrusted to his family by their relative Yang Chien when it was threatened with confiscation.
"This Assistant Prefect Li," he thought to himself, "is merely a civil official. What sort of standing does he possess? When he learns of this serious accusation, no doubt he will order his son to turn his wife over to me with both hands. If I then bring her home with me, she and Feng Chin-pao will make a pleasing pair for me to enjoy myself with."
Truly:
If his plan prevails, it will be like seizing
the jade hare in the moon;
If his plot succeeds, it will be like snaring
the gold raven in the sun.[17]
If Ch'en Ching-chi had not embarked on this scheme, all might have been well; but when he chose to do so, it was a case of:
A sleepy slugabed encountering the General of the Five Ways;
A cold and hungry demon running into Chung K'uei.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
How can he ever start out for Yen-chou in pursuit of a jade damsel?
The human heart is difficult to fathom[18] like a stone sunk in the sea.
To vanish inside a nobleman's gates is to be as unreachable as the ocean depths;
From this point on, the amorous gentleman is destined to fall into a pit.
To resume our story, one day Ch'en Ching-chi went through his mother's trunks and took out a thousand taels of silver. He set aside a hundred taels to cover Feng Chin-pao's expenses during his absence and arranged for Ch'en Ting to move back in to look after the house and take charge of the piece goods store out front. He then set off with the remaining nine hundred taels of silver in hand, at the Mid-autumn Festival on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, together with Yang the Elder and his servant Ch'en An, for Hu-chou, where they purchased half a boatload of piece goods and silk floss, and then went on to the river's mouth at Ch'ing-chiang P'u, where they moored their boat at the dock, and put up at an inn the proprietor of which was called Ch'en the Second.
That evening, after the lanterns had been lit, he had Ch'en the Second slaughter a chicken and provide wine for them, and he sat down to drink with Yang the Elder, saying, "Manager, I would like you to keep watch over the boatload of merchandise, and stay here at Ch'en the Second's inn for a few days, while Ch'en An and I take some gifts with us and go to Yen-chou prefecture in Chekiang to pay a call on my sister, who is married to the son of the assistant prefect there. I should be able to get back in five days at the most or three days at the least."
"Brother," said Yang the Elder, "go ahead and go if you like. I will be happy to remain here and wait for you at the inn. When you return, we can set off together."
Ch'en Ching-chi, though he:
Never, ever, should have done it, set out one day, together with Ch'en An, taking some silver and presents with him, and traveled to Yen-chou prefecture, where they went into the city and found lodging in a monastery. Upon making inquiry, he learned that the Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i had assumed office a month ago, and that the boat with his dependents had arrived only three days earlier.
Ch'en Ching-chi did not dare to be remiss but purchased four platters of delicacies, two bolts of satin fabric, and two jars of wine, which he entrusted to Ch'en An to carry. He then dressed himself to befit the occasion, endeavoring to look his best, and headed straight for the prefectural yamen.
When he arrived there, he bowed to the gatekeeper, saying, "Please announce me. You can say that I am Meng the Second, a relative of the newlywed wife of His Honor Assistant Prefect Li's son, who has come to pay her a visit."
When the gatekeeper heard this, he did not dare to be remiss but promptly went inside to report his arrival. The young squire was in his study reading a book at the time.
When he heard that the visitor was a brother of his wife's, he ordered his attendants to bring the presents inside, adjusted his clothing, and said, "Invite him to come in."
He then conducted Ch'en Ching-chi into the reception hall of the prefectural yamen where they exchanged the customary amenities.
After they had assumed their positions as guest and host, he said, "How is it that, the other day, at our wedding ceremony, I did not see you, Brother-in-law?"
"I have been away for the past year," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "and have only just returned from a purchasing expedition to Szechwan and the Hu-Kuang region, so I did not know that my elder sister had married into your family. I am guilty of losing touch with her, but today I have respectfully prepared some meager gifts and have come to call on my sister."
"I did not know anything about you in the past," explained the young squire. "I apologize for my neglect. Forgive me. Forgive me."
A little later, after they had consumed a serving of tea, the young squire ordered his attendants to take the list of gifts and the presents inside and tell their mistress that her brother Meng the Second was there.
Meng Yü-lou, who was sitting in her room at the time, heard the gatekeeper come in and announce that Meng the Second was there.
"He hasn't returned home for the last year or two," she said. "Who else could it be? It must be that my brother, Meng Jui, has finally come home and has taken the trouble to traverse:
A thousand mountains and a myriad streams,
in order to come and see me."
When she saw that a servant had brought in the presents, along with a gift card that was signed, "Your relative, Meng Jui," she knew it must be her younger brother and said, "Invite him to come in."
After ordering Lan-hsiang to straighten up the rear reception room, Meng Yü-lou dressed herself up and prepared to come out and welcome him. When the young squire ushered him into the reception room, Meng Yü-lou was standing on the other side of the hanging screen looking into the interior, but:
Strange as it may seem,
it turned out not to be her brother, but Ch'en Ching-chi.
"I wonder what he is doing here?" she asked herself. "I'd better go out and see what he has to say. As the saying goes:
Whether a kinsman or not,
He is from my home place;
Whether palatable or not,
It is water from my home.[19]
Even though he is no brother of mine, he is my son-in-law."
So saying, she straightened her attire and came out to greet him.
"I did not know that you had married into this household," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so I have failed to call upon you."
Unexpectedly, while he was still uttering these words, the gatekeeper came in and informed the young squire that there was a guest waiting to see him outside.
"Pray entertain my brother-in-law," the young squire said to Meng Yü-lou, as he went out to meet his guest.
When Meng Yü-lou observed that Ch'en Ching-chi was about to kowtow to her, she hastily bowed in return, saying, "Son-in-law, you can skip the obeisance. What wind has blown you here?"
After they had exchanged the customary amenities, she offered him a seat and called for Lan-hsiang to bring out a serving of tea. When they had finished their tea, the two of them engaged in small talk together.
"How is Hsi-men Ta-chieh?" Meng Yü-lou asked.
Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to tell Meng Yü-lou all about how they had been forced to leave Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, and how he had tried to recover the trunks of valuables that his family had originally deposited there. Meng Yü-lou also told him about how they had visited the ancestral graveyard on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, and how they had encountered Ch'un-mei at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, where she had gone to burn paper money at Chin-lien's grave site.
She also went on to say, "When I was still in the Hsi-men household, I constantly admonished the First Lady, saying, 'If you love your daughter, you should also love her husband. He is your own son-in-law, after all; it is not as though you are supporting a stranger.' But she believed the slander that petty people purveyed to her and consequently drove you out of the household. As for your later request to recover the trunks your family had entrusted to them, I know nothing about that."
"I will not attempt to deceive you," Ch'en Ching-chi said. "It is true that I was carrying on an affair with Sister Six, as everyone knew. But when the First Lady heard about it from those slaves of hers and drove her out of the household, she ended up being murdered by Wu Sung. If she had been allowed to remain in the household, that Wu Sung, even if he had possessed:
Seven heads and eight galls, would never have dared to break into the household and kill her. My enmity for the First Lady is as deep as the sea, and Sister Six, though dead in the Underworld, will also never forgive her."
"Enough of that," objected Meng Yü-lou. "It's something you can't do anything about. It has always been true that:
It is better to resolve an enmity than to contract one."[20]
As they were talking, a maidservant set up a table, and put out wine, cups, and an assortment of delicacies until its entire surface was filled.
Meng Yü-lou then poured out a cup of wine and proffered it to Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "Son-in-law, you have exposed yourself to:
The wind and dust of a long journey,[21] and gratuitously expended a considerable sum on me. Please accept this meager cup of watery wine."
Ch'en Ching-chi took the cup in his hand, bowed to her, and poured out another cup of wine to proffer to her in return. After she expressed her gratitude, they sat down together.
Upon noticing that the woman insisted on addressing him as Son-in-law:
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
"How is it that this whore refuses to recognize her vulnerability, but persists in addressing me as Son-in-law? I'd better sound her out gradually."
At the juncture, when:
Three rounds of wine had been consumed, and Five courses of food had been provided, the two of them continued:
Talking back and forth, until the conversation started to warm up. By this time Ch'en Ching-chi's face was flushed with wine. As the saying goes:
The passions born of wine are as deep as the sea;
Giving rise to lustful daring
as big as the sky.[22]
Seeing that no one else was present, Ch'en Ching-chi dropped several lines of suggestive language, saying, "Sister, your younger brother yearns for you:
Like a thirsty person longing for drink;
Like a parched person longing for coolness.
I remember, when I was residing in my father-in-law's household, how the two of us used to enjoy board games together, and play at dominoes, sitting across from each other, and feeling connected as intimately as the carapace to the turtle. Who could have guessed that today:
We would be apart from each other;[23]
You to the east and I to the west?"

Meng Yü-lou laughed at this, saying, "Son-in-law, that's a fine way to talk! It has always been true that:
The clear is ever clear,
The turbid ever turbid;
As in time will be seen."
Ch'en Ching-chi responded with an ingratiating smile, groped out of his sleeve a package containing lozenges of fragrant tea in the shape of embracing couples, and gave it to the woman, saying, "Sister, if you have any feeling for me, take pity on your younger brother, and agree to consume this fragrant tea."
So saying, he proceeded to kneel down in front of her. As for the woman:
A spot of red appeared beside each ear, and the blood flew to her cheeks.
Taking the package of fragrant tea in her hand, she threw it onto the floor, saying:
"You wouldn't know a favor if you saw one.
I proffered wine to you with the best of intentions, and you turn around and play games with me this way."
So saying, she started to leave the table and head back to her room.
When Ch'en Ching-chi realized that she was not rising to his bait, he picked up the package of fragrant tea and called after her, saying, "I came to see you with the best of intentions, but you have apparently changed your mind about me. I dare say you think now that you have married a fine young man who is the son of an assistant prefect, you need not pay any attention to me; as though you never engaged in hanky-panky with me when you were the third concubine in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household."
He then reached into his sleeve, pulled out the gold-plated silver hairpin that he had formerly picked up, and held it in his hand, saying, "Who does this object belong to? If you never had sexual relations with me, how did this pin of yours ever fall into my hands? Your name is actually engraved on it. You and the First Lady have been in cahoots to divide up the eight trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, including jade girdles, jewels, and the like, that belonged to Yang Chien at court, and were deposited with you to avoid confiscation at the time of his impeachment, and have brought your share of them with you upon marrying your new husband. Never you fear, when we appear in court I'll have something to say to you."
When Meng Yü-lou heard his accusation and realized that the hairpin he held really was the gold-plated hairpin in the shape of a lotus petal that she had worn on her head, but had lost in the garden on a former occasion, she wondered to herself, "How could it ever have fallen into the hands of this short-life?"
Fearing that if she made a fuss about it the servants might overhear them, she promptly put on an ingratiating smile, came back inside, and took Ch'en Ching-chi by the hand, saying, "My good son-in-law, I was only kidding. There's no reason to get so upset."
Seeing that:
There was nobody about,
she murmured softly:
"If you've got a mind to it,
I've got the will."
The two of them then:
Without permitting any further explanation,
fell to embracing each other and kissing.
Ch'en Ching-chi:
Like a snake devouring a swallow, stuck his tongue into her mouth and told her to suck it, saying, "Call me your darling son-in-law. Only then will I believe that you really care for me."
"Keep it quiet," the woman said. "I fear that someone may overhear us."
Ch'en Ching-chi then whispered to her, saying, "I have bought half a boatload of merchandise which is waiting for me at the dock in Ch'ing-chiang P'u. If you deign to give yourself to me, thus and so, this evening, you can disguise yourself as a gatekeeper, surreptitiously make your way outside, and come home with me on the boat, so we can become man and wife. There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme. Your father-in-law is only a civil official, after all, and will seek to avoid trouble. He is scarcely likely to take the risk of trying to pursue or arrest you."
"In that case," the woman said, "so be it. Let us agree that tonight you will wait outside the rear wall of the yamen. I will let a bundle of gold and silver and other valuables down to you by a rope over the wall and then disguise myself as a gatekeeper, make my way outside, and go to embark on the boat with you."
Gentle reader take note: Truly:
If a beauty is well disposed,[24]
Not even a barrier a myriad feet in height will serve to deter her;
If a woman is ill disposed,[25]
Though seated next to one, she is separated by a thousand mountains.
If Meng Yü-lou had married a fool who was not the equal of Ch'en Ching-chi, this scheme of his might well have succeeded; but she had married the young squire Li Kung-pi, who had the prospect of a promising career before him and was also:
A man of romantic and engaging qualities,[26] still in the springtime of his youth, whose:
Loving devotion could hardly be surpassed.[27]
Under these circumstances, how could he ever have thought he could seduce her? Aside from the fact that the two of them had not had any relationship in the past, the young gentleman was simply bound to fail in his endeavor. Having told the truth, and revealed his plans to her, he opened himself up to being deceived by the woman.
Truly:
Flowering branches, beneath their leaves,
conceal their thorns;
How can one ever be sure the human heart contains no poison?
At this juncture, after the two of them had consulted together for a while, and Ch'en Ching-chi had downed several cups of wine, he said good-bye and prepared to leave. Li Kung-pi, forthwith, escorted him to the gate of the yamen and saw him off, with Ch'en An following in his wake.
Li Kung-pi then asked Meng Yü-lou, "Do you know where your brother is staying? I will go tomorrow to pay him a return call and give him some gifts for the road."
"Since when is he any brother of mine?" responded Meng Yü-lou. "He is Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law and has come with the intention, thus and so, of inveigling me into absconding with him. I have already arranged for him to wait outside the rear wall of the yamen at the third watch tonight, in order to:
Counteract his plot with one of my own,[28] so we can have him arrested as a thief, and thereby eliminate any further trouble from him. What do you think?"
"How can that rascal act so outrageously?" the young squire responded. "It has always been true that:
He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.
It is not I who have sought him out,
He is seeking to find his own death."[29]
So saying, he strode outside, called together a few trusted attendants, and instructed them, thus and so, on the preparations he wished them to make.
Meanwhile, Ch'en Ching-chi, who was quite unaware of the counterplot he was up against, during:
The third watch in the middle of the night, actually proceeded to take his servant Ch'en An with him, stand outside the rear wall of the prefectural yamen, and signal his presence with a cough. Meng Yü-lou coughed in response and then threw a length of rope with a large bundle of silver attached to the end of it over the wall to him. This silver consisted of two hundred taels that had been taken from the prefectural depository for money confiscated from criminals and levied in fines.
Ch'en Ching-chi was about to tell Ch'en An to pick it up and get out of the way when:
The sound of a watchman's clapper was heard,[30] and four or five men suddenly appeared out of the dark shadows, calling out, "Thief! Thief!"
In no time at all, they bound Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An and reported the event to Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who ordered that they be incarcerated in the jail and brought before the bench the following morning.
It so happens that the presiding prefect of Yen-chou was a man named Hsü Feng, who was a native of Lin-t'ao prefecture in Shensi province, had passed the chin-shih examination in the year 1070 and was a man of absolute integrity and uprightness.
The next morning, he took his place on the bench, with two rows of lesser officials standing to either side, while Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i took the formal roll call, and the keeper of the repository reported on the theft, bringing Ch'en Ching-chi with him, and announcing, "Last night, during the third watch, the two initially unknown but now identified culprits Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An broke open the lock to the repository, stole two hundred taels worth of the money confiscated from criminals, climbed over the wall, and attempted to escape but were apprehended and are now ready to be brought before Your Honor."
Prefect Hsü Feng ordered that they be brought forward, and Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were, accordingly, hustled into the courtroom and made to kneel before the bench.
When the prefect saw that Ch'en Ching-chi was young and had a naturally clear-cut appearance, he questioned him, saying, "Where does this rascal come from, and why should he have come to this prefectural yamen of mine during the night, and stolen this amount of money confiscated from criminals from the government repository? What does he have to say for himself?"
Ch'en Ching-chi merely responded by kowtowing and protesting that he was being treated unjustly.
"Since you are guilty of larceny," said Prefect Hsü, "how can you claim to be treated unjustly?"
Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i bowed respectfully at his side and said, "Venerable sir, there is no reason for any further interrogation. The material evidence is before our eyes. Why do you not subject them to punishment?"
Prefect Hsü then ordered his subordinates to take them down and give them a flogging of twenty strokes with the bamboo.
Assistant Prefect Li remarked:
"Man is a miserable creature;
Unless you beat him he'll never confess.
Otherwise these thieves will try to wriggle out of it."
Thereupon, the lictors standing to either side took hold of Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An, turned them over, and began to beat them with the heavy bamboo.
Ch'en Ching-chi's only response was to curse, saying, "Who could have anticipated that that whore, Meng the Third, would try to ensnare me this way? It is unjust! It is bitter!"
Prefect Hsü Feng was an official with considerable experience in his prefectural office, and on hearing these cries, he thought to himself, "There must be something behind this."
After only ten strokes of the bamboo had been administered, he called out to the lictors, "That's enough for now. Take them back to the lockup, and we can continue the interrogation tomorrow."
Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i responded to this by saying, "Venerable sir, you ought not to let them off so easily. As the saying goes:
The human heart may be as hard as steel;
But legal prosecution is like a furnace.[31]
It may not matter if you let them off overnight, but it will give them an opportunity to concoct some alternative explanation."
"That will not be a problem," said Prefect Hsü. "I know what I'm doing."
Thereupon, the prison guards proceeded to take Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An back to the lockup.
Prefect Hsü Feng had some suspicions about the situation in his mind, so he summoned a trusted subordinate and instructed him, thus and so, to go to the lockup, endeavor to ascertain what lay behind the crime that had been committed, and then report back to him.
This man, thereupon, disguised himself as a prisoner, slept in the same cell with Ch'en Ching-chi that night, and asked him what had happened, saying, "Brother, you are still in the springtime of your youth and don't look like a criminal, but this day you have fallen into the clutches of the law and seem to be the victim of a miscarriage of justice."
Ch'en Ching-chi responded by saying:
"It's a long story.
I was originally the son-in-law of Hsi-men Ch'ing from Ch'ing-ho district. This woman, née Meng, who is the newly married bride of Assistant Prefect Li's son, was formerly a concubine of my father-in-law's, with whom I have had a sexual liaison. Now, on the occasion of her marriage, she brought with her ten trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, as part of her trousseau, that originally belonged to a relative of my family's, His Honor Yang Chien, who had entrusted them to my father-in-law's family for safekeeping. I came here with the intention of recovering them but have been double-crossed by her, thus and so, and ended up being arrested as a thief:
Severely beaten into making a confession,[32] and rendered no longer able to see the light of day. It's really intolerable."
Having heard this, his questioner made his way back to the rear hall of the yamen and reported it to Prefect Hsü, who said, "Just as I suspected, there was a reason why this man claimed to have suffered an injustice at the hands of this woman, née Meng."
The next day, when he took his place on the bench, with two rows of lesser officials standing to either side, Prefect Hsü Feng had Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An haled before him, directed that a record be made of their testimony, declared their innocence, and ordered them to be set free.
Assistant Prefect Li Ch'ang-ch'i, who was sitting beside him, did not know what was going on and objected repeatedly, saying, "Venerable sir, the guilt of these rascals is apparent. How can you let them go free?"
But Prefect Hsü, in front of his assembled subordinates, gave Assistant Prefect Li a severe dressing down, saying, "I occupy the senior office in this prefecture and derive my authority from the Emperor. It would not be right for me, on your family's behalf, to:
Abuse the law to avenge a private dispute,[33] and falsely accuse an innocent party of larceny. Your son has married the concubine, née Meng, of his deceased father-in-law, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who brought with her as part of her trousseau, trunkloads of gold and silver, and other valuables, that are subject to confiscation by the authorities. As Hsi-men Ch'ing's son-in-law, the accused has come here in the hope of recovering the said property. How can you bring yourself to frame him, have him arrested for a crime he did not commit, and then expect me to collaborate in this injustice on your family's behalf? As an official, one should:
Raise sons and raise daughters,
Hoping that they will become decent adults.
To allow them to act in this way, is a violation of justice."
In front of the court, he berated Assistant Prefect Li till his face turned red with embarrassment, and:
He hung his head in mortification,[34] not daring to utter another word. Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were then allowed to go free.
Not long afterwards, Prefect Hsü retired from the bench, and Assistant Prefect Li returned to his own quarters with his mind in a state of extreme turmoil.
When his wife noticed this, she said, "Sir, normally when you return from the courtroom, you act as though:
Nothing in Heaven or Earth could make you happier;

but today, you seem so unhappy. What's going on?"
"You're only a woman!" shouted Assistant Prefect Li. "What do you know about anything? You have given birth to a worthless son, and today, on his account, Prefect Hsü has subjected me to a severe dressing down in the open courtroom, in front of all the assembled subordinates. It's utterly enraging."
His wife was thrown into consternation by this response and asked, "What's it all about?"
Assistant Prefect Li merely called his son into his presence and shouted to his attendants, "Fetch a heavy bamboo cane. It's utterly enraging!"
He then addressed his son, saying, "You are responsible for bringing this woman into our household as your wife. And now, the son-in-law of her deceased husband has shown up, insisting, over and over again, that she brought with her as part of her trousseau trunkloads of gold and silver that belonged to the convicted court official Yang Chien and were entrusted to his father-in-law's family for safekeeping because they were subject to confiscation. He has come here in order to demand that you return them to him. He says that you surreptitiously removed government silver from the repository and used it to frame him as a thief. I didn't know a thing about this but have suffered a tongue lashing from Prefect Hsü in front of the entire contingent of other functionaries. This is something you have visited upon me when I have not even begun to exercise my authority for a single day. What use do I have for a worthless son like you?"
So saying, he ordered his attendants to begin beating him, and the strokes of the heavy bamboo fell on him like rain. Alas, the young squire was beaten until:
The skin was broken, the flesh was split, and Fresh blood spurted out.
When the prefect's wife saw that he was being beaten until he was scarcely recognizable, she wept on the sidelines and urged her husband to desist. Meng Yü-lou, also, eavesdropped on the scene from inside the postern gate to the residential quarters in the rear and wiped away her tears.
After he had been given thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo, Assistant Prefect Li ordered his attendants, saying, "Take the young squire into custody, and expel that woman of his from the premises at once. She can remarry anyone she chooses, and thereby avoid any further scandal, and allow me to reassert my integrity."
The young squire, Li Kung-pi, could not bear the thought of being separated from her, and fell to weeping and pleading before his parents, saying, "I would rather allow myself to be beaten to death by my father than relinquish my wife."
Assistant Prefect Li ordered that the young squire should be shackled with iron chains, confined in the rear quarters of the yamen, and not allowed out, with the intention of letting him die there.
His wife wept at this, saying, "Sir, in the course of your career as an official you have reached the age of more than fifty years, and this is the only offspring that you possess. If you confine him until he dies on account of this woman, in the future, when you grow old and retire from office, on whom will you rely?"
"But if I don't do so," said Assistant Prefect Li, "he will only continue to make trouble for me with my colleagues."
"If you don't wish to allow him to remain here," responded his wife, "why not send the two of them back to our ancestral home in Chen-ting prefecture?"
The assistant prefect allowed himself to be persuaded by his wife and consented to let the young squire go. He was given a limit of three days in which to arrange for transportation and set out with his wife for his native place in Tsao-ch'iang district, where he was to continue his studies.
To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi and Ch'en An were released from the yamen in Yen-chou prefecture, they returned to the monastery where they had been staying, picked up their luggage, and went straight back to the inn of Ch'en the Second in Ch'ing-chiang p'u.
When they asked for Yang the Elder, they were told, "Three days ago he went to the prefectural yamen to look for you and was told that you had been incarcerated in the lockup, so he came back, took charge of his boatload of cargo, and headed for home."
Ch'en Ching-chi could hardly believe this, so he went down to the waterfront to see for himself but came up empty-handed, being unable to find the boat.
"That god-damned creature!" he exclaimed. "How could he fail to wait for me, but simply take off on his own?"
On top of everything else, having just been released from the lockup, he had nothing in the way of traveling expenses at his disposal. He and Ch'en An had no recourse but to take passage on another boat, pawn their garments to cover the cost, and scrounge for food on their way home:
As flustered as a dog who has lost his way home;
As flurried as a fish who has
escaped the net.
Along the route, they sought for news of Yang the Elder but found no trace of him. At the time, it was already late autumn:
The trees were shedding leaves,
The metallic wind was turbulent, and the atmosphere was desolate. There is a poem of eight lines that describes the hardships suffered by travelers in the autumn:
Stem by stem the caltrop and the lotus wither;
Leaf by leaf the phoenix tree's foliage falls.
The crickets chirp in the decaying grasslands;
The wild geese come down upon the level sands.[35]
Drizzling rain showers drench the green woods;
The frost is heavy as the weather gets colder.
Those who do not have to journey on the roads;
Are quite unable to savor the taste of autumn.[36]
On the day that Ch'en Ching-chi finally arrived home, the servant Ch'en Ting was standing in the doorway. When he saw Ch'en Ching-chi arrive and noticed that:
His clothing looked disheveled,[37] and
His face was dark with sunburn, it gave him quite a start. After ushering him inside, he inquired about the whereabouts of his boatload of merchandise.
Ch'en Ching-chi was so angry that it took him what seemed like half a day to respond, telling him about the trial he had endured in Yen-chou prefecture, and saying, "I am lucky that the presiding officer, Prefect Hsü Feng, set me free. Otherwise:
My life would have been in jeopardy.[38]
And now, that god-damned creature Yang the Elder has made off with my merchandise, and who knows where he has taken it?"
The first thing Ch'en Ching-chi did was to send Ch'en Ting to Yang the Elder's home to see if he could find out anything, but they merely reported that he had not returned home yet. Ch'en Ching-chi then went in person to inquire about the situation but did not gain any information and came home and entered the house in a highly agitated state.
It so happens that Feng Chin-pao and Hsi-men Ta-chieh had proven to be incompatible:
One turning south and the other facing north.
Ever since Ch'en Ching-chi had embarked on his expedition, they had quarrelled with one another, right up until the day of his return.
Hsi-men Ta-chieh claimed that Feng Chin-pao had been secretly filching money to give to the procuress of the brothel from which she had been purchased, saying, "The servant from her place comes here all the time:
Surreptitiously acquiring things on the sly, and purchasing wine and meat for her, which she consumes in her own room, while the rest of us do without. She sleeps until noon all the time and refuses to buy anything for the household, simply leaving the rest of us to put up with it."
Feng Chin-pao, for her part, said, "Hsi-men Ta-chieh is so habitually lazy she will:
Neither pick up a bent piece of hay,
Nor glean a standing stalk of grain.[39]
She pilfers rice to exchange for baked wheat cakes to eat, and marinated pork which she sneaks into her room to share with her maidservant Yüan-hsiao."
Ch'en Ching-chi believed this last accusation and accosted Hsi-men Ta-chieh, saying, "So, you lousy worthless whore! I guess you must be suffering from such:
Acute consumption or avid craving, that you can't help pilfering rice to exchange for baked wheat cakes, and marinated pork to share with your maidservant."
So saying, he gave Yüan-hsiao a beating and kicked Hsi-men Ta-chieh a few times.
Hsi-men Ta-chieh was so upset by this that she chased after Feng Chin-pao and confronted her, head to head, saying, "What an adulterous whore you are! I suppose that the money you have been filching on behalf of that procuress of yours doesn't matter; but you actually have the gall to allege to my husband that I have been pilfering rice and meat for myself. This is a case of:
The curfew violator arresting the watchman.
And you have even incited my husband to kick me. I'll put my life up against yours any day, you whore. After all, what is it worth anyway?"
"What a fine whore you are!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi. "You offer to put your life up against hers, do you? You're not even worth as much as one of the toes on her feet."
This was one of those occasions on which:
Something was destined to happen,
and it turned out to be a catastrophe.
Thereupon, Ch'en Ching-chi, grabbed Hsi-men Ta-chieh by the hair with one hand and proceeded to pound her with his fist, kick her with his feet, and beat her with a stick. He beat her until blood oozed from her nostrils, and it seemed like half a day before she regained consciousness. Ch'en Ching-chi then retired to the quarters of his singing girl and went to sleep with her, leaving Hsi-men Ta-chieh in her own lesser quarters, where she gave way to:
Sobbing and wailing, as she cried bitterly, while Yüan-hsiao retired to the adjacent room to sleep. Alas, in the middle of the night, Hsi-men Ta-chieh suspended a length of rope from the rafters, and:
Hanged herself until dead.
At the time of her death she was twenty-three years of age.
The next morning, when Yüan-hsiao got up, she tried to push open the door to her bedroom but could not do so. Ch'en Ching-chi and Feng Chin-pao, who were still in bed at the time, sent their maidservant Ch'ung-hsi to fetch a wooden basin from Hsi-men Ta-chieh's room, so they could wash their feet; but she, also, was not able to push the door open.
At this, Ch'en Ching-chi started to curse, saying, "That lousy whore! How can she still be asleep at this hour and refuse to get up? I'll go kick her door open and pull the hair off her head."
Ch'ung-hsi managed to look in the window and said, "She has already gotten up and is amusing herself in the room by swinging."
She then went on to say, "It looks as though she has suspended herself like a puppet on a string."[40]
Yüan-hsiao also looked inside for what seemed like half a day before exclaiming, "Master, it's tragic. The mistress is hanging from the rafters over the bed and appears to be dead."
Only then was the young gentleman alarmed enough to get out of bed, along with his singing girl, kick open the door to her room, cut the rope by which she was suspended, lay her down, and attempt to revive her for what seemed like half a day. But there was not a breath left in her. There was no way they could tell when it had happened, but:
Alack and alas,
she had died. Truly:
Who knows to what place her true nature
may have flown;
Unless it is in the flying clouds and the autumn waters?[41]
When Ch'en Ting learned that Hsi-men Ta-chieh was dead, he was afraid of being implicated and went to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence to inform Yüeh-niang of what had happened.
When Yüeh-niang learned that Hsi-men Ta-chieh had committed suicide by hanging herself, and that Ch'en Ching-chi had brought a singing girl into his household, her feelings toward him were truly an instance of the adage:
When the ice is three feet thick,
It is not due to one day of cold.
Taking with her seven or eight of her page boys, maidservants, and servants' wives, she made her way straight to his place. When she set eyes on Hsi-men Ta-chieh's corpse, stretched out straight and stiff, she began to scream with rage, grabbed hold of Ch'en Ching-chi, and had her servants beat him until his entire body looked as though it had been gored with an awl in innumerable places. The singing girl Feng Chin-pao tried to hide under the bed, but she too was dragged out and beaten to a stinking pulp. Yüeh-niang had them smash the doors, windows, and walls of the house until they were in a shambles:
All at sevens and eights;[42] and also ordered them to ransack her room, and carry away the beds and curtains and other remains of her trousseau. When she arrived home, she invited her brothers, Wu K'ai and Wu the Second, to come and consult with her about the situation.
Wu K'ai said, "Sister, if you don't seize this occasion, when a member of your family has perished, to take the case to court, in the future, when he has trouble making a living, he will come back and demand those trunks from you once again.
If one does not take thought for the future,
One is sure to meet with present misfortune.[43]
The best thing to do would be to take him to court and have the case settled once and for all, in order to:
Stave off any future catastrophe."
"Brother, what you say is right," responded Yüeh-niang, and they proceeded, forthwith, to set about drafting an accusation.
The next day, Yüeh-niang went in person to the courtroom in the district yamen and submitted her accusation.
It so happens that the newly appointed district magistrate was named Huo Ta-li. He was a native of Huang-kang district in the Hu-kuang region, a holder of the provincial graduate degree, and a person of upright character. When he learned that the case was a serious one, involving a human fatality, he promptly took his place on the bench and accepted the accusation, which read as follows:

The plaintiff, née Wu, is a thirty-three-year-old woman who is the widow of the deceased Battalion Commander Hsi-men Ch'ing.

The target of her accusation is her unworthy son-in-law, who has taken advantage of her widowhood by crediting the accusations of a singing girl, and mistreating her daughter so egregiously that she has committed suicide by hanging herself. She importunes you to show her due consideration by undertaking a thorough investigation of this case, and thereby saving her from an early death.
The son-in-law in question, whose name is Ch'en Ching-chi, originally sought refuge by residing for some years in my husband's household because his family was implicated in a legal case. He is given to drinking to excess and becoming violent, is not the sort to abide by his lot, and is wont to take his cut of both outgo and income. For this reason, fearing legal entanglements, I expelled him from the household. I failed to anticipate that this Ch'en Ching-chi would harbor such hatred for me that he would constantly mistreat my daughter, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, in his own home, and force her to put up with it for some time. Unpredictably, he also brought a singing girl from Lin-ch'ing named Feng Chin-pao into his home and gave her the master suite in which to reside. Believing whatever she said to provoke him, he resorted to humiliating his wife in every way, beating her, pulling her hair, and kicking her until her entire body was covered with bruises, and she could not bear it any longer, feeling as though she was about to die. This year, on the twenty-third day of the ninth month, during the third watch of the night, he drove his wife to commit suicide by hanging herself. If I had not brought an accusation against him, I fear that this Ch'en Ching-chi, with his fierce and uncontrollable nature, would take advantage of my widowhood, since he has actually threatened to attack me with knife in hand. These circumstances are intolerable. [44] I therefore implore that you have him arrested and brought before you in order to examine thoroughly the facts behind my daughter's death. If this case is pursued according to the law, potential felons will be deterred, law-abiding citizens will be able to live in peace, and the dead will be relieved of their sense of injustice. This is the reason why I have brought this accusation before you, as the presiding magistrate of this district, Lord "Azure Heaven," in the hope that you will act upon it.

The district magistrate, Huo Ta-li, in his position on the bench, read the accusation, and observed that Wu Yüeh-niang was attired in mourning garments, was the widow of an official of the fifth rank, and that:
Her countenance was upright and correct, and
Her bearing both nonchalant and elegant.
He then bowed toward her, rose from his seat, and addressed her, saying, "Lady Wu, please stand up. I see that you are the widow of a duly appointed official, and I understand the charges that are enumerated in your accusation. Please return home. There is no need for you to remain here any longer. In the future, it will suffice to have a servant from your household attend the court proceedings. I will issue a warrant for his arrest here and now."
Wu Yüeh-niang promptly bowed to the district magistrate, went outside, and rode home in her sedan chair, delegating Lai-chao to monitor the court proceedings for her.
The magistrate then signed the deposition and deputed two yamen runners with a bench warrant to take Ch'en Ching-chi and the singing girl Feng Chin-pao into custody, along with the neighbors to either side of his residence, and the head of the relevant mutual security unit, who were required to attend the court in person for the scheduled hearing.
Ch'en Ching-chi was at home at the time, engaged in making the funeral arrangements. When he heard that Wu Yüeh-niang had lodged an accusation against him, and that the district yamen had sent runners with a warrant for his arrest, he was so perturbed that:
His ethereal souls flew beyond the sky, and
His material souls fled to the nine heavens.
Feng Chin-pao, for her part, had been so badly beaten that:
Her entire body was racked with pain,[45] and she was trying to recuperate by lying in bed. When she heard that runners had come to arrest her:
Her fear was so great,
She lost her bearings.
Ch'en Ching-chi impulsively offered money to the runners in order to treat them to wine and food, but they proceeded to truss him up, together with the singing girl, with a single length of rope, and drag them off to the district yamen, along with their next-door neighbors Fan Kang, who lived to the left, and Sun Chi, who lived to the right, and the head of the mutual security unit, Wang K'uan.
When the district magistrate Huo Ta-li saw that the wanted persons had been duly arrested, he promptly took his place on the bench, while Lai-chao knelt up front, and Ch'en Ching-chi, Feng Chin-pao, and the rest knelt at the foot of the steps.
After rereading the accusation, the district magistrate called Ch'en Ching-chi before him and said, "So you are Ch'en Ching-chi."
He then went on to ask, "Which of you is Feng Chin-pao?"
Feng Chin-pao replied, "I am Feng Chin-pao."
The district magistrate then proceeded to interrogate Ch'en Ching-chi, saying, "What a despicable rascal you are. How could you have believed the allegations of that singing girl, and beaten Hsi-men Ta-chieh so severely that she hung herself? What have you got to say in your defense?"
Ch'en Ching-chi kowtowed to him and said, "I beseech Your Honor, Lord 'Azure Heaven,' to investigate the facts in this case. How could I have dared to beat her so severely as to cause her death? It is all because a manager of mine has absconded with the capital I entrusted to him, so that I arrived home in a bad temper and asked her to prepare a meal for me, which she refused to do, that I kicked her a couple of times. Then, in the middle of the night, she:
Hanged herself until dead."
"Since you have taken this singing girl into your household," exclaimed the magistrate, "why should you have imposed upon your wife to prepare a meal for you? It doesn't make any sense. The accusation lodged by the Lady Wu states that it was only because you had beaten her daughter nearly to death that she hung herself. Yet you still refuse to acknowledge it."
"The Lady Wu and I are enemies," protested Ch'en Ching-chi. "That is why she is falsely accusing me. I hope that Your Honor will investigate the facts of the case."
The magistrate was enraged at this and said, "The fact is that her daughter is dead. Who else do you propose to blame for it?"
He then ordered his attendants to take Ch'en Ching-chi down and give him twenty strokes with the heavy bamboo; and he had Feng Chin-pao haled before him, put into the squeezers, and given one hundred strokes on them. When these procedures had been carried out, the runners were ordered to take the culprits off and lock them up.
The next day, he deputed the docket officer Tsang Pu-hsi to take a clerk, along with the head of the mutual security unit, and the next-door neighbors, and proceed to Ch'en Ching-chi's home, where the corpse was brought out and subjected to a formal inquest. It was found that since Hsi-men Ta-chieh's entire body was covered with bruises, and there were rope marks around her throat, it must have been true that Ch'en Ching-chi had kicked and beaten her so severely that she could not bear it any longer and had:
Hanged herself until dead.
Depositions were taken, bond was posted for the witnesses, and the inquest report was duly filled out and submitted upon their return to the district yamen.
The magistrate was incensed at this and ordered that both Ch'en Ching-chi and Feng Chin-pao should be stripped and subjected to another ten strokes of the bamboo. He then issued a provisional finding that Ch'en Ching-chi, who was judged guilty of the crime of beating his wife to death, should be sentenced to strangulation; and that Feng Chin-pao should be sentenced to a hundred strokes of the bamboo and sent back to serve in the brothel from which she had come.
Ch'en Ching-chi was thrown into a panic by this and wrote a note in his prison cell directing Ch'en Ting to scrape together the sum of a hundred taels of silver from the capital of his piece goods store and Hsi-men Ta-chieh's head ornaments, and deliver it secretly to the district magistrate.
That night, the district magistrate altered the deposition so that the provisional judgement read that the defendant had coerced his wife to death, which was only a miscellaneous capital crime, redeemable by five years of penal servitude, or commutation in return for a payment to be used for the transport of charcoal.
When Wu Yüeh-niang learned of this, she knelt in front of the yamen gate and pled for reconsideration of the finding.
The district magistrate responded by calling her before him and saying. "My lady, your daughter was found to have rope marks around her throat, so how can you claim that her husband is guilty of beating her to death? To do so is surely to make a travesty of justice. If you are afraid that he will continue to molest you in the future, I will issue a written injunction prohibiting him from ever visiting your premises again."
He then had Ch'en Ching-chi brought before him and enjoined him, saying, "I have chosen to spare your life today, but it is essential that you should:
Correct your faults and renew yourself.
You must never again make trouble for the household of the Lady Wu. If you are ever brought before me for doing so in the future, I will certainly not spare you. You must immediately purchase a coffin for your wife, see that her corpse is dressed for burial, arrange for a funeral procession, and take care of her burial. When you report back to me, I will then forward the necessary documents to the higher authorities."
Ch'en Ching-chi, having been spared execution, turned over the sum of money required to commute his sentence and returned home, where he had Hsi-men Ta-chieh's corpse encoffined, arranged for her to lie in state until the first weekly commemoration was over, held a scripture recitation in her honor, and had her taken outside the city to be buried. Altogether, he had endured incarceration for half a month, had been compelled to expend a considerable sum of silver, and had been deprived of the singing girl Feng Chin-pao. His belongings had been completely cleaned out, he had been forced to sell his home, he had barely escaped with his life, and he no longer dared to bring charges against his mother-in-law. Truly:
Disaster and good fortune have no gateways, people bring them on themselves; [46]
One must be aware that when joy reaches its zenith, it gives birth to sorrow. [47]
A poem testifies to this:

Storms may be stirred up in untroubled waters within domestic confines;
The value of rectitude and worth of kindness[48] should never be forgotten.
When the Blue Bridge was inundated by water[49] a meeting was expected;
But the 3 lovers have become separated like Orion and Antares.

The savage tiger trusts to its own strength
But often is taken unawares.
It growls like thunder then, but that is all,
For the chains are set upon its legs.
When we see the tiger sleeping,
Its eyes have not the fierceness that we know.
The life of man is in worse case
Should evil men then not take heed?
Ximen Dajie came to Chen Jingji with all her belongings, but they were continually quarreling. He had asked his mother to give him some money to set him up in business. His Uncle Zhang borrowed fifty taels of silver from Mistress Chen and asked Jingji to find some work for him. One day, Jingji got drunk and quarreled with his uncle. This upset the uncle very much. He went elsewhere to borrow money and repaid the fifty taels he had had from his sister. This so distressed Mistress Chen that she fell ill. She had to go to bed; the doctors were sent for, and she took their medicine. Her son worried her so much about money that she gave him two hundred taels and Chen Ding was bidden to start a cloth shop at the front of the house. Jingji invited Lu the Third and Yang, and other foxy and doggish friends, to come to the shop, play the lute, gamble, and dice. This happened every day and, as they drank until midnight, the money was soon gone. Chen Ding told his mistress what was happening, and she placed her confidence in him. But Jingji accused Chen Ding and his wife of making money for themselves out of the dyeing of the cloth, and dismissed them. Then he asked Yang the Elder, whose name was Yang Guanyan, to be his manager.
This man's nickname was Iron Fingernails. He was a thorough-paced rascal, a magnificent liar, and skilled in the art of making something out of nothing. When he promised anything to anyone, they had as much chance of getting it as of catching a shadow, but when he made up his mind to get money out of anybody, it seemed as easy as if he took it from a sack.
Chen Jingji got another three hundred taels from his mother, so now his business had cost five hundred taels. First he had to go to buy cloth at Linqing. Yang went home, packed his baggage, then went back to Jingji and they started together for Linqing to buy what they needed. It was a place of considerable importance and a center of trade. People came to it from all sides. There were thirty-two flower and willow streets and seventy-two halls of music. Jingji was still young and only too glad to go with Yang to places of this sort instead of occupying himself with the purchases he had to make.
One day they went to a house where they saw a girl called Feng Jinbao. She was attractive and beautiful, and perfect from every point of view. They asked how old she was.
"She is my own daughter," the old procuress told them, "and my only source of livelihood. She is just sixteen years old."
Jingji was entranced. He gave the old woman five taels of silver and spent several nights with Feng Jinbao. When Yang saw how absorbed in the girl the young man was, so that he could not be persuaded to leave her, he suggested that Jingji should marry the girl and take her home with him. The old procuress demanded a hundred and twenty taels, but, after some discussion, she came down to a hundred. Jingji paid the money and took away the girl. She sat in a sedan chair; Yang and Jingji rode on horseback with the cloth they had bought. They cracked their whips, set their horses at the gallop, and were very pleased with themselves.
When they got home, Mistress Chen was so much upset to find that they had only bought a small supply of merchandise and that her son had married a singing girl that she died. Jingji bought a coffin, put his mother in it, called in some monks to hold a service and buried her in about a week's time. Her brother Zhang remembered how kind she had been to him and made no trouble with Jingji.
As soon as the young man came back from the grave, he set up his mother's tablet in the upper room and gave the other two rooms to Feng Jinbao, leaving only a little room for his wife. Then he bought a maid called Chongxi for Feng Jinbao. Yang looked after the shop and Jingji stayed at home and enjoyed the finest of food and drink. He spent every night with the singing girl and paid not the slightest attention to his wife.
One day he heard that Meng Yulou had married the magistrate's son and taken with her a considerable amount of property. Then the magistrate's term of office expired, and he was made Sub-Prefect at Yanzhou. He went to take up this new appointment. This reminded Jingji that he had once picked up one of Yulou's pins in the garden. He decided that he would take this pin with him to Yanzhou, and, with that as his evidence, claim that Yulou had had an intrigue with him and had given him the pin. He would say that everything she had brought with her from Ximen's household really belonged to Yang Jian and should have been confiscated.
The magistrate Li, he thought, was only a civil officer and not one of very high rank, and a few sharp words would induce him to order his son to give up Yulou. "Then," the young man said to himself, "I will bring her back with me and, with Feng Jinbao, I shall have two women for my enjoyment." Unfortunately for him, the matter did not turn out as pleasantly as he expected.
He opened his mother's chests and took a thousand taels of silver. He gave a hundred to Feng Jinbao and re-engaged Chen Ding to look after the shop. Then he and Yang, with his servant Chen An, took the remaining nine hundred taels and set off for Huzhou at the time of the Autumn Festival. There they bought silk of various kinds enough to load half a boat. Then they came to the wharf of Qingjiang. They moored their boat and went to an inn kept by a man called Chen the Second. They ordered chickens to be killed and called for wine, and Jingji and Yang the Elder drank together.
While they were drinking, Jingji said to his friend: "You stay here a few days and keep an eye on the boat, and Chen An and I will go to visit my sister who is married to a nobleman at Yanzhou. We shall be back in three or four days."
"Yes, Brother, go by all means," Yang said. "I will wait for you and, when you come back, we will start for home."
So Jingji took his money and some presents and set out for Yanzhou. When he came to the city, he lodged at a temple. He heard that the new Sub-Prefect Li had entered upon his office a month before, but that his family had only arrived three days ago. Jingji wasted no time. He bought some food, put it with two rolls of silk and two jars of wine, and gave them to Chen An to carry. Then he dressed in his best clothes, and so, looking very handsome, came to the Prefecture. There he bowed to the gatekeeper.
"Excuse me," he said, "but I am a relative of your master's daughter-in-law."
The gatekeeper went at once to tell his master. The young man was in his study, reading. When he was told that his wife's brother had come, he ordered the servants to take the presents, and told the gatekeeper to introduce the visitor. He put on his ceremonial dress.
Jingji was taken to the hall, and there he and Master Li made reverence to one another.
"When I married," Master Li said, "I was not aware that my wife had a brother."
"I was away then," Jingji said, "buying goods in Sichuan and Guangdong. I was away about a year and did not know that my sister had married. I am sorry. But now I have brought a few trifles and have come in the hope of seeing my sister."
"I am only sorry I did not know you before," Master Li said.
When they had had tea, the young man ordered a servant to take the presents and the card to Yulou. She was in her room when the message came.
"It must be my brother, Meng Rui, who has come all this way to see me," she said. She looked at the card, and it bore Meng Rui's name. She gave instructions that the visitor should be taken in, told Lanxiang to see that the great hall was tidy, and, when she had dressed, went to see her brother. Through the lattice, she saw her husband with a young man. It was not her brother but Chen Jingji.
"What can this young man be doing here?" she said to herself. "I must go and see. Even if we are not relatives, we belong to the same part of the world, and whether the water tastes sweet or not, it is the water of my native place. Though he is not my brother, he is my son-in-law."
She went in and greeted Chen Jingji.
"Sister," he said, "I did not know that you were married and living here."
The words were hardly out of his mouth when a servant came and told Li that another guest had arrived. He asked his wife to entertain her brother and went to receive the other visitor.
"What wind blows you here?" Yulou said.
When they had exchanged greetings, Yulou asked him to sit down, and told Lanxiang to bring some tea. They talked about the affairs of the family. Yulou inquired after Ximen Dajie, and Jingji told her how his wife and all her belongings had been sent to him. Yulou told him that she had met Chunmei at the Temple of Eternal Felicity at the Festival of Spring, and that she had burned paper offerings there for Pan Jinlian.
"I often used to tell the Great Lady that she should love you as well as her daughter-in-law," she said. "After all, you are her son-in-law and not a stranger. But she would believe the gossip that came to her ears, and that is how you came to be sent away. I never heard anything about your property."
"It is true that I did have dealings with Jinlian," Jingji said. "The Great Lady believed what the slaves said and drove me away. Then Wu Song killed Jinlian. If she had still been in that house, Wu Song, however bold a man he may be, would never have dared to go and kill her. That is a fact I shall never forget. Now Jinlian is dead and in Hades, and she will never forgive."
"Well, it is all over and done with now," Yulou said; "as the proverb says: hatred should be forgotten and not made more intense."
The maids brought food and wine and set it on the table. Yulou poured out a cup of wine and offered it to Jingji with both hands. "Brother-in-law," she said, "you have come a long way and spent much money on me. Please accept this poor cup of wine." Jingji bowed to her and took it. Then he poured out a cup for her. He noticed that she always addressed him as Brother-in-law. "Why doesn't the strumpet take the hint?" he said to himself. "Now let us see what happens."
The wine was passed three times, and they had reached the fifth course. They seemed to be getting on very well. Jingji's face was flushed with wine and, as the proverb says: wine makes desire as deep as the sea and stirs up lust as high as the heavens. There was nobody about, and he began to make evil suggestions.
"I have thought of you," he said, "as a thirsty man thinks of water, as a man seeks refreshment from the blazing heat. You remember how, when my father-in-law was alive, we used to sit close together playing chess. We never thought we should have to separate, and that you would be in the east and I in the west."
"No, Brother-in-law," Yulou said, "but don't forget the difference between right and wrong."
Jingji smiled, took some fragrant tea from his sleeve and gave it to Yulou. "Sister," he said, "if you will have pity on me, take this tea." He knelt down before her.
Yulou flushed, and threw the tea on the floor. "Evidently, you have no idea how to behave in a proper manner," she said. "I was good enough to offer you wine, and now you think you can behave as you like with me." She got up from the table and prepared to go to her room.

When Jingji found that she would not do what he wished, he picked up the tea. "I came here to see you," he said, "but how you have changed. I suppose now you have married the son of a Sub-Prefect I'm not good enough for you any more. When you were the third lady in Ximen Qing's household, things were very different, weren't they?"
He took the silver pin from his sleeve and held it out. "Whose is this pin?" he cried. "If you never had anything to do with me, what am I doing with it? Your name is on it. You and that woman plotted together to share between you all the precious things I left there. They belonged to Yang Jian, and the authorities should have had them. Now you have brought them to this new husband of yours, but wait and see whether I don't bring you to the place where you belong."
Yulou heard this. She knew that the pin was really hers. It was a pin with a gold head shaped like a lotus. She remembered losing it in the garden, but had no idea how Jingji had got hold of it. She was afraid the servants might hear of it, so she smiled at him. She even went over to him and took his hand.
"Good Brother-in-law," she said, "why did you take me seriously? I was joking."
She looked around, saw that there was nobody about, and said quietly: "If you care for me, I care for you too." No more was said. They put their arms about one another and kissed. Jingji put out his tongue like a snake's and made her take it into her mouth.
"You must call me your dearest husband, or I will not believe you," he said.
"Hush!" Yulou said. "Somebody will hear us."
"On a boat in the river I have some goods that I have bought," Jingji said. "We will go to it together. This evening, you can disguise yourself as a servant and come with me. I don't see why we should not. He is only a civil official and will not make any trouble. He won't dare to come and arrest us."
"Very well," Yulou said. "I agree. Come for me this evening and wait at the back of the house. First of all, I will throw a parcel of valuables over the wall. Then I will dress as a servant and come to you by the door and we will go to your boat."
Readers, when a beautiful woman takes an idea firmly into her head, even if the walls are ten thousand feet high, she cannot be prevented from carrying it out. But if she rejects it, you may be sitting in the same room with her, yet it will be as though a thousand mountains kept you apart.
If Yulou had married a fool, a man who was not so attractive as Chen Jingji, Jingji would certainly have succeeded in seducing her, but she had married young Li, who not only had a future in store for him, but was a brisk and lively fellow. She loved him and was quite content with her marriage. There was no reason why she should yield to Jingji. The unfortunate young man told her all his plans, but she deceived him.
When Jingji had drunk more wine, he went away. Young Master Li took him to the gate, and he went away with Chen An.
"Where is your brother staying?" Master Li asked his wife. "I must call on him tomorrow and take some sort of a present."
"He is not my brother at all," Yulou said. "He is Ximen Qing's son-in-law, and he came here because he wanted me to run away with him. I told him I would wait for him this evening at the back of the house. I mean to cheat him so that he is arrested as a thief and got rid of finally."
"Really, the fellow goes beyond all bounds," Master Li said. "But without my going to see him, he will come of his own accord and meet his death at my hands." He went out and told a trusted servant.
Jingji suspected nothing. At the third night watch, he came to the back of the house with Chen An. He coughed and Yulou answered. Then, over the wall, some silver was lowered at the end of a rope. It was about two hundred taels and had been taken from the official treasury. Jingji had hardly told Chen An to take it, when the watchman's alarm sounded, and four or five tall fellows came running out, crying: "Thief! Thief!" They seized Jingji and Chen An. The matter was reported to the Sub-Prefect, and he gave orders that the men should be thrown into jail and brought up for examination the next day.
The Prefect of Yanzou was called Xu Feng. He came from Lintao in Shaanxi. He had taken his examination in Gengxu, and was a very just and honorable man. He came to the hall of justice, and all the officers attended him. Sub-Prefect Li came and signed his name in the register. Then an official came and told Xu about the case, and Jingji was brought in.
"Last night," the official said, "about the third night watch, these two men, whose names we now know to be Chen Jingji and Chen An, broke open the treasury door and stole about two hundred taels of silver that are the proceeds of other cases. Then they jumped over the wall, but were caught and arrested."
The Prefect ordered his men to bring forward the thieves, and Chen Jingji and Chen An were hustled towards him. They knelt down. The Prefect saw that Jingji was only a young man and very good-looking. "Young fellow," he said, "where do you come from? What do you mean by coming to a government building to steal money belonging to the treasury? Have you anything to say?"
Jingji kowtowed again and again and protested he was innocent.
"How can you be innocent?" the Prefect said. "You stole the money, didn't you?"
Then the Sub-Prefect, who was sitting beside Xu, bowed and said: "My lord, ask him no more. The silver was found upon him. Why do you hesitate to punish him?"
The Prefect ordered Jingji to be given twenty strokes.
"Men are hard creatures," the Sub-Prefect said. "They never confess without a good beating. This young man, you see, is no exception to the rule."
The attendants threw Jingji to the ground and beat him with a thick cane. He yelled and shrieked. "I never realized what that strumpet Meng was up to," he cried. "It is she who has done this. Oh dear! Oh dear!"
Now Xu was a man who had taken a degree and, when he heard this, he thought there must be something underneath. When the young man had had ten strokes, he gave orders that he should be taken back to prison and brought up again the next day.
"That, I suggest, is the wrong course," the Sub-Prefect said. "The proverb tells us that men's hearts are as hard as iron, but the law is heavy as a mountain. If you give him one night, he will take back his confession in the morning."
"I know what I am doing," the Prefect said, and again told the jailers to put Jingji into prison. He was somewhat suspicious as to what was behind this case, and sent a man he trusted to the prison to ask Jingji what it was all about. The man disguised himself as one of the prisoners and spent the night with Chen Jingji.
"Brother," he said, "you are a young man and you do not look like a thief. I believe you are innocent."
"It is a long story," Jingji said. "I am the son-in-law of Ximen Qing of Qinghe. The woman Meng, who married Sub-Prefect Li's son, was one of my father-in-law's wives. Once she had a love affair with me, and now she has brought ten chests of gold and silver and precious things to Li's son. Those things once belonged to Yang Chien, and he left them in my father-in-law's care. I came here to ask for them, but they laid this trap for me and I fell into it. They arrested me as a thief and made me confess. Oh dear! Oh dear! Now I can see the blue sky and the sun no more."
The Prefect's servant went back and told all this to his master.
"When he mentioned the woman Meng, I wondered what there was at the back of it," the Prefect said.
The next day, he came again to the hall, and Chen Jingji and Chen An were brought before him. The Prefect extracted the real truth from the young man and set him free. The Sub-Prefect, who did not know what had happened, said: "My lord, he stole the money. Why do you let him go?"
The Prefect rebuked his assistant before all the other officers. "I am the Prefect here," he said, "and I serve his Majesty faithfully. It is not my business to take up your private quarrels, and to brand this innocent young man as a thief. Your son married a woman named Meng, one of Ximen Qing's concubines, and she brought with her many things that ought to have been handed over to the government. This young man is Ximen Qing's son-in-law, and he came to claim them. You have no right whatever to make him out a thief and try to have him punished as such. I am not here to do your dirty work. You are an officer and you have children, and you are trying to forward your children's interests. If this is the way you do it, it is an offense against justice."
The Sub-Prefect was ashamed. He flushed and bowed his head. It was a great blow to his pride, and he dared not say a word. Chen Jingji and Chen An went away.
When the Prefect had retired, Li went home in a furious temper. "This is the son you have reared for me," he cried to his wife. "He has caused the Prefect to insult me in the presence of all the officers. It nearly killed me."
His wife was upset and asked what was the matter.
The Sub-Prefect sent for his son and told the servants to bring him a thick rod. "Now!" he cried. "That thief you said you caught is Ximen Qing's son-in-law. That woman of yours brought many things away from Ximen's house and the young man said in the court that they had belonged to the criminal Yang Chien. He came here to demand them. You told me that he stole silver from the treasury and got me to treat him as a thief. I knew nothing at all of the truth, and the result is that I have been disgraced by the Prefect before all the officers of the court. That is what my son does for me, and I have only been in this post a few months. What use is such a son to me?"
He ordered his servants to beat the young man, and the blows rained down upon him. His flesh and skin were torn and the blood gushed out. The old lady could not bear the sight, and sobbed and tried to make her husband stop. Yulou stood, weeping, at the corner door.
When the young man had been given thirty strokes, the Sub-Prefect bade his servants stop.
"Get rid of this woman at once," he said. "Let her marry whom she pleases. I am not going to have her here to ruin my family."
Young Master Li could not bear this. He knelt down before his parents and cried: "I would rather die than give up this woman."
Then the Sub-Prefect ordered his servants to shut up the young man in a room at the back of the house. He was put in chains, for his father meant him to die there.
"My lord," the Sub-Prefect's wife said to him, "you are of official rank, and you are more than fifty years of age. You have only this one son. It is not right that you should let him die for the sake of this woman. When you are old and retired, who will care for you?"
"No," the Sub-Prefect said, "so long as he is here, I shall have everybody insulting me."
"Then send them away to Zhengdingfu, where our home is, if you won't have them here," his wife said.
The Sub-Prefect agreed. The young man was brought out again and told that he would have to take his wife and leave for his native place within three days.
When Chen Jingji and Chen An left Yanzhou, they removed their luggage from the temple and went back to the inn where they had left Yang.
"Yang told me he had received a letter from you saying you were not coming back," the host said. "He has taken everything and gone."
Jingji could not believe this. He went to the river to look for the boat, but it was not to be seen. "What an outrageous scoundrel!" he said then. "Why did he go away without waiting for me?" He had just come out of prison and had no money. So he and Chen An got on a boat and pawned their clothes to pay the passage money. They looked like a pair of stray dogs, like fish wriggling out of the net. All the way along, they asked for news of Yang the Elder, but heard nothing. It was now the end of autumn. The leaves were withered in the woods, and the West wind drove fiercely. It was sad and cold.
Sadly, the lotus withers
Leaf after leaf, the Wutong fades
The crickets chirp in the rotted grass
The wild goose rests on the barren sand
A fine rain drenches the dark forest
A heavy frost chills the air.
He who is not a wayfarer
Will never know what Autumn is.
At last Chen Jingji reached home. Chen Ding was standing at the door. Jingji's face was as black as lacquer and his clothes were nothing but rags. The servant was shocked. He took his master in and asked him where the boat was.
For a long time the young man could not speak. Then he told the servant what had happened to him in Yanzhou. "Fortunately," he said, "the Prefect set me free or my life would have been in danger. Then that heaven-destroying rascal Yang stole my merchandise, and I have no idea where he has gone." He told Chen Ding to go to Yang's house to find out if he had returned. Chen Ding was told that Yang the Elder had not yet come home. Then Jingji himself went to Yang's house, but could get no information. He was very much upset and went to his wife's room. He found her quarreling with Feng Jinbao. Indeed the two women had spent all their time quarreling while he had been away.
His wife said that Feng Jinbao had given a great sum of money to the old procuress and that the old woman came every day, stole things away, and brought food and wine that she ate with her daughter. She herself could get nothing to eat. Feng Jinbao used to sleep until noon and would not give her a penny to buy anything with.
Feng Jinbao said that Ximen Dajie did not do a stroke of work. She would not even stoop down to pick up a piece of straw. She stole rice and changed it for buns. She stole the preserved meats and ate them with her maid.
Chen Jingji believed what Feng Jinbao said and cursed his wife. "You whore!" he cried. "Are you starving that you must steal rice and change it for buns? And you and your maid have been stealing meat."
He beat the maid and kicked his wife. This annoyed her so much that she went and beat her head against her enemy's. "You whore!" she cried. "It was you who stole the things and gave them to the old whore. Yet you lie to my husband and say I stole them. That is like the thief arresting the policeman. You told my husband to kick me. Well, I will live no longer and you shall die with me."
"How dare you, you little strumpet," Jingji cried. "You are not worth one of her little toes."
With one hand he seized his wife's hair and beat her with the other. He kicked her, too. She bled from nose and mouth and was unconscious for a long time. Jingji went to the other room with the singing girl.
Alone in her room, Ximen Dajie sobbed bitterly. Her maid went to sleep in another room. At midnight, Ximen Qing's daughter tied a rope around the beam and hanged herself. She was only twenty-four years old.
The next morning, when her maid got up and tried to open the door, she could not. Jingji and Feng Jinbao were still in bed. Feng Jinbao told her maid to go to Ximen Dajie and ask for a bowl so that she could wash her feet. But the maid could not open the door.
"What!" Jingji cried. "Is she still in bed? It is not early now. I will go and open the strumpet's door and pull her hair for her."
The maid looked through the window. "She is up there," she said: "I can see her swinging. She looks as if she were trying to be one of the dolls in a puppet play."
Then Ximen Dajie's maid looked through the window. "Father," she cried, "Mother has hanged herself."
Chen Jingji was much disturbed at this. He and Feng Jinbao got up. They forced open the door and cut Ximen Dajie down. But she had been dead a long time, and nobody knew the hour at which she had died.
When Chen Ding heard of his mistress's death, he was afraid he might be involved in the matter and went to tell Wu Yueniang. So she heard that her daughter had hanged herself and her son-in-law had taken up with a singing girl. The hatred between herself and Jingji was like ice three feet thick, not the result of one night's frost. She went with servants, maids, and women, seven or eight of them, and came to Jingji's door. There she roundly declared that her daughter had hanged herself, and made a great to-do. She seized Jingji and beat him and even stuck awls into him. The singing girl, Feng Jinbao, hid under a bed, but was dragged out and beaten until she was half dead. They smashed the doors and windows and took away the bed and curtains and furniture that had belonged to Ximen Dajie.
Then Yueniang went home and sent for Uncle Wu the Elder and Uncle Wu the Second.
"Sister," Uncle Wu the Elder said, "we must take this opportunity and bring him before the courts, or he will make things very unpleasant in the future. He is sure to come and demand his property, and, if we don't look a long way ahead, we shall have trouble. We had better go to law at once and have the thing settled once and for all."
"Brother, you are right," Yueniang said.
They drew up an accusation and, the next day, Yueniang herself went to the magistrate. When she went to the Town Hall, her accusation was sent in.
The new magistrate was called Huo Dali. He was a graduate and a native of Huanggang, an upright and conscientious man. When he was told about the suicide, he went to the hall and took the accusation. It said:
The accuser is the Lady Wu, thirty-four years of age, widow of the late Ximen Qing, Captain. She accuses her evil son-in-law as a deceiver and oppressor. He believed the words of a strumpet and forced his wife to hang herself. The Lady Wu implores you to investigate this matter and save her life.
This son-in-law is Chen Jingji. He came to her when he was in trouble and lived in her house for many years. He was fond of wine and caused trouble. He was undutiful and created disturbances within and without the household. Being a law-abiding woman, she got rid of him. Ever since that time he has hated her and treated his wife badly. He beat her and ill-used her, but she bore it for a long time.
Then he brought home a strumpet from Linqing, a certain Feng Jinbao. This woman occupied the room that should have been the Lady Wu's daughter's. He believed whatever she said to him, and ill-used his wife in every way. He pulled her hair and kicked her till her body was covered with bruises, and she could bear it no longer.
Then, at the third night watch on the twenty-third day of the eighth month of this year, she hanged herself.
This Chen Jingji obstinately seeks to oppress the Lady Wu, and threatens that he will kill her also. This is intolerable, and she implores your Lordship to arrest and try him for being the cause of her daughter's death.
So may evil doers know the law, and the good live in peace. So will the dead be avenged.
With this accusation, the Lady Wu accuses this man. To the Magistrate of the District, whose justice is that of the Blue Heavens.
The magistrate looked at Yueniang. She was wearing white. She was, he remembered, the widow of an officer of the fifth class. She was dignified in manner and refined in appearance. He rose and said: "Lady, stand up. I believe you are the widow of an officer. I understand. Go home and leave a servant to take your place here. I will have the man arrested at once."
Yueniang thanked him and went home in a sedan chair, leaving Laizhao behind. The magistrate ordered two runners to take the white badge to their office and arrest Chen Jingji and Feng Jinbao, and order the attendance of the watchman in that neighborhood.
Jingji was very busy making preparations for the funeral when he heard that runners had been sent to arrest him at the request of his mother-in-law. He was almost distracted. Feng Jinbao, who was in bed after the beating she had received at Yueniang's hands, was so terrified when she heard that she was under arrest, that she hardly knew whether she was alive or dead. Without stopping to think, Jingji tried to bribe the runners, but the runners bound them with one cord and hauled them to the Town Hall. The neighbors and the local watchman went to the Town Hall with them.
When the magistrate heard that they had come, he went again to the hall. Laizhao knelt down on the left, Chen Jingji, Feng Jinbao and the others on the steps.
"You wicked man," the magistrate said to Jingji, "why did you listen to this singing girl and cause your wife's death? Have you anything to say?"
"My lord," Jingji said, "I did not beat her. It is all because of a partner I had who went away with me to do business. He stole my money, and when I came home I was in a very bad temper. I asked her for some food and she would not listen to me. I did kick her that time. Then, in the night, she hanged herself and so died."
"You had that strumpet," the Magistrate said angrily. "Why should you ask your wife to get you food? It was unreasonable. According to the accusation that has been brought against you, you beat your wife and she killed herself. Is that true or not?"
"The Lady Wu hates me," Jingji said, "and she has made up the whole of this story. I implore you, my lord, to go most carefully into the matter."
"Her daughter is dead," the Magistrate said. "Do you imagine you are going to get out of it?" He told his attendants to give Jingji twenty strokes with the rod.
Then Feng Jinbao was called forward, and thumbscrews were put on her. The magistrate gave orders that they should be thrown into jail and told one of his underlings to go with the neighbors and police to examine the body. They found bruises all over the body and the mark of the rope around Ximen Dajie's neck. They wrote down this report:

After Chen Jingji had severely handled her, she hanged herself, unable to bear his ill usage any longer.
When this report was brought to the magistrate, he was very angry. He ordered ten more strokes to be given to Chen Jingji and ten to Feng Jinbao also. He declared that Jingji was guilty of his wife's death, and sentenced him to strangulation. Feng Jinbao was sentenced to a hundred strokes with a ro, and afterwards to serve as the public whore. Jingji was in a terrible state. He sent a note to Chen Ding and told him to take every penny there was in the shop and his wife's ornaments, a hundred taels in all, and secretly take them to the magistrate. So, during the night, the magistrate altered the sentence and made it appear that he had been found guilty of having been the cause of his wife's death in the less criminal sense, imprisoning him for 5 years with permission to purchase his freedom. Yueniang continually pressed the magistrate for justice. At last, he sent for her. "Lady," he said, "we've discovered the marks of the rope on your daughter's neck so it's clear that she's not murdered. I wish to be unjust to no one and if you're afraid that he'll make trouble with you in the future, I'll arrange matters in such a way that he'll never come near you again." He sent for Jingji and said to him, "I've been very lenient with you. You must amend your evil ways and begin to lead a new life. I forbid you ever to go and cause a disturbance at this lady's house. If you come before me again, I'll not forgive you. Go home, buy a coffin, bury your wife, then come back, and report to me. I'll send an account of this matter to those in authority over me."
Jingji paid the fine that gave him back his freedom and went home. He put his wife's body into a coffin but kept it at home only 7 days. Then the religious service was held, the body taken outside the city, and buried. He returned to the Town Hall and there spent much money. Feng Jinbao had gone; he had lost all his property; his things were sold and his house disposed of. Only his life was left to him. He dared not mention his mother-in-law's name.

116

Wang Hsüan Relies on Righteousness to Help the Poor; Abbot Jen in the Desire for Profit, Invites Disaster & Chen Jingji Becomes a Monk

Who can say that in our mundane existence destiny is fickle?
Good luck and bad, misfortune and fortune travel hand in hand.[1]
It is only due to the lure of romance that we do ourselves in;
It is not the case that the human heart is straight as a needle.
One may assume one's official conduct to be devoid of injustice;
But how can one know what the Way of Heaven may reveal about it?[2]
If one learns early that success and failure are dictated by fate,
One may be able to walk freely even during the dark of night.

Ch'en Ching-chi, from the time that Hsi-men Ta-chieh committed suicide, Wu Yüeh-niang took him to court, and the singing girl Feng Chin-pao was sent back to the brothel, felt that he had barely escaped with his life. He had been forced to put his house up for sale and had exhausted his capital, had disposed of his wife's head ornaments, and did not even have any furniture left. He also claimed, once again, that Ch'en Ting had been embezzling the money entrusted to him and dismissed him. He did not have enough money to cover his daily expenses, but merely:
Sat at home frittering away his resources.[3]
He also felt driven to visit Yang the Elder's home to inquire about the whereabouts of his half boatload of goods.
One day, upon arriving at the door of Yang the Elder's home, he called out, "Is Yang the Elder at home or not?"
Who could have anticipated that Yang Kuang-yen, having made off with Ch'en Ching-chi's half boatload of goods and sold them for cash, hid out in one place or another until he learned that Ch'en Ching-chi's wife had committed suicide in her home, that his mother-in-law had lodged an accusation against him in the district yamen, and that he had endured half a month of incarceration. At this, he promptly returned home, but did not venture outside.
When he heard Ch'en Ching-chi calling for him at the door, and demanding to know what had become of the boatload of cargo, he sent his younger brother Yang Erh-feng out to confront him, saying, "You persuaded my elder brother to accompany you on a business trip, and nothing has been heard of him for the last several months. I don't know whether you either threw him into the river, or drowned him in the canal, but you actually have the nerve to come here and demand to know what has become of the boatload of cargo. Is a human life more important, or that cargo of your's more important?"
This Yang Erh-feng had always been a tough customer, both a gambler and a "knockabout." His biceps were:
Bulging lumps of purple flesh;[4] and his chest was covered with:
Tousled lengths of brown hair.
He was a "bare stick" pure and simple. Striding outside, he took hold of Ch'en Ching-chi with one hand and demanded to know the fate of his elder brother. Ch'en Ching-chi, in a state of panic, tore himself loose and started to run toward home.
Yang Erh-feng responded by picking up a three-cornered shard of tile and scratching open the skin on his skull with it, so that:
His face was covered with flowing blood.[5]
He then raced after Ch'en Ching-chi, yelling, "I'll fuck your mother's cunt! Since when have I ever seen any silver of yours? If you come farting around my place, I'll give you a real drubbing with my fists."
Ch'en Ching-chi fled homeward, as though:
Whether his fate were governed by metal or by water,
There was no place for him to hide;
and saw to it that the main gate was:
Locked tight as an iron bucket, so that
Not even Fan K'uai himself could get through.
He then permitted Yang Erh-feng to roundly abuse his parents, and try to smash open the gate with a large brick, without allowing so much as the sound of a breath to escape from his nostrils. On top of everything else, he had hardly recovered from a lawsuit and was as nervous as a man who:
Dreams of a length of rope and fears it is a snake, so all he could do was put up with it. Truly:
Tender plants are afraid of the frost[6]
and frost fears the sun;
One wicked person will be ground down upon encountering another.[7]
Shortly after this, he managed to sell his spacious house for seventy taels of silver and bought a small dwelling in an obscure alley in which to live. Later on, he was compelled to get rid of one of his two maidservants, selling off Ch'ung-hsi, and retaining Yüan-hsiao to sleep with him at night. In less than half a month after this, he was forced to dispose of his smaller dwelling, and move into a boarding house. On top of this, his servant Ch'en An left him, since he no longer had any business to conduct, and Yüan-hsiao died. As a result, he found himself:
Completely on his own.
His household belongings and furniture had all been sold, leaving him:
As poor as though he had been utterly cleaned out.[8]
It was not long before he did not even have enough money to pay his rent and had to move into a homeless shelter in order to survive.
When the other beggars in the shelter observed that he was the profligate scion of a wealthy family, and that he had a naturally clear-cut appearance, they made room for him to sleep on the heated k'ang and gave him some baked wheat cakes to eat. The patrolman on duty that night happened to come in and offered him a job as a night watchman, sounding his clapper and ringing his bell.
It was already late winter in the twelfth month at the time. There was a heavy snowfall, and the wind was gusting, making it extremely cold. Ch'en Ching-chi, after sounding his clapper for a time, and letting the patrolman go, set out to ring his bell as he patrolled the local streets and alleys. What with the wind and snow, and the ice that had formed on the ground, he was so frozen that all he could do was to:
Hunch his shoulders and tighten his back, as he trembled and shivered with the cold. At the fifth watch, when the cocks crowed, he came upon an ailing beggar who was lying on the ground beneath a wall and feared that he might be dead. The local neighborhood head told him to keep watch over him, and to light a bundle of straw to keep him warm.
Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been sounding the watches all night long without any rest, promptly proceeded to sprawl out on the ground and go to sleep. Unexpectedly, he started to dream of the:
Glory and luxury, wealth and honor, he had enjoyed as a resident of Hsi-men Ch'ing's household, and the fun and games he had indulged in during his affair with P'an Chin-lien. When he awoke from the dream with tears in his eyes, the other beggars asked him what he was crying about.
Ch'en Ching-chi responded to this query by saying, "Brothers, listen to my explanation."
There is a song suite beginning with the tune "Powdery Butterflies" that testifies to this:
During the ninety coldest days of winter,
Snow fills the sky and everything is frozen.
A wild wind shakes Heaven and agitates the Earth,[9]
Chilling me to the point that I am frozen stiff.
My heart is palpitating,
And I find it almost impossible to contend with.
I cannot bear the hunger in my stomach;
I cannot stand the coldness of my body.
Living thus, half exposed to the elements,
It is really cold.
I cannot bear this sense of desolation,
And would like to find a way to death,
But in this flustered state, I cannot spare my worthless life.
To the tune "Playful Children," Paracoda One
Before I know it, the evening bell sounds;
At the evening bell people begin to rest.
Who is it that is calling for me?
It is the neighborhood head Chang Ch'eng.
He calls for me urgently,
And I respond repeatedly.
"Who is going to sound the watches for me tonight?" he asks.
It would seem that I am in luck, for once,
For he is giving me some baked wheat cakes.
Paracoda Two
I am grateful to the neighborhood head for his concern over my exposure,
And giving me the task of sounding the clapper to mark the watches;
So I am willing to let him use me this way.
As long as he is able to provide me with something to eat,
What do I care about the poor and humble nature of this task?
I am willing to engage in shouting the hour and ringing the bell.
Paracoda Three
When I sit for a while my hands and feet grow numb;
When I stand for a while my stomach begins to hurt.
The baked wheat cakes are cold, and I have to swallow them without any tea to wash them down.
Before the third watch is over, the patrolman on night duty demands that I light him on his way.
All I can manage is to pay him forty cash,
In order to bribe him into letting me off.
Paracoda Four
At the fifth watch when the cocks crow,
And people begin to walk along the streets,
Going hither and thither, every which way,
I happen to come upon an ailing beggar lying beneath a wall.

I am told to keep him warm without interruption,
And it is only when I detect a warm breath from his mouth that I can relax.
I no sooner close my eyes than I have an intimate dream,
From which I suddenly awake and weep until dawn.
Paracoda Five
The beggars ask me, "What are you crying about?"
And I tell them the story of my life from start to finish.
"My ancestors, for generations, have possessed substantial wealth.
If you were to mention the Ch'en family that deals in pine resin,
Who would not have been awestruck at the name?
They resided among the gentry;
My grandfather dealt in salt from the Huai region,
And my father devoted himself to forming influential connections.
But since he gave birth to me, I have been given to excessive drinking and fits of violence.
Paracoda Six
First I lost my grandfather, who used to discipline me,
And later I also lost my father.
My mother doted on me,
And let me do as I pleased.
I became proficient at every kind of drinking and gambling,
And was familiar with all the taverns and bawdy houses.
Everything I did was of this kind.
I had no sooner married than my relatives became implicated in a lawsuit,
And I fled to the home of my in-laws in order to avoid a heavier risk by seeking a lighter.
Paracoda Seven
While I was residing as a son-in-law in the Hsi-men household,
I manipulated the breeze and the moonlight,
seducing my mother-in-law.
In financial matters, I trusted someone who took advantage of me.
I also gambled away quantities of yellow gold and precious jade,
And provided rice and fuel to cover the expenses of the brothels.
After having beaten my wife to the point of death,
She committed suicide, and her family brought a suit against me.
I had to expend a great deal of money,
Before contriving to escape with my life.
Paracoda Eight
I sold my spacious home,
And bought a small dwelling;
Moved into a boarding house,
But could no longer afford it.
I took no thought for the future, or how to preserve what I had left.
Out of hunger, cold, and despair, my concubine fell ill,
And eventually died in my quarters,
unable to stay alive.
Everything I possessed was utterly cleaned out,
But I had not lost my taste
for wine and meat,
And had no alternative but to sell off my ancestral grave sites.
Paracoda Nine
I cannot carry the light,
Or support the heavy;[10]
Work as a laborer,
Or engage in farming.
Rather than undertaking anything, I am reluctant to make a move.
When at leisure with nothing to do,
all I hanker after is food;
When I fall asleep, I do not get up until the sun is already red.
My doglike nature is as adamant as steel.
I have grievously wronged all of my ten relatives and nine kinsmen,[11]
So should I freeze or starve to death, who will bother to care about me?
Paracoda Ten
My landlord is unrelenting in demanding my rent,
And does not think I will be able to stay.
His earthenware pots and broken bowls are utterly useless;
And he has attempted repeatedly to drive me out the door.
My frozen bones and drenched flesh are without a refuge,
And I have felt compelled to commit myself to a homeless shelter.
If only my luck should ever happen to change for the better,
I would then never be able to forget the kindness of my benefactor.
For ages I have endured privation and pain at the death of my wife;
I have no clothes on my back[12] and my mouth is without nourishment.
My horse is dead, my slaves have fled, and my home has been sold;
All by myself,[13] I have been forced to move into unknown territory.
In the morning, I frequent the marketplace begging for leftovers;
At night, I sleep in the open, up against the dilapidated walls.
Since there is no other course open to me in the days to come;

I must live in a homeless shelter and beat the watchman's clapper."
To resume our story, Ch'en Ching-chi was reduced to spending his nights in the homeless shelter, and his days begging for food on the streets.
It so happens that inside the city wall of Ch'ing-ho district there lived an elderly gentleman named Wang Hsüan, whose courtesy name was T'ing-yung. He was more than sixty years old:
His family holdings were substantial;[14]
he possessed a charitable disposition; and he was:
Chivalrous by nature and open-handed with his wealth.
He had a wide circle of acquaintances, derived pleasure from his philanthropy, and devoted himself to:
Aiding the poor and rescuing the wretched;[15]
Enjoying goodness and respecting the gods.
His two sons had both:
Set up households and established themselves.
His eldest son was named Wang Ch'ien and had inherited the office of battalion commander of the local Horse Pasturage Battalion of the Court of the Imperial Stud. His second son was named Wang Chen and was currently a government student in the prefectural school. The old gentleman had hired a manager and set up a pawnshop on the street-front of his residence. Every day, what with:
His elegant clothing and ample diet,[16]
His leisure and lack of obligations, he was free to:
Attend scripture readings in Buddhist temples,
Or discourse on the Way in Taoist sanctuaries.
When he had nothing else to do, he would situate himself at the gate of his residence and dispense medicine to the sick, or finger his rosary and recite the Buddha's name. Because there were two apricot trees in his rear garden, he called himself the Layman of the Apricot Hermitage.
One day, he was standing at his gate wearing a double-layered scholar's cap on his head, and a patchwork Taoist gown on his body, when Ch'en Ching-chi happened to pass by and proceeded to go down on his knees and kowtow to him.
Wang Hsüan hastily bowed to him in return, saying, "Brother, who are you? Old and decrepit as I am, my vision is too blurred to recognize you."
Ch'en Ching-chi, trembling and shivering, stood to one side and said, "I would not deceive you, venerable sir. I am the son of Ch'en Hung, the dealer in pine resin."
The old gentleman pondered this for what seemed like half a day before saying, "So you are the respected son of Ch'en Hung are you?"
Noticing that:
His clothing looked disheveled, and
His countenance seemed haggard,[17] he said, "My worthy nephew, how have you been reduced to such a state?"
He then went on to ask, "Are your father and mother well?"
"My father passed away in the Eastern Capital," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "and my mother is also dead."
"I have heard that you were living in your father-in-law's household," said Wang Hsüan.
"My father-in-law is dead," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and my mother-in-law expelled me from the household. When her daughter died, she lodged an accusation against me, and I was forced to endure a lawsuit. I have had to sell our home and have been robbed of what capital I possessed. As a result, I have been idle for some time, and unable to make a living."
"My worthy nephew," said Wang Hsüan, "where are you living at present?"
Ch'en Ching-chi hesitated for what seemed like half a day before saying, "I will not deceive you, venerable sir. The case is thus and so."
"How sad, worthy nephew," said Wang Hsüan. "So you have been forced to beg for your sustenance. I recall that your family was originally one of considerable substance. At the time when I was acquainted with your father, worthy nephew, you were still young, your hair was done up in a topknot, and you were going to school. Since then, you have fallen into such a state. How regrettable! How regrettable! Are you without any relatives who might be able to help you out?"
"That is the case," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "My maternal uncle Chang Kuan has not seen fit to visit me for some time, so I would not feel comfortable approaching him."
After questioning him for some time, the old gentleman ushered Ch'en Ching-chi into the parlor of his dwelling, ordered a page boy to set up a table and lay out some refreshments, and then urged his guest to eat his fill.
When he noticed how thinly clad he was, he got out a Taoist gown of black wool, a felt cap, a pair of felt stockings, and a pair of woolen shoes; weighed out a tael's worth of silver, along with five hundred copper cash; and gave them all to him, saying, "Worthy nephew, these clothes, and shoes and stockings, are for you to wear. These copper cash are for your living expenses, and ought to enable you to rent half a room to live in. This tael of silver can be used to start a little business of some kind, in order to feed you, and supply your daily expenses. That would be better than living in a homeless shelter, where you will have no chance of improving yourself. When your monthly rent becomes due, you can come to see me, and I will take care of it for you."
Ch'en Ching-chi got down on the floor and kowtowed to him in gratitude, saying, "Your humble nephew understands."
So saying, he took his leave but neither looked for a room to rent nor tried to start a business. Day by day, he spent the five hundred copper cash in taverns and noodle shops, until they were all gone. And as for the tael of silver, he had it melted down and compounded with baser metals and then tried to peddle it in the streets but was arrested by the police, accused of petty larceny, taken to the office of the local ward adjutant, and subjected to the squeezers and a beating. As a consequence, he was not only utterly wiped out, but also left with a buttocks completely covered with welts. In less than two days, he was compelled to pawn his woollen robe and stockings in exchange for something to eat and was reduced, as before, to begging in the streets.
One day, he happened once more to pass by the gate of Wang Hsüan's residence. Wang Hsüan, who was standing there at the time, looked on as Ch'en Ching-chi kowtowed to him and noticed that he was no longer wearing the robe and stockings he had given him, but had nothing but the felt cap on his head, that the feet in his sandals were bare, and that he appeared to be not only chilled but:
Both impoverished and emaciated.
The old gentleman addressed him, saying, "Master Ch'en, how is your business going? I imagine your rent must be due, and you have come here to get it from me."
Ch'en Ching-chi found himself to be:
At a loss for words,
for what seemed like half a day; and it was only after he had been asked time and time again that he replied, saying, "Thus and so, I have been completely wiped out."
"Ai-ya! Worthy nephew," the old gentleman responded, "that is no way to support yourself. Since:
You cannot lift the light,
Or support the heavy,
engaging in some business, however insignificant, is better than having to beg for your food. That way you can avoid becoming a laughingstock to others, and bringing shame on the reputation of your ancestors. Why don't you do as I suggest?"
So saying, he once again ushered him inside and had his page boy An-t'ung provide him with enough food to eat his fill.
He also gave him a pair of trousers, a white cotton shirt, a pair of foot bindings, a string of copper cash, and a peck of rice and said, "Take these things with you, and be sure to start up a small business of some kind. You can sell kindling and charcoal, or beans and melon seeds, in order to make a living for yourself, which would be better than having to beg for your food this way."
Although Ch'en Ching-chi gave his verbal consent to these suggestions, took the money and rice in hand, and left the old gentleman's residence, it did not take more than a few days for him to consume it all, sharing the ready-cooked meat and noodles with his fellow beggars in the homeless shelter. He also gambled away the white cotton shirt and the trousers he had been given.
During the first month of the new year, he was once again out walking the streets, while wrapping his arms around his shoulders to keep warm. Although he was somewhat embarrassed at the prospect of seeing the old gentleman again, he went up to the wall under the gable of the old gentleman's gatehouse and stood there warming himself in the sun. The old gentleman regarded him with a sardonic eye but did not speak to him. Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded:
Hesitantly and punctiliously, to make his way forward, after which, he knelt down on the ground and kowtowed before him.
When the old gentleman saw that he looked just as destitute as before, he said to him, "Worthy nephew, this is not a viable plan for the future.
One's appetites are as deep as the ocean;
The days and months fly by like shuttles.[18]
How can one ever hope to fill up a bottomless pit? Come inside. I have something to say to you. There is a place that would not only provide you with undisturbed leisure, but also with a haven in which to stay. My only fear is that you may not consent to go there."
Ch'en Ching-chi knelt down and wept, saying, "If my venerable uncle should see fit to take pity on me, no matter where this place may be, if it will only accommodate me, I will consent to go there."
Wang Hsüan responded, saying, "The place in question is not far from our city. On the dock at Lin-ch'ing there is a Yen-kung Temple, a Taoist establishment dedicated to the worship of the river god Yen-kung.[19] That is:
A location teeming with fish and rice,[20] where river boats congregate in large numbers. The temple is amply supplied with money and provisions, and endowed with a secluded and elegant atmosphere. Abbot Jen, the head priest of the temple, is an old acquaintance of mine, and he has two or three disciples and acolytes serving under him. I propose to provide appropriate gifts and escort you there in order for you to become a disciple of his and enter the priesthood. If you were to study the sacred texts, learn to perform religious music, and thus be able to confer blessings upon people, it would be a good thing."
"If my venerable uncle is willing to help me out that way," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "that would really be wonderful."
"In that case," said Wang Hsüan, "you can go now. Tomorrow is an auspicious day. If you come here early in the morning, I will escort you there."
After Ch'en Ching-chi had gone, Wang Hsüan promptly summoned a tailor and had him make up two sets of Taoist garments, a Taoist cap, and shoes and stockings for him.
The next day, Ch'en Ching-chi showed up as he had promised, and Wang Hsüan had him take a bath in an empty room, comb his hair, put on the Taoist cap, change into a new jacket and new trousers, don a black silk Taoist robe, and slip into felt stockings and a pair of shoes with cloud patterned toes. He also prepared four trays of preserved fruit, a jug of wine, and a bolt of fabric, and sealed up five taels of silver. He then mounted his horse, hired a donkey for Ch'en Ching-chi to ride, and, with his page boys An-t'ung and Hsi-t'ung following them, and two carriers bearing the gift boxes, set out for the Yen-kung Temple on the dock in Lin-ch'ing. It was only a day's journey of seventy li. By the time they arrived at the Yen-kung Temple, it had begun to grow late. Behold:
The image of the sun is about to sink;
The luxuriant shade has already fallen.
The sunset clouds, reflected in the water, dispense their red glow;[21]
The setting sun, as it crosses the hills, engenders bluish mists.
Amid the shadows of the verdant willows,[22]
One hears the birds returning to the woods.
In the villages with their red apricots,
One sees the cattle herding into the fold.[23]
Truly:
On the banks of the streams fishermen
head into the woods;
On the meadows the herd boys ride home
astride their calves.[24]
Upon coming to the Lin-ch'ing dock, Wang Hsüan crossed the great bridge over the Kuang-chi lock, gazed at the innumerable boats that were moored on the canal, and arrived in front of the Yen-kung Temple, where he dismounted and prepared to go inside. Behold:
The verdant pines are luxuriant,
The emerald cypresses are dense.
To either side there are peaked red walls,
Upon the facade are three vermilion gates.
Truly, it was an imposing temple. Behold:
The gate of the temple soars aloft,
Its halls and porticos rise boldly.
Displayed on high is an imperial plaque in letters of gold;
And a picture of officials, leaving and entering the court.[25]
The thirty-foot-wide great hall,[26]
Contains effigies of the twelve Dragon Kings;
The two colonnades that flank it,
Have images of myriads of aquatic creatures.
Flagstaffs stretch up toward the heavens;
The words on the flags catching the wind.
In all four quarters and the eight directions,[27]
The spring and autumn sacrifices are offered on schedule;
When rains are seasonable and winds favorable,
The common people perform sacrifices along the waterways.

The efficacy of a myriad years of burning incense[28] has been acknowledged;
In the four quarters both officials and commoners depend on it for peace.
The young servants beneath the gate of the temple had spotted the arrival of the visitors and went inside to report it to the abbot's quarters. Abbot Jen promptly adjusted his clothing and came out to receive them. Wang Hsüan directed Ch'en Ching-chi and the bearers of the gifts to wait outside.
In no time at all, Abbot Jen ushered Wang Hsüan into the reception hall of his quarters, known as the Pine Crane Studio, where he greeted him, saying, "Venerable layman, why has it been so long since you last came to my humble temple? What good fortune has led you to deign to visit me today?"
"It is only because I have been tied up with mundane matters at home," responded Wang Hsüan, "that I have been remiss in paying you a visit for so long."
After exchanging the customary amenities, they sat down in the positions of host and guest, and a young servant presented them with a serving of tea.
When they had finished their tea, Abbot Jen said, "Venerable layman, it is already late in the day, and you might as well stay overnight."
So saying, he ordered a servant to take his visitor's horse back to the stable in the rear and see that it was fed and housed for the night.
Wang Hsüan then said:
"If I did not have a reason to do so, I would not
visit the Hall of the Three Treasures.
It is because I have a favor to ask of you that I have come to pay you this visit. But I don't know whether or not you will agree to it."
"Venerable layman," responded Abbot Jen, "what would you like me to do? Just tell me what it is. I would not presume to reject your command."
"At present," said Wang Hsüan, "there is a young man named Ch'en Ching-chi, who is the son of an old friend of mine. He is just twenty-three years old, is clean-cut by nature, and is as clever as can be. The only problem is that his parents passed away too early so that he has not been properly brought up. His family was quite affluent, so he is not a person from an undistinguished background, and he came into a substantial inheritance, but lost everything as the result of a lawsuit and has been reduced to homeless destitution. Out of regard for my former friendship with his father, I would like to introduce him into your prestigious temple to become a disciple of yours. But I don't know what you may think of this proposal."
"Venerable layman," replied Abbot Jen, "whatever you suggest, I would not venture to oppose. But it has been my misfortune that, though I already have two or three disciples on hand, they are not very intelligent, and none of them are likely to succeed. This has been a source of constant annoyance for me. I wonder whether this young man is a straightforward person or not?"
"As for this young man," responded Wang Hsüan, "I would not deceive your reverence, but you don't need to worry; he is always serious and content to abide by his lot. He possesses a timorous disposition and is straightforward about everything. He would make a good disciple."
"When do you propose to bring him here?" asked Abbot Jen.
"He is waiting outside the temple gate right now," responded Wang Hsüan.
"I have also brought some paltry gifts. I humbly beseech you to accept them with a smile."
This flustered Abbot Jen into asking, "Venerable layman, why did you not say so before?"
He then went on to say, "Invite him to come in."
Thereupon, the bearers proceeded to carry in the gifts, and Abbot Jen saw that the card accompanying them read, "Respectfully presented with a bow by your pupil Wang Hsüan: a bolt of coarse satin, a jug of insipid wine, a set of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two boxes of fruits, and five taels of white gold."
Abbot Jen promptly bowed in gratitude, saying, "Venerable layman, what need was there for you to put yourself to the trouble of presenting me with all these lavish gifts? You put me in a position in which it would be:
Discourteous to refuse, and Embarrassing to accept."
Whom should he see at this juncture but Ch'en Ching-chi, who wore a gilt-ridged Taoist cap on his head, a black silk Taoist robe on his body, a pair of shoes with cloud-patterned toes and white socks, and a silk belt around his waist. He had:
Clear-cut brows and sparkling eyes;
His teeth were white and his lips were red, and
His face looked as though it were powdered.
On coming in, he went up to Abbot Jen, knelt down on the floor, and proceeded to perform:
Four brace makes eight kowtows.
Abbot Jen asked him, "How old are you?"
"I was born in the year of the horse," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so next spring I will be twenty-three years old."
Upon seeing that he did indeed seem to be clever, Abbot Jen bestowed a Taoist appellation on him, so that he became known as Ch'en Tsung-mei.
It so happens that Abbot Jen already had two disciples at his command. The senior disciple was called Chin Tsung-ming, and the junior disciple was called Hsü Tsung-shun. So Ch'en Ching-chi took his place with them and was known by the appellation Ch'en Tsung-mei.
Abbot Jen called the other disciples out, and they exchanged greetings, after which he formally accepted the gifts he had been offered. A young servant then lit the lanterns, set up a table, and laid out the foodstuff, after which they fell to drinking wine. The surface of the table was covered with cups and platters, along with an assortment of foods including chicken, pig's trotters, goose, duck, fish, shrimp, and the like.
Wang Hsüan did not drink very much, although the abbot and his disciples took turns urging him to do so.
After a while, he said:
"I cannot handle the effects of the wine," excused himself, and went to his room, where a bed had been set up for him, and went to sleep for the night.
Early the next morning, a young servant brought water for him to wash his face in, and by the time he had combed his hair and performed his ablutions, Abbot Jen came in to offer him a serving of tea. Before long, breakfast was laid out, and they drank another two rounds of wine together.
After his horse had been fed, and the bearers had been paid for their efforts, Wang Hsüan prepared to make his departure and called Ch'en Ching-chi over in order to instruct him, saying, "While here, you must devote yourself to mastering the scriptures, and obey your master's instructions. I will come visit you from time to time and will see that you are supplied with new clothing and footwear at the change of seasons."
He also turned to Abbot Jen and said, "If he fails to obey your instructions, discipline him as you see fit. I will certainly not endeavor to defend his shortcomings."
He also admonished Ch'en Ching-chi in private, saying, "After I am gone,
I want you to:
Cleanse your heart and reform your ways.
You must devote yourself to the task at hand. If you fail once again to live up to my expectations, I will concern myself with you no more in the future."
Ch'en Ching-chi assented, saying, "Your son understands."
Wang Hsüan thereupon said farewell to Abbot Jen, went outside, mounted his horse, left the Yen-kung Temple, and set off for home.
From this time on, Ch'en Ching-chi led the life of a Taoist novice in the Yen-kung Temple. He observed that Abbot Jen:
Was elderly with a ruddy nose;
Possessed an imposing stature;
Had a clear, resounding voice,[29]
And fully bearded countenance;
Was glib and devoted to drink;
and concerned himself only with:
Welcoming guests and seeing off visitors.
All other matters, both great and small, were left in the hands of his senior disciple Chin Tsung-ming.
At that time, the government had just completed the necessary repair work and reopened the Grand Canal. At Lin-ch'ing two locks had been constructed to control the water where the canal met the Wei River. Crew members from both government and private boats on the canal, on reaching the locks would come to the Yen-kung Temple, in order to seek the protection of the spirits, to fulfill their vows, to seek their fortunes by interpreting the hexagrams in the Book of Changes, or casting divining blocks.[30] There were also those who came in order to perform good deeds, by donating money and rice, contributing incense, lamp oil, paper money, and candles, or furnishing pine resin and rush mats.
Abbot Jen was in the habit of taking the surplus supplies from the temple treasury and assigning them to his disciples with which to set up shop on the dock, while keeping the profits from these transactions for himself. His senior disciple Chin Tsung-ming was also not one to be content with his lot. He was about thirty years old, was in the habit of maintaining singing girls from the local brothels as his mistresses, and was:
A libertine devoted to wine and sex.[31]
He also had two innocent young novices at his disposal, with whom he was accustomed to sleep at night, but as time passed he had become tired of them. When he encountered Ch'en Ching-chi and observed that:
His teeth were white and his lips were red,
His face looked as though it were powdered;
that he was:
Clean-cut, unusual, and;
Didn't miss a wink,
he arranged for them to share the same room. In the evening, he would ply him with drink for half the night until he was utterly soused, and then go to sleep on the same bed with him. At first, they slept head to foot and foot to head, but he objected to the smell of Ch'en Ching-chi's feet and had him come share the same pillow with him. But before they had been asleep very long, he complained about Ch'en Ching-chi's breath, and had him turn over so that his bottom ended up against his belly. Ch'en Ching-chi pretended to be asleep and paid no attention to him, but he went on to manipulate his organ until it rose up as hard and straight as a stick, rubbed some saliva on the head of his glans, and proceeded to thrust it into his anus. It so happens that when Ch'en Ching-chi had been residing in the homeless shelter, the beggar boss Hou Lin, whose nickname was Flying Demon, had sodomized him, so that his anus was already enlarged. As a result, Chin Tsung-ming's organ had penetrated him before he knew it.
As for Ch'en Ching-chi:
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
"This rascal is asking for it; he is trying to take such egregious advantage of me. Who does he take me for? I'll give him something to savor in return and thereby make him pay for his fun."
Ch'en Ching-chi, thereupon, made a show of crying out in protest, and Chin Tsung-ming, fearing that Abbot Jen would hear him, promptly put his hand over his mouth, saying, "Good brother, be quiet. Whatever you demand from me, I will agree to."
"If you want to have a fling with me," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "and don't want me to reveal it, you'll have to agree to three conditions."
"My brother," responded Chin Tsung-ming, "not to mention three conditions; even if you impose ten conditions, I'll agree to them all."
"The first condition," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "is that if you want to carry on with me, you will no longer sleep with those other two novices. The second condition is that I be given control over the keys to all the doors on the premises, both large and small. The third condition is that you will not raise objections to my going anywhere I want. If you agree to all these conditions, I will let you do what you wish with me."
"That's no problem," said Chin Tsung-ming. "I'll agree to everything."
That night the two of them proceeded to:
Tumble and toss this way and that,[32] for fully half the night. Ch'en Ching-chi had been a habitué of the world of breeze and moonlight ever since his youth, so there wasn't much he didn't know about anything. On this occasion, what with:
Vows under the covers to be as faithful as the hills,
Promises by the pillowside to be as true as the seas;
Obscene noises and lascivious words,
Sucking at this and toying with that;
he managed to please Chin Tsung-ming to the point that:
His delight knew no bounds.
The next day, as promised, he turned over the keys to Ch'en Ching-chi, and he no longer spent the night with the other two novices, but slept on the same bed with him every day.
As time passed:
One day became two,
Two days became three.
One day, it so happened that Abbot Jen and his two disciples were scheduled to go to someone's home to pray for blessings and perform good works, and the abbot chose to leave Ch'en Ching-chi behind to look after the temple as a crafty means of testing his integrity.
Abbot Jen thought to himself, "The venerable layman Wang Hsüan said that he was conscientious, and I would like to see whether he is conscientious or not."
As he was about to go out the gate, he instructed him, saying, "You stay here and look after that flock of chickens I am raising in the backyard. They are actually phoenixes, and, before long, when I have:
Achieved merit and fulfilled my tasks,[33]
I hope to ascend to Heaven upon one of them, and pay court to the Jade Emperor. Those crocks that are secreted in one of the rooms contain liquid poison. If any one of my disciples should commit a serious offense, I would not beat him, but merely give him a dose of this liquid poison to drink, which would cause him to pass away on the spot. You must conscientiously look after everything, and when I return after the midday repast I will bring you something to eat."
When he had finished speaking, the abbot and his disciples left the temple.
Ch'en Ching-chi closed the door behind them and laughed to himself, saying, "How could he think that I would not see through these things; claiming that those crocks of glutinous millet wine are actually liquid poison, and that those few chickens in the backyard are phoenixes, on which he hopes to mount to Heaven?"
Thereupon, he proceeded to kill one of the fattest chickens, pluck it clean, and cook it in a pot; and then used a basin to dip up some of the wine and heat it on the fire. After which, pulling apart the limbs of the chicken with his hands, and dipping the flesh into a mixture of garlic and vinegar, he feasted until he might well have ejaculated:
"Is it not delightful?"
As he ate, he uttered four lines to describe his pleasure:
With a brass basin I scoop up the clear wine,
Like mist veiling the bright moon;
I dip the slow-cooked chicken in garlic sauce,

Like wind sweeping away the clouds.
While he was eating, he heard his master Abbot Jen calling for him outside the gate, upon which, he hastily cleared away the utensils and went out to open the door for him.
Abbot Jen noticed that his face was red and asked him what had happened, but Ch'en Ching-chi merely hung his head in silence.
"Why don't you speak?" Abbot Jen asked him.
"I will explain the situation to you, master," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "After you left, one of those phoenixes in the backyard managed to fly away somehow, which left me in a state of panic. I climbed up onto the roof to look for it for what seemed like half a day, but could not find it. Fearing that when you came back you would give me a beating, I thought of slitting my throat with a knife but was afraid of the pain it would cause. I thought of hanging myself but was afraid the rope might break and I would fall down. I thought of jumping into a well but was afraid the mouth might be too small and would catch me by the neck. Unable to think of any viable alternative, I ended up by dipping out two bowls worth of the liquid poison in those crocks of yours and drinking them down."
"How did you feel after drinking them?" Abbot Jen asked.
"Since drinking them down," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "for what seems like half a day, I have felt;
Neither dead nor alive,
just as though I were drunk."
On hearing this explanation, Abbot Jen and his two disciples laughed to themselves, saying, "He turns out to be straightforward after all."
Consequently, Abbot Jen put up the money to buy an ordination certificate for him, so that from then on, as an ordained Taoist monk, he was free to do as he pleased. Truly:
You may peddle a load of truths for three days without making a sale;
While in a single day three loads of falsehoods may actually sell out.
As a result, Ch'en Ching-chi frequently took money in hand and went out to enjoy himself on the dock.
While there, he ran into a "cribber" from the licensed quarter named Ch'en the Third, who told him, "The madam of Feng Chin-pao's establishment has died, and she has been sold to the Cheng Family Brothel, where she is known as Cheng Chin-pao. At present she is doing business in a large tavern on the dock. Why don't you go take a look at her?"
As for the young scamp:
His old feelings for her had not changed.
Taking some silver in hand, he allowed Ch'en the Third to conduct him straight to the tavern. Nothing might have happened if he had not gone there, but since he did go, it was a case of:
Five hundred years ago, these lovers
were fated to meet;
After their affair of the past, they are to be reunited.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
In this life one must not begrudge raiment of golden threads;
In this life one should not betray the years of one's youth.[34]
If you see flowers you would like to pluck, just pluck them;
Don't wait till the flowers fall to pluck the bare branches.[35]
It so happens that this tavern was the most prominent tavern in Lin-ch'ing and was called the Hsieh Family Tavern. It had more than a hundred rooms and was surrounded with green balustrades. It backed on a hill, overlooked the Grand Canal, and was known for:
The liveliness of the teeming crowds, and
The coming and going of boat traffic.
What did this magnificent tavern look like?
Sculpted eaves reflect the sunlight;
Painted rafters fly into the clouds.
Green balustrades connect beneath the balcony windows;
Kingfisher blinds are rolled high above the casements.
Those blowing pipes and playing flutes,
Are all noble scions or royal princelings;
Those holding cups and raising beakers,[36]
Are bands of courtesans and dancing girls.[37]
Barely visible to drunken eyes,
Soaring into azure Heaven, are ten thousand mountainous clouds;[38]
Stimulating to poetic thoughts,
Like tumbling drifts of snow, are the waves of mist-bound water.
By the white duckweed crossing,[39]
One hears trawlers sounding their clappers;
By the red smartweed beachhead,[40]
One hears fishermen beating their bulwarks.
By the tavern side, on the verdant willows,
the wild birds are crowing;
Before the gate, amidst the green poplars, piebald steeds are tethered.[41]
Ch'en the Third led Ch'en Ching-chi to an upper floor of the tavern, and into a room, furnished with an ebony table and red lacquered benches, where they sat down together. He then summoned a waiter to wipe off the table, supply cups and chopsticks, and lay out a serving of first-class wine and delicacies, after which he sent him downstairs to summon the powdered face for him. Before long, they heard footsteps on the stairs, and Feng Chin-pao came in, holding a little gong in her hand. Upon seeing Ch'en Ching-chi, she paid him a respectful obeisance.
As the saying goes:
When one lover meets another,
Before they know it, all of a sudden, they will shed two streams of tears.[42]
Truly:
The sounds of a few amorous words are like warbling orioles;
Tears drop like a strand of pearls falling off their string.[43]
Ch'en Ching-chi no sooner caught sight of her than he pulled her aside to sit down with him and asked, "Sister, where have you been all this time since I saw you last?"
Feng Chin-pao dried her tears and said, "After I was released from the district yamen, it was not long before my mother, having suffered from shock, fell ill and died. I was subsequently sold into Auntie Cheng the Fifth's establishment as a powdered face. In recent days, however, patrons have been few, and I have been forced to go out onto the Lin-ch'ing dock to seek for customers among the drinkers in the tavern. The other day, I learned from Ch'en the Third that you had come here and opened a money-changing shop. I have been wanting to see you but did not anticipate that you would turn up for a drink in the tavern today, so that I would be able to run into you. I have been longing to death for you."
So saying, she started to weep all over again.
Ch'en Ching-chi pulled a handkerchief out of his sleeve and proceeded to wipe away her tears with it, saying, "My sister, you can stop worrying. I am all right again. After emerging from that lawsuit, and losing all my property, I have sought refuge in the Yen-kung Temple, where I have taken orders as a Taoist monk. My master Abbot Jen has entrusted me with major responsibilities, and I will be able to come see you frequently in the future."
He then went on to ask, "Where are you residing now?"
"I am living just west of the bridge here," responded Feng Chin-pao, "in the place called My Own Tavern operated by Liu the Second. It has over a hundred rooms, and unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls from all over, including the licensed quarter, reside there. During the day, they come out to frequent the various taverns in search of business."
As they talked, the two of them moved closer to each other as they continued drinking. Ch'en the Third went to heat more wine and then came back upstairs with a balloon guitar in hand. Feng Chin-pao then proceeded to play her musical instrument and sing a song to the tune "The Whole Realm Rejoices" in order to entertain Ch'en Ching-chi as he drank his wine.
Tears fall in two streams;
Two streams of tears fall.
Three cups of parting wine;[44]
Parting wine in three cups.
The male and female phoenixes are disunited;
Disunited are the male and female phoenixes.
Behind the mountain ridge the setting sun is gradually sinking;
Gradually sinking behind the mountain ridge is the setting sun.
The sky is growing dim and the earth dark.[45]
Dillydallying, they are reluctant to part;
Reluctant to part, they are dillydallying.[46]
When the two of them began to feel the effects of the wine, they could not help taking a small room and:
Doffing their clothes for the game of clouds and rain.
Ch'en Ching-chi had not had access to a woman recently and had thirsted for such an opportunity for some time. On reencountering Feng Chin-pao, he:
Exhausted himself to please her;
Addicted to the clouds and rain,
He was reluctant to call a halt.
Behold:
One of them stirs his jade arms into motion;
The other gently wriggles her willowy waist.
His pair of pupils spouts fire;[47]
Her starry eyes look dissolute.
One of them, his chest soaked with sweat,
Strives mightily to win two or three bouts.
One of them, emitting cosmetic fragrance,
Moans with satisfaction thousands of times.
The engagement is protracted,
As the "divine turtle" penetrates deeply it is harder than ever;
As the conflict is prolonged,

The gush of his "silvery stream" spurts well into her interior.
Although he had often challenged singing girls in furious battles,
None of them had ever risen to the level of this one's intensity.

It was not long before their engagement was over, and they put their clothes back on. Ch'en Ching-chi saw that it was getting late and took his leave of Feng Chin-pao, after rewarding her with a tael of silver, and giving Ch'en the Third three hundred copper cash.

As he was leaving, he said to Feng Chin-pao, "Sister, I plan to come and see you as often as possible, and we might as well meet here in the future. If you should hanker after me, just send Ch'en the Third to summon me."

So saying, he went downstairs and paid Hsieh the Third, the manager of the tavern, three candareens of silver for the wine they had consumed, after which he returned to the temple. Feng Chin-pao accompanied him as far as the bridge before coming back. Truly:

People may wear out their eyes in the desire for money;
Or ravage their faces with tears for the sake of lucre.

He stands on the steps and his tears fall silently
In the crowd his heart is full of discontent.
He breathes the air about him in a daze
And knows not his own feelings.
A warm breeze comes to the merry feast.
The sun shines brightly on the pollen of the flowers.
Yet even here his sorrow deepens.
He lives a life apart and only longs
To see the Springtide pass.

Chen Jingji had saved only his life. He sold his house and he had spent all his capital. His wife's ornaments were all gone, and there was no furniture left. He suspected that Chen Ding had made money at his expense, and dismissed him. Now he led a miserable existence without a penny to spend. He went several times to Yang's place to find out if Yang had come back with the goods.

One day, he went and shouted: "Is Yang the Elder at home?"

Now Yang had stolen Jingji's things and sold them. He hid himself in one place and another until he heard that Jingji's wife was dead and that the young man had been sent to prison for sometime on his mother-in-law's accusation. Then he came home. When he heard Chen Jingji's voice outside asking for the return of his property, he told his younger brother to go out and see him.

"You took my brother away on some of your business," Yang the Second said. "We have not heard a word from him for months, and, for all we know, you may have thrown him into the river and murdered him. Now, here you are, daring to come and ask about your merchandise. Do you think your merchandise is more important than my brother's life?"

This Yang the Second was a very bad man, a terrible fellow to meet in the gambling den. The purple muscles stood out on his arms and there was a mop of yellow hair on his chest. He was a villain pure and simple. He caught hold of Chen Jingji and demanded his brother. Jingji was frightened, struggled, and tried to get away. Yang the Second picked up a broken tile with three edges and deliberately gashed his own head so that the blood ran down. Then he ran after Jingji.

"I'll shove my spade in your mother's eye," he said. "What do we know about your money that you come farting around our house? Come here, and taste my fist."

Jingji ran for his life. When he got home, he fastened the door as tight as the lid of an iron pail. Outside it, Yang the Second cursed Chen Jingji, his father and his mother. Then he took some stones to smash open the door and Jingji held his breath. He had just come out of jail and had to put up with it. He was like a man who has once been bitten by a snake, afraid even of a piece of rope that he sees in a dream.

Some days later, he sold his house and got seventy taels of silver for it. He rented a small house in a very quiet road and went to live there. He sold the maid he had bought for Feng Jinbao and kept Ximen Dajie's maid to sleep with him. In less than a month, he sold the small house and went to live in a lodging house. Chen Ding no longer served him, and the maid died. He was alone in the world. He sold what furniture he had and was as poor as an old suit of clothes. Then he could not pay his rent and had to go and live at the Beggars' Rest.

The beggars knew he had been a rich man, and he was a good-looking fellow, so they gave him the stove bed to lie on and cakes to eat, and recommended him to the watchman as a bell ringer.

In the twelfth month, towards the end of winter, it was snowing heavily and the wind was very cold. Jingji came back from beating the alarm for the watchman. Then he went around the streets again with his bell. There were wind and snow together, and he had to tramp over the icy ground. It was so cold that he hunched his shoulders and bent his back and shivered all the time. About the fifth night watch, he saw a beggar ill and collapsed against a wall. The policeman thought the beggar was going to die and told Jingji to get some straw to warm him. Jingji went to sleep there, after doing all he could for the beggar. He had a dream. He dreamed he was back again in Ximen Qing's house, enjoying luxury and wealth, playing and joking with Pan Jinlian. Then he cried and woke up. Some of the other beggars came and asked him why he was crying. "Ah, Brothers," he said, "you do not know what I have had to bear." Every night, Jingji went to the Beggars' Rest, and every day went out to beg for food.

Long years he has suffered hardship
Bewailing his wife's death
Without clothes to cover his body
And food to put in his mouth.
His horse is dead
His servant run away
His house is sold.
Now, all alone, he wanders through the land
Standing, in the morning, outside the shops
To beg a scrap of bread
And, in the evening, lodges beside a ruined wall
Away from human habitation.
One hope alone is left to him
To go the watchman's round in the cold night.

In the city of Qinghe there lived an old man called Wang Xuan, whose other name was Ting Yong. He was more than sixty years old and very wealthy. He was a kind-hearted man who spent his money trying to help others. He always gave alms to the poor and assisted those in distress, and was very kind and very devout. His two sons were both married. One, Wang Qian, had inherited his grandfather's position at the royal mews and held the rank of Captain; the other, Wang Zhen, was a student at the Academy of Learning. The old gentleman had a small pawnshop. He had all the food he needed and all the clothes he could wear, and nothing to do but go to temples and monasteries to hear the preachings of the monks. He used to distribute medicine to the people, count his beads, and study the teachings of Buddha. He had two apricot trees in his garden, and took as his name in religion the Hermit of the Apricot Trees.

One day this old gentleman, wearing a monastic habit and a double-brimmed hat, was standing outside his door when Chen Jingji came along. The young man knelt down and kowtowed to him. The old man made a reverence in return.

"Brother," he said, "who are you? My sight is so bad I can't recognize you."

Jingji stood shivering. "Sir," he said, "I am Chen Hong's son."

The old man thought over this for a long time. "So you are Chen's son," he said at last. "My good nephew, how do you come to be in such a state? How are your father and mother?"

"My father died at the Eastern Capital," Jingji said, "and my mother is dead too."

"I believe you have been living with your father-in-law," the old man said.

"Yes," Jingji said, "but when he died, my mother-in-law would not have me any longer. Her daughter died, and we had a lawsuit. I had to sell my house, and I was cheated out of the little money I had. I have no work to do, and there is no way in which I can make a living."

"Where are you living now, my good nephew?" the old man said.

Jingji hesitated a long time, and at last said, "I will tell you the truth. It is like this...."

"Dear, oh dear!" the old man said. "So you are now a beggar. And yet, if I remember rightly, you come of a very respectable stock. Your father was a great friend of mine. But you were a little boy then, and had your hair dressed in a knot, and were going to school. Can it be possible you have come down to this? I am very sorry for you. Have you no relative who can help you?"

"There is my Uncle Zhang," Jingji said, "but he has not come to me, and I don't feel I can go to him."

The old man took Jingji into his house. He told his boys to bring food and cakes and bade Jingji eat as much as he could. Then he saw how poor and thin the young man's clothes were, and found for him a long black cloth gown, a felt hat, and a pair of strong winter shoes and socks. He gave Jingji a tael of silver and five hundred coppers.

"Good nephew," he said, "these clothes and shoes are for you to wear and this money is for you to spend. Rent a little room and start yourself in business with this tael of silver. You will at least be able to make something to eat that way, and it seems to me better than staying at the Beggars' Rest, where you are bound to go downhill. When you have found a room, come and tell me what the rent is and I will pay it for you."

Jingji knelt down on the floor and thanked the old gentleman. He promised to do what he was told and went away with the money. But he did not go to look for a room, nor did he start a business. He spent the coppers in a wineshop, and changed the tael of silver into base money and spent it in the street. Then the police arrested him as a common thief and, when he was taken to the police station, he was well beaten. He came away with nothing but the torn flesh on his back.

In a couple of days he had gambled his clothes away, and even taken off his socks to change them for food. Then he went back to begging on the street.

One day he again went past old Wang's door, and the old gentleman was standing outside. Jingji came and kowtowed to him. The old man looked at him and saw that the clothes and socks had gone. He had only the hat on his head and the boots on his bare feet. He was shivering with cold.

"Master Chen," the old man said, "how is your business getting on? I suppose you have come for the rent for your room."

Jingji could not think what answer to make. At last, when the old gentleman pressed him, he said what had happened and how everything the old man had given him was gone.

"Ah, my good nephew," the old man said. "That is no way to make a living. You are no use for manual labor; you must get some sort of little business. It is much better than this begging. If you become a beggar, people will look down on you, and you will bring disgrace upon your father and grandfather. I wonder why you did not do what I told you."

Again the old man took Jingji into his house and ordered a boy to bring him food. When he had finished eating, the old man gave him a pair of trousers and a white cloth gown, a pair of socks, a string of coins, and some rice.

"Take this," he said, "and do start some business. Even if you sell fire-wood or charcoal or beans or melons, you can at least make a living, and it is surely better than begging."

Jingji promised and took the money and the rice away. In a few days he had spent all the money on food and meat and noodles that he shared with the beggars in the Beggars' Rest. Then he went gambling and sold the white cloth gown.

It was the beginning of the year, and, clasping his shoulders with his hands, he went wandering about the streets. He felt very shy about approaching the old man again, but nonetheless went to the old man's place and stood in the sun beside the wall. The old man saw him, but looked at him with cold eyes and said nothing. The young man came up hesitatingly, knelt down, and kowtowed. Then the old man found out again how Chen Jingji had spent his money.

"Good nephew," he said, "you are off the track altogether. Our bellies are as deep as the sea, and time flies as quickly as a weaver's shuttle. Nobody can help you to fill a bottomless pit. Come in. Now, let me tell you. I know of a quiet and peaceful place. It would be the very best place for you, but I fear you will not wish to go there."

Jingji, kneeling before him, wept and said: "Uncle, if you will only take pity on me once more, I will go, no matter where you send me, and stay in peace there."

"Not far from the Linqing wharf," the old man said, "there is a temple called the Yangong temple. It is a place that produces rice and fish, and much business is done there. The Abbot is a good friend of mine. He has only two or three novices at present and, if I take you to him with some presents, I think he may accept you. It will be very good for you to learn how to read the sacred books and perform sacred music. Then you will be able to offer divine worship for people."

"Uncle, I am very grateful to you. It is an excellent idea."

"If you are willing," the old man said, "come here early tomorrow morning. It is a good day, and I will go with you to the temple."

Jingji went away. The old man sent at once for the tailor and told him to make a religious habit, a hat, shoes, and socks for Chen Jingji.

The next day, Jingji came to the old man's house. He was sent into an empty room to take a bath. Then he combed his hair and put on the new hat, and dressed himself in a whole suit of new clothes. The old man took fruits, a jar of wine, a roll of silk, and five taels of silver. He mounted a horse and gave Jingji a donkey to ride. Two boys went with them and carried the presents. They went outside the city and came to the river, about seventy li away. The sun was setting when they came to the temple. Old Wang dismounted and went in. The pine trees were very luxuriant, and the dark cypress trees were massed closely together. The walls were shaped like the character pa. On the north side were three rooms. It was a very handsome temple.

The young monks at the gate saw them coming and went to tell the Abbot. He came out to receive them dressed in his robes. The old man told Jingji to stay with the presents outside, and went in with the Abbot. When they came to the Abbot's apartments, the priest said: "My lord Wang, why have you been so long without coming to see me? Why am I favored today?"

"I have been very busy, or I should have come to see you before," the old man said.

They sat down and young monks brought tea.

"It is late," the Abbot said, "and you will not be able to go away this evening." He gave orders that the old man's horse should be taken to the stable.

"I have come to this most venerable temple to ask a favor of you," old man Wang said. "I can only hope that you will grant it."

"Give me your orders," the Abbot said, "and I shall not fail to obey."

"I have brought with me a young man, the son of an old friend. His name is Chen Jingji, and he is twenty-four years old. He is very handsome and not lacking in intelligence. But his parents died while he was still young and his upbringing has been neglected. His family is a very estimable and noble one. At one time they were rich, but they were unfortunately compelled to go to law, and now the young man is homeless. Because of the old friendship between his father and myself, I have suggested that he should come and become a monk in your temple."

"Since that is your wish, how dare I refuse?" the Abbot said. "Unhappily, though I have two or three novices here, none of them has any intelligence and they give me a great deal of trouble. All I should like to know is that this young man is honest."

"I can assure you, Sir, that he is most well-behaved. He is painstaking and clever in all things. I am sure he will make an excellent novice."

"When will you bring the young man?" the Abbot said.

"He is waiting outside at this moment. I have also brought a few humble presents that I ask you to accept with a smile."

"My lord," the Abbot said, "why did you not say so before?" He gave orders that the young man should be brought in. The servants carried in the presents. The Abbot looked at the card: 'Your humble disciple Wang Xuan respectfully offers a roll of coarse silk, a jar of wine, a pair of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two boxes of fruits, and five taels of silver.'

The Abbot quickly made a reverence to the old man. "Why do you give me such a valuable present?" he said: "it would be rude for me to refuse, and it embarrasses me to accept."

He looked at Jingji, who was wearing a Daoist hat, gown, and shoes, and a girdle about his waist. He had beautiful eyebrows and bright eyes. His teeth were bright, his lips red, and his face as white as though it were powdered. He stepped forward and kowtowed four times to the Abbot.

The Abbot asked how old he was.

"My animal is the Horse," Jingji said, "and I am twenty-four."

The Abbot realized that Jingji was indeed intelligent. He gave him the name Chen Zongmei. The other novices were called, one Jin Zongming, and the other, Xu Zongshun. Old Wang asked the Abbot to introduce Jingji to the others. The Abbot accepted the presents; boys brought a light and the table was set. There was plenty of food on the table, and, needless to remark, chickens, ducks, fish and meat. Old man Wang could not drink very much and, though the Abbot tried to persuade him, he soon refused any more and, asking leave to retire, went to bed.

The next morning, boys brought him water and, when he had dressed, the Abbot came to offer him tea. Then they had breakfast and, after it, the old man drank two cups of wine. His horse was well fed, and the Abbot gave a present to each of the two boys.

Before the old man went away, he sent for Jingji. "Work hard," he said, "at learning the Sacred Scriptures, and obey the orders your Teacher gives you. I will come and see you again, and bring clothes, shoes and socks for you at every season."

"If he does not obey you," he said to the Abbot, "punish him. I shall not blame you."
Then he took Jingji aside. "You must cleanse your mind and change your ways," he said. "Learn. If you still remain as bad as you have been, I shall cease to trouble about you."
Jingji promised, and the old man went home. So Jingji was established at the temple, and became a novice.
The Abbot was elderly and red-nosed. He was tall and had a loud and resonant voice. His beard was long; he was a good talker and a good drinker. He spent all his time receiving visitors. The business of the temple was managed by the novice, Jin Zongming. At that time, the government had just completed the canal and built two sluices at Linqing to control the water. So all boats, whether those of officials or people, had to stop there, and it was customary for those who traveled upon them to visit the temple. Some said prayers, some offered gifts, some came in quest of miracles, some came to do works of charity. They gave cloth and money and rice, oil, paper and candles. Some gave poles and mats.
With the money that he could not spend, the Abbot had set up a money-changing shop and a rice store on the river, and put his novices in charge of them, taking the profit for himself.
Jin Zongming was not a good young man. He was about thirty years old, and spent much of his time in the bawdy house. He was a great fellow for wine and women. He had some younger novices of his own, very smart, good-looking boys, and spent the night with them. When Chen Jingji came, Zongming saw how handsome he was, how white his teeth and how red his lips. He seemed so intelligent that he could make his eyes speak for him in place of his mouth. So he asked the young man to come and sleep in his room. In the evening they drank and, when Jingji was drunk, they went to bed together. At first, one had his head at one end of the bed and the other at the other end. But Jin Zongming complained that Jingji's feet smelled, and asked him to come over the other way. Then he complained that Jingji's breath was bad, and asked him to turn his face around. Jingji pressed his back against the other monk's stomach and said nothing, feigning sleep. Then Jin Zongming's penis became firm and erect like a spear. He smeared it with spittle and plunged in. When Jingji had been living among the beggars, two of his companions had misused his bottom and stretched it, so the monk's path was now easy. Jingji still said nothing. "This fellow will fall into my hands," he thought. "He doesn't know who I am and he can't do me much harm. I will let him have a taste and then I will get hold of his money."
He suddenly cried out. Jin Zongming was afraid the Abbot might hear, and covered the young man's mouth with his hand.
"Brother," he said, "don't make a noise. Tell me anything you want and you shall have it."
"I will not tell anybody," Jingji said, "if you will promise me three things."
"Good Brother," Zongming said, "do you say three things? I am ready to promise ten."
"Very well," Jingji said. "If you want me, you must leave the other boys alone. You must let me have the keys of all the rooms. And, if I go anywhere, do not ask me where I have been. If you like to promise these three things, you can do whatever you wish."
"I will do everything you say," Zongming said. They spent half the night in their wild pursuits. Jingji had been a dissolute young wastrel and knew all the tricks of the trade. He used these tricks for the benefit of Jin Zongming, who was perfectly delighted. The next day, he gave all the keys to Chen Jingji. He kept his promise that he would sleep no more with the boys.
Days passed and Jin Zongming was always singing the praises of Jingji to the Abbot. The Abbot believed him and bought a priest's diploma for Jingji. He was not suspicious, and the young man frequently took money and went to the town. There, one day, he met a certain Chen the Third who told him that Feng Jinbao's mother was dead. The girl herself had been sold to Zheng's bawdy house and given a new name. She was now frequenting the wine houses in the street. Chen the Third asked Jingji if he would like to see her. Jingji had not forgotten his old love for the girl. He took his money and went to a large wineshop. He had been happy enough before, but now it was as though he met her whom he had loved for five hundred years.
Do not spare your clothes of silk and gold
Do not let your youth be wasted.
When you see a flower that is ripe for gathering.
Gather it.
Wait not till all the flowers are faded
For then only bare branches will remain
For you to gather.
The wineshop to which they went was the finest in Linqing. It was known as Xie's wineshop, and had more than a hundred rooms. There were green balconies with, at the back, a little hill and, at the front, the river. It was in a very busy position, and all the boats called there.
The sun shines on the carven eaves
The painted columns shimmer in the air.
There are low green rails under the great windows
And long green curtains hanging there.
Young noblemen play the flute and the sheng
Singing girls and dancing maidens serve the wine
And bear the wine jars.
The drinkers feast their eyes on the blue sky
And the cloud-covered mountains.
Water and mist, like snow of good omen,
Take away the breath.
The wild birds sing in the green willows
And horses in happy trappings
Are tethered to the willow beside the door.
Chen the Third took Jingji in, and they went into a small room. He bade the waiter bring wine and food and send them a singing girl from downstairs. They heard footsteps coming up the stairs, and Feng Jinbao came into the room. She was carrying a little gong. She made a reverence to Chen Jingji. When the two lovers met, they could not prevent their tears from falling.
Jingji asked her to sit down with them. "Where have you been since I last saw you?" he asked her.
Feng Jinbao dried her tears. "After I came out of prison," she said, "my mother died. The shock had been too much for her. Then I was sold to Madam Zheng the Fifth. But lately, few people have come to see me, and I have had to go to the street to pick up business. Yesterday Master Chen told me that you had a money-changing shop here. I was anxious to see you, and at last my wish has been fulfilled. I have thought of you all the time." She began to weep again.
Jingji took out his handkerchief and dried her tears. "Sister," he said, "do not worry any more. I am all right again now. When I came out of prison, I had to spend all my money. Then I went to the Yangong monastery and became a priest. The Abbot trusts me absolutely, and I shall be able to come and see you as often as I like. Where are you living?"
"I am at Liu the Second's place," Feng Jinbao said. "It is west of the bridge. He has more than a hundred houses, all occupied by singing girls. Most of them come to the wine houses during the day."
They sat side by side and drank together. While the wine was being warmed, Chen the Third gave her a lute and she sang for them.
Tears fall in pairs
Tears fall in pairs
Three cups of wine at parting
Three cups of wine at parting
The phoenix and his mate are together no more
The phoenix and his mate are together no more.
Over the mountaintop
The slanting sun sinks gradually to rest.
Beyond the mountain the sun sets.
Now the sky is dark and the earth is gloomy
They do not wish to part
They do not wish to part.
When they had had wine enough, Jingji and Feng Jinbao went into a small room and did the work of love. It was a long time since Jingji had touched a woman, and he was very eager. Now that he had found Feng Jinbao, he put forth all his strength. They wished that they might never make an end, but at last they did so, and put on their clothes again.
It was late. Jingji left Feng Jinbao. He gave her a tael of silver, and three hundred coppers to Chen the Third. "Sister," he said to the girl, "we will meet here again. Whenever you want me, ask Chen the Third to tell me." He paid three qian of silver for the wine and then started back for the temple. Feng Jinbao went with him and left him at the bridge.

117

Liu the 2ND Drunkenly Beats Ch'en Ching-chi; Sun Hsüeh-o is Sold to a Brothel & Becomes a Trollop in the Scoffing Scholar's Own Tavern

When flowers bloom they do not disdain the plots of the poor;
The moon shines on mountains and rivers so that all are bright.
In this world the heart of man alone remains vile;
In all things demanding that Heaven show him favor.
The foolish, the deaf, and the dumb everywhere prosper;
While the clever and the intelligent suffer in poverty.
The year, month, day, and hour of birth determine it all;
However calculated, events are controlled by fate rather than man.[1]

From the time that Ch'en the Third led Ch'en Ching-chi to the Hsieh Family Tavern where he met with Feng Chin-pao, the two of them resumed their former affair. From then on, no three days passed by without their getting together. If Ch'en Ching-chi happened to be tied up at the temple and failed to show up, Feng Chin-pao would send Ch'en the Third to deliver a gift, or a love letter, and request that he come, and he would reward her with five mace or a tael of silver. Later on, he also undertook to supply her with fuel and rice, and to pay her rent. When he returned to the temple, his face was often red. When Abbot Jen asked him where he had been drinking, Ch'en Ching-chi would tell him that he had been enjoying three cups of wine with the manager of the rice shop, in order to reward him for his labors. His fellow disciple Chin Tsung-ming would also cover up for him and continued, needless to say, to have his fun with him in the evenings. As the mornings and evenings succeeded one another, he managed to pilfer nearly half of the assets in Abbot Jen's strongbox without his being aware of it.
One day, it was one of those occasions when:
Something was destined to happen.
Liu the Second, the proprietor of My Own Tavern, who was known as the Turf-protecting Tiger, was the brother-in-law of Chang Sheng, a trusted servant in the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu of the Regional Military Command. He specialized in operating brothels on the Lin-ch'ing dock:
Relying on his power to oppress the weak,[2] and acting as a loan shark. He would lend money to the singing girls in the brothels at thirty percent interest, and if they failed to pay up when due, he would renegotiate the contract, adding the unpaid interest to the original amount of the loan, and charging interest on the interest. He was:
Given to drinking to excess and becoming violent, so people did not dare to cross him. He was:
A foreman among the beaters of trollops;
A leader among the abusers of drunkards.[3]
Upon seeing that Ch'en Ching-chi, though still a white-faced youngster, was a disciple of Abbot Jen of the Yen-kung Temple and was maintaining the powdered face Cheng Chin-pao as his mistress in Hsieh the Third's tavern, he drank himself into a stupor, proceeded to clench his bowl-shaped fists, and headed for the Hsieh Family Tavern, demanding to know the whereabouts of Cheng Chin-pao.
This threw Hsieh the Third into such consternation that he bowed hastily in response and said, "Uncle Liu the Second, she is residing in room number two on the second floor."
Liu the Second then proceeded, with giant strides, to ascend the steps. Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao were in the room at the time, drinking together, and enjoying each others' company. They had closed the door to the room and left the blind hanging outside.
Liu the Second tore down the blind with his hands and called out in a loud voice, demanding that Cheng Chin-pao should come out. This flustered Ch'en Ching-chi to such an extent that he was barely able to breathe through his nostrils.
Liu the Second then kicked open the door with his foot, and Cheng Chin-pao felt compelled to come outside, saying, "Uncle Liu the Second, what have you got to say to me?"
"You lousy whore!" said Liu the Second, "you owe me three month's rent and have been hiding out here in order to avoid me."
"Uncle Liu the Second," responded Cheng Chin-pao with an ingratiating smile, "you can go home, and I will have my procuress, Auntie Cheng the fifth, deliver the rent to you."
But Liu the Second proceeded to strike her a blow in the chest with his fist, knocking her to the floor, and banging her head on the steps until:
The flow of blood inundated the ground, saying, "You lousy whore! I will not wait to have it delivered to me but am demanding to have it right now."
Seeing that Ch'en Ching-chi was in the room, he strode inside and overturned the table, smashing the dishes to smithereens.
"Ai-ya!" exclaimed Ch'en Ching-chi. "Who are you to come in and wreak havoc in this way?"
"Fuck you, you 'sweetie'[4] of a Taoist priest," cursed Liu the Second, whereupon, he proceeded to grab him by the hair and hold him down while he:
Struck him with his fists and kicked him with his feet, innumerable times. The other customers on the upper floor of the tavern were stupefied by what they saw.
The owner of the tavern, Hsieh the Third, on observing that Liu the Second was drunk, did not initially dare to interfere, but when he realized that he was beating someone until he was scarcely recognizable, he came upstairs and endeavored to intervene, saying, "Uncle Liu the Second, venerable sir, pray abate your wrath. He is unfamiliar with your reputation and has offended you by mistake. You would do well to make allowances for him and let him go, for my sake."
Liu the Second paid no attention to him but continued to beat Ch'en Ching-chi with all his strength until he had:
Rendered him senseless to the nth degree.[5]
He then summoned the local constable and the head of the relevant mutual security unit and had them arrest Ch'en Ching-chi and the powdered face, truss them up together with a single length of rope, and lock them up for the night, instructing them to escort them to the yamen of the Regional Military Command early the next morning.
It so happens that Commandant Chou Hsiu had been ordered by imperial edict to protect his territory, apprehend thieves and bandits, and oversee the canals and waterways in his jurisdiction.
Meanwhile, the fact that Ch'en Ching-chi had been arrested was still unknown to Abbot Jen in the Yen-kung Temple, who thought that he was probably staying overnight in the rice shop, having chosen not to return.
To resume our story, the next day, the local constable, the head of the relevant mutual security unit, and the couriers who patrolled the Grand Canal took charge of Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao, hired donkeys for them to ride on, and set out early in the morning to escort them to the yamen of the Regional Military Command. Upon arriving there, they showed the relevant documents to the head servants Chang Sheng and Li An and explained that the culprits had been in a brawl with Uncle Liu the Second, and that one of them was a Taoist priest from the Yen-kung Temple named Ch'en Ching-chi, and the other a singing girl named Cheng Chin-pao.

The soldiers on duty demanded money of them, saying, "We are the corps of twelve personnel who are responsible for administering punishments and are prepared to accept whatever you choose to give us, but you cannot afford to regard the two head servants lightly."
"I did have money on my person," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "but last night while Liu the Second was beating me, someone made off with it. The clothes I was wearing have all been torn to tatters, so where could I conceal any money? All I've got now is the silver hairpin that holds my topknot in place. I'll pull it out, and you can present it to the two head servants."
The jailers took the hairpin and showed it to Chang Sheng and Li An, saying, thus and so, "He could not come up with so much as a candareen but merely presented us with this silver-plated pin."
"Call him to come here so I can interrogate him," said Chang Sheng.
In no time at all, the soldiers hustled him inside and made him kneel down before him.
"What disciple of Abbot Jen are you?" asked Chang Sheng.
"I am his third disciple," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.
"How old are you this year?" he went on to ask.
"I am twenty-three years old," replied Ch'en Ching-chi.
"If you are as young as all that," said Chang Sheng, "you ought to be devoting yourself to your duties as a Taoist priest, and studying the scriptures, rather than going out whoring, and drinking, and creating disturbances. What sort of insignificant yamen do you take the commandant's yamen to be, that you should allow yourself to be brought here without any money in hand? This hairpin of yours is:
Hardly enough to discolor the water.
What would I want with it?"
So saying, he tossed it back to him and told the jailers, "Wait a little, until His Honor takes his place on the bench, and then see that this case is given priority. It is obvious that this servile cur of a Taoist priest is a penny-pinching sort himself, though he feels free to solicit money and provisions from:
The patrons in the four directions.
Quite aside from the fact that you have been brought here because you are accused in a law case, even if you were coming to have a drink or attend a feast, you would be expected to bring along a handkerchief with which to wipe your mouth. When the time comes to administer punishment, see to it that this rascal is beaten and subjected to the squeezers as severely as possible."
He also called Cheng Chin-pao before him, but she had been accompanied by the pimp from the Cheng Family Brothel, who had expended three or four taels of silver on the staff of the yamen, both high and low.
"Since you are a singing girl," said Chang Sheng, "it is only natural that you should go where the pickings are good in order to support yourself. That's no big deal. It all depends on the mood of His Honor. If he is angry, you may be subjected to a session or two with the squeezers; while if he is well disposed, he may simply let you go."
The jailer standing to one side said to her, "If you give me another mace of silver, should you be subjected to the squeezers, I will see to it that your two thumbs are spared."
Li An then said to the jailer, "You take her out of sight and wait. His Honor is about to take his place on the bench."
Before long, lo and behold, the cloud-shaped gong sounded and Commandant Chou Hsiu came in and took his place on the bench. The functionaries, soldiers, and jailers were neatly arrayed to either side in strict formation. Behold:
The walls are decked with crimson silk;
The tables covered with purple drapery.
At the head of the chamber are suspended
red hangings;
On all four sides there hang kingfisherhued screens.[6]
The judge adheres strictly to the law;
The admonitory stone tablet is incised with four lines in the Emperor's hand.[7]
The officers are meticulous and honest;
Beside the external abatises are displayed two of the commandant's standards.
The soldiers and jailers stand sedately;
The functionaries are arrayed imposingly.
Holding their staffs, they stand before the steps ready to perform their duties;
With writing materials in hand, they wait on the sidelines to hear the judgment.
Though only the officers of one region;
They resemble a courtroom full of gods.[8]
On this occasion:
Without coincidences there would be no stories.
It was a case of:
Five hundred kalpas ago, these lovers
were fated to meet;
It is those who are predestined to do so who come together.
Ch'un-mei, after entering Commandant Chou Hsiu's household, had given birth to a son during the eighth month of the previous year, and the young squire was now half a year old.
His face was smooth as a jade cap ornament, and
His lips looked as though they were rouged.
The commandant cherished him as:
A pearl in the palm;
and valued him more than:
A priceless treasure.
Not much later, his first wife died, and the commandant formally raised Ch'un-mei to the status of his legitimate wife and moved her into the master suite of five rooms. He also bought two wet nurses to take care of breast feeding his infant son, one of whom was named Yü-t'ang, and the other Chin-kuei; and two maidservants to wait on his wife, one of whom was named Ts'ui-hua, and the other Lan-hua. He also had two singing girls as concubines, who were fifteen or sixteen years old, one of whom was named Hai-t'ang, and the other Yüeh-kuei, who also waited upon Ch'un-mei in her new quarters. His senior concubine, Sun Erh-niang, had only a single maidservant to wait on her, named Ho-hua. But no more of this.
At the time, the young squire enjoyed having Chang Sheng hold him in his arms and take him outside to play, and when Commandant Chou Hsiu was holding court, Chang Sheng would stand to one side and allow him to look on at the proceedings.
On that day, when Commandant Chou Hsiu took his place on the bench and ordered that the tablet announcing the category of cases to be heard should be hung up, the local constables brought in the prisoners from their jurisdictions for trial, and Ch'en Ching-chi and Cheng Chin-pao were the first to be called before him.
When the commandant had read the deposition and saw that there were wounds on Ch'en Ching-chi's face, he said, "You rascal, you are a Taoist priest, yet you:
Do not abide by the Rules of Purity.
How can you indulge in sleeping with prostitutes, drinking, and creating disturbances in my jurisdiction?
This kind of behavior is unacceptable.
Lictors, take him down, give him twenty strokes of the bamboo, and revoke his ordination certificate. As for that singing girl, née Cheng, subject her to fifty blows on the squeezers, and have her sent back to work at the brothel from which she came."
The jailers standing to either side came forward, turned Ch'en Ching-chi over, stripped off his clothes, bound him with a length of rope, flourished their bamboo rods, and shouted for the beating to begin. At this juncture:
Strange as it may seem,
Chang Sheng was standing on the platform in front of the courtroom looking on, with the young squire in his arms, when the child broke away from him, approached Ch'en Ching-chi, and poked him out of a desire to be hugged. Chang Sheng fearing that the commandant would see what was going on, went over and picked him up, but the child started to cry out loud and continued to cry as he carried him back to Ch'un-mei in the rear compound.
"What is he crying about?" asked Ch'un-mei.
"His Honor is conducting affairs in the courtroom," responded Chang Sheng, "and had just ordered that the Taoist priest named Ch'en from the Yen-kung Temple should be given a beating, when the child went over and poked him out of a desire to be hugged. When I took him away, he started to cry."
Upon hearing that the culprit was named Ch'en, Ch'un-mei:
Lightly moved her lotus feet,
Gently lifted her beige skirt, and made her way out to a position from which she could observe the proceedings from behind a hanging screen.
When she saw that the voice and the appearance of the person being beaten in the courtroom resembled those of Ch'en Ching-chi, she wondered, "Why should he have taken orders and become a Taoist priest?"
She then called over Chang Sheng and asked him, "What is this person's name?"
"According to the deposition of this Taoist priest," responded Chang Sheng, "he is twenty-three years old, and his secular name is Ch'en Ching-chi."
Ch'un-mei thought to herself, "So it really is him after all."
She then turned to Chang Sheng and said, "Go ask His Honor to come see me."
At the time, as the commandant presided over the court, Ch'en Ching-chi had only been given ten strokes of his sentenced beating, and Cheng Chin-pao was still being subjected to the squeezers.
When Chou Hsiu heard that his wife was calling for him, he ordered the jailers to suspend the beating and went to see her.
"That Taoist priest you are beating is a cousin of mine," said Ch'un-mei. "Please forgive him for my sake."
"My wife," responded Chou Hsiu, "why didn't you let me know before? I have already had him given ten strokes, and there is no remedy for that."
He then went back to the courtroom and ordered the jailers to let them both off, and to have the singing girl sent back to the brothel from which she came.
He then privately instructed Chang Sheng to call back the Taoist priest and also said, "Go ask your mistress if she would like to see him."
Ch'un-mei was about to have Chang Sheng call him into the rear compound to see her, when she suddenly remembered something.
From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself:
"If I am able to eradicate the obstacle before my eyes,
I may be able to replace it with the love of my heart;[9]
If the obstacle before my eyes cannot be eradicated,
How can I ever replace it with the love of my heart?"
Thereupon, she said to Chang Sheng, "You can let that person go for the time being. I will call him back another time."
She also ordered him not to revoke his ordination certificate.
Ch'en Ching-chi, having endured ten strokes with the bamboo, left the commandant's yamen and hastily made his way back to the Yen-kung Temple.
How could he have known that someone had told Abbot Jen, "That disciple of yours, Ch'en Tsung-mei, has been maintaining the harlot Cheng Chin-pao as his mistress in the Hsieh Family Tavern, which has annoyed the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, the owner of My Own Tavern, into beating him into a stinking pulp.
Along with the woman, he has been tied up and escorted to the yamen of the Regional Military Command. On the grounds that:
This kind of behavior is unacceptable,
the commandant is sending soldiers to hold you for interrogation, and revoke your ordination certificate."
When Abbot Jen heard this, on the one hand, he was old and susceptible to fright, while on the other hand, he was suffering from obesity. When he opened his strongbox and found that it was nearly empty, he received such a shock that the phlegm in his heart rose up to choke him, and he:
Fell to the floor in a faint.
His disciples rushed to his assistance and engaged a physician to come and administer a dose of liquid medicine, but he remained:
Oblivious to human affairs.
Later that night, alas:
He stopped breathing and died.
At the time of his death he was sixty-two years old.
The day after this, when Ch'en Ching-chi arrived back at the temple, the neighbors on the left side said to him, "Do you still dare to go into the temple? Your master, on your account, thus and so, has suffered such a severe shock that he died during the third watch last night."
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he was:
As flustered as a dog who has
lost his way home;
As flurried as a fish who has
escaped the net:
and made his way back to Ch'ing-ho district. Truly:
The case of the deer was one that the minister of Cheng was unable to solve;

Whether the butterfly was Chuang Chou, or vice versa, cannot be determined.[10]
At this point the story divides into two. To resume our story, when Ch'un-mei had seen Ch'en Ching-chi in the commandant's yamen, she had intended to keep him there, but an obstacle to doing so suddenly arose in her mind. She consequently sent Chang Sheng out to tell Ch'en Ching-chi to go his way for the time being. She then went back to her room, removed her headdress, took off her embroidered garments, and threw herself down on the bed, where she proceeded to stroke her chest and hug the covers, giving vent to moans and cries of pain. This had the effect of throwing the entire household, both high and low, into a state of consternation.
The commandant's secondary concubine Sun Erh-niang came in to see her and said, "First Lady, you have seemed to be in good health. What has happened to you?"
"You can go," responded Ch'un-mei. "Just leave me alone."
Later on, when the commandant came in from the courtroom and saw that she was lying on the bed and groaning with pain, he too became flustered, took hold of her hand, and asked, "What is it that is troubling you?"
When she did not reply, he went on to ask, "Has anyone been annoying you?"
Once again, she did not make a sound in response.
The commandant then said, "It must be because I have given your cousin a beating just now that you are upset."
Yet again, she did not respond.
The commandant:
At a loss for what to do,[11] went outside and took Chang Sheng and Li An to task, saying, "If the two of you knew that he was your mistress's cousin, why didn't you tell me about it before I had him beaten ten strokes, and thus made your mistress unhappy? I told you to keep him here so that he could meet with your mistress. Why have you let him go instead? I demand an explanation from the two of you."
"I reported the situation to the mistress," said Chang Sheng, "and she said that I should let him go for the time being. It was only then that I let him go."
So saying, he went into the room and wept bitterly as he pled with Ch'un-mei, saying. "Mistress, I beg you to say a word to His Honor on our behalf. Otherwise, he is bent on punishing us."
Ch'un-mei, thereupon:
Opening wide her starry eyes, and Raising up her moth eyebrows, called the commandant into her presence, and said, "It's just that I've been feeling out of sorts and has nothing to do with the two of them. It's only because that rascal:
Is not the sort to abide by his lot, and has gone so far as to go about masquerading as a Taoist priest, that I want to test his patience for a while before acknowledging him."
The commandant, upon hearing this, no longer held Chang Sheng and Li An to blame but, seeing that Ch'un-mei was continuing to groan with pain, sent Chang Sheng to summon a doctor to come and take her pulse.
The doctor said, "Your venerable wife is suffering from a condition engendered by the six desires and seven passions, that has produced a heavy feeling of congestion in the chest."
The medication he prescribed was prepared for her, but she refused to take it, simply letting it grow cold. Her maidservants did not dare to reproach her for this but brought the commandant in to try to get her to take it, whereupon, she did swallow one mouthful but refused to take any more.
When the commandant left the room, his concubine Yüeh-kuei brought the medication over to her again and said, "Mistress, please take the medicine."
But Ch'un-mei picked it up and threw it in her face, reviling her with the words, "You lousy wanton slave! Why should you keep on trying to get me to swallow this bitter liquid? There's nothing in my stomach."
She then made her kneel in penance before her.
Sun Erh-niang came in and asked, "What has Yüeh-kuei done that has caused the mistress to make her kneel this way?"
The concubine Hai-t'ang explained, "When she tried to get the mistress to take her medicine, the mistress said, 'My stomach is empty, so why should you try to force this medicine on me?' That's why she has made her kneel."
"Mistress," inquired Sun Erh-niang, "have you really not eaten anything today? Yüeh-kuei could not have known that. You ought not to beat her. Pray forgive her this once, for my sake."
She then said to Hai-t'ang, "Go into the kitchen and boil some congee for the mistress to eat."
Ch'un-mei then allowed Yüeh-kuei to get up from her kneeling position, while Hai-t'ang went into the kitchen and, carefully and conscientiously, prepared a small pot of thick congee made from nonglutinous rice, along with four saucers of side dishes. After putting the congee in a large bowl, and providing a pair of ivory chopsticks, she brought the steaming hot congee into the room.
At the time, Ch'un-mei was asleep on the bed, with her face to the wall, and she did not venture to disturb her but waited until she turned over before offering it to her, saying, "Mistress, the congee is here. Won't you eat some of it?"
But Ch'un-mei kept her eyes closed and did not respond.
Hai-t'ang appealed to her once again, saying, "The congee is getting cold.
Won't you get up, Mistress, and have some congee?"
Sun Erh-niang, who was standing by her side, said, "Mistress, you haven't had anything to eat for half a day. If you are feeling any better now, why not get up and have something to eat? It will help to maintain your stamina."
Ch'un-mei hastily crawled into an upright position, told the wet nurse to bring over a lamp, and took the bowl of congee into her hands. After swallowing only one mouthful, she shoved it onto the floor, but fortunately the wet nurse caught it in her hands, so that it did not break.
She then raised her voice and shouted at Sun Erh-niang, "You urged me to get up and have some congee for no good reason. Just take a look at the fine batch of congee that lousy slave boiled up. I'm not recuperating from childbirth, so why should she come up with such a thin batch of congee that I can see my face in it?"
She then said to the wet nurse Chin-kuei, "You give that slave four slaps in the face for me."
There and then, she actually did give Hai-t'ang four slaps in the face.
Sun Erh-niang then said, "Mistress, if you don't want to eat the congee, what would you like to eat instead, in order to relieve your hunger?"
"You want me to eat something," responded Ch'un-mei, "but my abdomen is feeling congested, and I can't keep anything down."
After a little while, she called over her junior maidservant Lan-hua and said to her, "I'd like to try some soup flavored with wing tips of chicken. Go into the kitchen and get that whore of a slave to wash her hands and make me a bowl of soup flavored with wing tips of chicken. Have her put in a good number of marinated bamboo shoots, and see that it is both sour and spicy."
Sun Erh-niang said, "Mistress, since you have told her what to do, she will go and have Sun Hsüeh-o make it for you. When you hanker after some particular dish, it will be as good as medicine for you."
Lan-hua did not dare to be remiss but went straight to the kitchen and said to Sun Hsüeh-o, "The mistress has ordered you to make some soup flavored with chicken wing tips for her. Hurry up and do it. She is waiting to have it."
Sun Hsüeh-o thereupon proceeded to:
Wash her hands and trim her nails, after which, she killed two little chickens, plucked them clean, removed their wing tips, and cut them into slivers with a sharp knife. She then mixed in pepper, minced scallions, coriander, marinated bamboo shoots, oil, soy sauce, and the like, in order to make a clear broth, with which she filled two bowls, and placed them, while still steaming hot, on a red lacquer tray, for Lan-hua to take back to the master suite.
After looking them over by the light of a lamp, Ch'un-mei swallowed a mouthful but immediately cried out in an angry voice, "Go ask that whore of a slave what kind of soup she thinks she has made? It is as clear and flavorless as water and has no taste at all. You all may have been trying to get me to eat something, but all you are doing is making me angry, for no good reason."
This had the effect of causing Lan-hua to fear a beating, and she promptly returned to the kitchen, where she told Sun Hsüeh-o, "The mistress objects to the tastelessness of the soup and is ranting abusively about it."
Sun Hsüeh-o did not say a word, but proceeded to:
Swallow her anger and keep her own counsel,
as she put the pot back on the stove, made another bowl of soup, to which she added additional pepper, making it redolently fragrant, and gave it to Lan-hua to take back to the master suite. Ch'un-mei once again objected that it was too salty, and picking up the bowl she threw the soup onto the floor. Luckily, Lan-hua was quick enough to dodge out of the way, or it would have splashed all over her.
Ch'un-mei said irately, "You go and tell that slave that I know she is annoyed at having to cook for me, but if she doesn't do any better this time, she will have to answer for it."
When Sun Hsüeh-o heard this:
Though she never, ever, should have done it, she mumbled out loud, "Sister, since when did you become so high and mighty as to impose on other people this way?"
She did not anticipate that Lan-hua, upon returning to the master suite, would repeat this remark of hers to Ch'un-mei.
If Ch'un-mei had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard it, she immediately:
Pricked up her willow brows,
Opened wide her starry eyes, and Ground her silver teeth to smithereens,
As her powdered face turned bright red.
"Go drag that whore of a slave in here for me," she shouted.
In no time at all, three or four wet nurses and maidservants succeeded in dragging Sun Hsüeh-o into the room.
Ch'un-mei, in a rage, grabbed hold of her by the hair, tore off her headdress, and cursed her, saying, "You whore of a slave! How can you ask how I became so high and mighty? It was not the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing that elevated me to this status. I bought you in order to serve me, and you have been unhappy to do so. You were told to make me some soup, but what you produced was either too tasteless, or overly salty. Yet you have the nerve to ask in front of a maidservant when I became so high and mighty as to impose on other people. What further use do I have for the likes of you?"
She then sent for the commandant and had him force Sun Hsüeh-o to kneel in the courtyard, after which, she summoned Chang Sheng and Li An from the front compound and ordered them to strip off her clothing, and give her thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo. The servants, accordingly, lined up to either side and lit brightly shining lanterns, while Chang Sheng and Li An stood by with their heavy bamboos in hand.
When Sun Hsüeh-o objected to taking off her clothes, the commandant, who was afraid of angering Ch'un-mei, did not venture to intervene, but Sun Erh-niang, who was standing to one side, pled with Ch'un-mei, saying, "Mistress, order her to be beaten as many strokes as you like, but spare her the humiliation of having her underclothes removed. If she is stripped completely naked in front of the servants, it will not redound to His Honor's credit. I pray you, Mistress, to:
Lift high your gracious hand, though it is true that she is at fault."
But Ch'un-mei refused this request and adamantly insisted that she be stripped naked to be beaten, saying, "If anyone should try to stop me, I will first dash my child to death, and then hang myself with a length of rope, leaving her behind in my place."
Thereupon, without ordering the beating to proceed, she threw herself to the ground, where she lay in a faint, stretched out at full length:
Oblivious to human affairs.
The commandant, in a state of panic, hastily lifted her up, saying, "Go ahead and beat her however you want. Don't get so upset over it."
Thereupon, the pitiable Sun Hsüeh-o was:
Forcibly turned over on the ground,[12] stripped of her clothing, and subjected to thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo. She was beaten until:
The skin was broken and the flesh was split.
Ch'un-mei then dispatched a young jailer to summon Auntie Hsüeh in the middle of the night and instructed her to take Sun Hsüeh-o off empty-handed and offer her for sale.
Taking Auntie Hsüeh aside, she said to her, "I want no more than eight taels of silver for her. Take this whore of a slave away, and do your best to sell her into a house of prostitution. I don't care how much money you make on the transaction, but if you dispose of her anywhere else, and I hear about it, I won't have anything more to do with you."
"Who else do I depend on for my livelihood?" said Auntie Hsüeh. "I can hardly refuse to do as you say."
That very night she took Sun Hsüeh-o home with her, where she continued to weep pitifully:
In sorrow and distress,
until the day dawned.
"There's no point in crying any more," Auntie Hsüeh urged her. It's just your bad fortune to have ended up in the hands of your enemy. His Honor is not ill-disposed toward you, but unluckily your old enemy, harboring her old resentment, is out to hurt you, and His Honor feels that:
The situation is out of his control.
Since she has borne him a son, he feels obliged to accommodate her every wish. Even his secondary consort Sun Erh-niang feels that she must give way to her. As the saying goes:
Even a worker who pilfers the rice will sometimes rise to become head of the granary.
There is nothing more to be said about it. You should swallow your resentment and stop crying."
Sun Hsüeh-o dried her tears and thanked Auntie Hsüeh, saying, "I only hope that sooner or later you can find a good customer for me, who will be able to support me."
"She ordered me repeatedly," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "to sell you into a house of prostitution. But I feel that:
Those who raise sons and raise daughters,
Should be governed by Heavenly principle.
I will endeavor either to find a monogamous match for you, so there will be but:
One husband and a single wife;
or marry you to a merchant with limited capital, who will be able to support you."
Sun Hsüeh-o thanked Auntie Hsüeh for this with:
A thousand thanks and ten thousand expressions of good will.
Two days later, Old Mother Chang, the proprietress of an inn next door to Auntie Hsüeh's residence, came over to see her and asked, "What woman are you harboring in your place that cries so piteously?"
Auntie Hsüeh invited her inside and said, "This is the lady in question. She comes from a prominent household but was unable to get along with her mistress and has been driven out and turned over to me to find her a husband. She is hoping for a monogamous match, involving but:
One husband and a single wife, in order to avoid such rancorous conflicts in the future."
"There is a cotton merchant from Shantung lodging at my inn," said Old Mother Chang. "His name is P'an the Fifth, he is thirty-six years old, has several cartloads of cotton wool to sell, and often stays at my place. The other day he told me that he has a mother who is more than seventy years old and is unwell, and that his wife died half a year ago, so that he has no one to look after her. He has repeatedly asked me to arrange a match for him, but I have been unable to find anyone suitable. It seems to me that this lady is about the same age and would make a good wife for him."

"I will not deceive you," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but this lady comes from a prominent household and is adept at both rough and refined domestic work. As for needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments, not to mention:
Skill with cooking pots and stoves,[13]
That naturally goes without saying.
In addition to which, she makes excellent soups. At present, she is just thirty-four years old, and her owner is asking only thirty taels of silver for her, so she ought to be a good match for him."
"Does she have trunkloads of personal belongings?" asked Old Mother Chang.
"She has only the clothing she is wearing and the hairpins and bracelets she has on," replied Auntie Hsüeh. "She is without any other luggage."
"In that case," said Old Mother Chang, "I will go back and tell him about her, and propose that he come over to see her for himself."
After concluding this discussion, and drinking her tea, she sat a little longer and then went home. That evening, she told her lodger about it.
The next day, after breakfast, she actually did bring her lodger over to see for himself. When he saw that Sun Hsüeh-o was both attractive and young, he promptly offered to pay twenty-five taels of silver for her, and to give Auntie Hsüeh an additional tael of silver as her go-between's fee. Auntie Hsüeh did not bother to bargain with him but proceeded to weigh the silver and write out a contract, allowing him to take her away that very night, so they could leave the next morning.
After the transaction was concluded, Auntie Hsüeh had someone alter the wording of the contract, weighed out a mere eight taels of silver, and then had this amount delivered to Ch'un-mei in the commandant's household, and report that she had sold her into a house of prostitution.
P'an the Fifth took Sun Hsüeh-o back to Old Mother Chang's place to spend the night, and during the fifth watch the next morning he thanked Old Mother Chang and took his leave of her, after which, the two of them got into a cart and headed straight for Lin-ch'ing. It was the sixth month at the time, so the days were long, and the sun had just begun to set when they arrived at the dock and made their way to My Own Tavern.
This establishment had more than a hundred rooms, in which unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls from all over, including the licensed quarter, were housed. Sun Hsüeh-o was led into a half-sized chamber containing an earthen k'ang, on which there sat a fifty- or sixty-year-old woman. There was also a sixteen- or seventeen-year-old girl from the establishment waiting upon her, whose hair was done up in two curled knots on either side of her head, who was made up with white face powder and red lips, was garbed in soft damask clothing, and was standing by the k'ang strumming a balloon guitar.
When Sun Hsüeh-o saw this, she gasped in distress, for she realized that this man P'an the Fifth must be a white slaver, who had bought her in order to make her into a powder-faced singing girl. She was renamed Yü-erh and, like the other young girl, whose name was Chin-erh, was expected to make her living by taking a little gong with her every day, and frequenting the taverns on the dock in order to attract customers, and sing to them.
No sooner did she enter the door than P'an the Fifth:
Without discussing the pros and cons of the matter,[14] proceeded to give her a beating, and restrict her to her bed for two days, while giving her only two bowls of rice to eat. She was then given instruction in how to play musical instruments and sing, and when she was not up to the mark, she was beaten again, until her body was covered with red and blue bruises. Only after she began to get the hang of it was she given fine clothing, properly made up, and made to stand by the gate:
Leaning upon the door with a smile,[15] and Provoking attention with her brows.
Truly:
If one's real work had ever found favor in the eyes of one's contemporaries;
One would not have had to spend money on rouge in order to paint portraits.[16]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
In straitened circumstances one has no place to run and no place to flee;
No matter whether one goes south or comes north[17]
it will all be to no avail.[18]
On this night where have the varicolored clouds ended up being scattered to?
One's dreams follow the path of the bright moon as it sinks above the brothel.[19]
While Sun Hsüeh-o was working in My Own Tavern, it just so happened, one day, that:
As providence would have it,
Commandant Chou Hsiu sent Chang Sheng to the canal port of Lin Ch'ing to purchase ten piculs of distiller's yeast, with which to brew homemade wine. When the proprietor of My Own Tavern, the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, saw that his brother-in-law Chang Sheng had come to pay him a visit, he immediately had one of his best rooms swept clean and furnished with wine and delicacies, table utensils, seasonal fruits of various kinds, vintage wine, and fresh fish for the occasion, and invited Chang Sheng to come in for a drink.
The wine steward who was in charge of the drinks knelt down in front of Liu the Second and inquired, "Uncle, which of the singing girls from downstairs should I invite up to serve the drinks?"
Liu the Second responded by saying, "Have Old Sister Wang, Chao Chiao-erh, and P'an the Fifth's two girls, Chin-erh and Yü-erh, the four of them, come up to wait on Brother-in-law Chang."
The wine steward assented and made his way downstairs. It was not long before they heard the sound of laughter coming from the stairwell as the four singing girls, made up as flowerlike beauties, and dressed in outfits of light silk and soft damask, came up the stairs and proceeded:
Like sprigs of blossoms swaying in the breeze;
Sending the pendants of their embroidered sashes flying, to kowtow four times before the guest, and then stand to one side.
When Chang Sheng opened his eyes wide and took a good look at them, he thought to himself, "One of these powdered faces:
Strange as it may seem,
looks just like that Sun Hsüeh-o who used to work in His Honor's kitchen until the young mistress drove her away. How did she ever end up here, engaged in this line of work?"
Sun Hsüeh-o, also, upon surveying the scene, recognized Chang Sheng but chose not to say anything.
Chang Sheng then inquired of Liu the Second, "Where do these powdered faces come from?"
"Brother-in-law," said Liu the Second, "there is no reason for me to deceive you. These two, who work for P'an the Fifth, are named Yü-erh and Chin-erh. This one is called Old Sister Wang, and the other is called Chao Chiao-erh."
"I recognize Old Sister Wang," said Chang Sheng, "and this Yü-erh from the P'an establishment also looks familiar to me."
He then called Yü-erh over to him and whispered to her, "Are you not Sun Hsüeh-o from His Honor's residence? How did you happen to end up here?"
No sooner did Sun Hsüeh-o hear his question than she began to:
Shed two streams of tears,
and said:
"It's a long story."
She then proceeded, thus and so, to explain what had happened, saying, "I was tricked by Auntie Hsüeh, who sold me for twenty-five taels of silver, only to end up here:
Entertaining at parties and endeavoring to sing:
Engaging customers and catering to their wishes."
Chang Sheng had noticed how attractive she was in the past and felt himself drawn to her, while Sun Hsüeh-o did her best to cater to him as she served the drinks, and the conversation between them started to warm up. Sun Hsüeh-o and Chin-erh then took up their balloon guitars and proceeded to sing a song for Chang Sheng as he drank his wine, to the tune "Four Pieces of Gold":
In my last incarnation, I imagine,
I must have owed him a love debt due in this life;
For he has abandoned me along the way,
So that our lover's knot cannot be tied.
To speak of it floods my cheeks with tears;
When depressed, my sorrow is as deep as the sea.
As for our myriad oaths of fidelity,
What has become of them now?
You wretched scoundrel!
How can you ignore the love I have lavished upon you all this time?[20]
After the song was finished, the two of them, what with:
The raising of glasses and passing of cups,
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,
continued to drink until they began to feel the effects of the wine. As the saying goes:
Worldly wealth, painted faces, and wine in the sing-song houses;
Who is there who is not deluded
by these three things?[21]
Chang Sheng became enamored of Sun Hsüeh-o, and the two of them spent the night together in a room at the tavern. Sun Hsüeh-o, employing her mastery of the arts of the bedchamber, and whispering oaths of fidelity into his ears, gave herself over to Chang Sheng.
They exhausted themselves to please each other,
Like fish sporting in the water,
in ways that:
Were too multifarious to describe in detail.
The next day, by the time they got out of bed and performed their ablutions, Liu the Second had already brought up a serving of wine and delicacies in order to provide his brother-in-law with a pick-me-up. After they had sated themselves on this repast, served in:
Large platters and large bowls,
Chang Sheng got together his luggage, fed his horse, packed up the shipment of distiller's yeast, and prepared to depart, along with his attendants.
As he was about to go out the door, he gave Sun Hsüeh-o three taels of silver and said to Liu the Second, "See that you look after her well, and don't let anyone take advantage of her."
From this time on, whenever Chang Sheng came to the canal port of Lin-ch'ing on business, he would get together with Sun Hsüeh-o in My Own Tavern; and afterwards, as he traveled back and forth, he agreed to pay P'an the Fifth a few taels of silver every month, in order to maintain her as his mistress, and prevent her from taking on any other customers. Liu the Second, out of a desire to please his brother-in-law, did not even demand any rent for her and went so far as to fleece his other customers in order to pay for her keep, and provide Sun Hsüeh-o with fuel and rice. A poem testifies to this:

Who could know at the time the way in which he would indulge his desires?
Given to lust, and relying on his influence, his acts are unconscionable.
Calamity does not seek people, they court it themselves;
Beauty does not delude people, they delude themselves.

Those of her kin are dead, and all is lost
Unwillingly she must become again
A light of love.
Her tears fall like great drops of jade
She leaves her home and with her dainty feet
Walks to the brothel.
Before the mirror she sighs
Laments the fate of her most perfect beauty
And before men begins to play the whore.
Rain and dew in springtime are like the waters of the sea.
She mates with Master Liu
Whom she finds better than Master Yuan.

Chen Jingji and Feng Jinbao met at the wine house every two or three days. If he failed to come, the girl would send him a message by Chen the Third. And every time he came he gave her a tael of silver or five qian. He also gave her rice and firewood, and paid her rent. When he went back to the temple, his face was always red. The Abbot would ask him where he had been drinking, and Jingji would say that he had drunk two or three cups with customers at the rice shop because he was so tired and worn out. Jin Zongming supported him in everything he said, to make sure of his companionship during the night. So things went on for a long time, and Jingji robbed the Abbot of nearly half his takings.
Liu the Second of the wine house was a famous tiger in this neighborhood. He was the younger brother of the wife of that Zhang Sheng who was the trusted servant of Major Zhou. He set up a number of houses for singing girls, foregathered with rich and powerful people, and oppressed the weak. He lent money to the singing girls, taking from them interest at three times the ordinary rate. If they did not pay, he altered the contracts, adding the interest to the loan and so making it more and more. He was fond of wine, and very quarrelsome in his cups; no one dared to cross him in any way. He was indeed a leader of those who beat singing girls and a captain of wineshop bullies.

He had observed Chen Jingji, a handsome young fellow and a novice of Abbot Ren, spending a great deal of time at the large wine house with the girl Feng Jinbao. One day, when he was drunk, he came to the wine house his two fists the size of rice bowls, and demanded Feng Jinbao. The host, Xie, bowed and said: "Uncle Liu, she is upstairs in Number Two." The man bounded upstairs with great strides. Jingji was drinking wine with Feng Jinbao behind a closed door with the lattice pulled down. Liu pulled aside the lattice and demanded that Feng Jinbao should come to him at once. Jingji was so terrified that he held his breath. Liu kicked open the door, and the girl had to come out.
"Uncle Liu," she said, "what can I do for you?"
"You whore!" Liu cried, "you haven't paid me any rent for three months and now you are trying to get away from me."
"Uncle," Feng Jinbao said, smiling, "go home and I will tell mother to send you the money."
Liu struck her in the chest and felled her to the ground with one blow. Her head hit the stairs, and blood streamed over the floor.
"You whore," Liu cried, "I'm not going to wait. I want my money now."
Then he saw Chen Jingji. He went forward, took hold of the table and smashed everything that was on it.
"Who are you," Jingji cried, "to come here and behave in this mad fashion?"
"I'll pound your mother's rice for her, you priest," Liu cried. He dragged Jingji by the hair, knocked him down, kicked him, and struck him. Meanwhile, the people in the wine house stood and watched him as if they were silly. The host could see that Liu was drunk and did not dare to interfere, but when he saw that matters were really getting serious he screwed up courage enough to come and say: "Uncle Liu, don't be annoyed with him. He doesn't know your honorable name, or he would never have done anything to upset you. Please forgive him and let him go, for my sake."
Liu paid no attention and went on beating Jingji until he was half dead. Then he sent for the police and told them to arrest both the girl and the young man and take them before the court. He had, in fact, a commission from Major Zhou to direct the police and keep watch for thieves and bandits on the river.
The Abbot did not know that Jingji had been arrested. He thought the young man had stayed at the rice shop for the night.
The next day the police took the young man to the court. They handed their charge to Zhang Sheng and Li An. This declared that Chen Zongmei, a priest of the Yangong monastery, had picked a quarrel with Liu the Second, and that the girl was a harlot.
The people at the court asked Jingji for money. "We are the executioners here," they said, "and there are twelve of us. We leave it to you. And there are the two officers who must not be overlooked."
"I had some money," Jingji said, "but it was stolen when I was having the trouble with Liu. He tore my clothes to rags. Now I have no money, only this silver pin, and that I must give to these two gentlemen."
The men took the pin to Zhang Sheng and Li An. "The fellow has no money," they said, "he only offers this pin, and it is of very inferior silver."
"Bring him in, and I'll see what he has to say," Zhang Sheng said.
They brought in the young man and he knelt down before Zhang Sheng.
"When did you become a disciple of Abbot Ren?" Zhang Sheng said. "What is your civil name? I don't remember having seen you before."
"My name is Chen Jingji," the young man said, "and I am of good family. I have only recently become a priest."
"Since you are a priest," Zhang Sheng said, "it is your duty to study the Sacred Scriptures; not to come out from your monastery, associate with whores, and make trouble with others. You seem to think my position here is not very important and that it is not necessary to give me anything. Why! if I throw this pin into the water, it won't even cause a ripple on the surface."
He ordered the attendants to take the man away to await the pleasure of his superior officer. "This doggish pair is very stingy," he said. "The only thing these priests care about is their money. Now this is an official matter, and when people come here to a dinner party, the least they can do is to bring a handsome handkerchief to wipe their mouths. When you beat him," he said to the others, "see you do it well."
Then he sent for the girl. She brought a man with her who gave three or four taels to the officers.
"You are a singing girl," Zhang Sheng said to her, "and of course you go to any place where it is busy to make a living. You did nothing wrong. It will all depend on whether my chief is in a good temper or not. If he is in a bad temper, you may get a beating; if not, he may let you go."
After a while they heard the signal, and Major Zhou entered the hall. The officers stood in ranks on either side.
In the eighth month of the year before this happened Chunmei had given birth to a son. The baby was now six months old. His face was like a piece of jade and his lips were as red as rouge. Zhou looked upon this child as the most precious thing in all the world. His first wife had died, and he had put Chunmei in her place. She lived in the upper rooms and had two nurses to look after the child, one called Yutang; the other, Jinkui. She also had two maids, Cuihua and Lanhua. She had two favorite singing girls, both sixteen years old, called Haitang and Yuegui. All these girls were devoted to the service of Chunmei alone. The Major's second wife had only one maid, Hehua.
Very often, Zhang Sheng would take the baby outside the court to amuse him and, when the magistrate was hearing a case, he would stand there with the baby in his arms and look on.
Today, when Zhou entered the court, a number of people were brought before him, but he decided to begin with Chen Jingji. So the young man and Feng Jinbao were brought forward. Zhou read the charge. "You are a priest," he said. "What do you mean by breaking your rule, frequenting whores, drinking, and disturbing the public peace? It is disgusting."
He ordered Jingji to be given twenty strokes of the rod, and canceled his priest's diploma. He put thumbscrews on Feng Jinbao, ordered her to be given a milder punishment, and sent back to the bawdy house. The attendants bound Jingji, took off his clothes, raised their rods and shouted. They were just about to begin their beating when the baby, who was with Zhang Sheng outside the hall, stretched out his arms to the young man and wanted to go to him. Zhang Sheng could hardly hold him. He was afraid that the Major might see the child and hurriedly took him away. The baby cried, and did not even stop crying when he was in his mother's arms again. Chunmei asked what was the matter with him.
"My master was in the hall trying cases," Zhang Sheng said, "and he was just about to have a priest beaten, a man named Chen, when the baby began to struggle and try to get to the man. I had to bring him away and then he began to cry."
When she heard the name Chen, Chunmei gathered up her skirts and went softly to the hall. There she peeped through a screen. She could hear the voice of the man who was being beaten and it sounded like that of Chen Jingji. But she could not understand how Jingji could have become a priest. She called Zhang Sheng to her.
"Do you know the man's name?" she asked him.
"He told me that his name as a layman was Chen Jingji," Zhang Sheng told her.
"It is he," Chunmei said to herself. Then she said to Zhang Sheng: "Go and ask my husband to come and see me."
Major Zhou was watching the punishment being administered to the young man. Jingji had had ten strokes when the Major was told that his wife wished to speak to him. He ordered the officials to stop, and left the hall.
"The priest you are punishing is my cousin," Chunmei said to him. "Please forgive him, for my sake."
"Why didn't you tell me before, my dear?" the Major said. "I have already given him ten strokes, and I can't take them back."
He went back to the hall and told the attendants to release both the man and the girl. Then he told Zhang Sheng to go after the priest and also to find out whether Chunmei wished to see him. This was just what Chunmei did wish, but she hesitated. After thinking for a long time, she said to Zhang Sheng: "Let him go. I will send for him another time."
So the Major allowed Jingji to go after no more than ten stripes. He went back to the temple.
The Abbot heard that his novice, Chen Zongmei, had been carrying on with a singing girl at the wine house, that he had got into trouble with Tiger Liu, and been beaten nearly to death. He heard, too, all that had happened afterwards. Now the Abbot was an old man and fat. He was very much upset. He opened his boxes only to find that many of his most treasured possessions had disappeared. Then he collapsed on the floor. The monks came and sent at once for the doctor. They poured medicine down his throat, but without effect. At midnight, the Abbot breathed his last. He was sixty-three years old.
The next day, as Jingji was approaching the temple, some of the people who lived near by said to him: "Do you still think of going to the temple? Because of you, your Teacher died last night!"
Jingji rushed back to Qinghe like a stray dog.
When Chunmei had told Zhang Sheng to let Jingji go away, she went back to her room. She took off her headdress and her long gown and went to bed. She groaned, pressed her hands to her bosom, and said she felt a pain. The whole house was upset. The Major's second wife came and said: "Lady, you have been very well until now, what is the matter?"
"Leave me alone and don't ask questions" was the only answer Chunmei would give to anybody.
Then the Major came from the hall. When he found his wife lying on the bed, groaning, he too became alarmed.
"How do you feel?" he said, taking her hand.
There was no answer.
"Has anyone been annoying you?"
There was still no answer.
"Perhaps it was I, when I punished your cousin."
Chunmei would not say a word.
The Major did not know what to do. He went out to Zhang Sheng and Li An. "You knew that man was your mistress's cousin," he said. "Why didn't you tell me instead of allowing me to punish him and upset my wife? I told you to stop him and let your mistress see him. Why did you let him go? You are a pair of fools."
"I told the mistress," Zhang Sheng said, "but she said she didn't wish to see him. That's why I let him go."
Zhang Sheng went weeping to Chunmei.
"Lady," he said, "please say a word to master for us, or we shall be beaten."
Chunmei opened her eyes wide and raised her eyebrows. She sent for the Major. "I am not well," she said, "but these two men are not to blame. As for that immoral priest, it is better he should suffer a little. I do not wish to see him now."
Zhou said no more to Zhang Sheng and Li An, but told Zhang Sheng to go and fetch a doctor for Chunmei. She was still in pain.
When the doctor had felt her pulse, he said: "It is anger that has upset this lady." He gave her some medicine, but she would not take it. The maids did not dare to try and persuade her, and they sent again for Major Zhou. He begged her to take the medicine. She took one mouthful and no more. Then he went away.
"Lady, do take some of it," the maid Yuegui said, taking up the cup. Chunmei took it and threw it in the maid's face. "You thievish slave," she cried angrily, "why do you try to make me drink this bitter stuff? What is there in my stomach now?" She told the maid to kneel down.
Then the Major's second wife came and asked why Yuegui was kneeling there. The other maid said: "Because she gave our mistress the medicine."
"But she had had nothing to eat," the Second Lady said. How could she take medicine?"
"Lady," said the second wife, "you have had nothing to eat today, but Yuegui did not know. Won't you forgive her?" She told Haitang to go to the kitchen and get some gruel for her mistress.
Chunmei told Yuegui to get up. Haitang went to the kitchen and very carefully prepared some gruel and four small dishes. She took them to Chunmei, all steaming hot. Chunmei lay on the bed, her face turned to the wall, so that the maid dared not disturb her, but had to wait until she turned over. Then she said: "I have brought you some gruel. Will you have a little?"
Chunmei did not open her eyes, and made no reply.
Haitang said: "Please, Lady, do get up and take some gruel. It will be cold soon."
"Lady, you have had nothing at all," the second wife said. "You must be better now you have had a sleep. Do get up and eat something."
Then Chunmei got up and told the nurse to give her a light. She took a mouthful of gruel and threw the bowl away. Fortunately, the nurse caught it and it did not break.
"You told me to have some porridge," Chunmei shouted to the second wife. "What sort of gruel do you call this? I am not having a baby. Why do you give me slops like this?"
Then she said to the nurse: "Box that slave's ears four times for me." The nurse did so.
Then the second wife said: "Lady, if you don't care for the gruel, have something else. You must not starve yourself."
"It is all very well for you to talk," Chunmei said. "My stomach is too weak." After a while, she said to Lanhua: "I will have some chicken soup. Go to the kitchen and tell that whore there to make me some chicken soup. She must be sure to wash her hands first, and put some pickled bamboo shoots into it. I want it very hot and very sour."
"Lady," the second wife said, "since you fancy it, it will be as good as medicine for you."
Lanhua went to the kitchen. "Mistress wants some chicken soup," she said to Sun Xue'e. "Make it at once: she wants it now."
Chicken soup is made of the wing, cut into very small pieces. Xue'e washed her hands, killed two chickens, plucked them, then cut the meat into very fine pieces with a sharp knife. She took onions and pepper, pickled bamboo shoots and sauce, and the soup was made. She filled two bowls, put them on a red lacquer tray, and Lanhua took them, very hot, to Chunmei.
Chunmei examined the soup under the lamp and tasted it. "Go and ask that whore what she calls this," she shouted. "It is nothing but plain water. It has no taste at all. You talk about my eating something and this is the sort of stuff you bring me."
Lanhua was afraid of being punished. She hurried to the kitchen and told Xue'e that her mistress complained that the soup had no taste. Xue'e did not say a word. She swallowed her anger and humiliation, washed out the pan, and made some more soup. This time she put more pepper into it. It had a delicious smell. Lanhua took it to her mistress.
Chunmei complained that it was too salty, took up the bowl and threw the soup on the floor. If Lanhua had not moved aside, the soup would have caught her.
"Go and tell that slave I know she hates cooking anything for me, but if she doesn't make good soup next time, she will know what to expect."
Then Xue'e made a great mistake. "You have not always been so high up in the world," she muttered, "but what airs you give yourself."
Lanhua heard this and told Chunmei. The woman opened her eyes wide and raised her eyebrows. She clenched her teeth, and her pale face flushed. "Bring that whore here," she cried.
Three or four women dragged Xue'e into the room. Chunmei tore at her hair and threw her headdress to the floor.
"You whore!" she cried, "how dare you say I have not long been so high up in the world? Well, I don't owe my position to Ximen Qing. I bought you so that you should do what I told you, but I find you are too proud. I told you to make some soup for me, and you make it either with no taste at all or with too much. Then you tell my maid that I nave not always been what I am now, and that I only wish to insult you. Why should I keep you here?"
She sent someone for her husband. Xue'e was taken to the courtyard and made to kneel down. Then Chunmei sent for Zhang Sheng and Li An and told them to strip the woman of her clothes and give her thirty strokes with a rod. The servants took lanterns and torches, and Zhang Sheng and Li An each had a big stick.
Xue'e refused to take off her clothes. The Major, who was afraid of his wife, did not say a word.
"Lady," the second wife said. "Let her be beaten, but don't make her take off her clothes with all these men and servants about. I know she was in the wrong, but do forgive her this time."
Chunmei would not listen. She insisted that the woman's clothes should be stripped from her.
"Let anyone try to stop me, and I will kill my child first and then hang myself," she cried. "Then I shall be dead and you can have this strumpet in my place."
She did not give the word to beat Xue'e, but fell on the ground in a faint. Zhou was excited, picked her up, and said: "Tell them to beat her, and don't let yourself get upset like this."
Xue'e was thrown to the ground. Her clothes were stripped off and she was given thirty strokes, till the skin and flesh were torn from her bones. Then they sent for old woman Xue, who was to take her away immediately and sell her. Chunmei took old woman Xue aside. "I want eight taels of silver for her," she said, "and not a penny more. But I insist that she must be sold to a brothel. If you let her go anywhere else and I find out, you will never see me again. Otherwise, you can make what profit you like out of her."
"How can I do other than obey you?" old woman Xue said.
She took Xue'e away. The woman cried all night and Xue tried to console her. "Don't cry," she said. "It was your unhappy fate that brought you back to your old enemy. Your master was fair enough, but unfortunately there was an old hatred between you and her. She treated you badly, and the master could do nothing for you. Now she has borne him this son, he does absolutely everything she asks. Even his second wife must always give way. It is like an old bandit becoming governor of a granary; we have to put up with it. Don't cry."
Xue'e dried her tears and thanked old woman Xue. "I only hope," she said, "that I may come to some place where I shall get food enough to live."
"She told me repeatedly that I must sell you to a brothel," Xue said, "but I have children of my own, and I must think of what is right. I will find a husband for you, some merchant in a small way, and he will treat you as his wife and let you have all you need."
Xue'e thanked her gratefully.
A day or two later, one of the neighbors, Madam Zhang, came to see old woman Xue. "Sister Xue," she said, "who was it I heard crying so bitterly the other night?"
"Come in," old woman Xue said. "It was this lady. She comes from a very exalted family but she had a quarrel with her mistress and was sent away. Now she is here, hoping to find another husband. She doesn't want any more trouble and would like a single man."
"There is a guest from Shandong staying with me," Madam Zhang said, "a dealer in cotton wool. His name is Pan, and he is the fifth in his family. He has large stocks of cotton wool and keeps them at my place. He is thirty-seven years old. Only a day or two ago he told me that he has an old mother, an invalid of about seventy. His wife died six months ago, and he can't find anybody to look after his mother. He asked me, if I could, to find somebody for him to marry. I have looked about, but so far I haven't been able to find anybody suitable. This lady would do for him very well, I think."
"She has belonged to a very good family," old woman Xue said. "She can make clothes, both plain and fancy; she can sew well, and she is an excellent cook. She is thirty-five years old. There ought to be no difficulty, since they are only asking thirty taels of silver for her."
"Has she any boxes?" Madam Zhang said.

"No, she has only the clothes and ornaments she stands up in."
"I will go and tell him. Then he can come and see her for himself," Madam Zhang said. She had tea and went away. That night she told the man all about Xue'e and, the following afternoon, took him to see her. He thought her beautiful and still young, and immediately offered twenty-five taels for her with an extra one for the old woman herself. Old woman Xue did not attempt to bargain. She took what he offered and settled the matter. That evening, he took Xue'e away, saying that he was returning home next day.
Old woman Xue altered the contract and took eight taels to Chunmei, telling her that she had sold the woman to a brothel.
Pan slept that night with Xue'e at Madam Zhang's place. Before dawn next day, he thanked Madam Zhang and set off for Linqing. It was now the sixth month and the days were at their longest. When they came to the wharf, it was about the time when the sun turned to the west. They went to a wine house. There were many wine houses at Linqing, all occupied by singing girls from everywhere around. Xue'e was taken to a small one. She went into a little room with a bed in it. An old lady about sixty years old was sitting there. There was a maid too, about seventeen or eighteen. Her hair was dressed in several knots, her face powdered, and her lips red. She wore a silken dress, and played a lute as she sat on the bed. Then Xue'e cried out, for then she knew that this man, Pan the Fifth, was a woman-dealer, and he had bought her for a harlot.
The man proposed to send Xue'e to the wine houses to make herself agreeable to the customers and so make money. Without a word, he gave her a severe beating, then sent her to bed and kept her there for two days. In those two days, he gave her nothing but two bowls of rice to eat. Then he told her to learn a few songs and taught her how to play, and, when she did not succeed very well, he beat her again. When she was sufficiently trained, he dressed her up in pretty clothes and bade her stand outside the door and smile at the passersby.
Then Heaven took pity on her. One day, Zhang Sheng came to the river to buy ten measures of yeast for his master who wished to make some wine. When Tiger Liu saw his brother, he cleared a room in his wine house, and offered Zhang Sheng a feast. The waiter heated the wine and said: "Uncle, there are several singing girls here. Would you like one? Liu mentioned four names and the waiter went to fetch the girls. Soon laughing voices were heard and, one after the other, the four singing girls came into the room. They seemed as beautiful as flowers and were all dressed in light, soft silken clothes. They came and made reverences to the two men. Zhang Sheng looked at them. It seemed to him that one of them was very like Xue'e, whom his master had dismissed. But he could not understand how she could have become a singing girl. Xue'e recognized Zhang Sheng, but neither of them spoke.
"Brother-in-law," Zhang Sheng said, "who is this girl?"
The Tiger pointed them all out.
"This one, who you say is from Pan the Fifth's house, seems very familiar to me somehow," Zhang Sheng said. He called her forward. "Are you not Xue'e?" he whispered. "What are you doing here?"
Xue'e began to cry. "It's a long story," she told him. "Old woman Xue sold me for twenty-four taels and here I'm. I come to make myself pleasant to the guests and sing for their entertainment."
Zhang Sheng had long been attracted by her beauty. Now, Xue'e entertained him so pleasantly and talked so agreeably that he was very pleased with her. She and I of the other girls took up their lutes and sang for him. Then they passed the wine and Zhang Sheng was more and more delighted. As the proverb says:
Money, girls, and wine houses are 3 things that no man can resist. That night, he asked Xue'e to stay with him. She let him appreciate her skill upon the bed and he was perfectly satisfied. The next day when they got up and dressed, Tiger Liu had prepared an excellent breakfast for his brother-in-law. There was as much as they could eat. Zhang Sheng packed his luggage and fed his horses. When they were laden with the yeast, he started off with the other servants. He gave Xue'e 3 taels of silver and asked Tiger Liu to look after her and give her his special protection. Ever afterwards, when Zhang Sheng came to the river, he went to the wine house to meet Xue'e. They remained attached to one another and every month, he gave a few taels to Pan the 5th so that he might reserve Xue'e for himself and she should not be forced to go out and receive all comers. Liu who wished to please his brother-in-law would not let him pay for the room. He took money from others and paid for the room with that. He also kept Xue'e supplied with rice and firewood.

118

P'ing-an Absconds with Jewellery from the Pawnshop; Auntie Hsüeh Cleverly Proposes a Personal Appeal & Ping'an Meets his Deserts

Some words of admonition:

If you are fortunate, do not expect to enjoy it forever;
When your fortune runs out, you will be poverty-stricken.
If you have authority, do not expect it to last forever;
When your authority runs out, you will face your enemies.
One's good fortune should only be relied on providently;
One's authority should always be exercised deferentially.
In this human world of ours, authority and good fortune;
May seem to begin well enough, but often end in calamity.[1]

Sun Hsüeh-o was sold into the life of a singing girl working out of My Own Tavern. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.
To resume our story, after Hsi-men Ta-chieh committed suicide, and Wu Yüeh-niang took Ch'en Ching-chi to court for it, Lai-chao, the head servant in the household, also passed away, and his wife "The Beanpole" took her son Little Iron Rod and remarried someone else. Lai-hsing was then made responsible for the gate.
The maidservant Hsiu-ch'un left the household after being turned over to Nun Wang to serve as a novice. Lai-hsing's wife Hui-hsiu had also died, and he had been some time without a spouse. The wet nurse Ju-i was in the habit of taking the baby Hsi-men Hsiao-ko into his quarters to play, and to enjoy snacks there. Lai-hsing would also provide wine and drink with her. The two of them flirted with each other, back and forth, until they ended up consummating an affair. This happened on more than one occasion, and when Ju-i returned to the rear compound, her face would be red.
When Yüeh-niang became aware of what was going on, she gave her a dressing down; but on the grounds that:
Domestic scandals should not be noised abroad,[2]
she presented her with an outfit of clothing, four hairpins, a silver brooch in the shape of the character for long life, and an ornamental comb for her hair; selected an auspicious day for the occasion; and gave her to Lai-hsing as his wife. During the day, she continued to work in the kitchen, look after Hsi-men Hsiao-ko, and serve in the rear compound; while at night, she would go out to his quarters in the front compound and sleep with him.
One day, on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, it was Yüeh-niang's birthday, and Sister-in-law Wu, along with Wu the Second's wife, and the three nuns, came to celebrate it with her and were served drinks in the parlor of the master suite. That evening, arrangements were made for them all to stay overnight in Meng Yü-lou's former quarters on the other side of the courtyard, so they could listen to the nuns recite a precious scroll for them.
During the second watch, the maidservant Chung-ch'iu, who had been assigned to look after their tea, was called for by Yüeh-niang but did not respond. When Yüeh-niang went into the master suite to look for her, what should she see but Tai-an, who was making out vigorously with Hsiao-yü on the edge of the k'ang. Upon seeing her push open the door and come in, they became so flustered they hardly knew what to do with themselves.
Yüeh-niang chose not to say a word about it, merely remarking, "You lousy little stinker! Why haven't you gone to the kitchen and taken care of the tea? The nuns in the other room over there have been reciting a precious scroll all day long and need some tea to drink. What are you doing in here?"
"Chung-ch'iu has been tending the stove," responded Hsiao-yü, "and I told her to prepare the tea."
With her head hanging sheepishly, she then proceeded to make her way outside, while Tai-an headed through the ceremonial gate to the front compound.
Two days later, after Sister-in-law Wu, Wu the Second's wife, and the three nuns had returned home, Yüeh-niang had Lai-hsing vacate his quarters and refurbished them for Tai-an to reside in, while moving Lai-hsing into what had been Lai-chao's quarters, so he could take charge of the front gate. She then had two sets of bedding made for Tai-an, along with an outfit of new clothing, a newly blocked hat with a new hairnet, and a new pair of boots and stockings. She also allowed Hsiao-yü to put up her hair and gave her a fret to wear over it, while providing her with several gold and silver hair ornaments, four silver hairpins with gold heads, bracelets, pendant earrings, finger rings, and the like, along with two outfits of varicolored silk and satin clothing. After choosing an auspicious day for the event, she then gave her to Tai-an as his wife. During the day, she continued to wait on Yüeh-niang in the rear compound, but when the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds was about to be locked for the night, she would go out to sleep with Tai-an. This maidservant constantly secreted goodies of every kind and took them out for Tai-an to eat. Yüeh-niang saw what she was doing but pretended not to notice. As the sayings go:
Those who dote on another do not see clearly;
Those who are covetous can never be satiated.[3]
When veal and wine are not doled out equally;
Even the finest teams will split and scatter.[4]
If the household is not governed impartially;
The male and female servitors will resent it.
To resume our story, when P'ing-an saw that Yüeh-niang had favored Tai-an by giving him Hsiao-yü as a wife, providing him with quarters of his own to live in, and bestowing new clothing upon him, he resented the fact that, though at the age of twenty-one he was two years older than Tai-an, she had not seen fit to provide him with a wife, or with quarters of his own.
One day, in the pawnshop, he was present when Manager Fu Ming accepted a set of gold head ornaments and a gilded buckle from a customer, in return for a loan of thirty taels of silver, which he agreed to redeem, with the added interest, in a month. Manager Fu Ming, along with Tai-an, then proceeded to stow them away in the shop's large storage cabinet.
What they did not anticipate was that P'ing-an:
On seeing their value, developed ideas,
and surreptitiously made off with them, along with the box they were in, and made his way to the brothel of Wu Ch'ang-chiao, or Longfoot Wu, in the Southern Entertainment Quarter, where he patronized the two unlicensed prostitutes that worked there, one of whom was named Hsüeh Ts'un-erh, and the other Pan-erh, and spent two nights with them. When the pimp of the establishment observed that he was spending money so recklessly, that his box contained gold head ornaments, and that he was flaunting silver ingots in order to buy wine, and gifts for the proprietress, he reported him to the local constable, who confined him to his room, boxed his ears twice, and took him into custody.
It was one of those occasions when:
Something was destined to happen.
Who could have anticipated that just at this juncture, Wu Tien-en, who had recently been appointed to the position of a suburban police chief, happened to be riding by in the street, preceded by a pair of runners bearing placards announcing his office. When he saw what was going on, he asked who the shackled culprit might be.
The constable knelt down before him and reported, thus and so, saying, "The person in question appears to have stolen some things and fled to the Southern Entertainment Quarter, where he has been patronizing prostitutes, and paying for them with gold and silver head ornaments. Having found this suspicious, your humble servant has put him under arrest."
"Bring him along with you so I can interrogate him," ordered Wu Tien-en.
P'ing-an was then taken to the police headquarters, where Wu Tien-en took his place on the bench, with armed lictors arrayed to either side, and the local constable dragged his tethered prisoner before him.
P'ing-an recognized Wu Tien-en and thought to himself, "Since he was formerly a manager in my master's household, he is sure to let me go."
The first thing he said was, "Your humble servant is P'ing-an from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household."
"Since you are a servant from his household," said Wu Tien-en, "what have you been up to in this brothel with these gold objects?"
"My mistress," said P'ing-an, "had lent these head ornaments to a relative to wear and sent me to bring them back to her. I was late in returning, and the city gates were closed when I got there, so I went to that brothel to seek a place to stay overnight. I could not have expected to be arrested by the local constable."
Wu Tien-en derided him, saying, "Slave that you are, you're talking nonsense. Your household is amply supplied with this sort of head ornaments, and other objects of gold and silver. What reason would they have for turning over head ornaments like these to a slave like you in order to spend in a brothel? I imagine you must have stolen these things. You had better explain yourself if you want to avoid punishment."
"It is a fact," responded P'ing-an, "that a relative of the family borrowed these head ornaments, and the First Lady sent me to bring them back. I would not dare to tell a lie."
Wu Tien-en was enraged at this and reviled him, saying, "This slave is really a thief. Without a beating, he will not confess."
He then shouted at his attendants, "Put the squeezers on this slave for me."
The squeezers were then fastened onto him, and when they were applied he:
Howled like a stuck pig, calling out, "Your Honor, stop applying the squeezers to me. If you only let me do so, I will tell you the truth."
"If you tell me the truth," responded Wu Tien-en, "I will stop squeezing you."
P'ing-an then testified, saying, "Your humble servant actually did steal a set of gold head ornaments that someone had left at the pawnshop, along with a gilded buckle."
"Why did you steal them?" asked Wu Tien-en.
"I am twenty-one years old this year," responded P'ing-an, "and the First Lady had promised to find a wife for me, but she has not done so. Meanwhile, she has given one of the maids from her own quarters as a wife to another household servant named Tai-an, who is only nineteen years old. It was because I was so upset over this that I stole these head ornaments from the pawnshop."
"I imagine," pronounced Wu Tien-en, "that this page boy Tai-an must have been engaging in hanky-panky with Mistress Wu, and it must be for that reason that she has given her maidservant to him as a wife. Tell me the truth about it. Since it has nothing to do with you, I will let you off."
"I don't know anything about that," responded P'ing-an.
"You are not telling the truth," pronounced Wu Tien-en. "Subject him to the squeezers once again."
The attendants put the squeezers back on, which threw P'ing-an into such consternation that he called out inarticulately, "Your Honor, don't subject me to the squeezers again. I'll tell you all about it."
"Here we go again," said Wu Tien-en. "Simply tell me about it then. I dare say it has nothing to do with you."
The squeezers were then released, and P'ing-an said, "It is true that the First Lady has been engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an. He started out by seducing her maidservant Hsiao-yü, but when the First Lady discovered it, she chose not to say a word about it but actually bestowed a lot of clothing and jewelry upon her and gave her to him as a wife."
When Wu Tien-en heard this, he had the docket officer take a record of his testimony and make up a formal deposition. He then incarcerated P'ing-an in the police office to await the issuing of arrest warrants for Wu Yüeh-niang, Tai-an, and Hsiao-yü, so that he could hold a hearing on the case.
To resume our story, one day, when it was discovered that the head ornaments in question were missing from the cabinet in the pawnshop, Manager Fu Ming, in a state of fear and consternation, questioned Tai-an about it.
"I have been looking after the wholesale pharmaceutical shop," responded Tai-an, "while you have been earning your livelihood over there. I don't know anything about it."
"I put that box of head ornaments in the storage cabinet," said Manager Fu Ming. "How could they have disappeared this way?"
He then proceeded to look all over for P'ing-an but could find no trace of him. This disturbed Manager Fu Ming so much that he took to:
Burning incense and swearing oaths;
and when the owner sent a servant to redeem the head ornaments he had pawned, Manger Fu could only say that he hadn't been able to find them yet.
When the servant had returned several times without being able to retrieve the head ornaments, he stood outside the door of the shop and made a fuss, saying. "Those things were left with you two months ago, and my master is prepared to pay you back both the original sum for which they were pawned and the interest; so how can you refuse to turn over the head ornaments and buckle to me? They are worth seventy or eighty taels of silver."
When Manager Fu Ming learned that P'ing-an had not returned home that night, he realized that he must have stolen the missing objects and sent people out to look everywhere for him, but they were unable to find him.
When the servant of the owner returned once again and made a fuss outside the door, Manager Fu suggested to Yüeh-niang that they should give him fifty taels of silver to settle the matter, but he refused to accept the offer, saying, "Those head ornaments are worth sixty taels of silver and the buckle, along with the precious stones and pearls with which they are inlaid, are worth another ten taels. So you should pay seventy taels of silver as compensation."
Manager Fu Ming offered to pay him an additional ten taels of silver, but he refused to accept it and insisted on continuing to wrangle with him.
Just as they continued to argue about it, someone showed up and reported, saying, "The page boy P'ing-an from your household stole the head ornaments in question and went off to the Southern Entertainment Quarter where he has been patronizing prostitutes. He has been arrested by Police Chief Wu Tien-en, who is currently holding him in detention. You ought to send someone as quickly as possible to identify the stolen goods."
When Wu Yüeh-niang heard that Wu Tien-en was now serving as a police chief, she recalled that he had originally been employed as a manager by their household, and she invited her elder brother Wu K'ai to come and consult with her about it.
They forthwith wrote out a claim certificate and sent Manager Fu Ming off with it, the next day, to retrieve the missing goods, saying to him:
"If the original objects are only recovered,
There will be no reason for further dispute;
or for anyone to continue farting around this way in front of our door."

Manager Fu Ming took the document with him and set out for the police office, expecting that Wu Tien-en, out of consideration for the fact that they had formerly been colleagues, would allow him to retrieve the head ornaments. He could hardly have anticipated that Wu Tien-en would, on the contrary, revile him as an old dog, and an old slave, order the lictors to drag him down for a beating, and strip off his clothing, so that his bare buttocks were exposed for what seemed like half a day.
Only then did he allow him to get up, before saying to him, "The page boy from your household has testified that your mistress, née Wu, has been carrying on an illicit affair with Tai-an. I have already reported this to the prefectural and district authorities and am planning to issue a warrant summoning her here to respond to his testimony. And yet, old dog bone that you are, you have the nerve to come here and attempt to retrieve the stolen goods."
After being reviled as a slave and an old dog a thousand, if not ten thousand times, Manager Fu Ming hastened home in a state of consternation as fast as he could go. Upon arriving there, he did not dare to conceal the truth of the matter but told Yüeh-niang, thus and so, all about it.
If Yüeh-niang had not heard this, nothing might have happened; but having heard this account, truly, it was just as though:
The eight-boned structure of her skull had been split asunder;
Only to have poured into it half a bucketful of icy snow.
She was so upset that her hands and feet became paralyzed, on top of which, she observed that a servant of the owner of the head ornaments had come back to the door, where he engaged her in:
A vituperative altercation, saying, "Your household has lost track of the head ornaments and has not only failed to return the original objects but has also failed to pay anything in compensation, while tricking me into running back and forth time and again. One day you trick me into coming to pick up the objects, and another day you tell me to wait until you have recovered them. But truly, where do you expect to recover them from? How can you be so unreasonable?"
Manager Fu Ming did his best to placate him, saying, "If you will just have patience for a few days, we will recover the head ornaments for you. And if we fail to do so, we are willing to pay double their worth in compensation."
The servant said, "Wait until I report back to my master," and then went his way.
As for Yüeh-niang, she:
Felt worry piled upon worry, and
Her eyebrows remained contracted.
After sending a page boy to ask her elder brother Wu K'ai to come consult with her, she suggested to him that he should pull strings on her behalf by speaking to Wu Tien-en and persuading him to drop the case.
"I'm afraid he is unlikely to respond to any string pulling," responded Wu K'ai. "The only thing that may move him is a bribe."
"It is thanks to us that he obtained his official position in the first place," said Yüeh-niang. "We gave him a loan of a hundred taels of silver at the time, for which my husband would not even accept a promissory note; and now he is:
Requiting kindness with enmity."
"Sister," said Wu K'ai, "it is pointless to say that. From time immemorial, he is scarcely the only one to: Forget favor and break faith."
"Brother," responded Yüeh-niang, "I can only rely on you to do your best to find a way of handling this. Give him several tens of taels if you must, in order to recover those head ornaments and return them to their owner: thus preventing any further wrangling over it."
She then proceeded to offer Wu K'ai a meal, before sending him on his way. When Yüeh-niang saw her elder brother to the gate, by fortunate coincidence, she caught sight of Auntie Hsüeh, who was carrying her box of trinkets and leading a young maidservant, as she passed by on the street.
Yüeh-niang called her to a halt and asked her, "Auntie Hsüeh, where are you headed? And why have you not come here to visit for so long?"
"Venerable Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "that's a fine way to talk. I've been extremely busy the last few days and have had too much to do. The young lady, formerly from our household, has sent jailers or servants to summon me several times, but I have been too busy to go."
"Just look at you, Auntie," said Yüeh-niang. "What nonsense you talk. Since when has she become a young lady?"
"Right now," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "she is no longer the young lady, but has been promoted to the status of principal wife."
"How has she become a principal wife?" asked Yüeh-niang.
"Venerable Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "I guess you don't know about it yet. It was just her good luck that after she bore him a son, his first wife died, and His Honor the commandant moved her into the master suite and made her his legally recognized principal wife, superior in status to his secondary lady, Sun Erh-niang. He has purchased two wet nurses and four maidservants to wait upon her, in addition to which she is served by two former singing girls whom he has deflowered. If she wishes to punish any of them, she subjects them to the rod, and His Honor does not dare to interfere, not wishing to do anything that might anger her. The other day, for some unknown reason, she had Sun Hsüeh-o given a beating, plucked her hair out, and called for me in the middle of the night to take her away, after selling her to me for no more than eight taels of silver. At present, Sun Erh-niang has only one maidservant, named Ho-hua, to wait upon her, while Ch'un-mei has four or five, in addition to the two wet nurses, and still objects that she has too few. Sun Erh-niang doesn't dare to complain about this but merely addresses her as, 'Mistress this' and 'Mistress that,' all day long in order to placate her; and the other day, she said to me, 'Auntie Hsüeh, try to find another young maidservant to wait on me. I regret to say that the one I have isn't able to do much of anything except tend the stove.' Things are complicated in those quarters of hers. Today, while I was still asleep early in the morning, she sent a jailer over twice to summon me to her place as quickly as possible. She wanted me to supply her with a pair of ornaments with kingfisher feather inlays and inscribed with images of auspicious clouds, and a silver pin for holding her chignon in place, in the shape of nine phoenixes holding strands of pearls in their beaks, and with pendants of green and red precious stones set in plaques of gold. She gave me the sum of five taels of silver for this purpose, but I have managed to misplace it somewhere and have not yet given her the pieces she ordered. When I go to see her, she is sure to give me a dressing down. Right now, I'm on the way to deliver this maidservant to Sun Erh-niang."
"Come back to the rear compound with me," said Yüeh-niang, "so I can have a look at that ornament with kingfisher feather inlays."
So saying, she escorted Auntie Hsüeh back to the parlor in the rear compound and offered her a seat. Auntie Hsüeh then opened her box of trinkets and showed the pieces in question to Yüeh-niang. They were, indeed, exquisitely crafted. The first item was about four fingers wide, which was enough to cover a fret, with its gold and turquoise hues setting each other off, its kingfisher feather inlays protruding, and its back plated with gold. The item with the nine phoenixes holding strands of pearls in their beaks, and its gem-studded pendant plaques, was exceptionally well fashioned.
Auntie Hsüeh said, "This ornamental piece cost three taels and five mace of silver to make, while the other piece, inscribed with auspicious clouds, cost only one tael and five mace of silver, but I still haven't located the money she gave me."
As they were speaking, whom should they see but Tai-an, who came in and said to Yüeh-niang, "The man who is trying to retrieve those pawned head ornaments has come back again and is out front making a fuss about it. He says that the owner cannot wait any longer to get them, and that if they are still not forthcoming tomorrow, he will hold Manager Fu Ming accountable and will take him off somewhere to settle the matter. Uncle Fu the Second is so upset at the prospect that he has gone home, and the servant of the owner has also departed after delivering his threats."
"What is that all about?" asked Auntie Hsüeh.
Yüeh-niang gave a long sigh and then told Auntie Hsüeh, thus and so, "That slave of ours, P'ing-an, absconded with a set of gold head ornaments and a gilded buckle that someone had deposited in our pawnshop and fled to a brothel in the Southern Entertainment Quarter outside the city where he patronized a pair of prostitutes. He has been arrested by the police chief Wu Tien-en and is being held in the lockup there. The owner has sent someone to redeem the pawned head ornaments, but they are unavailable, so he has been making a fuss in front of the gate. The police chief Wu Tien-en is malevolently trying to shake us down by not letting us retrieve the stolen objects, and threatening our manager with a beating, with an eye to extorting money from us. I have been unable to come up with a solution to the problem. Ever since my husband died:
Misfortunes and losses have befallen me, and I have been taken advantage of by others. It is really hard to take."
As she spoke, tears fell profusely from her eyes.
"My Good Lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "There is a road open to you if you do not refuse to take it. If you will write a note to our young lady, I will also explain the situation to her, and she will get His Honor the commandant to issue an order to the police department, which should enable you to retrieve not just one set of head ornaments, but as many as ten, if need be."
"Commandant Chou Hsiu is a military officer," said Yüeh-niang. "I doubt if he has jurisdiction over the police department."
"Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "You may not know it yet, but the Emperor has recently issued an edict conferring a wide range of powers on Commandant Chou. He has the right to call the roll and issue commands to the personnel in charge of the local area, the rivers and canals, the troops and horses, and the stocks of money and grain throughout his jurisdiction. Moreover, the apprehension of bandits and felons both east and west of the Grand Canal is in his hands."
When Yüeh-niang heard this, she said, "If he does actually possess these powers, Auntie Hsüeh, I will indeed trouble you to convey my regards to Sister P'ang Ch'un-mei. Tell her that:
One guest does not trouble two hosts, and ask her to put in a word on my behalf with His Honor Chou Hsiu, requesting that he try to retrieve this set of head ornaments from the police department for me. If you will do so, I will reward you with five taels of silver."
"My good Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "it is not money that motivates me. When I saw how distressed you were just now, I could hardly bear it. Get someone to write out a note for you. I don't need any tea but will go straight to the commandant's household and speak to the young lady about it. If I am successful, you can give me whatever you want. Even if I am unsuccessful, I will come back and report to you."
Yüeh-niang then told Hsiao-yü to provide a serving of tea for Auntie Hsüeh.
"It's getting late," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I don't need any tea. Just get one of your senior servants to write out a note for you, and I'll take it with me. You don't know how busy I am."
"I understand," said Yüeh-niang. "You've been out and about for half a day already. Have a pastry before you go."
Hsiao-yü then proceeded to set up a table, and lay out a serving of tea and pastries. Yüeh-niang kept her company as she drank her tea, and Auntie Hsüeh gave two pastries to the young maidservant she had with her.
"How old is this maidservant?" asked Yüeh-niang.
"She is just eleven this year," replied Auntie Hsüeh.
It was not long before Tai-an, in the front compound, finished writing the note; and Auntie Hsüeh, having finished her tea, tucked it into her sleeve, said good-bye to Yüeh-niang, and went out with her box of trinkets. After exiting the gate, and:
Rounding bends and turning corners,
she made her way straight to the commandant's residence.
Ch'un-mei was still lying on a heated k'ang, not having risen yet, when whom should she see but her senior maidservant Yüeh-kuei, who came in and announced, "Auntie Hsüeh has come to see you."
Ch'un-mei then told her junior maidservant Ts'ui-hua to open the casements, so that the sunshine brightly illuminated the gauze covered windows.
Upon coming inside, Auntie Hsüeh remarked, "Young Lady, I see that you haven't gotten up yet."
She then put down her box of trinkets, got down on her knees, and kowtowed to her.
"There's no need for any of that," said Ch'un-mei. "What are you kowtowing to me for?"
She then explained, "I've been feeling out of sorts and have gotten up later than usual today," and she went on to ask, "Have you brought those ornaments with inscribed auspicious clouds and nine phoenixes that you have had made for me, or not?"
"My Lady," responded Auntie Hsüeh, "those two ornaments took quite a lot of trouble to make. It was only last night that I was able to pick them up from the jeweler's shop. I was planning to deliver them to you today but did not expect you to send a jailer after them."
She then took them out and handed them to Ch'un-mei to look over. Ch'un-mei felt that the ornament with the kingfisher feather inlays and inscribed auspicious clouds was not as striking as she would have liked but put them back in their cardboard box and handed them to Yüeh-kuei to put away.
She then ordered a serving of tea for Auntie Hsüeh to drink. Auntie Hsüeh then called in the young maidservant she had brought with her and told her to kowtow to the lady.
"Where is she from?" asked Ch'un-mei.
"The Second Lady has spoken to me several times," explained Auntie Hsüeh, "telling me that Ho-hua is only able to cook, and asking me to find another young girl for her, whom she can teach to do needlework. That is why I have brought this youngster with me. She is the daughter of a country family and is only eleven years old this year. As trainable material, with the proper discipline it should be possible to teach her to do whatever is needed."
"If you had found her a girl from the city," remarked Ch'un-mei, "she might have turned out to be cleverer. What do these country girls know? Just the other day, a certain Old Mother Chang tried to sell me two young maidservants from the countryside. One of them was a ten-year-old, and the other eleven; and their names were Sheng-chin and Huo-pao; but neither of them turned out to be any good. Their parents wanted five taels of silver for each of them and were waiting outside to collect the money. I told the go-between to tell their parents to let them stay overnight, so I could test them out, and see how they responded; and have them come back the next day to collect their silver. I insisted on keeping them overnight, and my maidservants, just as though they:
Didn't know any better, gave them some pork-ball soup and rice gruel to eat. Early the next morning, my maidservants started to kick up a fuss, and I scolded them, saying, 'What are you making such a fuss about?' It turned out that Sheng-chin had befouled her bedding with shit, and that Huo-pao had pissed in her pants till they were so stiff with dried urine that they could hardly be removed. It made me want to laugh on the one hand but also gave me the creeps; and when Old Mother Chang came back, I had her take them away."
She then went on to inquire, "How much are you asking for this maidservant of yours?"
"Not much at all," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "Merely four taels of silver. Her father is planning to enlist in the army."
Ch'un-mei then said to Hai-t'ang, "Take her over to the Second Lady's room. We'll arrange to pay for her tomorrow."
She also said to Yüeh-kuei, "Bring that large flagon of Chin-hua wine, and pour some of it for Auntie Hsüeh in order to fend off the cold. And bring in a box of whatever pastries are available for her to eat. At this early hour in the morning it would never do to douse her with wine on an empty stomach."
"Sister Yüeh-kuei," said Auntie Hsüeh, "don't pour any wine for me until I've finished talking to your mistress. I've already had something to drink elsewhere."
"Tell me," said Ch'un-mei, "where have you been drinking?"
"Just now," said Auntie Hsüeh, "the First Lady detained me at her place and gave me something to eat and drink. She wept as she told me, thus and so, how the page boy P'ing-an has stolen a set of gold head ornaments that someone had left in the pawnshop, along with a gilded buckle, and run off to amuse himself by sleeping with prostitutes; only to end up being arrested by the local constable, taken to the police station, and forced to endure a beating in the squeezers. The original owner sent someone to retrieve the stolen objects and kicked up a fuss when he was unable to do so. She then sent Manager Fu Ming to try to recover the missing objects from the police station. The police chief, Wu Tien-en, formerly served as a manager in their household, and when her husband was still alive, he enabled him to gain his official position; but now he has turned against them ungratefully and subjected her page boy to the squeezers, in the hope of getting him to implicate her in some sort of misconduct. He not only refused to relinquish the stolen objects without being paid for them but also threatened Manager Fu Ming with a beating, which frightened him so that he is hiding out in his home. She asked me to come convey her respects to you. She doesn't know whether His Honor has any jurisdiction over the police station in question but hopes that you will take pity on her, since she is now all alone in the world, and ask His Honor if he can do anything about it. If he succeeds in recovering the stolen objects so she can return them to their original owner, the First Lady will come in person to express her thanks to you."
"Do you have a note explaining the situation with you?" asked Ch'un-mei. "It doesn't matter though; His Honor is out on duty right now, but when he comes home tonight, never fear, I will speak to him about it."
"I do have an explanatory note from her," said Auntie Hsüeh, as she pulled it out of her sleeve.
When Ch'un-mei had finished reading it, she casually placed it on the windowsill.
Before long, Yüeh-kuei brought in a tray with four dishes of delicacies, and, taking up a large silver goblet, proceeded to fill it to overflowing with wine, and present it to Auntie Hsüeh.
"I can't handle a thing as large as that," said Auntie Hsüeh.
"It's not as large as that thing of your husband's," Ch'un-mei said with a laugh. "Since you're able to handle that all right, why can't you handle this? No matter what, I want you to handle it for me. If you refuse, I'll tell Yüeh-kuei to hold your nose and pour it down your throat for me."
"You'd better let me have some pastries first," said Auntie Hsüeh, "in order to provide a lining for my stomach."
"Old Mother," responded Ch'un-mei, "all you do is tell lies. You just told me that you had been given something to eat where you came from, and now you claim that you need to line your stomach."
"The two pastries I had there," said Auntie Hsüeh, "were not enough to last until now."
"Auntie Hsüeh," said Yüeh-kuei, "if you will drink this large goblet of wine, I will give you some pastries to eat. Otherwise, my mistress will say I am of no use and is likely to give me a beating."
Auntie Hsüeh had no recourse but to let her pour the entire goblet of wine down her throat, which gave her the sensation that:
Her heart was hopping like a little fawn.
Ch'un-mei pursed her lips and told Hai-t'ang to pour out another goblet of wine and give it to her to drink.
Auntie Hsüeh pushed it aside and said, "My Good Lady, I can't drink another drop."
Hai-t'ang then addressed her, saying, "You managed to drink what Yüeh-kuei offered you. If you don't drink what I offer you, the mistress will beat me instead."
This threw Auntie Hsüeh into such a state of consternation that she got down on her knees, so her torso looked as though it were sticking straight out of the ground like a post.
"That will do," said Ch'un-mei. "Bring a pastry over for her to eat, so she can manage to get down the rest of the wine."
Yüeh-kuei did as directed, saying, "Auntie Hsüeh, no one is more considerate of you than I am. I have saved these corn flour pastries with rose-flavored stuffings for you to eat."

She then presented her with a large plateful of stuffed rose-flavored cream puff pastries.
Auntie Hsüeh ate only one of them, after which Ch'un-mei said to her, "You can tuck the rest into your sleeve and feed them to that cuckold of yours when you get home."
Auntie Hsüeh then drank the wine and endeavored to hide her embarrassment as she took the servings of smoked pork and salt-cured goose from the platter, wrapped them up, first in absorbent grass paper and then in cloth, and stuffed the package into her sleeve. Hai-t'ang obstinately insisted on getting her to drink another half goblet of wine. Only upon seeing that she was about to throw up did she desist and clear away the utensils.
Ch'un-mei then said to Auntie Hsüeh, "Come back to check on things tomorrow, and we will weigh out the silver for the young maidservant you brought with you."
She also sent Hai-t'ang to ask for Sun Erh-niang's opinion of her, and, upon returning, she reported, "She said she would like to keep the maidservant and requested that you would pay the asking price for her."
As Auntie Hsüeh was about to say farewell and go out the door, Ch'un-mei said to her, "Auntie, you must not persist in:
Pretending to be both deaf and dumb.
That pair of ornaments inscribed with auspicious clouds that you brought me is not well enough made. You should bring me a set of better ones to look at another day."
"I understand," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "My Lady, would you please have one of your maidservants accompany me, lest the dog should bite my leg."
Ch'un-mei laughed at this, saying, "Our dog knows what he is doing. He stops biting when he reaches the bone."
She then sent Lan-hua to escort Auntie Hsüeh as far as the postern gate.
To make a long story short, at sunset that day, Commandant Chou Hsiu came back from his round of inspection, accompanied by a squad of cavalry with their identifying insignia, carrying blue command standards, and followed by another contingent holding long spears with decorated handles. When he entered the rear hall, the attending maidservants took his official cap and outer garments, after which he went into the master suite to see Ch'un-mei and his young son and was:
Delighted in his heart,
as he sat down to join them. Yüeh-kuei and Hai-t'ang brought him a serving of tea, after which he recounted the events of his tour of inspection that day. Before long, a table was set up, and a meal was served; after which, the candles were lighted, goblets were brought out, and they proceeded to have a drink together.
Upon his asking if anything had happened that day, Ch'un-mei fetched the note and gave it to the commandant to read, saying, "It seems that over at Wu Yüeh-niang's place, thus and so, the page boy P'ing-an stole some head ornaments and has been arrested and incarcerated by the police chief Wu Tien-en, who has not allowed her to reclaim the stolen objects, and beaten the page boy in order to induce him to falsely accuse Yüeh-niang of engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an. In the hope of extorting money from her, he is threatening to forward the case to the prefectural and district authorities."
When the commandant had finished reading the note, he said, "This case falls within the jurisdiction of my office. How can he propose to forward it to the prefectural or district authorities? This rascal, Police Chief Wu Tien-en, is acting outrageously? I will issue a summons for him tomorrow and deal with him myself."
He then went on to say, "I have heard that this police chief Wu Tien-en used to work as a manager in their household. It was only because he was sent by his employer to deliver some gifts to Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching in the Eastern Capital that he was able to obtain this office. How can he do such an about-face and bring a false accusation against his former benefactors?"
"It is just as you say," remarked Ch'un-mei. "See what you can do to take care of the matter on her behalf tomorrow."
Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
The next day, he sent a message to Wu Yüeh-niang telling her to draft a written deposition on the matter and have it delivered to him. He then made out a certified document in the courtroom, written on stationery with decorative borders, and placed it in an envelope. The document read: "The Office of the Regional Military Command of Shantung, with regard to a case of larceny, requests the appearance of the relevant police chief and the culprit before his court. Delivered by the inspectors Chang Sheng and Li An. The above request is mandatory."
The two of them, thereupon, took the document with them and proceeded to go first to Wu Yüeh-niang's residence. Yüeh-niang treated them to wine and food and gave each of them a tael of silver as a reward for their efforts. Since Manager Fu Ming was still confined to his bed at home, Yüeh-niang's brother, Wu the Second, agreed to accompany them to the police station.
Police Chief Wu Tien-en, on seeing that P'ing-an had been incarcerated for two days without anyone from Hsi-men Ch'ing's household offering to grease his palm about the situation, was in the very act of ordering a clerk to draft a document forwarding the case to the prefectural and district authorities, when the two emissaries from the office of the Regional Military Command showed up and delivered the certified document to him. When he saw that the inscription in red ink on the envelope indicated that both he and the culprit were ordered to appear before the commandant, and opened and read the enclosed deposition by Wu Yüeh-niang, he was thrown into a state of panic. Doing his best to placate Li An and Chang Sheng, he gave them each a tip of two taels of silver, wrote up a document about the case, and then took the accused with him as he made his way to the office of the Regional Military Command. Upon arriving there, he had to wait for what seemed like half a day before the commandant took his place on the bench, with soldiers and jailers lined up to either side, and ordered them to be brought before him.
Police Chief Wu Tien-en handed up the document he had drafted, and after the commandant had read it, he said, "This case is one that falls under the jurisdiction of this office. Why have you not forwarded it to me for a decision, but chosen to procrastinate this way, no doubt in the hope of obtaining a bribe? It is clear that you are guilty of malfeasance."
Police Chief Wu Tien-en pleaded, "Your humble servant was just in the process of drafting a document to forward to Your Honor when your summons unexpectedly arrived."
"You dog of an official!" the commandant cried at him. "This conduct of yours is detestable. How high an official are you to try to manipulate the law this way, in defiance of your superiors? I have been commissioned by the Emperor himself to protect this territory, apprehend thieves and bandits, command the military forces, and oversee the canals and waterways. My jurisdiction over these matters is clearly established. How can you feel entitled to arrest a suspect without reporting it to higher authorities, and have the culprit tortured and beaten in the endeavor to get him to falsely implicate innocent parties? It is obvious that you are guilty of malfeasance."
When Police Chief Wu Tien-en heard this accusation, he tore off his official cap and proceeded to kowtow before him at the foot of the steps.
"I really ought to prosecute you, you dog of an official," said the commandant, "but I will let you off this once. If you commit the same offense in the future, however, I will see to it that you are indicted and arraigned."
He then had P'ing-an brought before him and said, "You slave, you are not only guilty of stealing objects but have also given false evidence implicating your employer. If every slave were like you, people would not dare to employ servants."
Turning to his attendants, he said, "Give him thirty strokes with the heavy bamboo; and seal up the stolen objects so that their original owner can send someone to repossess them."
He then called Wu the Second before him and gave him a receipt entitling him to take custody of the objects in question, and gave a card to Chang Sheng to take back to Hsi-men Ch'ing's residence, indicating that he had performed the favor that had been asked of him. Wu Yüeh-niang gave Chang Sheng some wine and something to eat and rewarded him with a tael of silver, after which he went back to report to Commandant Chou Hsiu and Ch'un-mei.
Police Chief Wu Tien-en not only had arrested P'ing-an in vain but had lost quite a few taels of silver for his pains. Wu Yüeh-niang saw to it that the head ornaments and the buckle were returned to their owner, who recognized them as his original objects and took them away without saying a word. When Manager Fu Ming had arrived home, he came down with an acute intestinal fever and was bedridden for seven days when, because it was not properly treated:
Alas and alack,
he died. When Yüeh-niang realized how much trouble it had caused her, she directed that the pawnshop should accept the repayment and redemption of property that had already been pawned but should not pay out anything in return for pawned objects in the future. She merely had Wu the Second and Tai-an continue to operate the wholesale pharmaceutical shop at the front of their property and employed whatever proceeds were made from day to day to cover her household expenses. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.
One day, Wu Yüeh-niang summoned Auntie Hsüeh and offered her three taels of silver as a reward for her successful intervention.
"I don't want it," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "I fear that if word of it gets to the commandant's household, the young mistress will think ill of me."
"I am much indebted to you," responded Yüeh-niang, "but:
Heaven would hardly condone letting you go unrewarded for your pains.
I will not mention it to her the next time I see her, that's all."
Thereupon, she bought four platters of delicacies, along with a freshly slaughtered pig, a jug of southern wine, and a bolt of satin fabric, and entrusted them to Auntie Hsüeh to deliver to the commandant's household as an expression of her thanks to Ch'un-mei. Tai-an donned a black silk jacket, put the card with the list of gifts into a gilt lacquer box, and accompanied her on her way to see Ch'un-mei. Upon arriving there, Auntie Hsüeh led him into the rear hall where Ch'un-mei came out, wearing a gilt-ridged cap, gold hairpins and combs, and the ornament with its nine phoenixes on her head, an embroidered jacket on her torso, and a brocade skirt, and accompanied on either side by the maidservants and wet nurses in her service. Tai-an promptly proceeded to kneel down on the floor and kowtow to her.
Ch'un-mei ordered a table to be set up and provided with tea and delicacies for Tai-an and then said to him, "What I did didn't amount to anything. Your mistress ought not to have done all this on my behalf. What need was there for her to take the trouble to send all these gifts to me? I am sure that my husband Commandant Chou will also refuse to accept them."
"My mistress says," responded Tai-an, "that the settlement of that problem caused by P'ing-an the other day was entirely owing to the efforts expended on her behalf by His Honor and Your Ladyship. This doesn't amount to anything. These:
Paltry and insignificant gifts, are proffered to the two of you to dispense as you see fit."
"I do not feel right about accepting them," said Ch'un-mei.
"Venerable Lady," said Auntie Hsüeh, "if you refuse to accept them, the sender will hold it against me."
Ch'un-mei then invited the commandant to come in and consult with her, after which, they agreed to accept the pig, the wine, and the delicacies, but to return the bolt of fabric. They then gave Tai-an a handkerchief and three mace of silver for his pains and also rewarded the bearer who had carried the gift box with two mace of silver.
Ch'un-mei then asked him, "How is your mistress's infant son doing?"
"The little boy is a very playful sort," responded Tai-an.
She then went on to ask, "Tai-an, when did you put up your hair and start wearing a hair net; and when did you and Hsiao-yü get married?"
"It was during the eighth month," replied Tai-an.
"When you get home," said Ch'un-mei, "be sure to convey my greetings to your mistress, and tell her how grateful I am for her generous gifts. I would like to invite her to come by for a visit, but the commandant is going to leave on another tour of inspection sometime soon. Next year, during the first month, on her son's birthday, I intend to come pay her a visit."
"If you plan to do so," said Tai-an, "I will not only tell my mistress about it when I get home but also offer to come escort you there when the day arrives."
When they had finished speaking, Tai-an prepared to leave, and Auntie Hsüeh said to him, "You go ahead. The mistress wishes to say something else to me."
Tai-an thereupon escorted the bearer of the gift box on the way home and, on seeing Yüeh-niang, told her, thus and so, "The commandant accepted only the pig, the wine, and the delicacies but has returned the bolt of fabric. Ch'un-mei invited me back to the rear compound, gave me a serving of tea and something to eat, asked how Hsiao-ko was doing, and how things were going in the household, rewarded me with a handkerchief and three mace of silver, and the carrier of the gift box with two mace of silver, and asked me to convey her greetings to you, and thank you for your generous gifts. Initially, she refused to accept any of the gifts, but Auntie Hsüeh and I finally persuaded her to accept the delicacies, the pig, and the wine, although she insisted on my bringing back the bolt of fabric. She would have invited you to come by for a visit, but the commandant is due to set out on another tour of inspection in a few days. Next year, during the first month, on Hsiao-ko's birthday, she plans to come here for a visit."
He then went on to explain, "She occupies the master suite of five rooms; was wearing a brocade skirt, an embroidered jacket, and a gilt-ridged cap; looks plumper than she used to; and is waited on by a considerable number of maidservants and wet nurses."
"Did she really say that she is planning to come visit us next year?" asked Yüeh-niang.
"She really did say just that," responded Tai-an.
"When the day comes," said Yüeh-niang, "we will have to send someone to escort her here."
She then went on to ask, "Why has Auntie Hsüeh not appeared?"
"When I prepared to leave," said Tai-an, "she was still seated there engaged in conversation and told me to go on without her."
From this time forth, the two households resumed their social relations without interruption. Truly:
The way of the world responds to cold and warmth;
Human prestige is thereby enhanced or diminished.
A poem testifies to this:

Success and failure, flourishing and decay are controlled by fate;
Everything is determined by the year, month, day, and hour of birth.
Those who harbour ambition in their chests may achieve their goals;
But those whose purses are devoid of money cannot depend on talent.

Only a few monks live in the ancient temple
Few travelers cross the ruined bridge.
When a house is poor, the slaves deceive their master
When one in authority is weak, his underlings will serve him ill.
Where the water is shallow, the fish will not stay
Where the wood has few trees, the birds will not sing.
So it is with the affairs of men.
We can only sigh and be sorry for it.
After the death of Ximen Dajie and the lawsuit with Chen Jingji, Wu Yueniang's servant, Laizhao, died. His wife took her son, Little Iron Rod, and married again. Laixing was given charge of the gate. Xiuchun became a nun with Nun Wang.
After the death of Laixing's wife, he did not marry again. The nurse, Ruyi'er, often used to take Xiaoge and play with him. Laixing gave her wine and, in course of time, their relations became very friendly. Yueniang noticed that Ruyi'er often came back to the inner court with a very red face, and so found out what was happening. She reproached Ruyi'er, but did not make very much fuss about the matter. She gave the nurse a dress and four pins, chose a day of good omen, and married her to Laixing. In the daytime the nurse came to the kitchen and looked after the baby, and at night she went to Laixing.
The fifteenth day of the eighth month was Yueniang's birthday. Her two sisters-in-law and the three nuns came to congratulate her, and she gave them wine in the inner court. In the evening they listened to the nuns reading their texts in the room that had once belonged to Yulou. About the second night watch, Zhongqiu was sent to the kitchen to make some tea. Yueniang called her several times but got no answer. Then she herself went to her room to try to find the maid. She did not find her, but discovered Daian and Xiaoyu on the bed amusing themselves to their own very great satisfaction. When Yueniang came in, they were so taken aback they did not know what to do with themselves.
"You young scamp, what are you doing here? Why don't you go and make tea?" was all Yueniang said.
"I told Zhongqiu to go," Xiaoyu said. She hung her head and went to the back. Daian went through the second door to the other part of the house. Two days later, when the nuns and the two Aunts Wu had gone, Yueniang told Laixing to go to the rooms that Laizhao had had, since he was now the gatekeeper, and gave Laixing's old rooms to Daian. She fitted out Daian with two sets of bedclothes, a new suit, a hat, shoes, and socks. To Xiaoyu she gave a hairnet, some gold and silver ornaments, four pins of silver with gold heads, rings, and two silk dresses. Then she selected an auspicious day and married Daian to Xiaoyu. Xiaoyu spent her days waiting upon Yueniang and at night went to Daian. The girl was always taking away dainties for her husband, but Yueniang pretended not to see. As the proverb says: If you are in love, you never see your lover's faults. Another proverb tells us: A greedy man will never be satisfied. When food and wine are distributed unequally, there will be trouble in the household, and when the mistress is unfair, maids and women will complain.
Ping'an saw that Yueniang had married Xiaoyu to Daian, and that he was given better clothes than the rest. He himself was two years older than Daian—he was twenty-two—but Yueniang had never thought of finding a wife for him.
One day he was in the pawnshop when somebody pawned a set of gold ornaments and two gilded hooks for thirty taels of silver. They were to redeem the things in a month with interest. Clerk Fu and Daian took them and put them in the large press in the shop. Ping'an stole them and took them to Long-footed Wu's place in Nanwazi. There were two receivers of stolen property there, one called Xue Cun and the other Pan Er.
Ping'an stayed there two nights. The man of the bawdy house noticed that he was spending money freely, and also saw that he had some gold ornaments in a box. He pretended to go out with a silver pot to buy some wine, but actually went to the police and told them what he had seen. The police came and found the young man there. They beat him about the head and then arrested him.
It happened that Wu Dian'en, who had recently been made an Inspector, rode down the street, with his tablet of office carried before him. He asked who this man was whom the police had arrested. The police knelt down and said: "This fellow stole some things and came here to spend the money in the bawdy house. We had reason to be suspicious and took him into custody."

"Take him to my court," the Inspector said. They all went to the Inspector's court. When Wu Dian'en had taken his seat, his underlings standing on either side, Ping'an was brought in. He recognized Wu Dian'en, who had once been one of Ximen Qing's friends, and thought he would certainly be set free.
"I am Ximen's servant," he said, "and my name is Ping'an."
"If you are a servant in Ximen's household," Wu Dian'en said, "why did you take these things and go to the brothel?"
"My mistress had lent them to one of her relatives and sent me to fetch them," Ping'an said. "I got back very late and the city gates were closed. I went to the brothel to pass the night. There, unfortunately, the police arrested me."
"Nonsense!" Wu Dian'en said angrily. "Have Ximen's people so much gold and silver that they even let you, a slave, look after gold ornaments like these and take them to the brothel? I believe you stole them. Tell me the truth and you shall not be beaten."
"Really," Ping'an said, "my Mistress's relative borrowed these things, and I was sent to bring them back. I am telling the truth."
Wu Dian'en was angry. "You slave," he cried, "you are a regular thief. I know you will never tell me the truth unless you are beaten. Give him a beating and put the thumbscrews on him."
The boy made a noise like a pig being killed. "Please stop," he cried, "and I will tell the truth."
"Tell me the truth and then I will stop," Wu Dian'en said.
"I stole the ornaments and the hooks from the pawnshop," Ping'an said.
"Why did you do it?"
"I am now twenty-three years old," Ping'an said, "and my mistress promised that she would see about getting a wife for me. She never did so. She has another servant, Daian, who is only twenty, but she has married him to one of her maids. I stole the things because I was jealous."
"Perhaps Daian has had some dealings with your mistress, and that is why she gave him her maid," Wu Dian'en said. "If that is what you say, I will forgive you."
"But I can't say that," Ping'an said.
"If you don't, I must put the rack on you again."
The attendants applied the rack again. Ping'an was so terrified that he cried: "Don't do it. I will tell you."
"Tell me and I will let you go," Wu Dian'en said. He told his attendants to put the rack away.
"Yes," Ping'an said, "my mistress secretly slept with Daian, and Daian also misconducted himself with Xiaoyu, the maid. My mistress found out what was going on between Daian and the maid, but she never said a word. She gave them clothes and ornaments and allowed them to marry."
Wu Dian'en ordered his clerk to write down what Ping'an had said. Then he kept the boy at his office and issued a warrant for the arrest of Yueniang, Daian, and Xiaoyu.
When Clerk Fu discovered the loss of the ornaments, he was very much upset. He asked Daian what he knew about the matter.
"I have been having my dinner in the medicine shop," Daian said. "I know nothing about it."
"I put the box into this cabinet, and it has disappeared," Clerk Fu said.
Then they looked for Ping'an. He had disappeared. Clerk Fu was in a terrible state. He swore all sorts of terrible oaths. When the owner of the things came to claim them, Fu could only say that he had not yet brought them from the house. The man came several times, but still the things were not forthcoming. Then the man stood outside the shop and shouted: "I pawned my things for a month only. I have paid for them and the interest too. Why don't you let me have them? They are worth seventy or eighty taels of silver."
In the evening, Clerk Fu could still see no sign of Ping'an, and realized that the young man had stolen the things. He sent people in every direction to try and find him. The owner of the things came again and kept shouting outside the door. Fu suggested that they should give the man fifty taels, but he would not accept it. He said the ornaments were worth sixty taels, and the hooks and jewels on the ornaments another ten, seventy in all. Clerk Fu offered ten taels more, but the man still refused. While they were disputing and arguing, a man came and said to Clerk Fu: "Your Ping'an has stolen the things and taken them to the bawdy house in Nanwazi. Now Inspector Wu has had him arrested. You had better send somebody to identify them."
Wu Yueniang knew that Wu Dian'en had once been a clerk in her husband's business. She sent for Uncle Wu. Together they made a statement and sent it by Clerk Fu to Wu Dian'en. She thought that the matter would be settled as soon as he received it. Fu took the paper to the office, quite sure that his old friend Wu Dian'en would give him the things at once. To his surprise, he was called an old dog. Indeed Wu Dian'en ordered his attendants to take off Fu's clothes and flog him.
Meanwhile, the Inspector said: "Your boy is here. He tells me that Mistress Ximen has been carrying on an intrigue with Daian. I am sending a report to the authorities, and later I shall send and examine Mistress Ximen herself. I am surprised that you, you old dog, dare to come here and claim these things."
Clerk Fu was sent away, with many shouts of "Old dog!" to pursue him. He hurried home as fast as he could and told Yueniang everything that had happened. She was so frightened that she felt as though her skull had been broken open and icy water poured into it. She was hardly able to move her feet and hands. Then the man who owned the ornaments came again and made a great to-do outside the door.
"You have lost my property," he shouted, "and now you will neither return it to me nor pay me what it is worth. You keep on telling me to come here and go there. Today, you say, you will go to the office and claim the things; and tomorrow, you will tell me to wait a little longer. Where are they? This won't do at all."
Clerk Fu went to the man and pacified him. "Give us one more day or perhaps two," he said, "and you shall have your things without fail. If we do not get them for you, you shall have double what they are worth."
"I will go and see what my master has to say," the man said, and went away.
Yueniang, what with one trouble and what with another, wore a continual frown. She sent a boy to ask her brother, Uncle Wu, to come and talk the matter over. "You must go to Wu Dian'en," she said, "and get this matter settled before things get any worse."
"I don't imagine he will do anything for us unless he gets well paid for it," Uncle Wu said.
"Remember that he owes his position entirely to us," Yueniang said. "And he still owes us a hundred taels of silver. My husband never asked him for any note, yet he repays our kindness by hatred."
"Ah, sister," Uncle Wu said, "there are only too many people who do that."
"Brother," Yueniang said, "I am counting on you to settle this. I will give you some money, and you can get back the ornaments and so end the wretched business."
When Uncle Wu had had something to eat, Yueniang took him to the gate. By chance, old woman Xue went past with a young maid. She was carrying her box.
"Where are you going, old woman?" Yueniang said. "I haven't seen you for a very long time."
"No, indeed, Lady," Xue said. "I have been very busy lately. Yesterday the young lady sent for me several times, but I could not go."
"Old woman, you are crazy," Yueniang said. "What do you mean by this young lady of yours?"
"Well, she is not a young lady any longer," old woman Xue said. "She is the mistress of the household now."
"How did she get into that position?" Yueniang said.
"It was just her good luck," the old woman said. "First, she had a baby. Then the Great Lady died, and the Major made her his first wife. His second wife has to do what she tells her. She has two nurses and four maids to wait on her, and two of them are very good singers. Though the Major has slept with both of them, if the lady takes it into her head to punish them, he never says a word to stop her. And still he is always anxious lest she should have something to complain about. The other day, for some reason or other, she punished Xue'e and pulled her hair out. She was sent away one night and sold for eight taels of silver. This morning, even before I was up, she sent for me twice. I was told to go at once and take two sets of green ornaments and one set of nine phoenix ornaments. They gave me five taels of silver. I have spent the silver, and they haven't seen the ornaments yet. Certainly I shall get a terrible scolding when she sees me."
"Come in and let me see what the ornaments are like," Yueniang said.
She took Madam Xue into the hall of the inner court. The old woman opened the box and took out the ornaments. They were indeed exquisitely made, with a beautiful blending of gold and green, and the backs gilded. Each ornament had a phoenix, and each phoenix held a string of little pearls in its beak.
"This set," the old woman said, "is worth three taels and five qian. The other, one tael and five qian. I have made no profit at all out of them."
As they were talking, Daian came and said: "The man has come again for those things that were pawned with us. He wants to know how much longer he will have to wait. He says if we don't get the things by tomorrow there will be trouble for Uncle Fu. He will go with Uncle Fu to a certain place. Uncle Fu is not well and has gone home. The man has gone too."
"What is it all about?" old woman Xue said.
Yueniang sighed. "Ping'an stole a set of gold ornaments and a pair or hooks from the pawnshop. He went to the bawdy house outside the city and there Inspector Wu arrested him. Now he is in jail and the man keeps coming for his things and shouts outside the door. Inspector Wu deliberately refuses to give the things up. He beat Clerk Fu. I don't know what to do. Ever since my husband died, I have had nothing but one trouble after another. It is very hard for me to have to put up with all these insults." She began to cry.
"My good lady," old woman Xue said, "there is one way out that you have not thought of. Let me go to the young lady, and ask her to send a card to the Inspector. Then you would get ten sets of ornaments if there were so many."
"Major Zhou is a military officer," Yueniang said. "What can he do with the Inspector?"
"Lady," the old woman said, "don't you know that he has special powers. He has many functions that a military officer usually does not have. He has something to do with the river and the taxes and the soldiers and all sorts of things. He seems to be able to settle any sort of question. And it is his business to see to the capture of robbers who go to the river. This is the very thing for him."
"Well," Yueniang said, "will you go to the young lady for me and ask her to speak to the Major on my behalf? If I get those ornaments back, you shall have five taels of silver."
"Money is not everything, my good lady," old woman Xue said. "I should not think of taking money for helping you out of such a sad predicament. Ask someone to write a note for you and I will take it to the young lady at once. If I do this business for you, just give me anything you think fit."
Yueniang asked Xiaoyu to give Madam Xue some tea.
"If you don't mind, I won't have any tea," the old woman said. "Tell a boy to write the note. I am rather busy."
"You must have something to eat. You have been out half a day."
Xiaoyu brought them tea and cakes, and the old woman ate something with Yueniang. She gave two cakes to the girl who was with her.
"How old is she?" Yueniang asked.
"She is twelve."
Daian finished the note and brought it in. Xue drank her tea and put the paper in her sleeve. She picked up her box and went away.
When she came to the Major's house, Chunmei was still in bed. Yuegui told her that Madam Xue had come. Chunmei told Haitang to open the windows and let in the bright sunshine.
"What, Lady," the old woman said, when she came in, "are you not up yet?" She set down her box and kowtowed to Chunmei.
"There is no need for ceremony between us," Chunmei said. "Stand up. I am not very well. That is why I didn't get up before this. Have you brought my ornaments?"
"Yes," the old woman said, "and I had a very hard business getting them. I did not get them, in fact, until last night. This morning, I was just going to bring them to you when your servant came for me."
She took the ornaments from the box and gave them to Chunmei. Chunmei did not care very much for one of the sets, but she put them in the box and gave the box to Yuegui. When the old woman had had some tea, she called forward the little girl who had come with her and told her to kowtow to Chunmei.
"Who is this?" Chunmei asked.
"The Second Lady has several times told me that her maid is only useful for cooking," old woman Xue said. "She wants a young girl to do needlework for her, and I have brought this one for her to see. She is a country girl and twelve years old. I think she will turn out well."
"You should have got her a town girl," Chunmei said. "Town girls are more intelligent. Indeed, I never think a country girl has any brains at all. How much does she cost?"
"Only four taels," old woman Xue said. "Her father is going to the army and needs the money."
"Take this girl to the Second Lady," Chunmei said to one of her maids. "We will pay for her tomorrow." Then she said to the other maid: "There is some Jinhua wine in the jar. Heat some for Madam Xue and bring her some cakes. If we don't give her cakes, she will say that we only give her wine to drink in the mornings and nothing to eat with it."
"Sister," the old woman said to the maid, "don't heat any wine for me. I have something to say to your mistress. I had some wine before I came."
"Where did you have some wine?" Chunmei asked her.
"I have just come from the Great Lady," old woman Xue said, "and she gave me something to eat. She is in great trouble and she cried to me. Her boy, Ping'an, stole a set of gold ornaments and a pair of gilt hooks from the pawnshop and went after some whore. Then he was arrested. Meanwhile, the owner of the things keeps coming and shouting and demanding his property. Inspector Wu was once a clerk in her family, and when Ximen Qing was alive he was very kind to Wu. But now the Inspector has forgotten all about that, and looks the other way. He had her servant beaten and refuses to give up the things. He insulted Clerk Fu and beat him. Fu got such a fright that he had to go home, ill. The Great Lady told me to bring you her love and ask you to take pity on her. She has no relatives of her own to help her, and she said I was to ask you if you would speak to the Major, so that she can get back the ornaments and give them to their owner. If you are good enough to do this for her, she will call to thank you.
"Have you brought any paper with you?" Chunmei said. "My husband is away on duty, but when he comes back this evening, I will tell him.
"I have the paper here," the old woman said. She took it from her sleeve. Chunmei read it and put it on the windowsill.
Then Yuegui brought four dishes on a tray. She filled a large silver cup with wine and offered it to the old woman.
"Lady," Xue said, "why do you give me so large a thing?"
Chunmei laughed. "It is not so large a thing as your husband's," she said. "If you can put up with that, you can drink this. If you won't drink it of your own accord, I shall tell Yuegui to hold your nose and pour it down your throat."
"Well, give me some cakes first so that I have something to make a foundation for it," the old woman said.
"You are an old liar," Chunmei said. "A moment ago you said you had just had something. Now you say you want something to make a foundation."
"I only had two cakes," old woman Xue said, "and they won't last forever."
"Mother Xue," Yuegui said, "drink the wine and then you shall have the cakes. If you won't, it will mean another beating for me. My mistress always says I am no use."
Old woman Xue could not help herself. She drank the wine and immediately felt as if a young deer were careering about inside her. Chunmei made a sign to Haitang, and the maid gave her another cup. The old woman put it aside.
"Mother," Haitang said, "you took the wine Yuegui offered you. You can't refuse mine. If you do, my mistress will give me a beating."
Old woman Xue knelt down.
"Well," Chunmei said, "give her some cakes to eat with it."
"Mother Xue," Yuegui said, "nobody is so kind to you as I am. I have kept these rose cakes especially for you."
She brought out a large plate of rose cakes, but the old woman ate only one.
"Take the others away and let your old turtle have them," Chunmei said.
When Madam Xue had had some wine, she wrapped up in paper some dried meat, buns and goose, and put the paper into her sleeves. Haitang pressed her to drink another half cup. Then she saw that the old woman was on the verge of being sick, so she cleared the table and urged her no more. Chunmei told her to come the following day and paid her for the ornaments. When Xue was going, she said: "Now, old woman, don't pretend to be deaf and dumb. One of these sets of ornaments is no good. I shall expect a better set tomorrow."
"Very well, Lady," the old woman said. "Will you send a maid out with me? I am afraid of the dog biting my leg."
"My dogs know what they're about," Chunmei said. "They will stop when they get to the bone." But she told Yuegui to take the old woman to the gate.
It was sunset when Major Zhou came back from his office. He went to the great hall. The maids took his hat and clothes. He went to see Chunmei and his little son, and was very happy with them. When he had sat down, the maids brought tea to him and he told Chunmei about the work he had done that day. Then the table was set and they had dinner together. Afterwards, candles were brought and they drank wine. He asked if anything special had happened in the household, and Chunmei gave him the paper that old woman Xue had brought.
"Mistress Ximen's boy, Ping'an, stole some ornaments," she said. "Then he was arrested. Inspector Wu refused the people who went to claim the things and beat the boy severely to make him declare that Mistress Ximen had behaved improperly. He says he is going to send the case to a higher authority."
"But this is my business," Major Zhou said. "What does he mean by talking about sending the matter further? He is a most unreasonable fellow. I will send for him tomorrow and see how he likes a beating himself. I believe he used to be one of Ximen Qing's men. When Ximen went to the Eastern Capital with presents for the Imperial Tutor, it was he who got this appointment for Wu. Now he is trying to do all the harm he can to Ximen's family."
"That is just what I was going to say," Chunmei said. "You must look into the matter tomorrow."
The next day, Major Zhou told Yueniang to send an accusation to him. In his great hall, the Major wrote out an instruction and put it in an envelope. "The Major's office wishes to investigate a certain case of theft," it said. "The thief and the stolen property are to be sent to this office immediately. This instruction will be delivered by officers Zhang Sheng and Li An."
Zhang Sheng and Li An took the document. First they called to see Wu Yueniang. She entertained them with food and wine and gave each of them a tael of silver with which to buy shoes. Clerk Fu was still in bed, so Uncle Wu went with the two men to the Inspector's office.
Wu Dian'en remarked the fact that although Ping'an had been in prison for two days, nobody from Ximen's household had been to see him. He was preparing a document to send to his superiors. Then the two officers from Major Zhou's office came in and handed him an envelope. He read the superscription and opened it. Inside was an accusation from Yueniang. He was alarmed and made himself most agreeable. He gave two taels of silver each to Zhang Sheng and Li An. He wrote a document in reply, sent those concerned to the Major's office, and went with them himself.
After a long time, Zhou came to the great hall, and his underlings stood on either side. They went in and the Inspector handed his document to the Major. The Major read it. "This business belongs to my office," he said. "Why did you deliberately delay handing the matter over to me? You must have had some evil purpose."
"I was just preparing the document when your instructions arrived," Wu said.

"You doggish officer," Major Zhou shouted. "What is your rank that you should dare to go contrary to the law and disregard your superiors? By his Majesty's command, it is my duty to protect this district, control the soldiers here and the river too. You know what my duties are, yet you dare to arrest people, and do not send them to me. You abuse your authority and even punish people yourself. Then you accuse the innocent. Certainly you are actuated by some evil motive."
Inspector Wu took off his hat and kowtowed to the Major.
"I ought to punish you, you doggish officer," Zhou cried, "but this time I will forgive you. If anything of the sort happens again, I shall certainly deal with you as the law requires."
He called Ping'an before him. "You slave," he said, "you stole these things and lied most disgracefully about your mistress. If all servants were like you, no one would dare to employ one." He ordered that Ping'an should be given thirty severe stripes, and sealed up the stolen property until the owner should claim it. Then he called for Uncle Wu, who gave him a receipt for the things.
Then he sent Zhang Sheng with his card to Yueniang. Yueniang gave the man wine and another tael of silver. When he returned, he told the Major and Chunmei what she had said. So Inspector Wu gained nothing by arresting Ping'an, but lost a few taels of silver. Yueniang returned the ornaments and hooks to their owner, who examined them, recognized them as his own, and took them away without a word.
Clerk Fu was very ill and, after seven days, he died. He had taken medicine, but it did him no good. After this trouble in the pawnshop, Yueniang decided to let people redeem their pledges, but would not accept any new ones. She put her younger brother and Daian to look after the medicine shop, and this brought in sufficient to pay the household expenses.
When the business was settled, Yueniang sent for old woman Xue and gave her three taels of silver. The old woman refused to take the money, saying that if she did so, her young lady would be annoyed.
"But I am very much indebted to you," Yueniang said, "and Heaven does not employ people without assuring them of their reward. You need not say anything about it to her."
Then she got ready four dishes, a pig, a jar of wine and a roll of silk, and asked Xue to take them to Chunmei as a mark of her gratitude. Daian, dressed in black clothes, took the list of presents. The old woman took him to the hall in the inner court and there Chunmei came to see him. She was wearing a golden arched headdress, an embroidered coat and a silken skirt, and her women and maids came with her. Daian knelt down and kowtowed. Chunmei told the maids to give him something to eat.
"I have done nothing," she said. "Why does your mistress trouble to send me these presents? I don't think my husband will allow me to accept them."
"My mistress told me to say that she is very grateful for all the trouble you have taken over Ping'an," Daian said. "She has nothing worthy to offer you, but sends these trifles in the hope that you and his Lordship will condescend to give them to your servants."
"It embarrasses me to accept them," Chunmei said.
"If you do not take them, Lady," old woman Xue said, "I am sure the Lady Ximen will blame me."
Then Chunmei asked her husband to come, and asked him what he thought about it. They decided to accept the pig, the wine, and the prepared food, but not the roll of silk. Chunmei gave Daian a handkerchief and three qian of silver, and two qian of silver to the porter.
"How is your young master?" she asked Daian.
"He is very merry and plays all the time," Daian said.
"When did you first dress your hair as a man's, and when did you marry Xiaoyu?"
"I married her in the eighth month," Daian said.
"Thank your mistress for me and say how glad I should be if she would come and see me. The Major will be away on duty and, in the first month next year, when it is your young master's birthday, I will pay a visit to your mistress."
"Lady," Daian said, "I will tell my mistress as soon as I get home and say that she must expect you."
Then Daian was dismissed.
"Young man," old woman Xue said to him, "you go home. I have something to say to the lady and I will stay."
Daian took the empty boxes and went away. When he got home, he said to Yueniang: "Sister Chunmei took me to the hall in the inner court and entertained me with tea and cakes. She inquired after the young master and asked many questions about this household. She gave me a handkerchief and five qian of silver. She also gave two qian to the porter. She told me to thank you. For a long time she would not accept the present, but old woman Xue and I urged her, and at last she took the food, the pig and the wine, but made me bring back the roll of silk. She says she would like to send you an invitation, but she cannot do so now as her husband is going away on duty. She is going to come and see us on the young master's birthday. She occupies the upper apartments now, five rooms. She was wearing an embroidered gown and a silk skirt. Her headdress has a gold crown. She is taller and fatter than she used to be and has a great many maids and servants to wait upon her."
"Did she really say she was coming to see us?" the Moon Lady said.
"Yes," Daian said.
"We must certainly send someone to receive her," Yueniang said. "Why hasn't old woman Xue come back with you?"
"When I left, she's still talking to the lady," Daian said. "She told me to come back first." After this, there was close friendship between the 2 households.

119

Ch'un-mei Enjoys Visiting the Pools and Pavilions of Her Old Home; Commandant Chou Hsiu Sends Chang Sheng to Look for Ch'en Ching-chi

Households that are solid without but hollow within must cover their deficiencies;
In entertaining guests and responding to associates their expenditures are great.
When one's horses have died and one's servants fled it is hard to host a banquet;
When towers are foundering and buildings collapsing pipes and voices are silenced.
One's leased farmland and rented commercial outlets must revert to their owners;
One's collections of antiques or gold and jewellery are given to female peddlers.
If one wishes to borrow something temporarily from some well-to-do household;
How can one ever hope to open one's mouth without suffering embarrassment?
Light and darkness alternate swiftly;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.

And before long, it was the twenty-first day of the first month of the following year. Ch'un-mei, after consulting with Commandant Chou Hsiu, prepared a sacrificial table, replete with four kinds of preserved fruit, and a jug of southern wine, and sent their servant Chou Jen to deliver it to Wu Yüeh-niang. In the first place, it was the third anniversary of Hsi-men Ch'ing's death; and in the second place, it was Hsiao-ko's birthday. Yüeh-niang accepted the gifts and rewarded Chou Jen with a handkerchief and three mace of silver; after which, she hastened to arrange for Tai-an to don his black livery and deliver an invitation to Ch'un-mei to come pay her a visit. The invitation read as follows:
Deeply moved by your bountiful gifts, our humble household has hastily prepared a meager potation as a deferential compensation for your generous largess. It is our ardent wish that you will deign to mount your elegant equipage and condescend to pay us a visit. Our gratitude for your favor will know no bounds.
Respectfully indited by the lady, née Wu, of the Hsi-men household and addressed to the dressing table of the virtuous and venerable consort of His Honor Chou Hsiu.
When Ch'un-mei had read the invitation, she waited until noon before setting out. When she did so:
Her head was adorned with pearls and trinkets, including gold phoenixes, hairpins and combs, and pearl earrings; her torso was clad in a full-sleeved scarlet robe, decorated with a motif of the four animals representing the cardinal directions paying homage to the ch'i-lin, over a skirt of kingfisher-blue variegated brocade, from which suspended jade pendants tinkled, and which was secured with a gold girdle; while on her feet she wore shoes of scarlet embroidery with high white satin heels. She rode in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers and invested with a black satin gold lamé canopy, escorted by soldiers holding rattan rods who shouted to clear the way, accompanied by servants and attendants carrying her dressing case, and closely followed by two smaller sedan chairs for her maidservants.
Wu Yüeh-niang had invited Sister-in-law Wu to join her and had also engaged the services of two singing girls to play their instruments and sing for the entertainment of her guest. Upon hearing that Ch'un-mei had arrived, Yüeh-niang, likewise, dressed herself elaborately in mourning garments in order to receive her. She wore a five-ridged cap with a number of gold and turquoise head ornaments on her head, two pearl earrings dangled beside her ears, and the two sides of her collar were clasped together with a gold chatelaine. On her torso she wore a white satin jacket, over a long trailing skirt of kingfisher-blue satin brocade; and on her feet she wore a pair of jade-colored satin high-heeled shoes. With Sister-in-law Wu, she then went out to the reception hall in the front compound to receive her guest.
Ch'un-mei's large sedan chair was carried all the way to the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds before she alighted from it and proceeded to the reception hall to proffer her greetings, with her servants accompanying her on either side. Upon arriving there, she kowtowed to Yüeh-niang:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder.
Yüeh-niang promptly kowtowed in return, saying hastily, "The other day I put you to a great deal of trouble on my behalf, and yet you would not even accept the bolt of course fabric I offered you. And now, deeply moved by your bountiful gift of a sacrificial table:
I will never be able to thank you enough."
"You embarrass me," protested Ch'un-mei." "My husband has nothing better than these paltry gifts to offer.
They are no more than tokens of our esteem.
I have wanted since some time ago to invite you over for a visit, but my husband was about to leave on a tour of inspection, so I failed to do so."
"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "when is your birthday? When the day comes, I would like to buy some presents and come to see you."
"My birthday is on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month," responded Ch'un-mei.
"I will be sure to come visit you that day," said Yüeh-niang.
When the two of them had finished with these amenities, and Ch'un-mei had accepted two obeisances from her, she insisted that Yüeh-niang should stand up; after which she proceeded to kowtow to Sister-in-law Wu, who likewise returned the courtesy.
"Sister-in-law Wu," objected Ch'un-mei, "you ought not to do that," and she helped her up with one hand so she could accept her obeisance.
"Sister," responded Sister-in-law Wu:
"The present cannot be compared to the past.
You embarrass this old body to death."
After accepting only half an obeisance from Ch'un-mei, she conducted her to the seat of honor. Yüeh-niang and her sister-in-law then sat down to keep her company in their positions as hosts. The servants' wives, the maidservants, and the wet nurse then came in to pay their respects to their visitor, and Ch'un-mei observed that the wet nurse Ju-i was carrying Hsiao-ko in her arms.
"Little Brother," said Yüeh-niang, "won't you come and kowtow to Sister Ch'un-mei, in order to thank her for coming to celebrate your birthday today?"
Hsiao-ko actually climbed off Ju-i's lap and went over to bow to Ch'un-mei.
"A fine little rascal you are," remarked Yüeh-niang, "refusing to kowtow to our sister, but merely offering her a bow."
Ch'un-mei responded by hurriedly pulling out of her sleeve a brocade handkerchief, as well as a gold brooch decorated with the eight auspicious symbols, which she had them attach to his cap.
"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "I have put you to even further trouble," and she bowed to her in gratitude.
After this, Hsiao-yü and the wet nurse Ju-i came forward and kowtowed to her. Ch'un-mei responded by giving Hsiao-yü a gold-headed hairpin, and Ju-i a pair of silver flower ornaments.
"Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "you may not know it yet, but I have given our wet nurse to Lai-hsing as his wife. Lai-hsing's former wife Hui-hsiu became ill and died."
"She has always hoped with all her heart to remain in this household," remarked Ch'un-mei, "so that is appropriate."
A maidservant then brought in a serving of tea, and after they had consumed it, Yüeh-niang said, "Sister, please come back and sit in my parlor in the rear compound. It is cold in this reception hall."
When Ch'un-mei arrived in the rear compound, the first thing she saw was Hsi-men Ch'ing's spirit tablet, before which lamps and candles had been lit, and the sacrificial table had been set up. Ch'un-mei burned some paper money before it and shed a few tears; after which, standing screens were placed around the company, the charcoal in the brazier was ignited, an Eight Immortals table was set up, and the tea service was laid out. This consisted of deftly prepared steamed shortcake, rare sweets, mouth-watering delicacies, and exotic fruits, in saucers with incised gold ornamentation, with ivory chopsticks, and high-grade tender leaf tea, served in snow-white cups. Yüeh-niang and Sister-in-law Wu kept Ch'un-mei company as she enjoyed her tea, after which, they led her into the interior of the master suite to change her clothes. When she had taken off her outer gown, the servants' wives who had accompanied her opened the dressing case she had brought with her, and she changed into a green jacket of patterned brocade, over a skirt of lilac-colored brocade, before sitting down with her hosts in Yüeh-niang's room, and chatting for a while.
"How is your young son doing?" asked Yüeh-niang. "Why didn't you bring him with you today?"
"I would have brought him with me," responded Ch'un-mei, "so he could kowtow to you; but his father pointed out that the weather is frigid and was afraid that he might catch a cold. He doesn't want to stay in his quarters but likes to have the servant on duty take him out to the courtroom, or carry him outside. The last few days he has been crying a great deal, but I don't know why."
"Doesn't he miss you when you are away?" inquired Yüeh-niang.
"Whatever happens," said Ch'un-mei, "he has two wet nurses who take turns looking after him."
"His Honor Chou Hsiu is well along in years," said Yüeh-niang, "and must be very pleased that you have borne him this little son. It is also your good fortune as a woman. I have heard that his secondary consort Sun Erh-niang has also borne him a daughter. How old is she now?"
"That child of Sun Erh-niang's is called Yü-chieh," responded Ch'un-mei, "and she will be four years old on her next birthday. This child of mine is called Chin-ko."
"I have heard," said Yüeh-niang, "that His Honor also has two other concubines at his disposal."
"Those two are really only maidservants who are learning to sing," said Ch'un-mei. "They are merely fifteen or sixteen years old and are constantly up to mischief."
"Does His Honor bother to sleep with them very often?" asked Yüeh-niang. "My Lady," said Ch'un-mei, "he hardly has the time to do so. He is:
Usually abroad, and Seldom at home.
At the present time, all over the realm, there have been:
Outbreaks of thieves and bandits;
and he has been ordered by imperial edict to be responsible for many things, including the protection of the territory within his jurisdiction, the policing of the canals and waterways, the arrest of thieves and bandits, and the training of infantry and cavalry. Consequently, he is constantly going out on tours of inspection and is utterly exhausted."
When they had finished speaking, Hsiao-yü brought in a serving of tea for them to drink.
Ch'un-mei then said to Yüeh-niang, "My Lady, would you please take me for a tour of my former mistress's quarters in the garden, beneath the artificial hill."
"Sister," responded Yüeh-niang, "the artificial hill and the garden are no longer the artificial hill and the garden that they used to be. Ever since my husband passed away, there has been no one to look after them, and they have been allowed to fall into a state of dilapidation. The stone markers have fallen over and the trees have died. Without a reason for doing so, I don't go there anymore."
"It doesn't matter," said Ch'un-mei. "I'd just like to go and take a look at my former mistress's quarters."
Yüeh-niang was unable to dissuade her and felt compelled to send Hsiao-yü to go fetch the keys to the garden gate and the gate of the grotto underneath the artificial hill. When the gates had been opened, she and Sister-in-law Wu accompanied Ch'un-mei for a tour of the garden, where they lingered for what seemed like half a day. Behold:
The encircling walls were tumbling down;
The terraces and kiosks were collapsing.
The painted walls to either side were covered with green moss;
The floriate tiles on the ground were hidden by verdant grass.

The rock formations before the hill,
Had been so damaged that they no longer looked impressive;
The summer bedsteads in the pavilions,
Had been leaked on until their frames had become wobbly.
The door of the rock grotto was covered with cobwebs;
The water in the fishponds was swarming with frogs.
Foxes frequently elected to sleep in the Cloud Repose Pavilion;
Squirrels scampered back and forth in the Hidden Spring Grotto.
One suspected that for years it had not been visited by humans;
But it was obvious that all day long it was frequented by clouds.[2]

After looking around for a while, Ch'un-mei made her way into the former quarters of Li P'ing-erh, where she saw that the second floor was littered with broken-down furniture, the rooms on the ground floor were locked, and the ground in the yard was covered with a tangle of uncultivated grass. Only then did she venture into her former mistress P'an Chin-lien's quarters, where she found that the second floor was still stocked with pharmaceuticals and incense, while the ground floor had only two clothes cabinets and did not even have a bed.

She then asked Hsiao-yü, "What has become of that bed of my mistress's? Why do I not see it?"

"When the Third Lady remarried," said Hsiao-yü, "she took it with her."

Yüeh-niang then came forward to explain the situation, saying, "When Father was still alive, he took that bed with retractable steps that the Third Lady had brought with her as part of her dowry and gave it to Hsi-men Ta-chieh when she married into the Ch'en family. Later, when the Third Lady remarried, I let her have your mistress's bed to take with her."

"I have heard," said Ch'un-mei, "that when you learned of Hsi-men Ta-chieh's death, you had that bed brought back to your place."

"As for that bed," said Yüeh-niang, "I was short of money and sold it for a mere eight taels of silver, which I had to spend on the lictors from the district yamen."

Upon hearing this, Ch'un-mei nodded her head and could not prevent her starry eyes from feeling sour.

From her mouth no word was uttered, but
In her heart she thought to herself,
"It was the disposition of my mistress to:
Contend for supremacy without conceding defeat, and she made a point of urging her husband to buy that bed for her. I had really hoped that I might be able to acquire this bed of hers as a souvenir, but it has unexpectedly fallen into someone else's hands."

Unable to control her distress, she asked Yüeh-niang, "What has become of that inlaid mother-of pearl bed of the Sixth Lady's?"

"It's a long story," responded Yüeh-niang. "Ever since my husband passed away, every day:
There are merely expenditures,
Without any sources of income.
As the saying goes:
If a family lacks a means of subsistence,
Even bushels of gold will not sustain it.
Being short of money, I had it taken away to be sold."

"How much did you sell it for?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"I only got thirty-five taels of silver for it," responded Yüeh-niang.

"It's too bad," remarked Ch'un-mei. "That bed, I remember Father's saying, originally cost more than sixty taels of silver; and now it has been sold for so much less. If I had only known that you were getting rid of it, I would have been willing to pay you thirty or forty taels of silver for it. I would have really liked to have it."

"My good Sister," said Yüeh-niang, "no matter how proficient people may be:
They cannot foresee future developments."

When they had sighed over this for what seemed like half a day, whom should they see but the servant Chou Jen from Chou Hsiu's household, who came to fetch Ch'un-mei, saying, "Mistress, His Honor would like you to return home as soon as possible. Your son has been crying after you."

Ch'un-mei promptly agreed to return to the rear compound, and Yüeh-niang ordered Hsiao-yü to lock the garden gate, after which she accompanied her back to the parlor in the master suite, where already:
Screens displayed their peacocks' tails,
Curtains showed off their mermaid silks, a feast had been laid out, and two singing girls stood by, with their silver psalteries and balloon guitars, to play and sing for the company. Yüeh-niang proceeded to serve the wine and preside over the feast, but there is no need to describe this in detail.

Ch'un-mei was ushered to the seat of honor but refused to occupy it by herself, insisting that Sister-in-law Wu share it with her. Yüeh-niang took her place as hostess and served the wine, as soup and rice, along with other delicacies, were laid before them, and Ch'un-mei directed her servant Chou Jen to reward the chef with three mace of silver. Words are inadequate to describe the scene:
Platters are piled with exotic viands,
And wine overflows with golden ripples.
Thereupon, what with:
The raising of glasses and passing of cups,
they continued drinking until the sun was about to set.

What should they see at this juncture but another servant from Chou Hsiu's household, who came with a lantern to escort Ch'un-mei on her way home. Yüeh-niang, however, would not let her go and ordered the two singing girls to kneel before her and play their instruments and sing, as a means of encouraging her to continue drinking.

"Select a good song," she told them, "with which to show your respect for Mistress Chou."

She also had Hsiao-yü pour out a large goblet of wine and place it before her.

Urging Ch'un-mei to drink, she said, "Sister, choose one of your favorite songs, and have the two of them perform it for you as you enjoy your wine."

"My Lady, responded Ch'un-mei, "I ought not to drink any more. I fear that my child is crying for me at home."

"Even if your little boy may be crying for you," said Yüeh-niang, "after all, his wet nurses are at hand to look after him. It's early enough yet, and I know you've got no mean capacity for drink."

Ch'un-mei then asked the two singing girls, "What are your names, and whose establishments are you from?"

The two of them knelt down before her and said, "One of us is the younger sister of Han Chin-ch'uan and is named Han Yü-ch'uan; while the other is the niece of Cheng Ai-hsiang and is named Cheng Chiao-erh."

"Can you sing any songs to the tune "Reluctant to Paint Her Eyebrows?" asked Ch'un-mei.

"If Mistress would like us to," responded Han Yü-ch'uan, "we can both do so."

"Since the two of you can sing what she has requested," said Yüeh-niang, "let us pour out some more wine for Mistress Chou to enjoy as the two of you sing for her."

Hsiao-yü, who was standing to one side, promptly poured out more wine, while the two singing girls, one of them playing the psaltery, and the other the balloon guitar, proceeded to sing:
My lover, when can I ever cease to care for you?
Having endured the spring, it has now come to autumn.
Who is there who understands what is in my heart?
Heaven!
You have caused me to become thin and emaciated.
Upon hearing anything of you, my two eyes shed tears.
Ever since the beginning, we have shared our desires.
Who would have thought you could heartlessly abandon me?

When Ch'un-mei had drunk her wine, Yüeh-niang told Cheng Chiao-erh to pour another cup for her, at which Ch'un-mei said, "Venerable Lady, you must keep me company with another cup for yourself."

Thereupon, both of their cups were filled to the brim, and the two singing girls then continued to sing:
My lover, all on your account I am losing my allure.
Magpies are crying before the eaves,[3]
unwilling to stop.
There is no call for the deadly tone of their lively cries.
Heaven!
Nevertheless, they serve to stir up my dormant feelings;
Causing such desolation that my
two eyes shed tears.
Ever since he elected to go his way,[4]
I can't forget him.
Who would have thought you could betray my love and abandon me?

"My Lady," said Ch'un-mei, "you should get your sister-in-law to drink a cup of wine."

"My sister-in-law is not much of a drinker," responded Yüeh-niang. "But I'll have her down a small cup to keep you company."

She then said to Hsiao-yü, "Pour out a small cup of wine for my sister-in-law."

The two singing girls then continued to sing:
My lover, on your account I am suffering from a bout of depression.
I long for you as I sit, yearn for you as I walk, and sorrow both day and night.
My fragrant flesh has become emaciated,[5] and my geniality has declined.
Heaven!
I long to see you, but I am unable to do so,
Which causes me such grief that my
two eyes shed tears.

Originally we were inseparably attached to each other.
Who would have thought that this time
you could abandon me?
At this juncture, Ch'un-mei saw that Hsiao-yü was standing in front of her, and proceeded to pour out a large cup of wine for her to drink.
"Sister," remarked Yüeh-niang, "she can't handle it."
"My Lady," responded Ch'un-mei, "she can handle two or three cups. Have I not enjoyed drinking with her when I was a member of your household?"
Thereupon, having poured out the wine, she urged Hsiao-yü to drink it. The two singing girls then continued to sing:
My lover, on your account I am suffering from idle grief.
As I lie on the pillow of my sickbed,
it never seems to end.
With a breastful of sorrow, I cannot help puckering my eyebrows.
Heaven!
Though I try to forget, my memories always return.
Upon the sides of my cheeks, my two eyes shed tears.
Originally the two of us were indivisibly united.
Who would have thought that for over a year
you would opt to abandon me?
Gentle reader, take note: At this juncture, why did Ch'un-mei choose to have the singing girls perform this particular set of songs? For some time she had been preoccupied by the thought of Ch'en Ching-chi, who was still at large, so that:
There was no way for them to get together.[6]
The seeds of passion and sprouts of ardor,
Inevitably have an effect on the feelings,
And are commonly given melodic expression.
She had also observed that the two singing girls performed sweetly and cleverly and was:
Delighted in her heart, by the way they waited upon her assiduously, addressing her as "Mistress this," and "Mistress that."
She therefore summoned her servant Chou Jen and had him take out a pair of gift packets containing two mace of silver apiece and awarded one to each of them. The two singing girls responded by putting aside their musical instruments, and kowtowing to her:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder,
in order to express their gratitude for her largess.
In a little while, Ch'un-mei got up to leave, and Yüeh-niang was unable to persuade her to stay any longer. Accompanied by her attendants, bearing lanterns, she said good-bye, went out the gate, and got into her large sedan chair. The servants' wives who had come with her also got into their smaller sedan chairs, and they went their way, with four lanterns in front and behind them, and with soldiers shouting to clear the way. Truly:
When fortune comes, even the crudest iron looks shiny;
When luck departs, even the brightest gold lacks luster.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
Daubing her lips with crimson rouge, she flaunts her jadelike beauty;
Like the phoenix flying down in response to the playing of the flute.
In front of the hall the speckled bamboo blinds are rolled up high;
Revealing the swallows as they return to reoccupy their former nests.
To resume our story, after coming home from her visit to Wu Yüeh-niang's residence, Ch'un-mei longed to see Ch'en Ching-chi but did not know where he had gone. All day long she took to her bed and was not in the best of moods.
Upon finding out what was bothering her, the commandant said, "I imagine you must be worrying that your cousin:
Has not been able to find a place for himself."[7]
He then called in Chang Sheng and Li An and admonished them, saying, "I entrusted you some time ago with the task of locating the whereabouts of your mistress's cousin. Why have you failed to exert yourselves in order to find him?"
"We went looking for him all over the place some time ago," the two of them responded, "but were unable to find him. We have already reported this to our mistress."
"I will set you a time limit of five days," the commandant said. "If you fail to locate him during that period, you will have to answer for it."
Chang Sheng and Li An, upon receiving this command, wore worried expressions as they proceeded conscientiously to:
Reconnoiter the streets and explore the alleys,[8] looking everywhere for him. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.
To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi had been beaten and let go from the commandant's yamen, he intended to return to the Yen-kung Temple, but someone told him, "Your master Abbot Jen, upon hearing that you had been sleeping with a prostitute and had been beaten up and taken to the commandant's yamen, went to check the contents of his strongbox and found it to be empty, which gave him such a shock that, later that night, he passed away. If you have the nerve to venture into the temple, his disciples are likely to kill you."
Ch'en Ching-chi was frightened by this and did not dare to enter the temple. He also did not have the face to go once again to appeal to the elderly Layman of Apricot Village, Wang Hsüan. By day, he drifted about scrounging for whatever he could pick up, and at night, he sought refuge in a homeless shelter.
One day, it was one of those occasions when:
Something was destined to happen.
Ch'en Ching-chi was standing in the street when he caught sight of the Iron Fingernail, Yang the Elder. He was wearing a new silk cap on his head, a white satin jacket on his torso over an undergown of jet-black damask, aloeswood-colored stockings, and a pair of shiny white loafers, and was riding on a donkey with ornate silver trim on the saddle and bridle, as he came down the street, with a page boy in attendance.
Perceiving that it was Yang Kuang-yen, Ch'en Ching-chi stepped forward, took hold of the donkey's bit with his hand, and addressed him, saying, "Brother Yang the Elder, it is some time since we have seen each other. The two of us were friends and went down river together to purchase piece goods for our business. But, while our boat was docked at Ch'ing-chiang P'u, I made a side trip to Yen-chou prefecture to visit a relative and was entrapped and taken to court. But you did not wait for me to return and absconded to who knows where with half a boatload of my goods. When I went to your house to ask after you, with the best of intentions, your younger brother Yang Erh-feng scratched open the skin on his head with a shard of tile and chased me all the way home, where he pounded on my gate. As a result, today, I have been reduced to the point of being:
As poor as though I have been utterly cleaned out, while you are able to swagger about and show off your wealth."
When Yang the Elder saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had been reduced to beggary, he laughed disdainfully, saying, "It's just my luck on this occasion to venture outside only to encounter a pestilential ghost. You lousy death-defying starveling of a beggar! Where on earth would the likes of you get half a boatload of goods for me to abscond with? If you don't let go of the bit, I'll subject you to a good whipping with my riding crop."
"At present," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "I am impoverished, while you are loaded with silver. Give me something to sustain me or I will take you to court."
When Yang the Elder saw that he would not let go of the bit, he jumped off his donkey and gave him a few strokes with his whip, while shouting to his page boy, "Drag this death-defying beggar aside for me."
The page boy, exerting all his strength, managed to push Ch'en Ching-chi onto the ground, whereupon, Yang the Elder stepped up and gave him a number of kicks with his foot, until he started to howl outlandishly. In no time at all, they were surrounded by a crowd of onlookers. At this point, a man emerged from the sidelines, who wore a high hat on his head, held in place with a kerchief, and was carelessly draped in a purple jacket, over a white cotton tunic. His two bare feet were clad in rush sandals. He had sunken eyes, broomlike eyebrows, an oversized mouth, and a three-pointed beard. His countenance was adorned with:
Bulging lumps of purple flesh;
while his wrists were lined with:
Swollen rows of blood vessels;
and he was stupefied with drink.
Raising his fists, he approached Yang the Elder and berated him, saying, "Brother, how can you be so unreasonable? He is only an impoverished youngster, so why are you bent on beating him this way? It has always been true that:
An angry fist does not strike a smiling face.
Moreover, he has done nothing to offend you. If you have the means to do so, give him something, out of consideration for your past relationship. If you lack the means, so be it. But there is no reason for you to continue beating him. It has always been true that:
When an injustice is witnessed on the road,
Someone will always try to shed light on it."
"You don't understand," responded Yang the Elder. "He falsely accuses me of absconding with half a boatload of his property. It is obvious that no one as impoverished as he is could have had half a boatload of property to begin with."
"I imagine," opined his interlocutor, "that he may originally have been the scion of a well-to-do family, who has since suffered the misfortune of becoming thus impoverished. Since you, Sir, are such a rich gentleman, I hope that you will comply with my request. If you have the means of doing so, give him something with which to support himself."
When Yang the Elder had heard him out, he actually unfastened the handkerchief in his sleeve, which contained an ingot worth four or five mace of silver, and handed it to Ch'en Ching-chi; after which he raised his hand in farewell to his interlocutor, mounted his donkey, and went nonchalantly on his way.
When Ch'en Ching-chi scrambled to his feet and looked at the man in question, he saw that he was not a stranger, but was the beggar boss, known as the Flying Demon, Hou Lin, who was currently the foreman of a gang of construction workers, and with whom he had formerly shared a bed when he was living in the homeless shelter. At present, he was in charge of a gang of fifty workers, who were engaged in repair work on the sanctuary of the Buddhist monastery outside the south wall of the city known as the Shui-yüeh Ssu, or Water Moon Monastery, presided over by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh.
Taking Ch'en Ching-chi by the hand, Hou Lin addressed him, saying, "Brother, had it not been for the few words of protest I confronted him with, he would hardly have come up with those five mace of silver for you. Louse that he is, at least he knew when to concede. If he had refused to concede, for better or for worse, I would have given him a drubbing with my fists. Come along with me. Let's go to a wine shop and have a drink."
They then made their way to a small meat-eating wine shop, sat down at a table, and ordered the waiter to bring them four dishes to go with their drinks, and two large flagons of wine. Before long, after the waiter had wiped their table clean, he laid out a selection of appetizers on four platters and four saucers, and two large jugs of the olive wine that was in vogue at the time. They were not provided with small cups but with large porcelain goblets.
Hou Lin then turned to Ch'en Ching-chi and asked, "Brother, would you rather eat noodles or rice?"
"The noodles are boiled in hot water," explained the waiter, "and the rice is polished white rice."
"I'll take the noodles," said Ch'en Ching-chi.
Before long, enough boiled noodles to fill two or three bowls were placed on the table. Hou Lin ate only one bowl of them, and Ch'en Ching-chi ate the other two. Only after that did they begin to drink the wine.
"Brother," said Hou Lin to Ch'en Ching-chi, "today you can come with me and spend the night at the establishment where I am staying; and tomorrow I'll take you south of the city to the Water Moon Monastery, presided over by Abbot Hsiao-yüeh. Repairs are under way there to the sanctuary and the two corridors of residence halls, and I am in charge of the fifty workers employed on the project. If you come there, you will not be given any heavy work to do, but merely put to carrying a few baskets of soil. You will be counted as one of the workers and will earn four candareens of silver per day. I can rent space in a side building outside the monastery where the two of us can sleep at night and prepare food for ourselves. I will entrust the lock to you and put you in charge of the place. How would that be? It would surely be better than having to reside in the homeless shelter while ringing your bell and sounding your clapper in place of that beggar of a night watchman, and it would be more respectable to boot."
"If my brother is prepared to show such favor to me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "I will be happy to accept. But I don't know how long this construction project is likely to last."
"It has only been going on for a month so far," responded Hou Lin, "and it may go on until the tenth month, or later, for all I know."
As the two of them talked together, what with:
First a cup for you,
Then a cup for me,
they managed to finish off the two large jugs of wine. The waiter calculated the bill to be one mace and three and a half candareens.
Ch'en Ching-chi offered to pay the tab and produced his ingot of silver to be weighed, but Hou Lin pushed it aside, saying, "You silly younger brother! Do you think I would let you pay for it? I've got the silver for it right here."
So saying, he pulled out his wallet and weighed out one mace and five candareens of silver for the manager, receiving one and a half candareens in change, which he tucked into his sleeve. He then leaned on Ch'en Ching-chi's shoulder as they made their way to the place where he was staying, and they spent the night together.
The two of them were both drunk, and during the night, Hou Lin enjoyed plucking the flower in Ch'en Ching-chi's rear courtyard all night long, exclaiming, "Dear brother! Dear daddy! Dear man! Dear father!" There were no endearments they did not lavish on each other.
Early the next morning, as he had promised, Hou Lin rented half of a side building outside the Water Moon Monastery south of the city, which was supplied with a heated k'ang and a wood-burning stove. He also bought all the cups, bowls, and other utensils that were needed. Later that morning, they reported for roll call at the construction site.
When the other workers saw that Ch'en Ching-chi was no more than twenty-three or twenty-four years old, and that he had a white face and was:
Bright-eyed and clean-cut, they realized that he was a catamite of Hou Lin's and teased him outrageously.
One of them asked him, "Youngster, what is your name?"
Ch'en Ching-chi responded, "My name is Ch'en Ching-chi."

"If your name is Ch'en Ching-chi," the worker continued, "I guess you are accustomed to being squeezed into."[9]
Another worker remarked, "As young as you are, even if you go in for such things, it's a wonder you can accommodate a pole of that size."
Hou Lin responded to this by shouting at them to leave him alone, saying, "You crazy beggars, what are you teasing him for?"
He then proceeded to distribute spades and shovels, baskets and carrying poles, to the assembled workers, who went about their respective tasks; some of them carrying earth, some of them mixing mortar, and others working on the foundations.
It so happens that Abbot Hsiao-yüeh had appointed a Buddhist follower known as Yeh the Ascetic as the chef in charge of cooking food for the workers on the construction project. This Yeh the Ascetic was about fifty years old and was blind in one eye. He was dressed in a long black gown, his feet were bare, and he wore a ragged woolen sash around his waist. He was incapable of reading the scriptures but was given to reciting the Buddha's name and was good at the physiognomic techniques of the Hemp-robed Master.[10] People referred to him as Adept Yeh.
One day, after their morning work was finished, and the laborers had eaten their lunch, they were sitting, standing, or squatting about at their leisure, when they saw Ch'en Ching-chi come up and ask Yeh the Ascetic for some tea, to which he merely responded by looking him over from top to toe.
"Adept Yeh," one of the workers said to him, "this youngster is a newcomer. Why don't you physiognomize him?"
"Go ahead and physiognomize him," another said. "He looks like a catamite to me."
"I'd say he looks more like a hermaphrodite," said another.
Yeh the Ascetic asked him to step forward and looked him over for a while before saying:
"Your demeanor, I fear, is too tender,
as well as seductive;
Your seductive voice and tender nature
may prove your undoing.
If your demeanor is tender in old age
it invites trouble;
If your demeanor is tender when young it will not endure.[11]
You are bound to suffer because of the tenderness of your demeanor, though during your whole life it will prove attractive to women.
Throughout your eighth, eighteenth, and twenty-eighth years,
It will show from the bridge of your nose to the top of your hair.
Whether you make a living or not, you will lose at both ends;
At thirty, you can't allow evil forces to besiege your brow.[12]
Your glance may be captivating and your brain be quick-witted;
You may attract people, though ignorant of poetry and history.
Whatever you do, other people may find you to be charming,
Since the falsehoods you manipulate are made to seem true.[13]
Don't take offense at what I say, but during your entire life:
Your quick-wittedness and artfulness, will induce women to help you succeed. How old are you this year?"
"I am twenty-three years old," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.
"It is amazing that you survived the events of the year before last," said Adept Yeh. "The fact is that:
If the room between your eyebrows is too narrow,
Your progeny will perish and your wife will die;
If the facial area under your earlobes is murky,
Your kinfolk will die and your household perish.[14]
If your lips do not cover your teeth,[15]
You will always provoke altercations.
If your nose looks like a stove-door,
Your family wealth will be dispersed.[16]
During that year did you experience:
The verbal interchanges of a trial; and
The loss of your family and wealth?"
"I experienced all those things," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.
"There is another thing," said Yeh the Ascetic. "The bridge of your nose ought not to be abbreviated. The Hemp-robed Master has two lines that state it very well:
If the bridge of your nose is abbreviated you will soon be wiped out;
The wealth of your ancestors will be lost and your family destroyed.[17]
During your early years, no matter how much wealth you inherited from your ancestors, once it came into your hands, you managed to squander it all.
If the upper segment of your face is short and the lower segment long,[18] it portends that you will have:
Many successes and many failures;[19] and that you may spend all your money, and yet get it back.
But in the end:
Though you may manage to find a means of supporting yourself;
It will end up like ice and frost when exposed to the hot sun.[20]
Be so good as to take a couple of steps for me to see."
Ch'en Ching-chi took a couple of steps, as requested.
Yeh the Ascetic then went on to pronounce:
"If your head extends in front of your feet,
It portends that you may start out well but end up impoverished.[21]
If your heels don't come down on the ground,
You may have to sell off your property and move to another place;[22] since, during your lifetime, you have:
Failed to preserve your ancestral property.
In the future, you may be fated to have three wives. Have you already suffered the loss of a wife, or not?"
"I have already lost a wife," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.
"You may still be fated to have three wives," said Yeh the Ascetic. "After all:
Your face is as radiant as a peach blossom.
But you may have difficulty siring a son, since you are so:
Engrossed by the pleasures of wine and sex.[23]
I fear, however, that there may be:
Misfortune lurking amidst your good fortune.
In their thirties, young men begin to lose their stamina and ought not to venture too often into the world of flowers and willows, but endeavor to moderate their desires."
At this juncture, one of the workers interrupted him, saying, "Adept Yeh, you've got it all wrong. He is already playing the role of a wife to someone himself. What would he do with three wives?"
This had the effect of causing the rest of the company to fall all of a heap with laughter.
They then heard Abbot Hsiao-yüeh sounding his clapper, and the lot of them picked up their spades, shovels, baskets, and carrying poles and went back to work.
Under these conditions, Ch'en Ching-chi continued to work at the Water Moon Monastery for a month or so.
One day, during the middle decade of the third month, Ch'en Ching-chi, along with his fellow workers, had carried up a load of earth and was squatting at the foot of the wall by the door of the monastery, sunning himself, and picking the lice off his body, when he happened to see a man who was wearing a flat-topped cap, held in place with a hammered gold ring that floated at the back of his skull, who was dressed in a close-fitting black gown and a purple cummerbund over the belt around his waist, and whose feet were clad in long-legged boots. He rode astride a brown horse and carried a basket of fresh flowers in his hands.
Upon catching sight of Ch'en Ching-chi, he abruptly jumped off his horse, came forward, and made a deep obeisance, saying, "Uncle Ch'en, we have been searching everywhere for you without success, and it turns out that you are here."
This gave Ch'en Ching-chi quite a start, and he promptly bowed in return, saying, "Brother, where have you come from?"
"I am Chang Sheng," he responded, "a servant in the household of His Honor Chou Hsiu. Ever since he released you from the legal difficulties you were in and let you go, my mistress has not been feeling well, right up until the present time. His Honor sent me out to look everywhere for you, but I had no idea you were here. Had my mistress not sent me, this morning, to go to their country estate outside the city and bring her these herbaceous peonies, so that I had occasion to come by here, I would never have discovered your whereabouts. In the first place, this is an instance of your good fortune, venerable sir; and in the second place, it is lucky for me too. There is no reason for you to hesitate. Just get on my horse, and I will escort you to the commandant's residence."
When the crowd of workers observed this, they could only gaze at each other in astonishment, not venturing to utter a word. Ch'en Ching-chi, thereupon, handed the key to the room they had been sharing to Hou Lin, mounted the horse, and set out for the commandant's residence, with Chang Sheng following closely behind him. Truly:
When one's lover achieves his desires while in the prime of his youth;
There is no knowing where he will enjoy the bright moon on this night.[24]
A poem testifies to this:

White jade is concealed within coarse rock;
Yellow gold is buried beneath filthy mud.
The day a prestigious person picks one up;
Is like a ladder going to the heavenly gates.

It was the twenty-first day of the first month. Chunmei spoke to her husband and prepared a table of food, four kinds of fruits, and a jar of wine, and sent the servant Zhou Ren with them to Wu Yueniang. It was now two years since Ximen Qing had died, and this was the anniversary of his death; it was also Xiaoge's birthday.
Yueniang accepted the presents and gave the messenger a handkerchief and three qian of silver. Then she told Daian to put on his black gown and take a card to Chunmei. On the card was written this message: "To the most virtuous Lady Zhou. Heartfelt thanks for your most precious gifts. Now I have made ready wine and await the honor of your presence. I hope for the coming of your exalted carriage and shall be grateful for the honor of your visit. Wu, the widow of the late Ximen, kowtows."
It was about midday when Chunmei came to see Yueniang. She was wearing many pearls, and her ornaments were those of the golden phoenix. Her gown was broad-sleeved with a unicorn embroidered on it, and her skirt had the design of the hundred flowers. There was a golden buckle on her girdle. Her sedan chair was carried by four men. It had a black silk cover with golden ornaments. Before it soldiers with staves marched to clear the way, and servants carrying dressing cases came after it. There were two small sedan chairs immediately behind for her maids.
Yueniang had invited Aunt Wu. She had also sent for two singing girls. When Chunmei arrived, Yueniang, dressed in mourning, and Aunt Wu went to receive the guest in the outer hall. Yueniang was wearing a five-arched hat and very few ornaments. Her gown was of white silk, and her skirt of light blue. The sedan chair was carried to the second door, and there Chunmei got out and the crowd of servants followed her. When they went into the hall, Chunmei hastily knelt down and kowtowed to Yueniang. Yueniang made reverence in return.
"Lately," she said, "I have given you much trouble. Yet you would not accept the silk and, today, you have sent me valuable presents. I find it hard to express my gratitude."
"I am only sorry that my husband has nothing better than these trifles to offer," Chunmei said. "I have been intending to send you an invitation for some time, but I have not been able to do so because my husband is so often away on duty."

"Sister," Yueniang said, "when is your birthday? I hope to come and see you with a few presents."
"It is the twenty-fifth of the fourth month," Chunmei said.
"I will come to see you on that day," Yueniang said.
Then Chunmei made a reverence to Aunt Wu, and Aunt Wu returned it formally.
"Aunt Wu," Chunmei said, "you should not do that. You should stand and allow me to make reverence to you." But Aunt Wu would not agree, and finally they contented themselves with half the usual ceremonial. Then they sat down. Yueniang and Aunt Wu sat together in the host's place. Then the maids, the nurse, and the serving woman came to see Chunmei. Ruyi'er was carrying Xiaoge.
"My son," Yueniang said, "this is your sister. She has come to wish you many happy returns of the day."
Xiaoge seemed inclined to get down and bow to Chunmei. "You are a good boy!" Yueniang said to him, "bowing like that instead of kowtowing as you should."
Chunmei took a silk handkerchief and a set of gold ornaments from her sleeve and put them on the child's cap. "Sister," Yueniang said, "why should you give him such presents?"
Then Xiaoyu and the nurse kowtowed to Chunmei. She gave Xiaoyu a pair of pins with gold heads, and Ruyi'er a pair of silver flowers.
"Sister," Yueniang said, "I don't believe you know that Ruyi'er is now married to Laixing. His first wife died."
"She is a good woman," Chunmei said, "since she is ready to stay in this household always."
A maid brought tea. After it Yueniang said: "Sister, shall we go to the back room? It is cold here." Then Chunmei went to the room where Ximen Qing's tablet was. There were candles lighted before it. Food was set out, and Chunmei offered it. Then she burned paper offerings and shed a few tears. A screen was brought in and coal put on the fire. A large square table was set, and tea was brought with delicious cakes and rare fruits. The tea was of the scarcest kind. After tea, they asked Chunmei to go and change her clothes in the upper room. She took off her long cloak: her woman opened the box and put on her a dress of embroidered silk with a skirt the color of a purple clove. Then they all sat down in Yueniang's room.
"How is your baby?" Yueniang said. "Why didn't you bring him?"
"I should have brought him to kowtow to you," Chunmei said, "but his father said it was too cold and the boy might get a chill. He has gone to the great hall because he doesn't care for the rooms. I don't know what is the matter with him, but he has been crying a great deal the last few days."
"When you go out, does he often want you?"
"Yes, but there are two nurses to look after him."
"His Lordship is not a young man now, and he must be pleased you have borne him a son. He is your lucky star. I understand the Second Lady has a girl. How old is she?"
"The Second Lady's child is four years old," Chunmei said. "She is called Yujie, and my boy is called Jin'ge."
"I understand that his Lordship has two girls," Yueniang said.
"Two of our maids are learning music," Chunmei said. "They are both seventeen years old and very troublesome."
"Does his Lordship go to them very often?"
"He has hardly any time at home," Chunmei said. "He is nearly always on duty. There are so many thieves and bandits about nowadays. By his Majesty's command, he has to occupy himself with all sorts of matters. He is responsible for the charge of the district; he has to keep watch upon the river; to search out the bandits, and to keep the troops well disciplined. Yes, he has to spend a great deal of his time away."
Xiaoyu brought more tea. Chunmei said to Yueniang: "Lady, will you take me to the garden, where my mistress used to live?"
"Sister," Yueniang said, "you can hardly call it a garden now. Since my husband's death, nobody has bothered about it. It has gone to rack and ruin. The artificial mound has fallen in; the trees have died. I seldom go there now."
"Never mind," Chunmei said. "I only want to see the place where my mistress lived."
Yueniang could not refuse. She told Xiaoyu to find the garden key. Then she and Aunt Wu took Chunmei there. Chunmei went first to the Sixth Lady's room. There were a number of broken tables and chairs upstairs. Downstairs, all the rooms were locked. Grass was growing on the floors. Then she came to the place that had been Pan Jinlian's. The store for medicine and incense was still upstairs. In the room that Jinlian herself had occupied, there were only two cabinets, no bed.
"Where is my mother's bed?" Chunmei said. "I don't see it."
"The Third Lady took it away with her when she married." Xiaoyu said.
"When my husband was alive," Yueniang said, "he gave Meng Yulou's bed to my daughter, so when she remarried, I gave her your mistress's bed."
"But didn't you get the bed back when your daughter died?" Chunmei said.
"I sold it for eight taels of silver and gave the money to the officials at the Town Hall."
Chunmei nodded. Tears fell from her bright eyes. She remembered how, when Jinlian was alive, she always tried to have something that others did not have. "She asked my father to buy her that bed," she said to herself, "and I should have liked to have it to remember her by. Now somebody else has taken it." She was very sad.
"What has happened to the mother-of-pearl bed the Sixth Lady used to have?" she said to Yueniang.
"It is a long story. Ever since your master died, I have been spending money all the time, but no money comes in. As the proverb says: If we cannot make both ends meet, it is no good having gold lying about. I was pressed for money and I sold that bed."
"How much did you get for it?"
"I only got thirty-five taels," Yueniang said.
"What a pity. I remember Father saying it was worth sixty. If I had known you wished to sell it, I would have given forty myself."
"But it never occurred to me that you would like to have it," Yueniang said. They both sighed.
Then a servant came and said to Chunmei: "His Lordship asks you to go back early as the young master is crying for you."
Chunmei went back at once to the inner court, and Yueniang ordered Xiaoyu to lock the garden gate. When they returned to the upper room, they set the screen in position, pulled down the blinds, and wine and food were brought. The singing girls began to play the lute and sing. Yueniang offered wine and asked Chunmei to take the place of honor. Chunmei would only do so on condition that Aunt Wu sat with her. The two ladies sat down, and Yueniang took the host's place. After the wine had been offered, more food was brought in. Chunmei told her servant, Zhou Ren, to give the cook three qian of silver. It was an excellent meal, and they encouraged one another to drink.
About sunset, Major Zhou sent servants with lanterns to escort his wife home. Yueniang would not let her go but ordered the two singing girls to sing again. "You must sing your very best songs for Lady Zhou," she said. Then she ordered Xiaoyu to fill a large cup with wine and set it before Chunmei.
"Sister," she said, "bid the singers sing your favorite song and then drink this wine."
"Indeed, I cannot drink any more," Chunmei said, "and I am anxious about my baby."
"You have nurses to look after him, and it is still quite early," Yueniang said. "Besides, I know that you can drink."
Chunmei asked the singing girls their names and where they came from. They knelt down. One said she was Han Yuchuan, the younger sister of Han Jinchuan, and the other that she was Zheng Jiao'er, Zheng Aixiang's niece. Chunmei asked them if they could sing "Languidly I Paint My Brows." Yuchuan said they knew it.
Yueniang offered wine to Chunmei before they began. Then the two singing girls, one with a lute, the other with a zither, sang.
When shall I cease to love you?
Spring is gone and Autumn is here
Who knows my heart?
Heaven sends me sadness. I grow thin.
I wept when I had news of you
The past is always in my mind
I never thought you would so cruelly desert me.
Chunmei drank her wine, and Yueniang told Zheng Jiao'er to pour another cup for her.
"Lady," Chunmei said, "you must drink with me." Their cups were filled, and the singers began another song.
For you, my lover, I cast happiness aside.
Now the magpies chatter in the courtyard
Their voice is sad, and yet they have no cause.
It must be that Heaven
Has made me love you always.
You have gone away, but I never forget.
I never thought you would so cruelly desert me.
"Lady," Chunmei said, "you must ask Aunt Wu to drink a cup."
"Aunt Wu is not a great drinker," Yueniang said. "I will give her a small cup." She told Xiaoyu to set a small cup before Aunt Wu. Then the two singers went on with their song.
For you, my lover, I am become so sorrowful.
I think of you by night and day.
Sitting and walking.
My dainty skin is wasted, my softness become hard.
I am so lonely that my tears fall always.
Yet once we lived together and loved.
I never thought you would so cruelly desert me.
Xiaoyu was standing beside Chunmei, and Chunmei gave her a cup of wine.
"Sister," Yueniang said, "she cannot drink."
"Oh, she can drink one or two cups," Chunmei said. "When I lived here, I often drank with her." She gave the cup to the maid. The two singers continued their song.
For you, my lover, I have suffered griefs
I have been ill and lain for long upon my bed
The sadness in my heart has knit my brows.
You have forgotten me but I still think of you
The thought makes tears stream down my cheeks.
We said that we would be together forever.
I never thought that, after but one year,
You would so cruelly desert me.
Chunmei asked the singing girls to sing this song because she was thinking of Chen Jingji. She could not meet him, but he was always in her mind. For her, the songs expressed a secret sorrow. She was pleased that the singing girls addressed her as "Lady" and told Zhou Ren to give them each two qian of silver. The two girls put down their instruments and kowtowed to her.
Then she rose. Yueniang could not persuade her to stay longer and ordered a servant with a lantern to take her to the gate. Chunmei got into her sedan chair, and her maids into the smaller chairs. Before them and behind were four great lanterns, and an escort of soldiers followed.
Chunmei was anxious about Jingji. She did not know where he was. When she reached home, she went to bed at once in a bad mood. Her husband saw this, and decided she must be worrying because she did not know what had happened to her cousin. He sent for Zhang Sheng and Li An and said to them; "I have already told you to find my lady's cousin. Why haven't you done so?"
"We have looked," they said, "but we have not been able to find him. We told the lady so."
"I will give you five days," Major Zhou said. "If you have not found him by that time, you know what to expect."
The two men went all over the place, poking their noses everywhere, questioning people, and their faces became more and more gloomy.
When Jingji left the Major's court, he had intended to go back to the temple. But, when he was told of the Abbot's death, he did not dare. Neither did he dare to go and see old man Wang. So again he wandered about the streets by day and slept at night in the Beggars' Rest. One day when he was standing about the street, he saw Yang the Elder. Yang was wearing a new hat and a white silk gown. He rode on a donkey with a silver-mounted saddle, and a small boy followed him. They were coming down the middle of the street. Jingji recognized Yang at once. He went out and grasped the donkey's bridle.
"Brother Yang," he said, "I haven't seen you for a long time. After you stole my property at the river I went in quite a friendly way to ask at your place. But your brother, Yang the Second, broke his own head and ran after me all the way to my house. Now I am poor, and you are having a fine time."
Yang the Elder could see that Chen Jingji had become a beggar. He smiled haughtily. "This must be an unlucky day for me, that I should come to the street and meet a pestilential fellow like you. You are a beggar. Where could you get the money to buy goods? Do you say I stole your things? Keep your hands off my donkey, or I will use the whip on you."
"I am poor and you are rich," Jingji said. "I only ask you to give me something. If you don't, I shall take you to the proper place and the matter shall be thrashed out there."
Seeing that Jingji still held the donkey's bridle, Yang the Elder jumped off and thrashed Jingji with his whip. "Drive this beggar away," he cried to the small boy. The boy pushed at Jingji with all his might and the young man fell to the ground. Yang kicked him, and Jingji made as much noise as if he had been a devil. A crowd assembled. Among them was a man wearing a high black hat, a kerchief, a purple gown and a white vest. He had bare legs, and a pair of straw sandals on his feet. His eyes were sunken and his eyebrows broad and thick. His mouth seemed to curl upwards and he had three wisps of beard. His face was strong and red and the muscles stood out upon his arms. He had had wine to drink, and this had made his eyes seem fierce.
"Brother," he said to Yang the Elder, shaking his clenched fist, "you are unreasonable. Why should you beat a man so young and poor? You know the saying that a clenched fist should never smite a smiling face. This young man did nothing to provoke you. If you have any money, treat him as a friend and give him some. Why are you beating him? I don't think it is right, and I shall be on his side."
"You know nothing about it," Yang the Elder said. "He says I stole his property. How could a beggar like him have any property worth stealing?"
"I believe he was rich once," the man said. "He doesn't look to me as if he came from a poor family. And as for you, I very much doubt if you have been rich ail your life. Now listen to me. If you have any money with you, let him have some."
Yang brought out a handkerchief in which was a piece of silver worth about four or five qian. He gave it to Jingji and raised his hand in salute to the man. Then he mounted his donkey again and rode proudly away. Jingji got up. He saw that his savior was no other than a man he had known in the Beggars' Rest, a fellow called Flying Ghost. He was now acting as foreman to a gang of fifty men who were working at a temple south of the city, building some new rooms. This man took Jingji by the hand. "Brother," he said, "if I had not used strong language to that man, you would not have that silver. He knows when it is time to give way. If he had not done so, I should have let him taste my fists. Come with me and have some wine."
They went to a small wine house, sat down, and ordered two pots of wine and four dishes. The waiter set out the dishes and two pots of olive wine that, at that time, was greatly liked. They drank this wine in large bowls instead of small cups.
"Brother," the man said, "which will you have, noodles or rice?"
"Our noodles are freshly washed and our rice the finest white rice," the waiter said.
"I will have noodles," Jingji said, and noodles were brought. Jingji had two bowls and his friend one.
"Brother," the man said, "come with me to my place today, and tomorrow I will take you to see the Abbot of the temple where I am working. We are building some rooms and cottages there, and I have fifty men working under me. I will give you a very light job. You will only have to carry earth, and for that you shall have five fen a day. Then I will get a room and we will sleep there together. We can cook our own food and lock our door, and I will let you have all you need. That will be better than the Beggars' Rest, and going around with the watchman. It will be much pleasanter for us to live together."

"You are very kind," Jingji said. "May I know if this work will last for long?"
"We only started a month ago, and I think we shall finish in the tenth month, but I am not sure."
They drank as they talked and finished two large pots of wine. The waiter brought them the bill. It was for one qian and three and a half fen. Jingji was going to pay, but Flying Ghost pushed his money aside.
"Do you think I would let you pay, you silly fellow?" he said. "I have money of my own." He brought out a handkerchief and gave the waiter one qian and five fen, taking back the change. Then he put his arm around Jingji and they went back to his place. That night they slept together. They were both drunk and behaved in an unseemly manner. Indeed they did so all night. Jingji called the man his brother, his sweetheart, his husband, and other attractive names. In the morning they went together to the temple. Here Flying Ghost, whose name was Hou Lin, rented a room with a fire and bought cups and bowls and other things that were necessary.
The workmen saw that Jingji was only about twenty-four or twenty-five. They noticed his white face and handsome appearance and realized that he was Hou's man. They made many jokes about him.
"Young man," one said, "what is your name?"
"I am called Chen Jingji."
"Well, Chen Jingji, you certainly live up to your name."[1]
And another said: "You are very young. How can you do such strenuous work? Are you sure that pole isn't too much for you?"
Then Hou came up. "You beggars," he said, "what do you mean by making fun of him?" He gave spades and shovels and baskets to the workmen, and they went to their tasks. Some carried earth, some mixed the mortar, some worked on the foundations.
One of the monks in the temple was called Ye. The Abbot had given him instructions to cook for all the workers. Ye was about fifty years old. He had only one eye. He wore a long black gown, and his feet were bare. There was a ragged girdle around his waist. He could not read the sacred scriptures, but he was very attentive to his devotions. He was a skillful fortune-teller.
One day, when the work was done and the workers had had their meal, they were all gathered together, some lying down, some squatting on their haunches. Ye looked hard at Chen Jingji.
"This young man is a newcomer," one of the men said to Ye, "why not tell his fortune?"
"In my opinion, he is half one thing and half another," one of them said.
The priest asked Jingji to go to him. "Too handsome and woman-like," he said. "A charming voice and a tender body are unpardonable. When an old man is like this, he will come upon hardship. When a young man is like it, he will not be stout and strong. You suffer from that smooth face of yours. All your life, you will be a woman's man. Eight, eighteen, and twenty-eight. With eight years, eighteen, and twenty-eight, from the root of your nose to the top of your hair, whether you have any means of livelihood or not, you get less at both ends, and at thirty you cannot have a blackness between your brows. Your eyes are very handsome, and your mind is clever. Even if you cannot read, you have charm enough without. Whatever you do, people like you. When you play a trick, it is taken for the truth. Forgive me for saying so, but you are very cunning and get much sport from women. How old are you?"
"I am twenty-four," Jingji said.
"I am surprised that you got past the year before last," the monk said. "Your brows are narrow, and your son and your wife both die. The hanging jade is very dark, and your family will be ruined. Your lips do not cover your teeth and you will have many troubles in your life. Your nostrils are like the hob of a furnace, and you will not be able to keep your property. Have you experienced any such misfortunes?"
"I have had them all," Jingji said.
"One thing I must tell you," the monk said, "that your nose is detached is not a good sign. As the great teacher Ma says, he whose mountain root is broken will waste all his substance in his youth. He will bring ruin to the property he has inherited from his ancestors, and no matter how much his father left to him, he will spend it all. Your upper half is short and the lower half long. This is a sign that you are sometimes successful and sometimes fail. You spend your money, and money comes to you again. But, in the end, you will not leave a family behind you; you will be as when the hot sun shines on the hoar frost. But there is one sign of luck for you in the future. You are to be married three times. Have you ever been married and, if so, is your wife dead?"
"Yes, she is dead," Jingji said.
"Well, three marriages are indicated for you," the monk said. "But there is trouble also. "When you are about thirty, you will suffer from the machinations of others. You must not visit the flowers and the willows."
Then one of the workmen said: "Father Ye, you have made a mistake. He is a wife himself at this very time. How can you say that he will have three wives?"
All the workers laughed. Then the Abbot gave the signal, and they all took their tools and went to work again.
Jingji stayed for about a month and worked there. One day, in the middle of the third month, Jingji, who had been carrying earth, leaned against the temple wall and searched his body for vermin in the sun. A man who wore a swastika in his hat, a black gown with a purple lining, a girdle, and a pair of sandals, rode up on a brown horse. He was carrying a basket of fresh flowers. When he saw Jingji, he jumped off his horse at once and bowed low.
"Uncle Chen," he said, "I have been looking everywhere for you, and here you are."
Jingji, astonished, returned the greeting.
"Brother," he said, "who are you?"
"I'm Zhang Sheng, the servant of Major Zhou," the man said. "Since you left the court, my mistress's been ill all the time. My master ordered me to find you but it never occurred to me that you'd be here. And even now I'd not have seen you if my mistress hadn't told me to go to the country for these flowers. It's really a stroke of good luck for me. Don't waste a moment. Take my horse and go to my master's place." The workers stood and gazed. They did not speak. Jingji gave the keys to his friend Hou, mounted the horse, and rode quickly away.

Ch'en Ching-chi Plays a Role in the Commandant's Household; Auntie Hsüeh Peddles Trinkets & Proposes a Marriage Match & Chunmei Finds a Wife for Chen Jingji

In this world one has a role to play for three score years and ten;
What need is there both day and night to overtax one's spirits?
The affairs of this world in the end all eventuate in nothing;
The fleeting luxury that beguiles the eye is wont to prove unreal.
Poverty and want, wealth and distinction are allocated by Heaven;
Success and failure, flourishing and decay are but dust in a crack.
So why not let yourself go, enjoying pleasures as they come;
Rather than waiting for the messenger of death to seize you?

When Ch'en Ching-chi arrived at Commandant Chou Hsiu's headquarters and dismounted, Chang Sheng preceded him inside to report his presence to Ch'un-mei. Ch'un-mei ordered that Ch'en Ching-chi should be taken to a duty room in the front of the compound and given a bath in a tub of fragrant water, so that his body would be washed clean. She also sent one of the wet nurses to take out a bundle of new clothes, a pair of boots, and a cap for him to change into. Chang Sheng took the tattered old garments that he had been wearing, tied them up into a bundle, and hung it up in the duty room, before reporting back to Ch'un-mei. At the time, the commandant had not yet retired from the courtroom.
Ch'un-mei then invited Ch'en Ching-chi into the reception hall at the rear of the compound, where she adorned herself elegantly before coming out to greet him.
Upon entering the door, Ch'en Ching-chi went up to Ch'un-mei and set out to perform:
Four brace makes eight kowtows, saying, "Sister, pray accept my homage."
Ch'un-mei only allowed him to perform half an obeisance, after which, they sat down facing each other and proceeded to talk over the weather, and the events that had befallen them since they were separated, which led them both to:
Shed tears from their eyes.[2]
Ch'un-mei was concerned that the commandant might retire from the courtroom and come in upon them, so, seeing that there was nobody else about, she gave Ch'en Ching-chi a wink and whispered to him, saying, "In the future, if he should raise any questions about yourself, say that you are a younger cousin of mine. I am a year older than you at the age of twenty-five, and I was born at noon on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month."
"I understand," responded Ch'en Ching-chi.
Before long, a maidservant brought in a serving of tea, and the two of them drank it together.
Ch'un-mei then went on to ask, "Why did you ever give up lay life to become a Taoist monk? When you were allowed to go from the yamen here, the commandant did not know that you were related to me. He had you beaten in error and greatly regrets it. I would have detained you here at the time were it not that Sun Hsüeh-o, that worthless creature, was also working here, and it would not have been possible to accommodate you without her making trouble. That's why I let you go. Afterwards, I got rid of that worthless creature and sent Chang Sheng to look everywhere for you, but he couldn't find you. Who could have known that you were working as a laborer outside the city and had fallen into such miserable circumstances?"
"I will not deceive you, sister," said Ch'en Ching-chi:
"It's a long story.
After the two of us were separated, I planned to marry Sister Six, but my father died in the Eastern Capital, which delayed my return, so I was unable to marry her, and she was killed by Wu Sung. I heard that, out of the kindness of your heart, you had her buried on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity. I also visited her grave site and burned paper money there on her behalf. At home, my mother also passed away, and it was not long after I had taken care of her funeral that someone made off with my capital. Upon my return home, my wife Hsi-men Ta-chieh also died, and that whore, my mother-in-law, not only took me to court over it but also reclaimed all of my wife's belongings. After the lawsuit against me, I had to sell my house and was left:
As poor as though I had been utterly cleaned out.
Fortunately, an old friend of my father's, named Wang Hsüan, and known as the Layman of Apricot Hermitage, came to my rescue and escorted me to the Yen-kung Temple in Lin-ch'ing, where he arranged for me to become a Taoist acolyte. Unexpectedly, however, I was subsequently assaulted by a 'bare stick' and ended up being bound and transported to the commandant's yamen, where I was given ten strokes with the rod, and then released.
If I appeal to my relatives, they only ignore me;
If I appeal to my friends, they pay me no regard.
As a result, I ended up working as a day laborer at the Water Moon Monastery. I am profoundly indebted to my sister for caring enough to send your servant to look for me, with the result that I have been able to see you again.
Your kindness will be amply rewarded,
I will never dare to forget it."
As he related these pitiable events, the two of them both shed tears.
Whom should they see at this point but Commandant Chou Hsiu, who retired from the courtroom and came back to the rear compound. When his attendants lifted aside the portiere, and he entered the room, Ch'en Ching-chi came forward and knelt down before him.
This threw the commandant into such consternation that he promptly returned the salutation and said, "The other day, I did not know that you were a worthy young cousin of my wife, having been kept in the dark by my subordinates. I hope that you will forgive me for having treated you so offensively."
"Unworthy as I am," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "it is I who am at fault for having failed to keep in touch.
I can only hope that you will forgive me."[3]
So saying, he kowtowed once again.
The commandant helped him up with one hand and ushered him to the seat of honor. Ch'en Ching-chi, however, was sensitive enough to object to this and insisted on pulling the chair to one side before consenting to sit down on it. The commandant then assumed the role of host, and Ch'un-mei sat down facing their guest.
Before long, a new serving of tea was brought in, and when they had finished drinking it, Chou Hsiu asked, "Worthy cousin, how old are you? Why is it that I haven't met you before? And why did you leave lay life to become a Taoist acolyte?"
"I'm twenty-three," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "while my cousin is one year older than I am, and was born at noon on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month. A while ago, because both my father and mother passed away, my property became depleted, and my wife died, I left lay life to become a Taoist acolyte in the Yen-kung Temple. I did not know that my cousin had married into your household and have, consequently, been remiss in seeking her out."
"My worthy cousin," said the commandant, "ever since you were let go the other day, your cousin has worried about you, both by day and by night, and has been constantly upset, and given to:
Moaning and groaning, about it, right up until the present time. I have been sending men out to look for you for some time, but without success. Who could have anticipated that today we would get together? It is truly a case of:
An affinity extending to three lives."[4]
He then ordered his attendants to set up a table and provide them with wine. In no time at all, they laid out an assortment of cups and platters, containing chicken, pig's trotters, goose, and duck, which had been stir-fried, roasted, steamed, and deep-fried, along with soup and rice and other dainties, that filled the entire surface of the table.
Within silver flagons and jade goblets,
The wine overflows with golden ripples.
The commandant joined in their conversation and kept them company, feasting until the lanterns and candles were lighted that evening before breaking up.
The commandant ordered his servant Chou Jen to sweep out the library on the west side of the front courtyard, which was already furnished with a bed and bed curtains. Ch'un-mei then brought out two sets of bedding, complete with quilts and pillows, so that Ch'en Ching-chi would have a place to sleep; and also arranged for a page boy named Hsi-erh to wait on him. In addition, she supplied him with two more outfits of silk clothing, so that he would have something to change into when needed. Ch'un-mei also invited him to come into the residential compound for his meals every day. Truly:
At the time one meets with good fortune,
It owes nothing at all to one's efforts.[5]
Light and darkness alternate swiftly;
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.
Behold:
No sooner do the plum trees blossom
at winter's end,
Than one encounters New Year's day in the first month.
Before one is aware of the apricots filling the branches,
It is time for new lotus blossoms to adhere to the water.[6]
When Ch'en ching-chi had resided in the commandant's household for more than a month, the time came for Ch'un-mei's birthday on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month. Wu Yüeh-niang prepared an assortment of gifts for her, consisting of a tray of sweetmeats in the shape of birthday peaches, a tray of birthday noodles, two boiled geese, four fresh chickens, two trays of candied fruits, and a jar of southern wine. Tai-an, clad in black livery, delivered them. Commandant Chou Hsiu was sitting in the reception hall when the gate keeper came in to announce his arrival, and the gifts were carried inside. Tai-an handed over the note that accompanied the gifts and then got down on the ground and kowtowed.
When the commandant had read the note with its list of gifts, he said, "I am much obliged to your mistress for taking the trouble to send these presents."
He then told a servant, "Take these gifts inside, and bring out a serving of tea for this gentleman."
He also handed the gift card to a page boy, saying, "Deliver this to your uncle, and have him seal up a handkerchief and three mace of silver for this gentleman, and a hundred candareens for the bearer. Have him write a thank-you note as well to express our appreciation."

When he had finished speaking, Commandant Chou Hsiu donned his formal clothes and went out to make New Year's calls. Meanwhile, Tai-an waited in front of the reception hall for the return card.
What should he see at this juncture but a young man who was wearing a "tile-ridge" hat, a black silk Taoist robe, and sandals with white socks and came out through the postern gate, carrying the return card and gratuities in his hand, and gave them to the page boy, after which, he went straight back inside.
Strange as it may seem,
he looked just like son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi, and Tai-an thought to himself, "I wonder what he is doing here?"
The page boy then handed the handkerchief and the silver to Tai-an and saw him to the door.
When he got home and reported to Yüeh-niang, she saw that the return card read, "Respectfully indited with straightened skirts by the lady, née P'ang, of the Chou family," and asked him, "Did you not see your sister Ch'un-mei?"
"I did not see my sister," replied Tai-an, "but I did see our son-in-law."
"You crazy jailbird!" laughed Yüeh-niang. "How could we have such an elderly son-in-law? The commandant is far too advanced in years for you to refer to him as our son-in-law."
"It was not the commandant I was referring to," responded Tai-an, "it was our son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi. When I first went in, His Honor Chou Hsiu was in the reception hall, and I handed him your card and kowtowed to him. He thanked me, saying, 'I have put your mistress to the trouble of sending these lavish gifts,' and then told a servant to bring me a serving of tea, and said to a page boy, 'Deliver this card to your uncle, and have him seal up a handkerchief and three mace of silver for this gentleman, and a hundred candareens for the bearer.' When he had finished speaking, His Honor Chou Hsiu put on his formal clothes and then set out on horseback to make New Year's calls. After I had waited for what seemed like half a day, the gentleman in question came out through the postern gate, handed the return card and gratuities to the page boy, and then went back inside, leaving me to take charge of the gift box and return home. If it wasn't him, who else could it have been?"
"You crazy little jailbird!" said Yüeh-niang. "Stop talking nonsense. Who knows where that stray lamb has ended up begging for his food? If he hasn't frozen to death, he has probably starved to death. Whatever would he be doing, for no good reason, in such a household? What would the commandant see in such a creature that would induce him to patronize him?"
"Mistress," said Tai-an, "would you like to make a bet with me about it? My identification of him is:
As certain as certain can be.
Even if he had been burned to ashes, I could identify his bones."
"How was he dressed?" asked Yüeh-niang.
Tai-an responded, "He wore a new 'tile-ridge' hat, held in place with a gold pin, a black silk Taoist robe, and sandals with white stockings; and he looked to be well-fed."
"I can't believe it," exclaimed Yüeh-niang, "I simply can't believe it."
We will say no more at this juncture about their conversation.
To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi reentered the rear compound, Ch'un-mei was still in her room, putting on her makeup and painting her eyebrows in front of her mirror stand.
Ch'en Ching-chi showed her Yüeh-niang's card and asked, "Why should her household be sending gifts to you? What reason could there be for it?"
Ch'un-mei then told him all about how, some time ago, on the Ch'ing-ming Festival, she had run into Yüeh-niang at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city; how, later on, P'ing-an had stolen the hair ornaments from the pawnshop; how the police chief Wu Tien-en had subjected him to a beating in the squeezers and induced him to testify that Yüeh-niang had been engaged in hanky-panky with Tai-an; and how Auntie Hsüeh had come and appealed to her to intervene in the case, with the result that the commandant had exonerated her.
"Her household purchased gifts for us as an expression of their gratitude," she went on to say, "and during the first month, I went to her home to celebrate Hsiao-ko's birthday. We have been keeping in touch with each other ever since, and she promised that on my birthday she would purchase gifts and come pay me a visit."
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this, he gave her a look and said, "Sister, how can you be so irresolute? Don't you remember how that lousy whore forced the two of us to separate and sent Sister Six to her death?
For a thousand years or all eternity,
it would be better if you:
Had nothing to do with each other,
either indoors or out.
But instead you actually intervened on her behalf. Why should you have been afraid to let Wu Tien-en torture that page boy P'ing-an into testifying that she had been engaging in hanky-panky, rather than letting that whore be taken into custody with a length of rope and allowing her to suffer humiliation in the courtroom? What's it got to do with us anyway? Actually, if she hadn't been engaging in hanky-panky with Tai-an, why should she have given her maidservant Hsiao-yü to him as a wife? If I had been here at the time, I never would have let you intervene on her behalf. She has been an enemy of ours, so why have you agreed to maintain relations with her?
The sixth month is the rainy season;
So one can hardly expect to have fair weather?"
This tirade had the effect of temporarily reducing Ch'un-mei to silence, but she then went on to say, "Why not let bygones be bygones? As far as I'm concerned:
Good minds are not obsessed with old enmities."[7]
"At the present time," responded Ch'en Ching-chi:
"Even the best intentions go quite unrequited."
"Since she has already sent these gifts to me," said Ch'un-mei, "I can hardly agree to accept them without doing anything in return. She is expecting me to send someone to invite her."
"From now on," opined Ch'en Ching-chi, "there is no need for us to pay any attention to that whore. What reason is there for issuing her an invitation?"
"Not to invite her would be a source of embarrassment," said Ch'un-mei. "I'll just send her a card, and leave it to her whether she chooses to come or not. If she does come, you should confine yourself to the library where you are staying, and not come out to meet her. In the future, I won't bother with her, and leave it at that."
Ch'en Ching-chi was annoyed by this but did not say a word and went to the front compound to compose an invitation, which Ch'un-mei entrusted to their servant Chou I to deliver to Wu Yüeh-niang. Yüeh-niang, after dressing herself appropriately, set out for the commandant's residence, along with the wet nurse Ju-i, who held Hsiao-ko in her arms and rode in a smaller sedan chair, followed by Tai-an. When she arrived there, Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang, appropriately dressed, came out to welcome her and ushered her back to the rear reception hall, where they sat down together after exchanging the customary amenities, and Ju-i, while holding Hsiao-ko in her arms, kowtowed to them. Ch'en Ching-chi concealed himself in the library and did not come out; allowing Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang to entertain their guest with tea, preside over the feast, and proffer her wine in the rear reception hall. They had engaged the two singing girls, Han Yü-ch'uan and Cheng Chiao-erh, to play their instruments and sing for their entertainment. But there is no need to describe this in detail.
Tai-an, who was being entertained in an anteroom in the front compound, happened to see a young page boy emerge from the rear compound, carrying a tray of soup and rice, and other viands, and head for the postern gate leading to the library on the western side of the courtyard.
"Who are those things intended for?" asked Tai-an; to which the page boy replied, "They are for my uncle to eat."
"What is your uncle's surname?" asked Tai-an.
"His surname is Ch'en," replied the page boy.
Tai-an surreptitiously followed him toward the library on the western side of the courtyard, and when the page boy lifted aside the portiere and went inside, he cautiously peeked through the gauze-covered window and saw that it was indeed their son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi who was sprawled out on the bed in the library, and who promptly got up, upon seeing that his meal was provided, set up a table for it, and proceeded to eat. Having observed this, Tai-an surreptitiously returned outside and sat down in the anteroom where he had been before.
That evening, when the lantern bearers from her household came to fetch Wu Yüeh-niang, she took her leave and went home, whereupon Tai-an told her in detail what he had seen, saying, "It is indeed the case that our son-in-law Ch'en Ching-chi is residing there."
From the time it was discovered that Ch'en Ching-chi had been taken into Ch'un-mei's household, the two families ceased to have any relations with each other. Truly:
Who could have known that the young scamp would face such adversities?
Even a single thought may turn out to be the harbinger of resentment.[8]
Although Ch'en Ching-chi was now carrying on a clandestine affair with Ch'un-mei, no one else was aware of it. Whenever the commandant was not at home, Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi would eat together and drink together in her room. During their free time, while playing board games, or laughing and joking with each other:
There was no length to which they would not go.
When the commandant was at home, Ch'un-mei would send maidservants or page boys to take meals out to the library for him to eat. Even in broad daylight, she would frequently go to the library herself and keep him company for half a day before returning to the rear compound. The warmth of their feelings for each other was such that there is no need to describe it in detail.
One day, the commandant led his men and horses out on a tour of inspection. It was the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month, and Ch'un-mei had arranged for a celebratory feast in the ornamental pavilion beside the library on the western side of the courtyard. Together with Sun Erh-niang and Ch'en Ching-chi, the three of them enjoyed drinking realgar-flavored wine and eating festival tsung-tzu,[9] while waited upon by maids and attendants. On that auspicious day in the fifth month, what did the celebratory scene look like? Behold:
Urns are planted with green willows.
Vases are studded with red pomegranates.
Portieres of beaded crystal furl their "shrimps' whiskers," Screens of inlaid mica display their peacocks' tails.
The irises are like sliced jade;
Smiling beauties proffer goblets of iridescent hue.
The tsung-tzu are like piled gold;
Waiting maids raise on high beakers made of chrysoprase.
Dainties are prepared of the rarest kind,
Fruits are provided just in season.
Efficacious charms and artemisia tigers adorn their heads;
Variegated strands of yarn are fastened around their arms.
Each household celebrates the Dragon
Boat Festival;
In every place people happily imbibe fragrant wine.
Journeying beyond the corporeal realm in the universe of the drunk;
Thus does one dissipate the idle days within the Taoist's gourd.[10]
Truly, it is a case of:
Her ornate pendants tinkle, and her golden lotuses are tiny;
As she gently handles her silken fan with her slender fingers.
Ch'un-mei ordered the concubines Hai-t'ang and Yüeh-kuei to play their musical instruments and sing for their entertainment. That day, they continued feasting until:
The burning sun sank into the west, and
A gentle rain had a cooling effect.
Ch'un-mei kept raising a large gold goblet in the shape of a lotus blossom, and urging them to drink. After:
Several rounds of wine had been consumed,
Sun Erh-niang:
Could not handle the effects of the drink, and got up to return to her room in the rear compound, leaving Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi to continue drinking together in the ornamental pavilion:
Playing at guess-fingers or gaming at forfeits;
First a cup for you,
Then a cup for me.
Before long, the maidservants brought out the gauze lanterns, and the wet nurses Chin-kuei and Yü-t'ang put the baby Chin-ko to bed. After losing a game, Ch'en Ching-chi went into the library, where he tried to avoid drinking any more by refusing to come out.
Ch'un-mei first sent Hai-t'ang to invite him back out, and when she learned that he refused to come, she then sent Yüeh-kuei after him, saying, "You must drag him back out, no matter what. If you fail to do so, when you return I'll give you ten slaps on the face, menial creature that you are."
Yüeh-kuei went to the library and pushed open the door, where she found that Ch'en Ching-chi was lying sprawled out on the bed, where he pretended to be snoring and could not be moved.
"The mistress has sent me to invite you back," she said. "If I fail to do so, she has threatened to beat me."
"If she beats you it is none of my business," Ch'en Ching-chi muttered in response. "I'm drunk and can't drink any more."
Yüeh-kuei dragged him up with her hand and gave him a push, saying, "I'm going to drag you there no matter what. If you won't let me do so:
You hardly count as a stout fellow."[11]
She then pushed and pulled Ch'en Ching-chi until he became so excited that, in the dark shadows, he pretended to be drunk and:
Half facetiously but in earnest, embraced Yüeh-kuei with his arms and gave her a kiss.

This only had the effect of encouraging Yüeh-kuei to:
Assume privileges above her station, saying, "I came to fetch you with the best of intentions, and you assume the right to treat me so disrespectfully. How can you do such a thing?"
"My child," responded Ch'en Ching-chi, "who is it now that is putting on airs with the best of intentions?"
So saying, he gave her another kiss, and it was only after this that they arrived back in the ornamental pavilion.
"Mistress," said Yüeh-kuei, "you may have threatened to beat me, but I have succeeded in dragging uncle back here."
Ch'un-mei then had Hai-t'ang pour out another large beaker of wine, and the two of them continued to enjoy themselves playing board games together, with the loser having to down a cup of wine as a forfeit. Thereupon, what with:
First a game for you,
Then a game for me,
they continued playing until the maidservants fell asleep from exhaustion. Ch'un-mei then sent Yüeh-kuei and Hai-t'ang back to the rear compound to fetch them some tea. Once the two of them were alone in the ornamental pavilion:
Untying her girdle pendant, she discloses the jade of the Nymph of the Hsiang River;
Distending her ruby lips, she displays the cloves of the Han dynasty Secretariat.[12]
Truly, it is a case of:
Amid the flower shadows by the curved balustrade
the lamplight shines aslant;
Beside it there is a fallen hairpin along with a pair of phoenix-feather shoes.[13]
A poem testifies to this:
As they embrace inside the ornamental pavilion her cloudy locks are disheveled;
Her powdered sweat becomes congealed fragrance that permeates the crimson gauze.
In the secluded courtyards the days are long[14]
and nobody comes to disturb you;
One can simply look on as the yellow orioles peck away at the famous flowers.
At the time, just as the two of them were in the thick of things, the concubine Hai-t'ang came back with the tea and said, "Mistress, you had better return to the rear compound. Your son Chin-ko has just waked up and is crying for you."
Ch'un-mei kept Ch'en Ching-chi company in drinking another two goblets of wine, after which, she rinsed out her mouth with tea, took her leave, and returned to the rear compound. The serving maids were left to clear away the utensils, and the male servant Hsi-erh supported Ch'en Ching-chi on his way back to the library, where he went to bed. But no more of this.
One day, an imperial edict came down ordering Commandant Chou Hsiu to lead the infantry and cavalry under his command to join Chang Shu-yeh, the prefect of Chi-chou, in a campaign against the outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh led by the bandit chieftain Sung Chiang, and to set out as soon as possible.
The commandant said to Ch'un-mei, "You must stay at home and look after our son Chin-ko. You should also engage the services of a go-between to arrange a marriage for your cousin. I will put his name on my roster; and if we are fortunate enough to be successful in our campaign, the magnanimity of the Emperor may result in his being given:
An official post or even half of one, which will also serve to enhance your reputation."
Ch'un-mei assented to this suggestion; and two or three days later, the commandant packed his gear, mustered his infantry and cavalry, and left Chang Sheng and Li An behind to look after the household, while taking only his servant Chou Jen to accompany him. But no more of this.
One day, Ch'un-mei summoned Auntie Hsüeh and said to her, thus and so, "My husband, on the eve of his departure, suggested that I engage the services of a go-between to find a wife for my cousin. See if you can locate a decent woman of:
Appropriate social and economic standing, for me. It doesn't matter if she is only fifteen or sixteen years old, so long as she is attractive, has dainty hands and feet, and is clever and adept, since he has a somewhat finicky disposition."
"Do you think I don't know that?" said Auntie Hsüeh. "There is no need for you to tell me about it. I recall that he was not even satisfied by the likes of Hsi-men Ta-chieh."
"If you come up with one who isn't up to snuff," said Ch'un-mei, "just see if I don't box your ears for it. After all, I'll have to address her as my young sister-in-law. It's not a matter to be treated lightly."
When they had finished speaking, Ch'un-mei had a maidservant bring in a serving of tea for her. Who should appear at this point but Ch'en Ching-chi, who came in to have something to eat.
Auntie Hsüeh stepped up and bowed to him, saying, "Brother-in-law, I haven't set eyes on you for a long time. Where have you been keeping yourself? You are to be congratulated. Just now, the mistress has directed me to find a nice wife for you. How will you repay me for doing so?"
Ch'en Ching-chi only frowned at this, without saying anything.
"You old beggar," said Auntie Hsüeh, "why do you have nothing to say?"
"Don't call him brother-in-law," said Ch'un-mei. "That's over and done with. Just address him as Uncle Ch'en, that's all."
"My worthless mouth deserves to be slapped," responded Auntie Hsüeh. "It is prone to make such mistakes. In the future, I will simply address you as Uncle."
On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi couldn't help breaking into a laugh, saying, "That really touches my heart."
Auntie Hsüeh, affecting a bout of silliness, ran up to him and gave him a blow, saying, "Just look at the fine way this old beggar talks. I'm not the one you're after. So how could I ever hope to touch your heart?"
Even Ch'un-mei broke out laughing at this.
Before long, Yüeh-kuei brought in a serving of tea and snacks for Auntie Hsüeh, after consuming which, she picked up her box of trinkets and prepared to go, saying, "I will do my best to locate an appropriate young woman for you, and if I do so, will come to let you know."
"We will not skimp," stated Ch'un-mei, "on the bride price, preserved fruit, festive red silk, gifts of wine, head ornaments, and clothing for her trousseau, as long as she is an attractive girl from a good family, who might appropriately become a member of our household."
"I understand," said Auntie Hsüeh. "I guarantee that she will live up to your expectations."
After some time, Ch'en Ching-chi finished his meal and went back to the front compound.
Auntie Hsüeh, who was still sitting there, asked Ch'un-mei, "When did that gentleman come here?"
Ch'un-mei then proceeded to tell her the story of how he had become a Taoist acolyte and went on to say, "It was I who located him, and have passed him off as a relative of mine."
"Wonderful! Wonderful!" exclaimed Auntie Hsüeh. "You really have an eye for the future."
She then went on to say, "I have heard that on your birthday, a while ago, the lady from his former household came to visit you."
"She took the initiative by sending gifts to me," said Ch'un-mei. "It was only then that I sent a card inviting her to come for a visit, and she sat around for the better part of the day before going home."
"I was busy on that occasion," said Auntie Hsüeh, "preparing the bridal chamber for one of my customers, which took me all day. I had wanted to come see you but was under such pressure I was not able to do so."
She then went on to ask, "Did Uncle Ch'en see the lady from his former household?"
"He would hardly have agreed to see her," said Ch'un-mei. "He got into quite a quarrel with me over the fact that I even invited her. I said that I had merely done a favor for her household, but he accused me of lacking resolution. He said, 'There is no reason to doubt that it would have been preferable if Wu Tien-en had been allowed to beat the page boy P'ing-an into implicating the First Lady in a scandal, so that she would have been dragged into court. What did it have to do with you, that you should choose to do her a favor, in spite of the fine way she treated us in the past?' "
"What you said makes sense," opined Auntie Hsüeh. "When you get right down to it, people:
Should not be preoccupied with old enmities."
"Since I had received gifts from her," said Ch'un-mei, "not to have invited her for a visit would have been unacceptable.
It is better to overlook another's unkindness,
Than it is to commit unrighteous acts oneself."
"It is no wonder," opined Auntie Hsüeh, "that you are blessed with such good fortune, when you possess such a good heart."
Thereupon, having chatted for what seemed like half a day, Auntie Hsüeh picked up her box of trinkets, took her leave, and departed.
Two days later, she came back and reported that Battalion Commander Chu, who resided inside the city, had a fourteen-year-old daughter, Miss Chu, whom he was prepared to marry off because her mother was dead. Ch'un-mei, however, felt her to be too young and was not interested. Auntie Hsüeh then suggested Ying Po-chüeh's second daughter as a possibility, and reported that she was twenty-one years old. Ch'un-mei rejected this suggestion as well, on the grounds that since Ying Po-chüeh was now dead, she would be in the hands of his elder brother, who would not provide her with anything much in the way of a dowry. She therefore told Auntie Hsüeh to return the cards with the horoscopes of these two candidates.
Several days later, Auntie Hsüeh returned with some artificial flowers in hand and pulled a card with the horoscope of another prospect out of her sleeve. The inscription on the crimson satin surface of the card read: "The eldest daughter of the prosperous dry goods merchant, surnamed Ko, who is nineteen years old, was born in the year of the cock, at midnight on the fifteenth day of the eleventh month, and her personal name is Ts'ui-p'ing."
Auntie Hsüeh then described her, saying, "She is as pretty as a picture, is petite in stature, has a face shaped like a melon seed, possesses a congenial and elegant disposition, [15] is as clever as can be, and her mastery of needlework and suchlike feminine accomplishments goes without saying. Her parents are both alive, and her father has the equivalent of ten thousand strings of cash in capital, operates a dry goods store on Main Street, and does business in Su-chou, Hang-chou, and Nanking. It is an incomparably fine family, and the beds and curtains, and the trunks containing her trousseau, are all manufactured in Nanking."
When Ch'un-mei heard this, she said, "If it's as good a match as all that, we might as well agree to it."
She then told Auntie Hsüeh to go ahead and transmit the needed documents, and she promptly set out to do so. Truly:
If you want to seek an alluring beauty from a brocaded boudoir,
You must rely entirely upon a red leaf to be a good go-between.[16]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
The Weaving Maid, positioned at her loom, attaches the fragrant silk;
An affinity between widely divided people suffices to connect them.
In Heaven above, the Herd Boy is matched with the Weaving Maid;
In the human realm, the man of talent
weds an alluring damsel.
When Auntie Hsüeh delivered the nuptial documents, and the family of Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's father, the prosperous dry goods merchant, saw that they came from the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, they were happy to accept the proposal and engaged another go-between named Auntie Chang to go with Auntie Hsüeh in order to arrange the match. Ch'un-mei, for her part, made up two parcels of tea leaves, dumplings, and candied fruit and sent off Sun Erh-niang in a sedan chair to deliver these betrothal gifts to the Ko family home and conclude the match by presenting Ko Ts'ui-p'ing with an engagement ring.
Upon her return, she said to Ch'un-mei, "She really appears to be a worthwhile young woman. She has an attractive demeanor, is as lovely as a flower, and her family is of an appropriate status."
Ch'un-mei thereupon selected an auspicious day for the formal betrothal ceremony, and prepared gifts including sixteen platters of preserved fruit, tea, and pastries; two platters of noodles to celebrate the putting up of her hair; two platters of pearls and trinkets; four jugs of wine; two sheep; a fret for her coiffure; a lavish set of gold and silver hair ornaments, pins, and bracelets; two velvet gowns; and clothing for the four seasons; in addition to bolts of cotton fabric; and a betrothal present of twenty taels of silver. But there is no need to describe this in detail.
The yin-yang master selected the eighth day of the sixth month for the wedding ceremony, when the bride would be brought over the threshold.
Before that date, Ch'un-mei asked Auntie Hsüeh, "Is her family going to supply any maidservants as part of her dowry?"
"They will supply beds and curtains as part of her trousseau," said Auntie Hsüeh, "along with gilt lacquer cabinets and so forth, but there will be no maidservants included in the dowry."
"It would be more convenient in that case," said Ch'un-mei, "if we were to purchase a twelve- or thirteen-year-old maidservant to serve in her room, empty the commode, pour bathwater, and so forth."
"I know of two families," said Auntie Hsüeh, "who are offering to sell their girls as maidservants. I'll bring one back with me tomorrow."
The next day, sure enough, she brought a young girl back with her and explained, "She has been working as a maidservant in the household of the merchant Huang the Fourth's son, and this year she is just twelve years old. Huang the Fourth and Li the Third, along with Lai-pao, who was formerly employed in your household, have all been imprisoned for misappropriation of official funds, until such time as they can make reparation. It is now more than a year since they were incarcerated, and they have been forced to dispose of their possessions, and sell off their houses. Li the Third has passed away, and his son, Li Huo, has been incarcerated in his stead. Lai-Pao's son, Seng-pao, has run away and is said to be serving someone as a groom."
"Are you referring to the servant we knew as Lai-pao?" asked Ch'un-mei.
"He is no longer known as Lai-pao," said Auntie Hsüeh, "but has changed his name to T'ang Pao."
"If this girl has been employed as a maidservant in Huang the Fourth's family," said Ch'un-mei, "how much do they want for her?"
"All they are asking for is four and a half taels of silver," said Auntie Hsüeh. "They are anxiously awaiting it in order to help them repay the misappropriated funds."
"Four and a half taels is too much," said Ch'un-mei, "but I am willing to pay three taels and five mace of silver for her."
She then paid over the sum of three taels and five mace worth of "snowflake" government silver, wrote out a contract for her, and changed her name to Chin Ch'ien-erh.
To make a long story short, on the eighth day of the sixth month, Ch'un-mei dressed herself up with a phoenix cap adorned with pearls and trinkets on her head, and a full-sleeved scarlet robe, encircled with a girdle featuring a plaque of green jade inlaid with gold. Riding in a large sedan chair borne by four bearers, and accompanied by drums and lanterns, she set out to fetch the daughter of the Ko family, preside over the bridegroom's ritual presentation of a goose to the bride's family, and bring her over the threshold in marriage. Ch'en Ching-chi rode on a large white horse with ornate silver trim on the saddle and bridle and was accompanied by soldiers who shouted to clear the way. He wore a scholar's cap on his head, a round-collared robe of black velvet, with a pair of white-soled black boots on his feet, and his head was adorned with two floral ornaments of gold. Truly, it was a case of:
Encountering sweet rain after a prolonged draught;
Meeting an old acquaintance when traveling abroad;
Enjoying the candlelit night in a nuptial chamber;
Finding oneself on a list of successful graduates.[17]
Each time such things are refurbished they will be as good as new.

When the wedding procession arrived back at the commandant's residence, and the bride descended from her sedan chair, she wore a scarlet gold-flaked bridal veil. Dressed in her wedding finery she accepted a ritual mouthful of rice, before entering the main gate, holding a "precious vase" in her arms. The yin-yang master then conducted her into a decorated hall where she proceeded to pay her respects before the family shrine, after which, she was taken to the nuptial chamber. Ch'un-mei saw to it that the two of them sat down together within the bed curtains, and then she came out again. After the yin-yang master had performed the ceremony of scattering auspicious symbols of fertility upon the nuptial bed, he left upon receiving his gratuity, and the drummers that had been hired for the occasion also went their ways.
After Ch'en Ching-chi had sat within the bed curtains with Ko Ts'ui-p'ing for a while, he mounted a horse and went to his father-in-law's home to thank him for the gift of his daughter. Upon his return he was quite drunk. That evening, being:
A woman of beauty and a man of talent;
They indulged their newlywed passions,
Enjoying the clouds and rain together.
Truly, it is a case of:
When spring touches the apricot and peach trees, their new buds burst into red flower;
When the breeze plays among the willow fronds,
they are made to bend their green waists.
There is a poem that testifies to this:
To encounter close up such a paragon of feeling and romance;
Is a consummation that: "Without good fortune one cannot enjoy."
Wherever has Lieh-tzu allowed the wind to carry him;
When night after night the beauty of the moon shines in the willow branches.[18]
That night, Ch'en Ching-chi and the young lady Ko Ts'ui-p'ing found themselves to be highly compatible. The pair of them were like:
Mandarin ducks beneath the quilt;
Phoenix mates within the curtains.
Like fish sporting in the water,
They enjoyed sharing loving cups.
On the third day after the wedding, in the rear hall of the commandant's headquarters, Ch'un-mei prepared a feast, hung up decorative bunting, hired musicians to provide:
Drum music, pipes, and song, and invited friends and relatives to attend a wedding reception. But there is no need to describe this in detail.
Every day, Ch'un-mei invited the two of them to her quarters so they could share their meals, and they addressed each other as cousins, constantly:
Getting up and sitting down together.
Not a single one of the maidservants, wet nurses, or servants' wives chose to object to this. It so happens that Ch'un-mei had fixed up a suite of three rooms on the western side of the front courtyard to serve as his quarters. Inside, she had provided a curtained bedstead, replastered the walls so that the rooms were as spotless as snow grottoes, and suspended blinds. The library on the outside served as his study and was also furnished with a bed and a couch, tables and mats, and a collection of old books. The letters and calling cards sent and received by the commandant, as well as the documents presented by other bureaucratic offices, all passed through his hands and were either listed in registers, or stamped by him with official seals. The brushes, inkstones, and other appurtenances needed by a writer were all available to him, and the shelves were loaded with books. Ch'un-mei would come out to the library from time to time in order to sit down and talk with him, and they ended up engaging in intercourse with each other on more than one occasion. Truly:

In the morning, he attends feasts in Golden Valley,
In the evening, he favors beauties in ornate houses.
But do not consider these to be occasions for joy,
Time's flowing light only chases the sunset clouds.

When they came to Major Zhou's place, Chen Jingji dismounted and Zhang Sheng went in to tell Chunmei. She ordered him to take Jingji to a room where he could have a bath, and told a woman to take him fresh clothes, boots and hat. The Major was still in the great hall, and Chunmei gave orders for the young man to be taken to the hall in the inner court. There she waited for him, beautifully dressed. Jingji came in and made a reverence to her as though she were his cousin. They sat down facing each other and talked of the things that had happened since they last met. Tears were in their eyes.
Chunmei expected the Major to come at any moment. She looked meaningfully at Jingji and said softly: "If he asks you any questions, say that you are my cousin and that I am a year older than you. I am twenty-five and was born at noon on the twenty-fifth day of the fourth month."
"I will remember," Jingji said.
The maid brought tea and Chunmei asked him how he became a priest. "My husband did not know that we had anything to do with one another," she said, "or he would not have punished you. He is sorry now. At that time I could not ask you to stay here, though I should have liked to, because Xue'e was here. That was why I let you go away. I got rid of her as soon as I could and told Zhang Sheng to look for you. I never imagined that things would come to such a pass that you would become a workman outside the city."
"It is a long story," Jingji said. "After we saw each other last, I made up my mind to marry Pan Jinlian. Then my father died at the Eastern Capital, and I came back too late. Wu Song had killed her. I heard that through your kindness she had been buried at the Temple of Eternal Felicity. I went there and burned paper offerings for her. Then my mother died. When I had buried her, my money was stolen. I came home and my wife died. That strumpet, my mother-in-law, took me to law and made off with all my wife's things. To settle the law case I had to sell my house and then I was as poor as if I had been cleaned completely out. Fortunately, I met an old friend of my father who took me to the Yangong temple to be a monk. Then some rascal gave me a beating. I was arrested and taken to the court. When I got away from there, I had no relative or friend to give me a helping hand, so I went to the temple and joined the workmen there. It was good of you, Sister, to tell Zhang Sheng to find me. I feel I am a new man now that I see you again." They both shed tears.
Major Zhou came from the hall. A servant pulled aside the lattice and he went into the room. Jingji stepped forward and knelt down before him. The Major hastily returned his greeting.
"I had no idea," he said, "that you were my good cousin. I was misled, or I should never have treated you so unbecomingly. I must apologize."
"It was my fault," Jingji said. "I have not been to see you. I trust you will forgive me." He again knelt down before the officer. Major Zhou helped him up and begged him to take the place of honor. Jingji was too clever to do this, and sat on a chair in the lower place. When they had all sat down together, tea was brought.
"Good cousin," Major Zhou said, "how old are you? I haven't seen you since we met that day. How did you come to go to the temple?"
"I am twenty-four years old," Jingji said, "a year younger than my cousin here. Her birthday is on the twenty-fifth of the fourth month. I went to the Yangong temple because my parents are dead and my family ruined. I did not know that my cousin had married you. If I had known, I should certainly have called to see you."
"Your cousin has been so worried about you all this time that she has never been at ease," Major Zhou said. "I sent out people to look for you, but they could never find you. It is a piece of good luck that I see you here today."
Major Zhou had been a friend of Ximen Qing. It was therefore to be expected that he would have made the acquaintance of Chen Jingji. But though Zhou was a friend of Ximen, he was an honest man and had never pried into his friend's domestic affairs. Always, when he had been at Ximen's house, Jing and Xia and other officers had been with him and he had never met Jingji. Besides, the young man had been a priest, and it never occurred to Zhou that he was Ximen Qing's son-in-law. So he was deceived by his wife and Jingji and believed that they were cousins.
Zhou ordered the servants to prepare dinner, and it was soon upon the table. The wine pots were of silver and the cups of jade. Wine was poured in a golden stream, and they feasted until the evening. Then the Major bade Zhou Ren prepare a room in the west court. Chunmei found two sets of bedclothes, and a boy called Xi'er was told to wait on him.
The time passed very quickly, the sun and moon racing like a weaver's shuttles.
When the old year drew near its end,
We saw the plum blossom.
Now, suddenly, New Year's Day is here
Dainty flowers appear upon the branches.
Fresh lotus leaves come out
Upon the surface of the water.
Jingji had been at Major Zhou's house for more than a month. It was Chunmei's birthday. Wu Yueniang sent Daian with a plate of longevity noodles, two geese, four chickens, two plates of fruit and ajar of wine. Major Zhou was sitting in the hall when a servant told him that Daian had come. He ordered the presents to be taken in. Daian brought the present list and came in and kowtowed.
"Tell your mistress it is very kind of her to send us these things," Zhou said to Daian. Then he handed the present list to a boy and told him to take it to his uncle. He said that Daian should be given a handkerchief and three qian of silver, and the porter a hundred coppers. Then he put on his ceremonial dress and went out. Daian stood at the door of the hall to wait for the return card. He saw a young man wearing a hat with a ribbed rim, a black gown, summer shoes, and light socks come through a corner door and give money to a boy. Then the man went back again. Daian thought he looked very like Chen Jingji, but he could not make out how Jingji could possibly be there. The boy gave Daian the handkerchief and the money, and he went home. He gave the return card to Yueniang.
"Did you see your sister?" Yueniang said.
"No, but I saw brother-in-law," Daian said.
"What do you mean, you young rascal?" Yueniang said, laughing. "What brother-in-law are you talking about? Do you have the audacity to speak of the Major as your brother-in-law, a man of his years?"
"I don't mean the Major," Daian said. "It was Chen Jingji I saw. When I got there, Major Zhou was in the great hall. I gave him my list and kowtowed. He said I was to thank you, and gave me some tea. Then he said to a boy: 'Take this card to your uncle and ask him for a handkerchief and three qian of silver for this man and a hundred coppers for the porter.' He dressed then and went out. I saw Master Chen coming by the corner door, and it was he who gave the return card to the boy. Then he went back, and I picked up my box and came away. I am sure it was he."
"I don't believe it, you scamp," Yueniang said. "I am sure that that young lamb must be wandering in other pastures now. He has probably died of starvation by this time. How could he be in that house? Would the Major have him there? Why, Chunmei herself would not have him."
"Lady, will you have a wager with me?" Daian said. "I am sure it was Master Chen I saw. I should know him even if he had been burned to ashes."
"What was he wearing?" Yueniang said.
"A new hat with a ribbed rim and a gold pin," Daian said. "He had a black gown, summer shoes, and white socks. He was looking very well."
"I can't believe you," Yueniang said.
Jingji went to the inner court where Chunmei was adorning herself in front of a mirror. He showed Yueniang's card to her. "Why is this woman sending you presents?" he said.
Chunmei told him that she had met Yueniang at the Temple of Eternal Felicity at the Festival of Spring, and that Ping'an had stolen ornaments from the pawnshop that Major Zhou had recovered for her. "She sent presents to thank my husband," Chunmei said, "and on the baby's birthday I went to see her. Now we are excellent friends, and she promised to send me birthday presents."
Jingji looked very hard at Chunmei. "Sister," he said, "you must have a very short memory. Have you forgotten how that whore treated you? She separated us and she is responsible for Jinlian's death. I only hope I may never set eyes on her again, and here you are actually befriending her. Why did you prevent Wu Dian'en from beating the boy? Then that woman would have been arrested and exposed. It was no business of ours. And, besides, if she has not been carrying on with Daian, why did she marry him to Xiaoyu? If I had been here then, I certainly would not have allowed you to do that. She is our enemy, and I can't understand why you let her come here. Friendship does not seem to mean anything to you."
Chunmei said nothing for a long time. Then she said: "Why not let bygones be bygones? I have a soft heart, and I do not like nursing a grievance."
"In these days," Jingji said, "if you have a soft heart you will suffer for it."
"Well, she has sent me these presents. I can't accept them without doing something in return. She is expecting me to send her an invitation."
"Have no more to do with her," Jingji said. "Why should you invite her again?"
"I shall feel very awkward if I don't," Chunmei said. "I will send her a card, and whether she comes or not will depend upon her. If she comes, you go to the other court and keep out of sight. Afterwards, I will break off relations with her."
Jingji was angry and went off without a word. He went to the front and wrote a card, and Chunmei sent a servant with it to Yueniang.
Yueniang dressed and, with Ruyi'er carrying Xiaoge, went to call upon Chunmei. Daian went with them. Chunmei and the Second Lady both came to welcome them. They went to the inner court and there greeted one another. Ruyi'er, with the baby, made a reverence. Jingji, who was in the other courtyard, kept out of the way.
Tea and wine were set out in the inner court and two singing girls played and sang. Daian was entertained in a small room at the front. He saw a boy, carrying a tray of food and cakes, going to the corner door on the west side. Daian stopped him and asked him where he was taking the tray.
"To my uncle," the boy said.
"What is your uncle's name?" Daian asked.
"Chen," the boy said.
Daian quietly followed the boy and went into the small courtyard on the west side. The boy pulled aside a lattice and went in. Daian peeped through the window. There was no doubt about it. Jingji was lying on a bed, and, when the food was brought in, he got up and began to eat. Daian went back to the front. In the evening people with lanterns came to take Yueniang back. Daian told her what he had seen. From that time onwards, Jingji dissuaded Chunmei from having any more to do with Yueniang, and their relations were broken off.
Jingji, unknown to everyone in Major Zhou's house, associated secretly with Chunmei. When Zhou was out, they had meals and drank wine together, and sometimes played chess and other games. When he was at home, Chunmei sent a maid with food to the young man and sometimes went to him herself, even in the daytime. She used to stay in his rooms for hours at a time. So they came and went one to the other and grew more and more attached.
One day, when Major Zhou was out with some of his men upon a tour of inspection, it was the Summer Festival. Chunmei arranged to have a feast in a summerhouse in the west courtyard. She and the Second Lady and Jingji drank together to celebrate the festival. Their maids and women were all there to wait, and Chunmei bade Haitang and Yuegui sing for them. They drank till the sun turned to the west and a very fine rain came to bring coolness to the day. Chunmei took a great gold cup, shaped like a lotus blossom, and urged the others to drink more. The Second Lady could not, and went to her own room to sleep. Jingji and Chunmei were left alone in the summerhouse. They guessed fingers, played games, and drank together. After a while, the maid brought lanterns and the nurse took away the baby to put him to bed. Jingji lost the game, went to the study, and refused to come back. First, Chunmei sent Haitang for him, but he would not come. Then she sent Yuegui. "You must drag him here, if necessary," she said. "If you fail, I shall box your ears ten times."
Yuegui went to the young man's room. When she opened the door, she saw him lying on the bed, snoring.
"My Lady says I must bring you back with me," she said. "If I do not, she promises to punish me."
"It doesn't matter to me whether you get punished or not," Jingji murmured. "I have had as much wine as I can drink, and I don't want any more."
Yuegui pulled him up. "I have to take you to my mistress," she said, "and if I can't drag you to her somehow, I shall own myself a feeble creature."
Jingji pretended to be more drunk than he was. He put his arms around Yuegui and kissed her. Yuegui made a fuss. "I came to take you away from here, not to behave like this," she said.
"My child," Jingji said, "do what I want of you and I will not treat you as a servant." He kissed her again, and they went together to the summerhouse.
"I have brought uncle," Yuegui said, "so you will not have to punish me."
Chunmei told Haitang to fill the large cups, and they played chess together. They played one game after another until the maids were sleepy and went away, all except Haitang and Yuegui, and Chunmei packed them off to get some tea. Then Chunmei and Jingji were alone together in the summerhouse. They kissed each other.
When they had been very happy together, Haitang returned with the tea. She asked Chunmei to go to the inner court because the baby was crying. Chunmei drank two more cups of wine with Jingji, then they rinsed their mouths with tea and she went to the inner court. The maid cleared the table and Jingji, with the assistance of his boy, went to his study and to sleep.

One day there came an Imperial Edict that instructed the Major to take his soldiers and join Zhang Shuye, magistrate of Jizhou, in an attack upon the bandits in Liangshan, who were led by Song Jiang. Before he set out on this expedition, he said to Chunmei: "Watch carefully over the baby, and send a go-between to arrange a marriage for your cousin. Then I will take him to the field with me. If he has good fortune and does his duty to his Emperor, he will get official rank, and that will be pleasant for you."
Chunmei promised to do this. In two or three months, Zhou joined his troops and went away. He took Zhou Ren with him and left Zhang Sheng and Li An at home.
One day Chunmei sent for old woman Xue. "When he went away," she said, "he told me to see about a marriage for my cousin. Go and see if you can find a suitable girl for him, someone about sixteen or seventeen. She must be beautiful and intelligent, because he has not the best of tempers."
"I know him," old woman Xue said. "You need not go into details. I remember that Ximen's daughter did not satisfy him."
"If you don't find a good girl for him, I shall box your ears," Chunmei said. "She must be pretty, because she and I will be living here as sisters. You must take the matter seriously."
She told a maid to give the old woman some tea. Then Jingji came in for something to eat. "Brother-in-law," the old woman said, "I haven't seen you for a very long time. Where have you been? I find I must congratulate you. I have just been told to find a pretty wife for you. What will you give me as a reward?
Jingji scowled and said nothing.
"Why don't you speak, you old beggar?" the old woman said.
"You mustn't call him brother-in-law," Chunmei said. "That is all over and done with. You must call him Uncle Chen now."
"I ought to be punished," old woman Xue said. "My doggish mouth gave him the wrong title. In the future, I will remember to call him Uncle."
Jingji could not help laughing. "I am glad to hear it," he said.
The old woman put on a great air of gaiety. She went up to him and gave him a little tap. "You old beggar," she said. "I am not your sweetheart. What do you mean by saying you are glad to hear it?"
Chunmei laughed. After a while, Yuegui brought cakes and tea for the old woman.
"I shall take the very greatest pains to find a suitable girl for you," Xue said, "and as soon as I find one I will come and tell you."
"We will see about clothes, ornaments, and all that sort of thing," Chunmei said. "All we care is that she should be a decent girl. This is not an ordinary family."
"I realize that," the old woman said, "and I am sure I shall be able to satisfy you."
Sometime later, Jingji finished his meal and went to the outer court.
"When did he come here?" old woman Xue asked.
Chunmei told her how he had become a priest. "I want to treat him as one of my relatives," she said.
"Excellent!" the old woman said. "You know your way about. I hear Mistress Ximen came here on your birthday."
"Yes," Chunmei said, "she sent me some presents, and I sent her an invitation in return. She was here quite a long time."
"I was very busy that day," the old woman said. "I very much wished to come, but I could not get away. Tell me, did Uncle Chen see Mistress Ximen?"
"He did not, indeed," Chunmei said. "He scolded me terribly because I invited her. He was very angry because I helped her and said I have no memory. Wu Dian'en, he says, should have punished the boy and dragged Mistress Ximen into the case. He says we ought to have left them alone and not bothered about them, because she treated us badly."
"I can understand his feelings," old woman Xue said, "but I don't think we ought to remember the things of the past forever."
"I had accepted her presents, and I could do no less than invite her," Chunmei said. "I have no wish to return evil for evil."
"No," old woman Xue said, "and that is why you have got on so well. You have a good heart."
They talked for some time, then old woman Xue picked up her box and went away. Two days later she came again. One of Master Zhu's daughters, a girl about fifteen, wished to marry as she had no mother. Chunmei considered the girl too young and would not agree. Then the old woman came again and suggested Ying Bojue's second daughter, who was twenty-two years old. But Chunmei would not have this either. Bojue was now dead; his daughter's marriage would have to be arranged by her uncle and she was not likely to have any dowry worth mentioning. So she returned their papers. A few days later, old woman Xue came again with some artificial flowers. She brought with her a proposal of marriage. On it was written: 'The eldest daughter of the silk merchant Ge Yuanwai. Her animal is the Cock. She was born at the hour of the Rat, on the fifteenth day of the eleventh month.'
"Her name is Ge Cuiping," the old woman said. "She is as beautiful as a picture. She is not tall, and her face is shaped like a watermelon seed. She is gentle, well-mannered and clever with her needle. Her parents are both alive and in good circumstances. Her father keeps a silk shop in the High Street and does business in Suzhou, Hangzhou, and Nanjing. We are not likely to find anyone more suitable. Besides, the furniture her father is sending with her is all of the Nanjing make."
"Let us settle this," Chunmei said. She told the old woman to take word to the other party at once. When she came to Ge's place, the silk merchant found that she came from Zhou's house and sent for another go-between, called Zhang, to go back with old woman Xue. Chunmei got ready two packets of tea leaves, dainties, and fruits, and asked the Second Lady to go to Ge's place and see the girl. The Second Lady, when she came back, said that the girl was really very pretty. She looked like a flower, she said, and the family seemed to be a good one. Chunmei found a day of good omen for the betrothal. She sent the girl sixteen different kinds of fruit and food, two sets of ornaments, two sets of flowers and pearls, four wine sets, two sheep, a hairnet, and a complete outfit of gold and silver pins and rings. She sent two silk gowns and dresses for all the year round, with silk and cloth and twenty taels of silver. This was for the betrothal day.
The Master of the Yin Yang selected the eighth day of the sixth month for the wedding. Chunmei asked old woman Xue if the girl had a maid. "No," the old woman said, "her father will supply her with all her furniture, but no maid."
"Then we must buy a girl about thirteen or fourteen years old for her," Chunmei said.
The old woman promised to bring a girl the next day and did so. She was thirteen years old and came from the household of Huang the Fourth, the merchant. Huang and Li the Third had got into trouble over the official finances; they were arrested and thrown into prison and stayed there for more than a year. Li the Third died in jail, and his son was taken in his place. Their property was all sold. Laibao's son had run away and become a groom for some stranger. Laibao, Chunmei discovered, had changed his name to Tang Bao. He was mixed up in this affair.
"How much do they ask for the girl?" Chunmei said.
"Four taels and a half," the old woman said. "They want the money very badly so that they can pay off the authorities."
"Four and a half's too much," Chunmei said. "Give them three and a half and I'll have the girl." She gave the old woman the money and so the matter was settled. She called the girl Jinqian. On the 8 th day of the sixth month, Chunmei put on a pearl headdress, a crimson gown with broad sleeves, a girdle with gold ornaments and jade buckle, and went to meet the bride. She was carried by four men in a large sedan chair and a band of musicians and lantern bearers went with her. Chen Jingji rode on a white horse with a silver-mounted saddle. Soldiers marched before him. He wore a scholar's hat and a black silk gown, a pair of black boots with white soles and a pair of golden flowers in his hair. He seemed like the rain that visits the land after a long drought, or like a man who meets an old friend in a foreign land. Indeed, the happiest day in a man's life is that on which he marries, or passes his examination. The bride's sedan chair came to Major Zhou's place. She was veiled in a veil of scarlet embroidery and carried a vase. When she had entered the great gateway, the Master of the Yin Yang took her to the hall. When the ceremonies were over, she was taken to her own room. Chunmei watched and then came away. When the Master of the Yin Yang had finished what he had to do, the bride and bridegroom sat together for a while. Then Jingji mounted a horse and paid a call upon his father-in-law to thank him for giving him his daughter. When he came back, he was drunk. That night this very lively young man and the beautiful maiden enjoyed the first pleasures of their marriage. They were as happy as 2 lovebirds and as merry as fishes in the water. On the third day after the wedding, Chunmei gave a feast in the hall of the inner court. Musicians were engaged and friends and relatives were invited. Every day, Chunmei asked the young couple to take their meals with her. She called the bride her sister. They were so much together that the maids and serving women looked upon the new bride with respect. Chunmei gave them three rooms in the west courtyard and the rooms were papered until they looked like a cave of snow. New curtains and blinds were fitted. Jingji's study was outside the courtyard. There he kept a bed, tables, and some old books, and there he attended to Major Zhou's correspondence. There, too, Chunmei came to him, not always for conversation only.

121
Ch'en Ching-chi Opens a Tavern in Lin-ch'ing; Han Ai-chieh Encounters a Lover in a Bordello & Wang Liu'er's Return

If the heart is content even a thatched cottage seems ample;
If one's feelings are calm even vegetable roots smell sweet.
The fewer worldly desires one has the more beneficial it is;
When human relations are tepid they are more likely to last.[1]
If one depends on others in order to attain one's ambitions;
In trying to avoid trouble one will deal with local tyrants.[2]
One may achieve an exalted level of distinction for the day;
But it will end with inevitable extinction in years to come.

One day, Commandant Chou Hsiu, and the prefect of Chi-nan prefecture Chang Shu-yeh, in command of their infantry and cavalry, completed a successful campaign against the outlaws in Liang-shan Marsh; and the thirty-six leaders of the band, under the command of their chieftain Sung Chiang, along with their more than ten thousand followers, agreed to accept the offer of an imperial amnesty, so that peace was restored in the affected territory. When this was reported to the throne, the Emperor was greatly pleased and promoted Chang Shu-yeh to the positions of censor-in-chief and pacification commissioner of Shantung, and Commandant Chou Hsiu to the post of commander-general of Chi-nan, with the responsibility for patrolling the waterways and hunting down the bandits in his jurisdiction. The Emperor also decreed that the meritorious officers who had participated in the campaign should all be promoted one grade. Since Ch'en Ching-chi's name had been listed in the roster, he was raised to the rank of counselor, with a salary of two piculs of rice per month, and the right to distinguish himself by wearing an official cap and girdle.[3]
During the middle decade of the tenth month, Commandant Chou Hsiu, with his imperial commission in hand, led the infantry and cavalry under his command on their way home and sent a messenger ahead to report the situation to Ch'un-mei and let the household know about it. Ch'un-mei was as pleased as could be and sent Ch'en Ching-chi, along with Chang Sheng and Li An, to go outside the city to welcome him. A feast was prepared in the reception hall of their residence, to celebrate his official promotion, and the number of his fellow officials and others who came to offer congratulations and proffer gifts was so great they could hardly be counted. When the commandant alighted from his horse and came back to the rear hall, Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang were there to receive him and pay their respects. Ch'en Ching-chi divested himself of his commoner's costume, put on a scarlet round-collared gown, an official cap, black boots, and a girdle with a rhinoceros horn plaque, and came out with his new wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing. When the two of them had paid their respects to him, and the commandant saw that she was a good-looking girl, he rewarded her with a set of clothing and ten taels of silver, which she could use to make head ornaments for herself. But no more of this.
That evening, as Ch'un-mei and the commandant enjoyed drinking wine together in their room, they could not avoid bringing up some mundane household matters, and Ch'un-mei said, "The arrangements for my cousin's marriage cost a good deal."
"Ai-ya," responded the commandant. "Your only relative is this cousin, who has sought refuge with you. If he were to be without a wife, it would not bode well for his future prospects. Even though it has cost us a few taels of silver, it has not been spent on some unrelated person."
"And now you have secured this prospect of advancement for him," remarked Ch'un-mei. "It is more than enough to distinguish him."
"The Emperor's edict has already come down," the commandant went on to say, "so that, any day now, I will have to go to Chi-nan prefecture to assume my office. I will leave you behind to look after the household, and you should provide your cousin with some capital so he can hire a manager, and open a business of some kind. Every third or fifth day, he can go to inspect the books, and he ought to be able to make enough in the way of profit this way to support himself."
"What you propose makes sense," responded Ch'un-mei.
That evening, the two of them enjoyed each other as husband and wife, but there is no need to describe this in detail.
The commandant remained at home for another ten days or so, but during the first decade of the eleventh month, he proceeded to get his baggage together and set out to assume his office in Chi-nan prefecture; taking Chang Sheng and Li An with him, and leaving his servants Chou Jen and Chou I to look after the household. He was seen off by Ch'en Ching-chi, who accompanied him as far as the Temple of Eternal Felicity south of the city before returning home.
One day, Ch'un-mei consulted with Ch'en Ching-chi and said, "The commandant suggested, thus and so, that you should open a business of some kind in the canal port of Lin-ch'ing, and hire a manager to run it for you, in the hope of making enough profit to help support the household."
On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi was as pleased as could be. One day, while he was walking along the street in the process of looking for a manager, it was one of those occasions when:
Something was destined to happen.
Unexpectedly, he ran into his old friend Lu the Second, or Lu Ping-i, who bowed to him and said, "Brother, why is it that I haven't seen you for such a long time?"
Ch'en Ching-chi responded by telling him about the death of his wife and continued, "That rascal Yang Kuang-yen made off with half a boatload of my goods, leaving me:
As poor as though I had been utterly cleaned out;
but I am all right again now. Luckily, my female cousin married into the household of Commandant Chou Hsiu, and they arranged another marriage for me. I have subsequently been raised to the rank of counselor and granted the right to distinguish myself by wearing an official cap and girdle. Right now, I am engaged in looking for a manager to run a business for me. But I haven't been able to find one anywhere."
"That rascal Yang Kuang-yen," said Lu Ping-i, "after stealing your merchandise, hired a manager surnamed Hsieh and opened a large tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, known as the Hsieh Family Tavern. With the profits he makes he acts as a money-lender, making loans to the unlicensed prostitutes and singing girls who gather there from the four quarters in the effort to make a living, and collects substantial sums in the way of interest from them. Every day, he wears fine clothing, eats good meat, and rides around on a donkey. Every three or five days, he goes down to the dock to look over the accounts and collect his profits, while utterly ignoring his former friends. His younger brother, Yang Erh-feng, operates a gambling den in his home and engages in cock-fighting and the raising of dogs. Nobody dares to cross him."
"I ran into him last year," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "and he not only turned against me without any feeling but started to give me a beating, from which I was lucky enough to be rescued by a friend. My hatred for him has infused the marrow of my bones."
He then pulled Lu the Second into a tavern by the side of the road, where they went upstairs to have a drink together.
During their discussion, he asked, "How am I to deal with him in order to vent this anger of mine?"
Lu Ping-i responded with the words, "As the saying goes:
He whose hatred is petty is no gentleman;
He who lacks ruthlessness is not a hero.
If we were to attempt to reason with him, since he is the sort of person who:
Before seeing his own coffin will not shed tears of repentance, he is certain not to concede anything. But I have an alternative plan to propose. Brother, there is no need for you to engage in any other business activity. Simply write out a legal accusation against him and submit it to your commandant's yamen. If you are able to recover your stolen goods and silver, you should be able to take over this tavern of his, invest some additional capital in it, and form a partnership with the manager Hsieh the Third. I could then cooperate with Hsieh the Third in operating the business on the dock, and all you would have to do is visit the premises every three or five days to inspect the accounts. I am absolutely sure that in a single month you should be able to realize a profit of more than a hundred taels of silver. That would be preferable to trying to start any other kind of business."
Gentle reader take note: This suggestion that Lu Ping-i made at the time would have the result of causing several people to:
Die an untimely death.[4]
As for Ch'en Ching-chi:
The manner of his death would be altogether too tragic;
The manner of his demise would be entirely too grievous.[5]
The nature of his death was as terrible as that of Li Ts'un-hsiao of the Five Dynasties, and that of P'eng Yüeh of the Han Dynasty.[6] Truly:
Though it may not be determined by fate;
It owes nothing at all to one's efforts.
When Ch'en Ching-chi heard this proposal, he promptly bowed to Lu Ping-i and said, "Worthy Brother, what you say makes sense. As soon as I get home, I'll take it up with my cousin and her husband. If this undertaking is successful, I'll put you and Hsieh the Third in charge of the enterprise."
Thereupon, when the two of them had finished their wine and gone downstairs to pay the bill, Ch'en Ching-chi said to Lu the Second, "Brother, be sure to keep this to yourself. If it should work out, I'll come to thank you for it."
"I understand," responded Lu the Second, and the two of them then went their separate ways.
When Ch'en Ching-chi had explained the proposal in detail to Ch'un-mei, he went on to say, "But His Honor is not here right now, so what are we to do?"
The senior servant Chou Chung happened to be standing by their side and said, "That's no problem. If Uncle will write out an accusation, indicating how much money and merchandise he lost, and include one of His Honor's calling cards with it, I will deliver it to the two officials at the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission. When this Yang Kuang-yen is brought before the bench and subjected to a beating in the squeezers, there is no reason to fear that the rascal will not cough up the money."
Ch'en Ching-chi was delighted by this proposal and proceeded at once to write out an accusation, seal it up in an envelope with one of the commandant's calling cards, and send the senior servant Chou Chung to take it to the office of the Provincial Surveillance Commission.

The two officials were sitting on the bench at the time, in the process of conducting a hearing, when the gatekeeper came in and reported, "His Honor Chou Hsiu, the commandant of the Regional Military Command, has sent someone to deliver a document to you."
The officials Ho Yung-shou and Chang Mao-te called for Chou Chung to come before them and inquired about His Honor Chou Hsiu's assumption of the office to which he had recently been promoted. After listening to his explanation, upon opening the envelope and examining the accusation and the calling card, they felt inclined to do Chou Hsiu a favor.
Agreeing forthwith to accept the case, they sent detectives and constables to the port of Lin-ch'ing to arrest Yang Kuang-yen and gave return cards to Chou Chung, saying, "When you get home, convey our regards to His Honor and his wife, and tell them that when we succeed in recovering the missing money, they can send someone here to collect it."
Chou Chung took the return cards back to the commandant's yamen and told Ch'un-mei, "They agreed forthwith to send people to arrest him and said that as soon as they succeed in recovering the money, you can send someone to collect it."
When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the two accordion-bound cards read, "Respectfully presented by your pupils Ho Yung-shou and Chang Mao-te," he was utterly delighted.
In less than two days time, the detectives, inspectors, and constables from the Provincial Surveillance Commission who had been dispatched to the port of Lin-ch'ing succeeded in arresting Yang Kuang-yen and his younger brother Yang Erh-feng and bringing them back to the yamen. The two officials there interrogated them on the basis of Ch'en Ching-chi's accusation and, upon subjecting them to a beating in the squeezers and several days of incarceration, succeeded in recovering the sum of 350 taels of silver, and a hundred bolts of porous ramie fabric. In addition, the tableware from the tavern was estimated to be worth 50 taels of silver. In Ch'en Ching-chi's accusation he claimed to be due a reparation of 900 taels of silver, so they were still short 350 taels. They sold their home for 50 taels of silver, but their property was then completely exhausted. Ch'en Ching-chi was thus allowed the right to take over his stake in the Hsieh Family Tavern, and he entered into a partnership with the owner Fatty Hsieh, or Hsieh the Third. Ch'un-mei also provided the sum of 500 taels of silver, so that he had a capital of a thousand taels of silver, and he appointed Lu Ping-i to be his manager. He also had the tavern entirely redecorated, repainting and varnishing it, and decorating it with pictures, so that:
The balustrades were sparkling,
The rafters appeared brand new,
The tables looked shiny bright,
The wine and food well ordered.
On the day that it reopened:
Drums and music resounded to the heavens,
Pipes and flutes were blown harmoniously;
attracting the patronage of itinerant merchants and singing girls from the four quarters. Ch'en Ching-chi celebrated the occasion by sacrificing a pig and burning paper money. As the sayings go:
If you unplug the jug, it will make three people drunk;
If you uncork the flagon, the aroma will spread far off.[7]
Spirits and immortals have deposited their jade girdles;
Ministers and councilors have pawned their golden sables.[8]
When Ch'en Ching-chi climbed to the top of the large tavern, he found himself surrounded by translucent latticed windows that could be pushed open, and balustrades embellished with green varnish.
In all four directions, clouded peaks rise in piles;[9]
Above and below, the sky and the water appear to meet.[10]
To the east, dimly appear the spiraling blue peaks of Mount T'ai;
To the west, impenetrable dark mists shroud
the imperial capital;
To the north, the red structures of wealthy homes rise in layers;
To the south, the Huai River's vast extent is like a strip of silk.
Above and below, the tavern had more than a hundred compartments.
Room after room houses the dancing skirts of singing girls;
Floor after floor reverberates with lively pipes and strings.[11]
Words are inadequate to describe the scene:
The viands are piled as high as hills;
The wine flows as copiously as waves.
Truly, it is a case of:
The dancing continued till the moon in the pavilion amid the willows hung low;
The singing went on until the breeze underneath the peach-blossom fans expired.[12]
It was the middle of the first month when Ch'en Ching-chi reopened the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock in Lin-ch'ing, and he cleared as much as thirty-five taels of silver per day. It was managed jointly by Fatty Hsieh and Lu Ping-i, who served together behind the counter. Every three or five days, Ch'en Ching-chi would ride a horse, accompanied by his servant Little Chiang, and go to the port of Lin-ch'ing to look over the accounts. Whenever he came, the two managers Lu Ping-i and Fatty Hsieh would prepare a clean room on an upper story of the building that was provided with a curtained bedstead, furnished with tables and chairs, and replastered so that it was as spotless as a snow grotto. They would prepare a feast for him there, and assign four good-looking powdered faces to keep him company. The "cribber" Ch'en the Third would look after seeing that he was supplied with wine.
One day, on the third day of the third month, when spring was at its most beautiful, and the landscape was suffused with floral fragrance:
With their green hues, the locusts and willows populate the banks;
With their rich reds, the apricots and peaches shine like brocade.
Ch'en Ching-chi, on an upper floor of the tavern, leaned over the green balustrade and contemplated the scene below, which was alive with activity. There is a poem that testifies to this:
Tossed by the wind, enshrouded in mist,
the brocade banner flutters;
During this era of great peace the days
are beginning to grow longer.
Wine is capable of enhancing the courage
of even a stouthearted hero;
And is equally effective at alleviating
the depression of a beauty.
Deep within the three-foot long branches
on the willow-lined bank;
The tavern's signpost rises at an angle
beside the apricot trees.
The stalwart who has yet to accomplish
his lifelong ambition;
Is prone to sing haughtily as he enters
the Land of Drunkenness.[13]
One day,[14] Ch'en Ching-chi happened to look out the rear window of his chamber on an upper floor of the tavern that overlooked the canal and noticed that there were two barges moored there, loaded with trunks, tables, benches, and other household effects, which four or five workers were moving into an empty suite on the ground floor. There were also two women on the barges, one of whom was middle-aged and tall of stature, with a rosewood complexion; while the other was a young woman, given to:
Putting on rouge and applying powder, who had an attractive pale complexion and was about twenty years old. The two of them also proceeded to go into the empty suite below.
Ch'en Ching-chi approached Manager Hsieh and demanded to know, "Who are those people who, without asking our permission, are taking it upon themselves to move into our building?"
"They are two women who have come from the Eastern Capital," explained Manager Hsieh. "Having failed to locate their relatives, and being unable to locate a dwelling on such short notice, they asked our neighbor Old Man Fan if they could stay here for two or three days before moving on. I was planning to report this to you sir, but you have asked me about it before I was able to do so."
Ch'en Ching-chi was about to give vent to his anger when he saw the young woman approach him respectfully with straightened skirts and bow deeply, saying, "Pray abate your wrath, sir. Your manager is not at fault. It was we who took the liberty:
For lack of an alternative,[15] of moving in before coming to ask your permission.
I can only hope that you will forgive us.
If you will permit us to remain here for three to five days, we will respectfully reimburse you upon moving out."
When Ch'en Ching-chi saw that the young woman had a way with words, he proceeded to look her over from top to toe, while the woman glanced back at him with her pair of starry eyes.
Their mutual feelings were visible in their four eyes;
They found they were unable to control their emotions.
As for Ch'en Ching-chi:
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
"I must have met her somewhere before, she looks so familiar."
The middle-aged woman who was tall of stature looked hard at Ch'en Ching-chi and said, "Sir, are you not Son-in-law Ch'en from the household of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing?"
Ch'en Ching-chi was startled by this and said, "How were you able to recognize me?"
"I will not deceive you," the woman replied. "I am the wife of his former manager Han Tao-kuo, and this girl is my daughter Ai-chieh."
"The two of you were residing in the Eastern Capital," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "so how have you happened to turn up here? And where is your husband?"
"He is on one of the barges, looking after our belongings," the woman replied.
Ch'en Ching-chi immediately responded by ordering a waiter to go invite him into his presence. Before long, Han Tao-kuo came in and greeted him with a bow. His hair and whiskers had already begun to turn gray.
He then went on to explain the recent events in the capital, saying, "At court, Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, Defender-in-chief T'ung Kuan, Minister of the Right Li Pang-yen, Defender-in-chief Chu Mien, Defender-in-chief Kao Ch'iu, and Eunuch Director Li Yen, all six of them, have been impeached in a memorial to the throne by the national university student Ch'en Tung.[16] His allegations have subsequently been supported by numerous other memorials from the supervising secretaries and censors. As a result, an imperial edict has come down, ordering them to be remanded to the Three Judicial Offices for interrogation, and they have been sentenced to perpetual military servitude in areas suffering from poisonous miasmas. [17] The grand preceptor's son, Minister of Rites Ts'ai Yu, has been executed, and his property has been confiscated by the state. The three of us were forced to flee for our lives and made our way to my younger brother Han the Second's place in Ch'ing-ho district, only to find that his house has been sold, and that he has fled to who knows where. The three of us, consequently, hired barges and traveled here on the canal, but we scarcely anticipated that we would run into you here.
Such good fortune would suffice for three lives."
He then went on to ask, "Son-in-law, are you still a member of His Honor Hsi-men Ch'ing's household?"
Ch'en Ching-chi explained the preceding events, saying, "I am no longer a member of his household but am serving as a counselor in the household of my cousin's husband Commandant Chou Hsiu and have been granted the right to distinguish myself by wearing an official cap and girdle. At present, I am supporting myself by operating this tavern on the dock with the help of two managers. Since you have run into me, there is no reason for you to move out. It will not be a problem if you choose to reside here for a while. Please feel free to do as you like."
The woman and Han Tao-kuo both kowtowed to him in gratitude and, after finishing their conversation, went back to moving their belongings off the barges.
As he looked on, Ch'en Ching-chi was moved to tell his servant Little Chiang and the "cribber" Ch'en the Third to help them move some of their things, at which Wang Liu-erh said, "There is no need, Son-in-law, for you to go to such trouble on our behalf."
They were both pleased at this exchange, and Ch'en Ching-chi went on to say, "After all, you and I were originally members of the same household. What need is there to quibble about it?"
When Ch'en Ching-chi noticed that:
The light was beginning to wane, and that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon, he decided to go home and told his managers to take care of supplying their new tenants with boxes of tea and goodies in the morning. He then mounted his horse and set out for home, accompanied by his servant. All night long:
His every thought and every consideration,[18]

was concentrated on Han Ai-chieh, whom he could not put out of his mind.
After spending a day at home, on the following day, he got up early, dressed himself appropriately, and returned to the tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing, accompanied by his servant Little Chiang, where he proceeded to look on for a while as his managers conducted their business.
Han Tao-kuo happened to send a servant over to invite him to come to their quarters for a serving of tea. Ch'en Ching-chi had been hoping for a chance to see Han Ai-chieh again, so when the servant arrived with his invitation, he promptly got up and went inside.
Lo and behold, Han Ai-chieh came out to meet him and greeted him with:
Such a smile you could have plucked it off her face;
bowing to him, and saying, "Sir, please come in and take a seat."
Ch'en Ching-chi went into the chamber and sat down, while Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh came out to keep him company. It did not take them long to finish a serving of tea, as they chatted back and forth about their memories of the past. While this was going on, Ch'en Ching-chi gazed continually at Han Ai-chieh, while Ai-chieh's pair of eyes, like autumn ripples, were fixed infatuatedly on Ch'en Ching-chi. It was clear that they both had the same idea in mind. There is a poem that testifies to this:
Her narrow and upturned shoe-tips are formed of florid silk;
Her fragrant flesh and creamy breasts resemble sculpted jade.
Her lovely person is hardly sustained by her lissome waist;
A bosomful of unexpressed resentment
puckers her eyebrows.[19]
After a little while, Han Tao-kuo went outside, and Han Ai-chieh turned to Ch'en Ching-chi and asked, "Sir, how old are you?"
"I'm twenty-five," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "May I make bold to ask, sister, how old are you?"
Han Ai-chieh smiled at this, and said, "Sir:
We must have been fated to meet.[20]
I, too, am twenty-five years old. We met each other as members of His Honor's household in the past, and now we have been fortunate enough to meet again. Truly:
Those with affinities will meet though separated by a thousand li."
When Wang Liu-erh observed that the conversation between them had started to warm up, she sensed what was going on and made an excuse to go out herself, leaving the two of them sitting together face to face. Han Ai-chieh then resorted to the use of suggestive language in the endeavor to entice Ch'en Ching-chi. Ch'en Ching-chi, who had been familiar with such matters since his youth, could not fail to understand her intentions and started to get up and leave.
This Han Ai-chieh had colluded with her mother in plying this trade during their journey from the Eastern Capital; and while she had resided in the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching, she had served as majordomo Chai Ch'ien's concubine. When it came to poetry, lyrics, songs, or rhapsodies, as well as the works of the hundred schools, she was acquainted with them all, and there was little she was not familiar with.
Upon seeing Ch'en Ching-chi get up and prepare to go out, and observing that they were alone, she went up close to him and sat down, affecting the:
Coquetry and petulance of a spoiled child, as she said, "Sir, let me take a look at that gold pin in your hair."
Ch'en Ching-chi was about to pull it out for her, when Han Ai-chieh grasped the knot of hair on top of his head with her hand and pulled out the pin, whereupon she stood up and said, "Why don't the two of us go upstairs and have a word together?"
As she spoke, on the one hand, and walked out, on the other, Ch'en Ching-chi felt compelled to follow her up the stairs. Truly:
Though you may be as devious as any demon,
You'll drink the water she's washed her feet in.
Ch'en Ching-chi followed her upstairs and then said, "Sister, what is it you want to say?"
Han Ai-chieh responded by saying, "You and I have:
A predestined affinity for each other.[21]
There is no need for you to pretend otherwise.
Let us share our fervor on pillow and mat,[22] Enjoying the pleasures of connubial bliss."
"I fear we may be discovered by the people here," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "That would never do."
Han Ai-chieh, displaying a variety of voluptuous airs, hugged Ch'en Ching-chi around the waist and proceeded to pull down his trousers with her dainty jade-white hands. Both of them felt that:
Their lascivious excitement burned like fire,
And it proved utterly impossible to suppress.[23]
Han Ai-chieh felt driven to take off her clothes and recline face-up on the bed, where they proceeded to engage in intercourse with each other. Truly:
With lustful daring as big as the sky,
what is there to fear?
Amid mandarin duck curtains the clouds and rain:
a lifetime of passion.
In the course of their engagement, Ch'en Ching-chi asked, "What number are you known by?"
"I was born on the Dragon Boat Festival on the fifth day of the fifth month," responded Han Ai-chieh, "so I am known as Han the Fifth, but my personal name is Ai-chieh."
In no time at all, after:
The clouds dispersed and the rain evaporated, they sat down next to each other, and Han Ai-chieh proceeded to say to Ch'en Ching-chi, "Ever since the time that the three of us fled from the Eastern Capital but were unable to locate our relatives, we have been short of living expenses. If you have the silver on hand, I beg you to lend five taels to my father. I will take the responsibility to repay you with interest. Pray don't refuse this request."
Ch'en Ching-chi agreed to her request, saying, "That's no problem. You have but to open your mouth and I will weigh out five taels of silver for you."
When Han Ai-chieh saw that he had agreed, she returned his gold pin to him, and the two of them then went on to sit together for what seemed like half a day.
Fearing that they might be subject to gossip, they drank a serving of tea, and Han Ai-chieh invited him to have lunch with her, but Ch'en Ching-chi said, "I've got something to do elsewhere, so I won't eat anything, but I'll send you the money you asked for in a little while."
Han Ai-chieh went on to say, "This afternoon, I will prepare a meager cup of watery wine to share with you. Pray don't refuse my invitation, sir, but come back to see me, no matter what."
When Ch'en Ching-chi had eaten lunch in the tavern's office, he took a casual stroll in the street and happened to run into his former fellow disciple from the Yen-kung Temple, Chin Tsung-ming, whom he greeted with a bow and regaled with the story of his subsequent adventures.
"Worthy brother," responded Chin Tsung-ming, "I did not know that you had been acknowledged as a relative by the household of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu, or that you had opened a thriving business in that tavern.
I have been remiss in not coming to pay my respects.[24]
Tomorrow, I will send a junior disciple to deliver a gift of tea to you. Please come to the temple for a visit when you have the time to do so."
Upon finishing their conversation, Chin Tsung-ming went back to the temple.
When Ch'en Ching-chi returned to the tavern, Manager Lu Ping-i reported to him, "That fellow named Han who is residing here has invited you for a drink, but I didn't know where to find you."
By a lucky coincidence, Han Tao-kuo's servant happened to come back at this point and said, "You are invited, sir, and your two managers are invited as well to keep you company. There are no other guests."
Ch'en Ching-chi, along with his two managers, then proceeded to go into their room, where a repast had already been neatly laid out, consisting of fish, pork, vegetables, fruits, and the like. Ch'en Ching-chi sat down in the place of honor, while Han Tao-kuo assumed the position of host, and Lu Ping-i and Fatty Hsieh were seated to either side. Wang Liu-erh and Han Ai-chieh sat down respectfully on the sidelines, while their servant came back and forth to serve the wine and refreshments.
After drinking a few cups of wine, the two managers, sensing what was afoot, said, "Sir, pray continue to drink at your leisure. The two of us will go back and man the counter."
So saying, they got up and left.
Ch'en Ching-chi was not accustomed to drinking heavily, but when he saw that the managers had left, he relaxed and downed another few cups of wine with the three members of the Han family, until he began to feel somewhat intoxicated.
Han Ai-chieh then ventured to say to him, "Sir, today there is no need for you to go home."
"It is already too late for me to return home by now," said Ch'en Ching-chi. "I might as well go home tomorrow."
When Wang Liu-erh and Han Tao-kuo had drunk with them for a while, they went downstairs, and Ch'en Ching-chi then pulled five taels of silver out of his sleeve and presented it to Han Ai-chieh, who went down and turned it over to Wang Liu-erh, before coming back upstairs. What with:
The sharing of glasses and passing of cups,
Hugging the turquoise and cuddling the red,
they then continued drinking together until the evening fell, at which point Han Ai-chieh:
Divested herself of her fancy attire,[25] and invited Ch'en Ching-chi to spend the night with her in her upstairs room. On this occasion, what with:
Oaths by the pillowside to be faithful as the hills,
Promises under the quilts to be as true as the seas;
Giving forth oriole's notes and swallow's cries,
They enjoyed to the full their mutual affection;[26]
But it is impossible to evoke all that they did.[27]
When Han Ai-chieh had gone to the Eastern Capital, where she resided in the household of Grand Preceptor Ts'ai Ching and waited upon his elderly wife, she had learned to play musical instruments and sing, and also acquired the ability to read and write. Upon hearing about this, Ch'en Ching-chi:
Felt unable to constrain his pleasure,[28] and found himself as attracted to her, as he had been to P'an Chin-lien. Consequently, the two of them proceeded to:
Frolic together the whole evening,[29]
And sleep together all night long.
As a result, they could not avoid sleeping until late the next day and did not get up until lunchtime, when Wang Liu-erh made a pick-me-up for them, containing eggs and pork meatballs, which the two of them consumed, along with several cups of warmed wine.
In a little while, one of his managers came in and invited Ch'en Ching-chi to join them for lunch, whereupon he put on his hairnet, performed his ablutions, got dressed, and went out to eat with them. When he had finished his meal, he came back to take leave of Han Ai-chieh before heading back home, but she did not want to let him go and made a show of shedding tears.
Ch'en Ching-chi responded by saying, "After I get home, I'll come to see you every three or five days. There's no reason for you to get upset."
When he had finished speaking, he mounted his horse and headed back to the city of Ch'ing-ho, accompanied by his servant.
Along the way, he said to Little Chiang, "When we get home you must not say anything about the Han family."
"I understand," responded Little Chiang. "There is no need for you to admonish me."
Upon arriving back at the commandant's residence, Ch'en Ching-chi claimed that business was so brisk at the tavern that by the time he had finished reckoning up the accounts it was too late to come home, so he had stayed overnight. He then handed over to Ch'un-mei the thirty-some taels of silver in the form of profits that had been realized since his last trip before going back to his own quarters.
When he arrived there, he was taken to task by Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who said, "What reason did you have for staying away overnight, unless you were out exploring:
The willow paths and flower lanes,[30] of the licensed quarter? You left me at home, all by myself in an empty room, without a thought for returning home."
Thereafter, she insisted on keeping Ch'en Ching-chi at home for seven or eight days in a row, without letting him return to the dock at Lin-ch'ing. For her part, Han Ai-chieh noticed that he did not return for some time but merely sent Little Chiang to collect the profits from the managers, who wrapped up the silver for him to take home.
As a consequence, Han Tao-kuo felt obliged to have his wife, Wang Liu-erh, entice familiar customers or traveling merchants into their quarters to drink tea or wine. For some time, Han Tao-kuo had enjoyed the convenience of being dependent upon his wife for his livelihood. Moreover, though Wang Liu-erh was forty-five or forty-six years old, and could be said to be middle-aged, she still retained her charm. And now they were lucky enough to have this daughter, who was prepared to take her place, so that the business that was the source of their livelihood would not be interrupted, and they could continue to practice it in the open.
It so happens that when people without any official position, or other source of livelihood, depended on their wives for their support, the latter were known as clandestine harlots, or what are now known as unlicensed prostitutes.
At this time, when Ch'en Ching-chi failed to show up, the wine steward Ch'en the Third arranged for the silk merchant Magnate Ho to patronize Han Ai-chieh. This Magnate Ho, who was about fifty years old and had a thousand taels worth of silk and other piece goods at his disposal, was quite willing to patronize her, but Han Ai-chieh, who was still infatuated with Ch'en Ching-chi, claimed that she was feeling out of sorts and refused:
On three times and five occasions,[31] to come downstairs, which Han Tao-kuo found extremely annoying. But when Magnate Ho observed that Wang Liu-erh was tall of stature, with a rosewood complexion; had a face shaped like a melon seed:
Painted her eyebrows and dressed her hair,[32]
so that she displayed long spit curls; possessed a seductive pair of starry eyes:
The glint in which suggested intoxication; and that her lips were daubed bright red, he surmised that she must be a past master at amorous liaisons; offered a tael of silver for the privilege of sharing a drink in her quarters; and ended up spending the night with her. Han Tao-kuo kept out of the way by sleeping in an outer chamber, while his daughter, Han Ai-chieh, on seeing that her mother was entertaining a customer, remained on the upper floor, without coming down.
From this time on, Magnate Ho was rendered so happy by Wang Liu-erh that the two of them were:
As hot for each other as burning charcoal; and he did not let more than two or three days go by without coming to spend the night with her. Han Tao-kuo, for his part, was thus able to pocket no small amount of his money.
When Han Ai-chieh saw that Ch'en Ching-chi had not come back to see her for more than ten days, she longed for him so that:
Each day was like three months of autumn;

Each night seemed like half a summer.
She couldn't help feeling affected by:
The eye alongside the wood, and
The heart beneath the field.[33]
She therefore sent their servant to the commandant's residence in the city to find out what was going on.
Upon encountering Ch'en Ching-chi's servant Little Chiang, he confidentially inquired, "Why has your master not gone to see her?"
"For the last few days," responded Little Chiang, "he has been feeling out of sorts and has not ventured outside."
When the servant returned and told Han Ai-chieh what he had heard, she consulted with Wang Liu-erh about it and then purchased a set of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two fresh fish, and a box of cookies; after which, in her upstairs room, she:
Ground her ink and picked up her brush,
Spreading out some flowered stationery,[34] and wrote out a note, which she entrusted to the servant to deliver to Ch'en Ching-chi.
She then placed the presents in boxes, turned them over to the servant to carry, and enjoined him, saying, "When you enter the city and see Master Ch'en, you must hand these things over to him personally, and ask him for an answering note."
The servant proceeded to tuck the note into his sleeve and take charge of the gifts, but of the events of his trip there is nothing to tell. Upon entering the city, he went up to the front of the commandant's yamen and sat down on the stone stylobate.
Who should appear at this juncture but the servant Little Chiang, who happened to come outside, and on seeing him asked, "What have you come again for?"
The Han family servant greeted him with a bow and then pulled him to an out-of-the-way spot, saying, "I've come to deliver some gifts to your master and have something to say to him. I'll wait for him here, if you will be good enough to let him know that I'm here."
Little Chiang promptly turned around and went inside, and it was not long before Ch'en Ching-chi swaggered into sight. It was the fifth month at the time, and the weather was swelteringly hot. Ch'en Ching-chi was dressed in an outfit of thin silk, wore a tile-ridged hat, held in place with a gold pin, on his head, while his feet were clad in sandals and white socks.
The Han family servant hastily bowed to him, saying, "Master, are you feeling somewhat better? Han Ai-chieh has commissioned me to deliver a note and some presents to you."
Ch'en Ching-chi accepted the note and said, "Is Han Ai-chieh well?"
"On observing that you have not visited her for so long," he replied, "she is suffering from heartache. She wishes to send you her regards and would like to know when you might come to see her again."
Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to open up the note and saw that it read as follows:
RESPECTFULLY INDITED WITH STRAIGHTENED SKIRTS TO HER LOVER MASTER CH'EN BY HIS HUMBLE CONCUBINE HAN AI-CHIEH.
Ever since parting from your distinguished countenance,[35] my heartfelt admiration for you[36] has not abated even slightly,[37] but has remained suspended and unforgotten in my heart. Since you promised to return, I have been leaning on the door gazing fixedly into the distance [38] but have failed to see you deigning to visit my humble abode. The other day, I sent a servant to ask after you, but he returned without having seen you, [39] although he heard that you were suffering from some ailment. This has filled my breast with such regret that I remain depressed whether sitting or lying down. Alas, I am not able to sprout a pair of wings so that I might fly to your side. Since you possess a captivating wife to love you at home, you cannot be expected to think of me but have spit me out like the seed of a fruit. I am sending you some boxes of savory foods as a meager expression of my sincere concern for you, and I hope that you will accept them with a smile.[40] I trust my sentiments will be apparent as I am unable to express myself more fully.[41]
In addition I am providing a brocade perfume sachet embroidered with mandarin ducks, and containing a lock of my black hair,[42] as a paltry expression of my heartfelt feelings.
The twentieth day of the middle month of summer.

Your humble concubine Han Ai-chieh salutes you.

When Ch'en Ching-chi had read the note, he looked over the perfume sachet and found that it contained a lock of black hair and was embroidered with the motif of two mandarin ducks, and eight characters that read:
Admiringly tendered to my lover,
I'll follow you wherever you go.
He then folded it up as before and concealed it in his sleeve.
There was a wine shop next door to the commandant's yamen, and Ch'en Ching-chi told Little Chiang, "Take the Han family servant into the wine shop to have a drink of wine while he waits for me to write an answering note."
He then went on to tell Little Chiang, "Take these presents into my room, and if the mistress asks anything about them, just say that they were sent to me by Manager Hsieh from our tavern in Lin-ch'ing."
Little Chiang did not dare to be remiss and proceeded to take the four boxes of gifts inside. Ch'en Ching-chi then went into the library and secretively composed an answering note; after which, he wrapped up five taels of silver and, going out to the wine shop, asked the Han family servant if he had enjoyed a drink or not.
"Thank you for the fine wine, sir," the servant responded. "I can't drink any more and am ready to be on my way."
Ch'en Ching-chi gave the silver and the answering note to the servant and said, "When you get home, convey my respects to Han Ai-chieh. These five taels of silver are meant as a contribution toward her living expenses. I will come to see her in the next two or three days."
The Han family servant then went downstairs, and Ch'en Ching-chi escorted him out the door of the wine shop and saw him off.
When Ch'en Ching-chi went into his living quarters, Ko Ts'ui-p'ing asked him, "Who was it who sent these gifts?"
"It was Fatty Hsieh, the manager of the tavern," responded Ch'en Ching-chi. "He had heard that I was not feeling well and sent these gifts as an expression of his concern."
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing believed his explanation. The two of them then, after consulting with each other, sent the maidservant Chin Ch'ien-erh to take a platter with one of the roast ducks, one of the fresh fish, and half a set of the pig's trotters back to the rear compound for Ch'un-mei to eat. She told her that they had been sent by one of the managers of the tavern, and she did not raise any questions about it. Now that this matter has been explained we will say no more about it.
To resume our story, when the Han family servant reached the dock at Lin-ch'ing it was already late in the day, and on entering the door, he handed the silver and the answering note to Han Ai-chieh. On opening the note and perusing it by lamplight, she saw that it read as follows:
RESPECTFULLY ADDRESSED IN REPLY TO THE DRESSING TABLE OF HIS INAMORATA HAN AI-CHIEH.
I am much obliged to you for the generosity you displayed toward me at our previous meeting. The sentiments inspired by our love making, and the affection you displayed on pillow and mat, have not been forgotten. I have been intending to hasten to our expected reunion, but a temporary indisposition has forced me to disappoint your expectations. You have also sent someone to ask after me, and present me with these mouth-watering delicacies, for which my gratitude is impossible to contain. In the next two or three days I should be able to thank you in person. I am also sending you five taels of silver, and a silk handkerchief, as a meager expression of my regard, which I sincerely hope you will accept, and deign to appreciate.

Signed: Respectfully presented by Ch'en Ching-chi

When Han Ai-chieh had read the note, she saw that a poetic quatrain had been inscribed on the handkerchief, that read as follows:
The handkerchief of Wu silk is inscribed
with a palindrome;
From a flourish of my writing brush the ink is still fresh.
I have dedicated it to my affectionate
love Han Ai-chieh;
That we may enjoy the century-long love
of mating phoenixes.[43]
When she had finished reading it, Han Ai-chieh handed over the silver to Wang Liu-erh, and mother and daughter gave vent to:
A thousand or ten thousand signs of joy, in anticipation of Ch'en Ching-chi's return. But no more of this.
Truly:
When a favored friend arrives, one's feelings can never be satiated;
When a real confidant shows up, conversation is mutually agreeable.
A poem testifies to this:

Beneath the green gauze window, I opened the seal of your letter;
The paper with its cloud-soaring geese is redolent with perfume.
I know the flourishes of your brush are done with your jade hand;
But your loving thoughts are seen only in what is left unsaid.

In the house of pleasure
The girls adorn themselves with powder and rouge.
When they are idle, they sit down
Looking at the flowers.
When they hear the old melody, they are sad,
But when they would go back to the old country
Where is now their home?
Before the mirror her cloudy hair is but half dressed;
Her tears flow and her silken gown is wet.
Today, once more, she met Pai Ssū-ma before the wine cups
And told her sorrow, playing the lute.
One day Major Zhou and Zhang Shuye, the magistrate of Jinan, took their forces and attacked the bandits of Liangshan. The thirty-six leaders of the bandits and more than ten thousand of their men were captured and order was restored. The victory was reported to his Majesty. The Emperor was pleased and promoted Zhang to be Censor and Commissioner in Shandong. Zhou was promoted to be general in Jinan to command all the forces there, guard the river, and pursue bandits and thieves wherever they might be. All Zhou's officers were advanced one degree in rank. Chen Jingji's name was put on the list, and he was appointed Counselor. Every month he was to draw two measures of rice. Now he was able to wear ceremonial hat and girdle, much to his delight.
In the middle of the tenth month, the new general was permitted by the Emperor to bring back his soldiers. He sent runners in advance to bring the news to Chunmei. She was delighted. She sent Jingji, Li An and Zhang Sheng to meet her husband outside the city. At the same time she prepared a banquet in the great hall to do honor to her husband. A number of officers came with presents.
When Zhou reached home, he went to the hall in the inner court and there his two wives welcomed him. Jingji, dressed in scarlet ceremonial gown, with hat, boots, and girdle, came with his wife. Zhou admired the bride and gave her a dress with ten taels of silver so that she might have some ornaments made. In the evening. Chunmei and her husband talked over the business of the household.
"My cousin's wedding, I am afraid, has cost you a great deal of money," Chunmei said.
"He is your cousin," Zhou said, "and since he has come to make his home with us, we could hardly leave him without a wife. We have spent some money, it is true, but he is not a stranger."
"Now you have secured this honor for him, it is indeed all that he can ask," Chunmei said.
"His Majesty has commanded me to go to Jinanfu to take up my new appointment," the General said, "but I shall not take you with me. We will give your cousin some money to set him up in business with someone. He need only go to look at the accounts every three or five days. If he makes any profit, it will be something for him to live on."
"That is an excellent idea," Chunmei said. They were very happy together and went to bed.
The General only spent ten days at home. Then he started for Jinan to take up his new appointment. It was the beginning of the eleventh month. He took Zhang Sheng and Li An with him and left Zhou Ren and Zhou Yi to look after his house. Jingji went as far as the Temple of Eternal Felicity to speed the General on his way.
One day Chunmei said to the young man: "My husband thinks you should go into business with a partner. If you make any money, it will be yours."
Jingji was delighted. He went out to find a suitable partner and, by chance, met his old friend Lu Bingyi on the street.
"Brother, I haven't seen you for a very long time," Lu said, bowing.
"My wife died, and I had a lawsuit," Jingji said. "Then Yang the Elder stole all my property and I was completely cleaned out. Now things are better again. My cousin married Major Zhou. I went to her, and she found a wife for me. Now I am a counselor and have the right to wear ceremonial robes and hat. I am looking for someone to go into partnership with me, but I haven't found anybody yet."
"After Yang the Elder stole your things," Lu told him, "he started a wineshop at Linqing. He is a partner of Xie. Besides owning that wine-shop, he is acting as a moneylender and doing very well. He lends to the people of Linqing and especially the singing girls. He wears smart clothes and eats good food. Every few days he gets on a donkey and goes to the wine house to collect his share of the takings. He doesn't care for his old friends any more. His younger brother has turned his place into a gambling den. He still keeps dogs and goes in for cock-fighting, and nobody dares to interfere with him."
"I saw him last year," Jingji said. "Instead of showing me the least kindness, he struck me. Fortunately a friend saved me from him. I hate that man as though my very marrow were imbued with hatred."
He took Lu to a wine house on the street, and they talked of finding a way by which Jingji could get his revenge.
"There is an old saying," Lu said, "that if a gentleman hates at all, he hates well. A great man must have a hand that can deal out ruin. When you come to deal with him, you must remember that unless you see a man's coffin, you do not weep for him. I have an idea. Brother, all you need do is to make out an accusation, send it to the court, and demand the money and goods that Yang stole from you. We can get his wine house. Then we need only add a little capital and carry on the place as a business ourselves. I will go and help Xie to manage it, and you can come every few days to go through the accounts. I am sure you would make more than a hundred taels a month. I can think of nothing else that would pay so well."
"Brother, you are right," Jingji said. "I will go and speak to my cousin and her husband about it. If we can get hold of that business, I will let you and Xie manage it."
They drank their wine, went downstairs and paid the reckoning. Jingji impressed upon his companion the necessity for keeping the matter secret, and they parted. When he got home, he mentioned the matter to Chunmei. "The General is not at home," he said. "What can we do about it?"
Zhang Sheng was there. He said: "Uncle, all you need do is to write out your accusation and say how much was stolen. Then seal it up with the General's card and I will send it to the magistrates. They will certainly order Yang's arrest, and, when he has been punished, we shall get the money."
Jingji wrote out an accusation at once. He put the General's card with it and gave it to Zhou Zhong to take to the courts. When Zhou Zhong came in, the two magistrates were in the hall hearing a case, but when they heard that Zhou had sent them a letter they called Zhou Zhong before them at once. They asked him about his master's new appointment, then opened the envelope and took out the card and the accusation. They were only too anxious to do anything for the General and issued a warrant for Yang's arrest at once. Then they gave Zhou Zhong a return card, and said: "Give our respects to your mistress and tell her that we will send you word when we get the money out of Yang." Zhou Zhong took the card and went home.
"The magistrates ordered Yang's arrest," he told Chunmei. "They say we have only to wait, and they will get the money back for us." Jingji looked at the card. It bore the words: "He Yongshou and Zhang Maode kowtow." He was very pleased. Two days later, the Yang brothers were arrested and the magistrates tried them upon the accusation Jingji had brought against them. They beat them and cast them into prison. Then the two Yangs gave up three hundred and fifty taels of silver, a hundred rolls of cloth, and the wineshop was valued at fifty taels. The total sum that Chen Jingji had mentioned was nine hundred taels, so they were still three hundred and fifty taels short. Yang sold his house for fifty, and was utterly ruined. Thus Jingji came into possession of the great wine house and went into partnership with Xie. Chunmei gave him five hundred taels more, so that he had a thousand taels in all. He made Lu Bingyi his manager. They redecorated the whole place, painted the walls, and brightened up the balconies. Everything was made to look new, even the tables.

It was about the middle of the first month when Jingji started this business, and every day they took thirty or fifty taels. Xie and Lu managed everything between them, and Jingji only came every few days. He used to ride there on horseback with a boy in attendance, and Lu and Xie always had an especially beautiful room prepared for him upstairs. They gave him wine and food and picked out the most beautiful singing girls for his benefit. Chen the Third was a waiter there.

One day in the third month, the Spring was bright and beautiful and everything sweet and fragrant. The willows and the locust trees on the banks of the river were wonderfully green, and the pink apricot and peach flowers seemed like embroidery. Jingji, leaning on the railing of his balcony, admired the exquisite scene.

The breeze blows softly
The mist enwraps the embroidered earth like a mantle.
In this season of peace the days grow longer
The hero's spirit grows lighter
And the beautiful maidens are happy once more.
The willows on the river's bank lengthen their branches
A pole is set beside the apricot tree.
The young man has not done all he would Yet now he can enjoy the singing
And make his way into the world of dreams
To which wine leads.

As Jingji was looking down, he saw two small boats draw to the wharf. They were weighed down by boxes and furniture. Four or five men began to carry these things to the rooms downstairs. On the boat were two women, one middle-aged, tall, and dark-complexioned; the other young and very fair, her face powdered. She seemed about twenty years old. They entered the wine house.

"Who are they?" Jingji said to Xie. "Why did they walk in so haughtily instead of asking leave?"

"They have come from the Eastern Capital to visit a kinsman," Xie told him. "They cannot find a house, so they asked our neighbor Fan to give them a room. They are only going to stay two or three days. I was going to tell you about them when you asked me."

Jingji felt annoyed, but the younger of the two women came and made a reverence to him. "Sir," she said, "please do not be angry. It is not your manager's fault, but mine. We need a room so much that we came without giving you notice. I am very sorry. We shall stay only for a few days. Then we will pay for our rooms and go away."

Jingji listened to these soothing words and looked at the young woman from head to foot. She gazed at him with star-like eyes. Jingji thought: "I have seen this woman before." Then he looked at the other woman, and she looked hard at him.

"Are you not Ximen Qing's son-in-law?" she said to him.

Jingji was taken aback. "How did you know?" he said.

"I am Han Daoguo's wife," the older woman said, "and this is my daughter Han Aijie."

"But you and your husband live in the Eastern Capital," Jingji said. "What are you doing here? Where is your husband?"

"My husband is on the boat seeing to the furniture," the woman said.

Jingji ordered a waiter to go and bring Han. After a while he came. His hair was now white.

"Chen Dong," he said, "of the Imperial Academy, brought an accusation against six of the highest ministers of the Court. They were Cai, the Imperial Tutor; Tong, the Grand Marshal; Li, the Minister of the Right; Grand Marshal Zhu, Grand Marshal Gao, and Grand Chamberlain Li. The Censors supported this indictment, and the Emperor accepted it. They were all arrested, brought before the Supreme Court, and sentenced to banishment for life. Cai Yu, the Imperial Tutor's son, has been executed and his property confiscated. We three ran for our lives. We went first to Qinghe to find my brother, but he has sold my house and disappeared. Then we took a boat and came here. I am very glad to meet you. Are you still in Ximen's household?"

"No," Jingji said, "I left there. Now I am a counselor in General Zhou's department. I have two partners here and keep this wine house for a living. Now that I have met you, I shan't let you go. You must stay here and make this place your own."

Han Daoguo and the women kowtowed to Jingji. They went on moving their things into the wine house. Jingji found things going too slowly, and ordered Chen the Third and a boy to help them. Wang Liu'er thanked him again.

"You really must not thank me," Jingji said. "We belong, as it were, to the same family."

It was late and Jingji began to think of going home. He told his manager to give Han everything he needed to eat and drink. Then he mounted his horse and went home with his boy. All night through, he could do nothing but think of Han Aijie.

Two days later he again dressed himself in his best clothes and went to the wine house with his boy. He attended to his business and then Han Daoguo asked him to take tea. As a matter of fact, he was thinking of going to them when the invitation was brought to him. He went to them. Han Aijie came smiling towards him and made a reverence. Then she asked him to go into their room. Wang Liu'er and Han Daoguo were both there. After tea they talked over past days. Jingji looked at Han Aijie and Aijie looked at him. They soon came to an understanding.

Before very long, Han Daoguo went out. Aijie asked Jingji how old he was, and he asked her. "We are both the same age," she said, smiling. "And we were both members of Ximen's household. Now we meet again here. It would really seem as though Destiny had brought us together over so many miles."

Wang Liu'er saw that they seemed to be on very good terms with one another. She made some excuse and left them. They now sat face to face, alone. Aijie spoke to him with sweet words that he could not fail to understand, for he had been used to the society of women ever since he was a child. He smiled at her.

Both Han Aijie and her mother, on their journey from the Eastern Capital, had done some traffic in their bodies. Now that the girl met Jingji she felt that Heaven had sent him to her. They seemed to understand and love each other without need for words. She came closer and sat beside him.

"Will you show me that gold pin in your hair?" she said. "I should like to look at it." But before he could take it out for her she had taken it out for herself. "Come upstairs," she said, smiling, "and I will tell you something." She led the way and Jingji, who was only waiting for such an opportunity, followed her immediately.

"Sister, what is it you wish to say to me," he asked when they were upstairs.

"You and I have come together today," Aijie said, "and to me it seems that Heaven has ordained our meeting. I am ready to enjoy with you the pleasures of the bed."

"I am grateful to you, Sister," Jingji said, "but aren't you afraid someone may find out?"

She put forth all her powers of fascination. She threw her arms around him and, with her dainty fingers, took down his trousers. Then they gave rein to their passion till they lost all control of themselves. She took off her clothes and gave herself to him.

Jingji asked what place she held in the family. "I was born on the Summer Day," she told him, "and they called me the Fifth Maid, but my name is Aijie."

When they had taken their fill of pleasure, they sat down again together. She put the gold pin back into his hair. "My parents and I came from the Eastern Capital to visit our kinsman," she said. "We are very poor, and, if you have any money with you, I will ask you to give my father five taels and I will pay it back to you with interest."

"I will lend it to him without interest, since you ask," Jingji said.

He gave her the five taels and sat with her for a long time. But he did not wish anyone else to know what was happening, so he would only take a cup of tea with her, and when she asked him to stay and have something to eat, he declined. "I can't stay now," he said, "I have some business to attend to. I will bring you some more money."

"This afternoon, I shall prepare a poor cup of wine for you," the girl said. "That you cannot refuse. You must come." Jingji took his dinner in the wine house and then went to the street for a stroll. In the street he met Jin Zongming, the monk of Yangong Temple. They talked about the things that had happened there.

"I didn't know you had settled down in the General's household and had set up this wineshop, or I would have come to see you," the monk said. "Tomorrow I will send a boy with some tea. I hope you will come to the temple when you have leisure."

Then the monk went his way, and Jingji went back to the wine house.

"Our guest Han has been asking for you," Lu said. "He is anxious to offer you some wine. But we could not find you."

As they spoke, a messenger came from Han Daoguo asking them, the two managers and Jingji, to go. They went. Wine and food were set out on the table. Jingji took the place of honor and Han Daoguo the host's place. The two managers, Lu and Xie, sat facing Wang Liu'er and Han Aijie. Han's servant heated the wine for them. After it had been around several times, the two managers began to see light. "You stay," they said to Jingji, "we must go and attend to business."

Jingji had not a steady head, but, when the two managers had gone, he drank without restraint. After a few cups he began to feel tipsy.

"I suppose you won't go home today," Han Aijie said to him.

"No," Jingji said, "it is late. I will stay until tomorrow."

Wang Liu'er and Han Daoguo went downstairs. Jingji gave five taels of silver to Han Aijie, and she went to give the money to her mother. Then she came back, and they went on drinking. They did not stop before sunset. Aijie took off her long coat and asked Jingji to stay with her. They spoke hot words of love together, and her voice was as sweet as an oriole's. They enjoyed every manner of love's delight.

When Han Aijie had lived in the Eastern Capital as Zhai's concubine, she had often visited the Imperial Tutor's mother. She had learned how to read and write, how to play various instruments, and sing. She had become accomplished and attractive, and Jingji found her equal in charm to Pan Jinlian herself. He sported with her all the night. It was late the next day when he rose, and Wang Liu'er prepared a meal for him. Then he and the girl drank a few cups of warm wine.

The managers invited the young man to have dinner with them. He dressed and went. Afterwards, he came back to say good-bye to Han Aijie. She hated to see him go away, and shed tears.

"Never mind," he said, "I will come and see you again in a few days." Then he mounted his horse and, with his boy following, went back to the city. On the way, he warned the boy that he must not mention the Hans to anyone at home. The boy assured him that he did not need to be told.

When they reached home, Jingji told them that he had had so much to do that he had not been able to come back the night before and had spent the night at the wine house. He gave Chunmei the money he had brought back with him, about thirty taels. His wife, Cuiping, suspected that he had been with another woman and had left her alone at home. Now she clung to him for seven or eight days and would not allow him to go to the wine house. The boy was sent to fetch the week's money.

Han Daoguo was in such need of money that he had to tell his wife to get some other man, a merchant or one of those who came to take tea or to drink in the wine house. He had found before that he was well able to live upon his wife's earnings. It was true that she was growing older, but there was Han Aijie to take her place, and no reason why the business should come to an end. They even followed it openly.

When Chen Jingji did not come back, the waiter Chen the Third found them a merchant from Huzhou. His name was He. He was about fifty years old and had silk goods with him worth a thousand taels. He was very anxious to have Han Aijie, but she was thinking of Jingji and made the excuse that she was unwell. Several times she refused to come down and see the merchant. Han Daoguo was greatly annoyed.

This merchant He saw that Wang Liu'er was tall and dark. Her hair was dressed in long braids and her starlike eyes were extremely seductive. Her lips were painted very red. He thought it undoubtful that she must be skilled in the arts of love, so he gave her a tael of silver and spent the night with her. Han Daoguo went to sleep somewhere else. Han Aijie did not come down. He enjoyed himself immensely. He became so attracted to Wang Liu'er that they were almost inseparable. Every two or three days he came to her and spent the night, and Han Daoguo was very well paid for his self-denial.

Han Aijie missed Jingji. She thought of him so much that one day seemed like three autumns and one night as long as half a summer. She was, in fact, utterly lovesick. At last she sent their old servant to the city to try to get news of her lover. He went to the General's house and secretly questioned the boy.

"Why does your master not come to the wine house any more?" he said.

"My master has not been very well," the boy said. "He has not been out at all."

The old man came back and told Han Aijie. She spoke to her mother, and they decided to buy a pair of pig's trotters, two roast ducks, two live fish, and a box of cakes. Han Aijie made some ink and wrote a card. They gave the things to the old man and told him to take them to Jingji. "When you get to the city," Han Aijie told him, "you must take the things to Master Chen yourself and get a return card from him."

The old man tucked the card away and took the things to General Zhou's. He sat down on a large block of stone. After a while the boy came out.

"What are you doing here again?" the boy asked him.

The old man bowed to him and took him aside.

"I have come to see your master and brought him some presents. Go and tell him I am waiting here to see him."

The boy went into the house, and very soon Jingji came gaily out. It was the fifth month and very hot. He was wearing the lightest of clothes, a brimmed hat, summer shoes, and white socks. The old man bowed to him.

"Master," he said, "are you better? Han Aijie has sent me with these things. Here is her card."

Jingji took it. "How is she?" he said.

"She is not very well, now that you have been so long away from her," the old man said. "She told me to say that you must go."

Jingji looked at the card.

To my lover Chen [it said]. Ever since you left me, I have been thinking of you all the time. You promised me you would come back, and I have stood at the door and waited for you, yet you have never deigned to visit this poor place. Yesterday I sent our old servant for news of you, but he came back without seeing you. He heard only that you were not well. That word made me so sad that I cannot sit or lie down in peace. I wish I had wings that I might fly to you. You are at your own home, where you have a delightful lady to give you pleasure, and you think of me no more. I am like the kernel of a fruit that you have spat from your mouth. I send you some cakes and food to show my love for you. Please accept them with an indulgent smile, for my love knows no bounds. Your unworthy Han Aijie greets you.

Then came the words:

I am sending you an embroidered red bag with a lock of my hair to show how much I love you. The twentieth day of the second month of summer. Han Aijie again makes reverence to you.

Jingji read the letter and looked at the little bag. There was a lock of black hair in it, and, attached to it, a small label with the words "To my lover, Chen." He folded everything up as it had been before and put it in his sleeve.

Not far from the house there was a small wineshop. He told the boy to take the old man there and give him something to drink. "I am going to write a letter," he said. "Take in the presents and, if your mother asks whom they are from, tell her that my manager Xie at the wine house has sent them."

The boy took in the boxes. Jingji went to his study and secretly wrote a letter. Then he took five taels of silver and went to the wineshop.

"Have you had some wine?" he said to the old man.

"Yes, Master! Thank you very much. I can't drink any more because I must be going back."

Jingji gave the letter and the silver to the old man. "Tell Han Aijie," he said, "that she is to spend this money. I will come and see her in two or three days."

The old man took the letter and the silver and went away. When Jingji went home again, his wife asked him who had sent the presents.

"Xie, my manager at the wine house, heard that I was ill and he sent them."

His wife believed him. They gave one of the roast ducks, one fish, and one pig's trotter to Chunmei and told her that they had come from the manager of the wine house. Chunmei suspected nothing.

The sun had set when the old man came back to the wine house. He gave the silver and the letter to Han Aijie. She read it in the light of the lamp. It said:

Younger Brother Jingji kowtows to his beloved Han the Fifth. I thank you for your letter and the delightful gifts that came with it. I, too, feel the desire for clouds and rain, and have not forgotten the joys of the bed I tasted with you. I have thought all the time of coming to you, but I have been ill and you have been disappointed. It was good of you to send someone to see me and to give me such charming dishes and that exquisitely made embroidered bag. I thank you with all my heart. I am offering you five taels of silver and a silk handkerchief, as a token of my love's sincerity. I trust you will appreciate my gift. Jingji kowtows.

There was a short poem written on the handkerchief. Han Aijie read the poem and gave the silver to her mother. So both women were pleased. They waited eagerly for Jingji's coming.

122

Liu the 2ND Drunkenly Curses Wang Liu-erh; Chang Sheng Wrathfully Kills Ch'en Ching-chi

Some words of admonition:

All of the forms of discontent,
Arise from lack of forbearance.
If you show patience to events,
Your perception will be bright.
Buddha's words reject argument,
Confucian texts abhor conflict.
This avenue leads to happiness,
But not many persons pursue it.[1]

THE STORY GOES that Ch'en Ching-chi allowed two days to pass, since the third day, the twenty-fifth of the fifth month, was his birthday. On that occasion, Ch'un-mei prepared a feast in the rear reception hall to celebrate his birthday, and the entire household joined in the festivities.

Early the next morning, Ch'en Ching-chi said to Ch'un-mei, "It is some time since I have been to the dock in Lin-ch'ing. Since I am not busy today, I plan to go there. In the first place, I will be able to go over the accounts with the managers of the tavern; and in the second place, I can avoid the stifling summer heat, and come back after my excursion."
Ch'un-mei said in response, "You should go in a sedan chair, and avoid any overexertion."
He then set out in a sedan chair, borne by two soldiers, and accompanied by Little Chiang, and headed straight for the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock in Lin-ch'ing, but of the events of his trip there is nothing to tell.
That afternoon, when he arrived in front of the tavern, got out of his sedan chair, and went inside, his two managers came out to welcome him, saying, "Sir, are you feeling somewhat better?"
Ch'en Ching-chi, whose mind was preoccupied with Han Ai-chieh, merely responded, "I fear I have put the two of you to the trouble of worrying about me."
After sitting with them for a while, he got up; told them, "Write out a copy of the accounts so I can look them over"; and then headed for the interior. The Han family servant came out to meet him and announced his arrival to Wang Liu-erh and her mate. Han Ai-chieh was in her upstairs room:
Leaning on the balustrade and gazing abroad,
Flourishing her brush and expending her ink,
as she composed a set of poems;
In order to dispel her lingering depression.[2]
When it was suddenly reported that Ch'en Ching-chi had arrived, she:
Lightly moved her lotus feet
Gently lifted her beige skirt, and made her way downstairs, where mother and daughter greeted him with their faces wreathed in smiles, saying:
"The more eminent you are, the harder you are to see.[3]
What wind has blown you here today?"
Ch'en Ching-chi bowed in response to mother and daughter and then went into their room and sat down.
In a little while, Wang Liu-erh prepared a serving of tea for them, and when they had finished drinking it, Han Ai-chieh said, "Sir, please come upstairs and have a seat in my room."
Ch'en Ching-chi went upstairs as requested, and the two of them:
Just like fish in the water,[4]
Resembling lacquer and glue,[5] did not fail to exchange words expressing:
Deep-felt love and intimate feelings.[6]
A sheet of flowery stationery was sticking out from under Han Ai-chieh's inkstone, and Ch'en Ching-chi picked it up to look at.
Han Ai-chieh explained, "Those are several poems that I wrote in my room up here while longing for you during my leisured hours, in order to:
While away my lingering depression.[7]
But I fear they may be unworthy of your distinguished eyes."
Ch'en Ching-chi then proceeded to peruse them, and they read as follows:
Spring
Leaning languidly against the embroidered bed,
I'm too depressed to move;[8]
Languorously unfastening my embroidered sash,
I let my hair tumble down.
Ever since my jadelike lover has departed
I have had no news of him;
Throughout the twenty-four hours of the day
I can only yearn for him.[9]
Summer
From a high vantage point on the lofty tower
I gaze into the clear radiance;
The rose blossoms covering the entire arbor are clothed in rare fragrance.
I have spent idle hours leaning over every one of the twelve balustrades;[10]
As the perfumed breeze from the south has begun to penetrate my garments.
Autumn
Within the cold hibiscus-blossom curtains
I am unable even to dream;
Since my understanding lover has left me
I can only grieve for him.
The tears I shed upon my pillow are like the raindrops on the steps;
Outside the window they drip unceasingly right up till the day dawns.[11]
Winter
Ashamed to face the caltrop-patterned mirror,
I retouch my unblemished makeup;
I have withered away on my loved one's account, losing the freshness of my complexion.
Closing the door, I am no longer concerned with the idle breeze and moonlight;
And will henceforth instruct the plum blossoms to do whatever they please.[12]
When Ch'en Ching-chi had finished perusing the poems:
Expressing the most fulsome admiration,
He praised them endlessly to the skies.
Before long, Wang Liu-erh prepared wine and delicacies and brought them upstairs, where she moved the mirror stand out of the way and laid them out on Han Ai-chieh's dressing table.
The two of them sat down next to each other, and Han Ai-chieh proceeded to pour out a cup of wine and proffer it to Ch'en Ching-chi with both hands, bowing deeply to him, and saying, "Sir, during the whole time that you failed to visit me, I could not get you out of my mind for even a moment. But when our servant returned with your contribution toward our living expenses, our whole family:
Felt they could not thank you enough."[13]
Ch'en Ching-chi took the proffered wine in his hand and bowed in return, saying, "It was my trivial indisposition that prevented me from keeping our engagement. Please do not hold it against me."
After downing his wine, he poured another cup and proffered it respectfully to Han Ai-chieh. When she had drunk it, they sat down together and prepared to enjoy some more. Wang Liu-erh and Han Tao-kuo also came upstairs to share a few cups with them but found excuses to go downstairs again in a little while, leaving the two of them to drink together, and share their experiences during the time they had been separated.
After some time, as they drank until they began to feel the effects of the wine:
Their lascivious excitement burned like fire, and they could not help recapitulating their former passion for each other.
As they engaged in intercourse,
Their affection knew no bounds.[14]
Getting up and putting on their clothes, they washed their hands and resumed drinking. After downing several more cups:
As their drunken eyes grew bleary,
Their residual lust had not faded.[15]
Ever since the last time they had met, the young man had been unhappy at home, and his mind had been so preoccupied with Han Ai-chieh that he had not engaged in intercourse with his wife. On this occasion, when reunited with his inamorata:
He was reluctant to call a halt,
after only one engagement. Truly, like:
Alive or dead predestined lovers,[16]
For the foregoing five centuries, they had finally been thrown together, and Ch'en Ching-chi's psyche was led completely astray by her. In a little while:
His lustful feelings rose again, and they engaged in intercourse a second time; after which, he felt that:
His body was so utterly fatigued,[17]
That he could carry on no longer.[18]
He had not eaten anything for lunch and simply collapsed onto the bed and went to sleep.[19]
It turned out to be one of those occasions when:
A disaster was destined to occur.
Unexpectedly, the silk merchant Magnate Ho showed up down below, and Wang Liu-erh entertained him with wine on the ground floor, while Han Tao-kuo went out onto the street to purchase vegetables, delicacies, and fruits to go with the wine. During his absence, the two of them engaged in intercourse, after which, Han Tao-kuo returned with the foodstuffs he had purchased, and the three of them drank several more cups of wine together.
About the time that the sun began to sink in the west, who should appear but the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, the proprietor of My Own Tavern, who was stinking drunk, and whose shirt was hanging open to reveal a torso of purple flesh.
With his fists raised on high, he strode into the ground floor of the tavern and shouted loudly, "Drag out the southerner Magnate Ho so I can beat him up."
This startled the two managers, who were afraid that Ch'en Ching-chi, who was asleep on the second floor, would hear him; so they hastily emerged from behind the counter, came forward, and bowed to him, saying, "Brother Liu the Second, Magnate Ho has not been here."
Liu the Second was not persuaded by this and strode into the interior in large strides, where he tore aside the portiere leading into Han Tao-kuo's quarters with one hand and found that Magnate Ho was inside, sitting shoulder to shoulder with Wang Liu-erh, and drinking wine.
Enraged by this, he cursed at Magnate Ho, saying, "You lousy servile dog! I'll fuck your mother! I've looked everywhere for you, but now I've found you. You've been maintaining two powdered faces in my tavern but have failed to pay them for their services on more than one occasion. In addition to which, you have not paid your rent for the last two months but have been coming over here to make out with another woman."
Magnate Ho hastily came outside and said, "Liu the Second, please go home. I'll come after you."
"You'll come after me, will you, you dog-fucked creature!" Liu the Second cursed at him.
Without any warning, he sent a clenched fist whistling his way that flew right into Magnate Ho's face, creating instantaneously a swollen purple bruise. When Magnate Ho got to his feet he managed to escape out the open door.
Liu the Second then knocked over Wang Liu-erh's table with a single kick of his foot, smashing all the utensils on it; at which Wang Liu-erh cursed at him, saying, "Who do you think you are, you death-defying, lousy, gallows bird, to break into my room for no good reason, only to let off your farts? I'm not the sort of woman who feels:
Inured to such alarms."
Liu the Second responded by stepping forward and giving her a single kick that knocked her flat on her back, and cursed at her, saying, "You whore, I'll fuck your mother! What are you but a nameless unlicensed prostitute, who did not come register yourself with me; as though I would let you get away with plying your trade in this tavern. You had better move out at once. If you delay, I'll subject you to a real beating with my fists."
"What sort of a 'bare stick' or 'knockabout' do you think you are?" retorted Wang Liu-erh. "Do you suppose I have no relatives of my own, so that you can get away with taking advantage of me? What do I want with this life of mine anyway?"
So saying, she plopped down on the ground and began to cry.
"You whore!" Liu the Second cursed at her, "I'll kick you in the entrails until they break. You still don't seem to understand who I am."
The uproar they created was such that, in no time at all, the neighbors to either side, as well as the pedestrians in the street, gathered around them in considerable numbers.
One of the bystanders, who did not comprehend the situation, said to her, "Wang Liu-erh, you are a newcomer and do not know that he is the renowned Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, who is the brother-in-law of Inspector Chang Sheng on the staff of His Honor Commandant Chou Hsiu. He is the proprietor of My Own Tavern and is:
A foreman among the beaters of trollops;
A leader among the abusers of drunkards.

You would do well to cut him some slack, rather than acting as though you:
Don't know what is in your own interest.[20]
No one around here dares to cross him."
"There are people even more powerful than he is," responded Wang Liu-erh. "What reason is there to worry about that gallows bird?"
When Lu Ping-i saw how rough Liu the Second was getting, he and Fatty Hsieh:
Resorting to both appeals and threats, succeeded in persuading him to leave.
Ch'en Ching-chi was still lying in bed at the time, and when he heard the disturbance on the floor below and got up to see what was going on, the sun was already setting in the west.
When he asked what was going on, Han Tao-kuo was nowhere to be seen, but he ran into Wang Liu-erh, who was coming up the stairs:
With disheveled hair and a soiled face,[21] and said to him, thus and so, "Some gallows bird of a 'knockabout,' who is known as the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second, who is the proprietor of My Own Tavern, and who claims to be the brother-in-law of Inspector Chang Sheng from the commandant's household, came looking for one of his customers, kicked and beat me for no good reason, and cursed me out before finally leaving. He also smashed our crockery and wine vessels to smithereens."
So saying, she started to weep out loud. Ch'en Ching-chi then called up the two managers to ask them what had happened, but the two of them could only:
Gaze at each other in astonishment, without daring to utter a word.
Finally, Manager Lu Ping-i, who had a glib tongue, explained, "It was the brother-in-law of the head servant Chang Sheng from the commandant's household, who came here looking for Magnate Ho. He claimed that he owed him two month's rent, and that he had also come to collect the unpaid fees for the services of the prostitutes he had been patronizing at his place. When he saw that he was in Wang Liu-erh's quarters drinking wine:
Without permitting any further explanation,
he tore the portiere aside and struck Magnate Ho a blow with his fist, which frightened Magnate Ho so much that he fled the scene. He then went on to quarrel with Han Tao-kuo's wife, kicking her over with his foot; and the rumpus thus created attracted the attention of all the pedestrians in the street, who crowded in to see what was going on."
Ch'en Ching-chi was worried about creating an incident this late in the day and ordered them to disperse the crowd. He then asked what had become of that rascal Liu the Second, and the two managers told him that they had persuaded him to leave.
On hearing this, Ch'en Ching-chi:
Made a point of remembering it;
and then did his best to placate Wang Liu-erh and her daughter, saying, "Leave it to me. There is nothing to worry about. The two of you, mother and daughter, can continue to live here. When I get home, I'll take care of it."
When the managers had calculated the interest earned since his last visit and turned the silver over to him, Ch'en Ching-chi got up to go, mounted his steed, and, followed by his servant, whipped up his horse and departed. By the time he made it inside the city wall, the sky was already dark, and he was not in a good mood. On arriving home, he went to see Ch'un-mei, turned the interest money over to her, and then returned to his own quarters. Concerning that evening there is nothing more to relate.
The next day:
His every thought and every consideration, told him that he should tell Ch'un-mei what had happened, but as he contemplated it, he said to himself, "I'd better hold off on it, and wait until I can find some serious faults with Chang Sheng, and get my cousin to persuade His Honor to put an end to him. I cannot tolerate the fact that he has shown more than once that he is not to be trusted. He dares to point out that it was he who located me and knows the truth about my origins, so he figures that I am at his mercy." Truly:
Getting revenge on one's enemies is often accomplished this way;
When the opportunity arises, one does not need to seek far for it.
Though you wear out shoes of iron without finding what you seek;
In the end you may find it without making
any effort whatsoever.[22]
One day, Ch'en Ching-chi went back to the tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock and met with Han Ai-chieh and her mother to discuss the fright they had been exposed to on the previous occasion.
He also asked his Manager Lu Ping-i, "Has that rascal Liu the Second come back to bother you again?"
"Since he left the other day," responded Manager Lu, "he has not returned."
He also asked Han Ai-chieh whether or not Magnate Ho had come back for another visit.
After having something to eat, and checking over the accounts, Ch'en Ching-chi felt obliged to go back to Han Ai-chieh's room on the second floor, where the two of them spent some time engaged in heartfelt conversation and also indulged in a bout of intercourse.
Upon coming out, he took advantage of his free time to call the wine steward Ch'en the Third into his presence and interrogate him, thus and so, as to whether Chang Sheng or Liu the Second were guilty of any serious misdemeanors that he knew of. This Ch'en the Third:
Though he never, ever, should have done it, told him how Chang Sheng was keeping Sun Hsüeh-o, who had formerly been in his master's household, as his mistress in My Own Tavern. He also told him how Liu the Second lent money to the singing girls in the brothels at 30 percent interest and took advantage of His Honor the commandant's name to conduct his illicit business. Ch'en Ching-chi made a mental note of everything he had said.
After this, he gave two or three taels of silver to Han Ai-chieh for her living expenses, finished checking the accounts with his managers, wrapped up the money that had been earned as interest since his last visit, said farewell, mounted his horse, and set off for home. But enough of this idle chatter. [23] He had harbored the thought of revenge in his heart for some time. In the first place, it was a case of:
Two enemies confronting each other;
and in the second place, it was only to be expected that it might give rise to a catastrophe.
Unexpectedly, just at this time, in the Court in the Eastern Capital, Emperor Hui-tsung was confronted with the fact that the army of the Great Chin regime had crossed the borders of the realm and had penetrated far into the interior. The situation was urgent and the Son of Heaven was thrown into a panic. After consulting with his chief ministers, he dispatched an envoy to travel to the northern kingdom and sue for peace; expressing his willingness to pay an annual ransom of several million taels worth of gold and silver, and colored silk, in return for a settlement. He also abdicated his throne in favor of the crown prince, who changed the reign title from the seventh year of the Hsüan-ho reign period to the first year of the Ching-k'ang reign period and assumed the title of Emperor Ch'in-tsung. When his son had taken his place on the throne, the former Emperor Hui-tsung assumed the title Supreme Taoist Emperor Emeritus and retired to the Lung-te Kung, or Dragon Virtue Palace. The court then appointed Li Kang[24] to the post of minister of war, in charge of the armies of the various circuits; and Ch'ung Shih-tao[25] to the post of general-in-chief, responsible for military affairs both inside and outside the capital.
One day, an imperial edict came down, addressed to Chou Hsiu, the commandant of Chi-nan prefecture, promoting him to the post of commander-general of the Shantung region, in command of an army of ten thousand men, both infantry and cavalry, and ordering him to station his forces in Tung-ch'ang prefecture, where he should join forces with the grand coordinator and censor-in-chief Chang Shu-yeh in defending the territory and resisting the Chin armies.
Commandant Chou Hsiu was presiding in his yamen at the time, when his attendants came in and reported that an imperial edict had come down and invited him to formally receive it. Commandant Chou Hsiu did not dare to be remiss and knelt down before an incense stand in order to listen to the reading of the edict. The imperial messenger then proceeded to declaim it out loud, and the text read as follows:
The edict from the Emperor, whose sovereignty is ordained by Heaven, states:[26]
We have heard that the civil arts establish peace in the country,[27] while military prowess serves to stabilize the realm. The Three August Ones relied on rites and music to establish their kingdoms; the Five Emperors [28] used military campaigns to secure their empires. Undertakings may go smoothly or with difficulty; men may be sagely or foolish.[29] We have inherited the unshakable foundation bequeathed by Our ancestors;[30] and the weighty position passed on to Us by Our predecessor. In performing Our myriad tasks We tremble with anxiety. In olden times, Shun subdued the four malefactors, and T'ang [31] drove out the Miao barbarians. Had they not deployed their armies, they could not have been victorious; had they not employed military might, they could not have established peace. Armies are the teeth and claws of the nation; military power determines the security of the realm. At the present time, the central plain is in danger of collapse, and the barbarians are in revolt. The Liao bandits have encroached upon Our borders from the west; and the Chin rebels have launched a southern invasion with their cavalry. The common people have been greatly afflicted;[32] and We are much concerned about their plight.[33] The military commissioner-in-chief of Shantung, Chou Hsiu, is a man of seasoned talent, and a commander capable of defending cities; who has repeatedly demonstrated extraordinary merit, and whose fidelity and courage are well-known. He deploys his troops strategically and knows how to lead them into battle. We hereby promote him to the posts of commander-general of the Shantung region, and defense commissioner of the four circuits. In concert with the grand coordinator and censor-in-chief of Shantung, Chang Shu-yeh, he is ordered to lead his infantry and cavalry to defend Kao-yang Pass; and to place the disposition of his forces and their battle orders under the jurisdiction of General-in-chief Ch'ung Shih-tao; in the hope of restoring peace to Our endangered society, and expelling the rebellious barbarians. Alas! The appointment of worthy men to office in order to set the country straight; and the willingness to put oneself in danger in order to protect the throne; are indications of the loyalty and sincerity of ministers and sons. Just as the recognition of the good and the rewarding of the worthy, in order to stimulate resistance toward the enemy, are among the important functions of the court. [34] Each of you should exert your loyalty to the utmost, in order to accomplish Our goals. This Imperial command must be obeyed.
Ordered on the stated day of the ninth month of the first year of the Ching-k'ang reign period.
When Commandant Chou Hsiu had listened to the reading of the edict, he sent the imperial messenger on his way. He then called in his two inspectors, Chang Sheng and Li An, and directed them to load up two carts with his trunks of luggage, valuables, and other belongings, and escort them back home.
It so happens that during the year he had served in office at Chi-nan he had amassed enormous sums of gold and silver, which he now stowed in his trunks of luggage and turned over to his two trusted servants, saying, "When you arrive home and have stored this material safely away, be sure to keep watch over the premises by day and by night. Some day soon, in conjunction with the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh, I will take charge of the infantry and cavalry from the four circuits and set out for the front from Ch'ing-ho district."
That very day, Chang Sheng and Li An took care of loading the carts as they had been ordered to do and set out ahead of their master, but of the events of their trip there is nothing to tell. When they arrived home some days later and had stored the material safely away, the two of them proceeded to patrol the premises, by day and by night, both inside and out. But no more of this.
To resume our story, when Ch'en Ching-chi saw that Chang Sheng had escorted the carts and come home, and learned that Commandant Chou Hsiu had been promoted to the office of commander-general of the Shantung region and would arrive back before long himself, he decided to reveal what was on his mind to Ch'un-mei, so that when the commandant returned they would jointly be able to disclose the incriminating evidence he had discovered about Chang Sheng.
Unexpectedly, one day, when his wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing was away from home visiting her mother, he was sleeping all by himself in the library on the west side of the courtyard when Ch'un-mei came in to see him early in the morning. Upon observing that there were no maidservants about, the two of them took off their clothes and proceeded to engage in the game of clouds and rain with each other.
What they did not anticipate was that Chang Sheng, ringing his bell as he patrolled the premises, should pass by the postern gate, and overhear what sounded like female laughter coming from inside the library. He immediately silenced his bell and crept slowly up to the window in order to eavesdrop on what was going on.
He found out that Ch'un-mei was inside, engaged in intercourse with Ch'en Ching-chi, and overheard him saying to her, "I can't put up any longer with that rascal Chang Sheng, who is trying to keep me under his thumb by reminding me that it was thanks to him that I was located, and rescued from the plight I was in. He has run me down in front of the other servants more than once. Recently, when he learned that I had opened a tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, he encouraged his brother-in-law, the Turf-protecting Tiger, Liu the Second, to take advantage of your husband's prestige in order to get away with operating a brothel for unlicensed prostitutes, and exploiting them as a loan shark. He is also maintaining Sun Hsüeh-o as his kept mistress in a separate location, and keeping you in the dark about all these things. The other day, his brother-in-law Liu the Second actually forced his way into my tavern and drove the customers away. I have been keeping quiet about these things, not venturing to tell you about them, but now that your husband is on his way home, if we don't let him know about all this, I will not dare to continue doing business on the dock at Lin-ch'ing."
When Ch'un-mei heard this, she responded, "How can that rascal act so improperly? I sold that menial creature Sun Hsüeh-o into prostitution. How can he presume to maintain her in a separate location as his kept mistress?"
"He is not only taking advantage of me," said Ch'en Ching-chi, "but is taking advantage of you as well."
"When His Honor arrives home," pronounced Ch'un-mei, "I'll see that he gets rid of that rascal for good."
As the saying goes:
There are sure to be ears on the other side of the wall;
How could there not be someone hidden beyond the window?[35]
The two of them were preoccupied with what they were saying to each other inside the room and were quite unaware that Chang Sheng, who was lurking outside the window, overheard what they said so clearly that he might well have ejaculated:
"Is it not delightful?"
From his mouth no word was uttered, but
In his heart he thought to himself,
"Right now, they may be hatching a plot against my brother-in-law and myself, but I will act first by hatching a plot against them."
So saying, he discarded his bell, went out to the duty room in the front compound, where he picked up a steel-bladed dagger, and then:
The telling is slow, but
What happened was quick;
he sharpened the blade on a whetstone and strode into the library.
Who could have known that:
As providence would have it,
Ch'un-mei was not fated to die at his hands.
Lan-hua, her junior maidservant, had suddenly come out in a state of consternation and interrupted them, saying to Ch'un-mei, "Your son, the young squire Chin-ko, has come down with a fit of convulsions, and you had better go back to see how he is."
This alarmed Ch'un-mei so much that:
Covering two steps with every one,
she had rushed back to the rear compound to look after her child.
No sooner had she left than Chang Sheng burst into the library with dagger in hand, where he failed to see Ch'un-mei but found Ch'en Ching-chi lying under the bedcovers.
Upon seeing him come in, Ch'en Ching-chi cried out, "Ai-ya! What are you coming in here for?"
"I've come to kill you," Chang Sheng announced angrily. "How could you bring yourself to tell that whore that you intended to do me in? Was it not I who was responsible for rescuing you from your earlier predicament? And now you are:
Requiting kindness with enmity.
As the saying goes:
A black-headed beetle is not safe to rescue;[36]
If rescued it will end up eating your flesh.
Don't try to escape, but have a taste of my dagger.
This day a year from now will mark the anniversary of your death."[37]

Ch'en Ching-chi, whose body was stark naked, had no place to hide, and tried to wrap himself in the quilt; but Chang Sheng tore it aside and jabbed him with the dagger, which penetrated between his ribs, causing his fresh blood to spurt out. When Chang Sheng saw that he was still struggling, he jabbed him in the chest once again, which left him:
No longer able to make a move;[38] at which point, he grabbed him by the hair and cut off his head. Truly:
So long as one has three inches of breath,
one uses it a thousand ways;
But when the messenger of death shows up,
everything comes to an end.
It is pitiable, but Ch'en Ching-chi was no more than twenty-seven years old when he was made to:
Die an untimely death.
Chang Sheng, with his dagger in hand, proceeded to circle the room and look behind the bed for Ch'un-mei but could not find her, whereupon, he headed out toward the rear reception hall in large strides. When he reached the ceremonial gate between the front and rear compounds, he ran into Li An, who was carrying his watchman's bell and patrolling the premises.
No sooner did Li An see Chang Sheng come charging in like an avenging spirit, with dagger in hand, than he asked him, "Where are you headed?"
When Chang Sheng refused to respond and continued to charge ahead, Li An blocked his way, and Chang Sheng attempted to stab at him with his dagger.
Li An laughed sardonically at this and said, "My uncle is the famous military instructor known as the Shantung Yaksha Li Kuei, but there is no need for me to avail myself of the skills I have acquired from him."
As he spoke, his right foot shot up and kicked the dagger in his antagonist's hand to one side with a clattering sound. Chang Sheng was thrown into a panic by this, and the two of them fell to grappling with each other. But Li An tripped him up with his foot, so that he fell facedown to the ground, and then took off the belt around his waist and tied him up with it in no time at all.
The noise created by their struggle was overheard by Ch'un-mei in the rear compound, and Li An explained it to her, saying, "Chang Sheng came inside with a dagger in hand, but I have succeeded in subduing him."
Ch'un-mei had only just succeeded in coaxing Chin-ko back to consciousness, and when she heard these words she:
Turned pale with consternation, and rushed out to the library, only to find the dead body of Ch'en Ching-chi lying there, with his:
Fresh blood flowing everywhere,[39]
at which she couldn't help starting to weep out loud.
She then sent someone to report the situation to his wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who hurried home as quickly as possible. When she saw the slain corpse of Ch'en Ching-chi, she:
Fell to the floor in tears,
Oblivious to human affairs.
Ch'un-mei helped her up until she regained consciousness; after which, she had the corpse removed, purchased a coffin in which it could be prepared for burial, and had Chang Sheng incarcerated in the lockup, while she waited for the commander-general to come home and deal with the affair.
In no more than a few days, since the military situation was urgent, and he had received orders to make haste, Commander-general Chou Hsiu managed to finish rounding up the infantry and cavalry from the various circuits and heard that the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh had already arrived in Tung-ch'ang prefecture and was waiting for him to join him there.
When he arrived home, Ch'un-mei told him how Ch'en Ching-chi had been killed by Chang Sheng, and Li An laid the murder weapon before him and knelt down to tell him what had happened. The commander-general was enraged by this and, taking his seat on the bench, had Chang Sheng brought before him, and:
Without discussing the pros and cons of the matter, ordered his soldiers to give him a hundred strokes with the bamboo, taking turns as they beat him five strokes at a time. In no time at all he was beaten to death. He then lost no time in dispatching flag-bearing couriers to proceed to the Lin-ch'ing dock, take the Turf-protecting Tiger Liu the Second into custody, and bring him back in fetters.
Sun Hsüeh-o, on seeing that Liu the Second had been arrested, feared that she might be taken also, and going into her room:
Hanged herself until dead.
When the flag-bearing couriers brought Liu the Second back to the yamen, Commander-general Chou Hsiu ordered that he also should be given a hundred strokes with the bamboo, and he was beaten to death that very day. As a result:
The district of Ch'ing-ho was dumbfounded;
The prefecture of Lin-ch'ing was much disturbed.
Truly:
One who spends his life doing evil and defying Heaven;
Will, one day, suffer retribution from Heaven itself.[40]
There is a poem that testifies to this:
In being a person one should never engage in deceit;[41]
Hovering three feet over one's head
there are the gods.[42]
If the doing of evil deeds received no retribution;
The cruel people of this world would devour each other.[43]
At the time, the commander-general, by ordering these two men to be beaten to death, succeeded in ridding the neighborhood of their harmful influence. He then ordered Li An to take care of returning the Hsieh Family Tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing to its original owner, and recovering the capital that had been invested in it. He also instructed Ch'un-mei to hold funeral services for Ch'en Ching-chi on the seven weekly commemorations of his death, and then to select an auspicious day on which to bury him on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city. He decided to leave Li An and Chou I to look after the household during his absence, and to take Chou Chung and Chou Jen to serve him at his military headquarters.
That evening, Ch'un-mei, along with Sun Erh-niang, hosted a farewell feast to see him off, at which, before she knew it, all of a sudden, she began to:
Shed two streams of tears,
and said, "Once you have set out, sir, there is no knowing when you will return. You must be careful when going into battle.
The barbarian troops are ruthless, and They cannot be lightly confronted."[44]
"The two of you," responded the commander-general, "while you remain at home, must:
Cleanse your hearts and reduce your desires,[45] while devoting yourselves to caring for my son. There is no need for you to worry about me. Since I have been the recipient of the Emperor's rank and emolument, I must:
Expend my loyalty to requite my country.[46]
As for:
Fortune or mischance, survival or death,
I can only leave them to Heaven."
When he had finished admonishing them, he went to bed for the night.
The next day, the infantry and cavalry under his command were all assembled outside the city wall waiting for him; and when the commander-general set out at their head, the men and horses were all in excellent order. Behold:
Signal flags flutter amid embroidered banners;
Painted drums resound along with bronze gongs.
Three-pronged pitchforks,
And five-pronged pitchforks,
Glitter like autumn frosts.
Spears as sharp as reeds,
And spears of tempered steel,
Proliferate like snowflakes.[47]
Buckler-bearing troops lead the way;
Strong bows and sturdy crossbows[48] come next.
Cannons are drawn behind their carts;
Battle-axes and lances follow in their wake.
The generals in their saddles,
Like the fierce tigers of the Southern Hills,[49]
Are ready for battle and given to combat.[50]
The horses they sit astride,
Like the coiled dragons of the Northern Seas,
Are adept at struggle and prone to fight.[51]
Truly, their blades and spears are as turbulent as tumbling waters;
In fact, the men and horses sweep forward like tempestuous winds.[52]
Of the events of their journey there is nothing to tell.
One day, they were met by a mounted scout who told them not to proceed any further and then led them up to the outskirts of Tung-ch'ang prefecture, at which point the commander-general dispatched a courier, bearing his blue commander's standard, to report their arrival and stationed his infantry and cavalry outside the city wall. When Grand Coordinator Chang Shu-yeh learned that Commander-general Chou Hsiu, and the infantry and cavalry under his command, had arrived, he went out to meet him, together with the prefect of Tung-ch'ang, Ta T'ien-tao. Upon arriving back in the courtroom of the prefectural yamen, and exchanging the conventional greetings, they sat down together to discuss the military situation, and the relative urgency of the information available to them.
After bivouacking overnight, the infantry and cavalry set out early the next morning in order to assume their duties in defending the front against the enemy. But no more of this.
To resume our story, when Han Ai-chieh and her mother, in the Hsieh Family Tavern on the Lin-ch'ing dock, learned of Ch'en Ching-chi's death, Han Ai-chieh gave herself over to weeping, by day and by night, and refused to consume either tea or food. She indicated that if she could only go to the commandant's yamen inside the city and be able to see Ch'en Ching-chi's corpse:
She'd be prepared to die if she must.
Her father and mother, along with others, did everything they could to talk her out of it, but she refused to be dissuaded. Han Tao-kuo, finding himself:
At a loss for what to do next, sent their servant to the commandant's yamen, where he learned that Ch'en Ching-chi's corpse had already been encoffined and buried on the grounds of the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city.
When the servant returned and reported this news, Han Ai-chieh expressed the desire to go burn paper money at his tomb, and weep over his grave, as an expression of her grief over the demise of their relationship. Her parents felt compelled to go along with this and proceeded to hire a sedan chair for her, and pay a visit to the Temple of Eternal Felicity. When they asked Abbot Tao-chien where the tomb was located, he ordered a novice to take them behind the temple and point out the location of the tomb.
Han Ai-chieh got out of the sedan chair, went in front of the tomb, lit the paper money, and bowed before it, calling out as she did so, "My darling brother:
I really looked forward to living in harmony with you until our old age.
How could I have anticipated that this day you would be dead?"
So saying, she commenced to weep out loud and then fell down in a faint, knocking her head on the ground so hard that she lost consciousness. This threw Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh into a panic, and they rushed over to help her up, calling out to her as they did so, but she did not respond, which panicked them even further.
Who should appear at this juncture but Ch'un-mei and Ch'en Ching-chi's wife Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, who arrived in two sedan chairs to conduct the ceremony of revisiting the grave on the third day after the burial, accompanied by their attendants, carrying the three sacrificial animals and other ritual offerings, in order to burn paper money on behalf of the deceased. On their arrival, they saw a young woman, wearing plain white mourning garments and a mourning cap on her head, who had:
Fallen to the floor in tears, while a man and a middle-aged woman were attempting to help her up, though she fell down again:
Oblivious to human affairs.
They were startled by this and asked where the man was from.
Han Tao-kuo and his wife came forward to greet them with a bow and told them what had happened up until that point, saying, "This is our daughter Han Ai-chieh."
When Ch'un-mei heard the name Han Ai-chieh she remembered that she had met her in Hsi-men Ch'ing's household in the past and also recognized Wang Liu-erh. Han Tao-kuo then went on to tell her all about how they had been forced to leave Ts'ai Ching's household in the Eastern Capital.

He then went on to explain, "Our daughter was acquainted with Master Ch'en Ching-chi but did not realize that he had died, and on finding out, wanted to come see his grave and burn paper money on his behalf. We did not anticipate that on arriving here she should collapse in tears this way."
The two of them then continued trying to resuscitate Han Ai-chieh for what seemed like half a day before she finally spit up a mouthful of sticky sputum and regained consciousness. She choked inarticulately for a while, before giving way to a fit of weeping.
She then got up and proceeded to kowtow to Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing four times:
Just as though inserting a taper in its holder;
while saying, "Although he and I were guilty of:
Cohabitation amid the dewdrops,
the two of us:
Swore to be as faithful as the hills,
And vowed to be as loyal as the seas.[53]
We looked forward to living in harmony together until our old age.
Who could have known that:
Heaven should fail to comply with our wishes,[54]
and he should predecease me one day, leaving me:
On the ground on all fours?
While he was still alive, he gave me a handkerchief of Wu silk with a love poem in the form of a quatrain inscribed on it. I knew that he had a wife at home, but I was willing to subordinate myself to you as his concubine. In case you don't believe me, I'll show it to you."
So saying, she pulled the handkerchief of Wu silk with the quatrain inscribed on it out of her sleeve so Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing could read it. The poem read as follows:
The handkerchief of Wu silk is inscribed
with a palindrome;
From a flourish of my writing brush the
ink is still fresh.
I have dedicated it to my affectionate
love Han Ai-chieh;
That we may enjoy the century-long love
of mating phoenixes.
Han Ai-chieh went on to say, "I also gave him a little perfume sachet embroidered with two mandarin ducks, for him to suspend from his belt. It had double-headed lotus blossoms depicted on either side, on each petal of which I had stitched a character, so that they read:
Admiringly tendered to my lover,
I'll follow you wherever you go."
Ch'un-mei then asked Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, "Why did we not find this perfume sachet?"
"It was suspended inside his tunic," responded Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, "and I put it inside the casket when he was encoffined."
When they had finished offering their sacrifices before Ch'en Ching-chi's tomb, Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing invited the mother and daughter into the temple where a repast was prepared for them to eat. When Han Ai-chieh's parents saw that:
The light was beginning to wane, they urged her to get ready to go, but she did not want to leave.
Kneeling down in front of Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing, she wept, saying, "I do not want to return with my mother and father. I would rather join you in wearing mourning and living as a widow, in order to honor our relationship, and show that:
While living I served as his concubine;
When dead I remain close to his spirit."
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing did not choose to say anything in response to this, but Ch'un-mei said, "My sister, I fear that someone still in the springtime of her youth as you are will find it difficult to remain chaste. The best years of your life will be wasted."
"Mistress," responded Han Ai-chieh, "how can you say such a thing? Having committed myself to him, even if:
My eyes were gouged out or my nose broken,
I would feel obliged to maintain my fidelity and swear never to marry anyone else."
She then turned to her parents and enjoined them, saying, "The two of you elders should return by yourselves. I wish to join my mistress and my sister as residents of their household."
Wang Liu-erh:
Shed tears from her eyes, and wept, saying, "We had hoped that you would support the two of us in our old age. We have only just rescued you from:
A tiger's lair and a dragon's pond,[55] and today you propose to abandon us."
All Han Ai-chieh said in response was, "I'll not go back with you. Even if you managed to take me with you, I'd only commit suicide." When Han Tao-kuo saw that his daughter was adamant about not returning with them, he and Wang Liu-erh cried together over her decision and shed tears as they set out for the tavern on the dock at Lin-ch'ing; while Han Ai-chieh joined Ch'un-mei and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing as they rode back to the commandant's yamen in their sedan chairs. On the way back, Wang Liu-erh could not bear the thought of relinquishing her daughter and wept over it repeatedly n sorrow and distress. Han Tao-kuo, for his part, feared that it was getting late and hired 2 horses to speed them on their way. Truly,

When the horse is slow and the mind beset,[56] the road ahead is endless, One's person resembles floating duckweed[57] or tosses like tumbleweed.
There is only the moon as it hovers over the gates of the capital;
That shines indifferently on the grief of those going west and east.

There is a white cloud over the mountain
The leaves are red upon the trees.
They have seen the rise and fall of many things
Yet this world is as it has been always.
Many times the evening sun has passed over the fragrant grass
Many times the tide has ebbed and flowed
They have seen the generations come and go.
The way of Yuan
The road of Yang
They turn and twist like the guts of a sheep
And the wheels of the carriages go astray.
Where the horses neigh near the dreary bushes,
The strains of the recorder and the silver zither
Once were heard
And the sound of singing through the night.
Two days later, it was Chunmei's birthday, the twenty-fifth day of the fifth month. There was a feast in the hall of the inner court and the household kept holiday. The next morning, Jingji said: "I haven't been to the wine house for a very long time. Today I have nothing else to do, so I will go there. It will give me an opportunity to get away from this stifling heat, and I can go through the accounts with my managers."
"You must take a sedan chair and not tire yourself," Chunmei said. She ordered two men to take him in a chair. He set off with his boy and came to the wine house about noon. When he got out of his chair, the two managers welcomed him and asked if he were better. He thanked them, but he was really thinking about Han Aijie. He had hardly sat down before he was up again.
"Get your accounts ready," he said to the managers, "and I will go through them with you when I come back."
He went to the back of the house. There the Hans' old man saw him and hurried in to tell his people. Han Aijie was upstairs on the balcony, composing a poem. Gathering up her skirts, she ran swiftly downstairs. Mother and daughter smiled. "Sir," they said, "it is seldom that we are allowed the pleasure of seeing you. What good wind has blown you here?"
Jingji bowed to them, and they went together into the room and sat down. Wang Liu'er made tea. When they had drunk it, Han Aijie took the young man to her room. They were so delighted in each other's company that they were as merry as the fishes in the water, and they spoke the tenderest words to one another.
Under the ink slab there was a piece of colored paper. Jingji took it and looked at it. "That is the poem I have been writing," Han Aijie told him. "I was thinking of you when I wrote it, but I fear you will find it very bad." Jingji read it.
I rest upon the embroidered bed
And am too weary to move.
Alone, I pull down the silken curtain and bend my head.
My treasure has gone
And I have no message from him.
I think of him throughout the day.
Jingji told her the poem was delightful. Then Wang Liu'er brought them wine and food. She took away the mirror and set out the food on the toilet table. They sat down together and Aijie offered him a cup of wine with both hands. She made a reverence and said: "Since you went away, I have been thinking of you all the time. The other day our old man brought the money you sent, and my parents and I are grateful to you."
Jingji took the cup and bowed to her in return. "It was only because I was ill that I did not come to see you," he said. "I am sorry." He drank the wine and gave the cup back to her. Then they sat down again and drank together. Wang Liu'er and Han Daoguo came up and had some wine with them, but they went away again almost at once. They knew that the young couple would rather get on with their lovemaking.
When they had drunk wine enough, their blood was stirred. They did not only what they had done before, but many things that were new, and their love seemed limitless. Then they dressed again, washed their hands and went on drinking. After a few more cups their eyes sparkled, and they felt that still they were unsatisfied.
The young man had been very ill-content at home. He had been thinking of Han Aijie all the time and had not touched his wife. Now that he again met the girl he loved, he could not be satisfied with one encounter. Their love seemed to have been maturing for five hundred years. He was fascinated by her. Soon his passions were roused again and he set to. Then he felt weary and could do no more. Indeed, he did not even take any food, but simply lay down on the bed and went to sleep.
That day the silk merchant He came to the house. Wang Liu'er drank with him, and her husband went to the street to buy fresh vegetables and fruit. While he was out, the merchant and Wang Liu'er took their pleasure together. When he came back, all three drank together.
About sunset, Tiger Liu rushed into the wine house. He was drunk and his unbuttoned clothes revealed his purple flesh. His hands were clenched. "Where is that Southerner He?" he cried.
The two managers were alarmed. They knew that Jingji was asleep upstairs and did not wish him to be disturbed. "Brother Liu," they said to the Tiger, "he is not here." Liu would not believe them. He strode to Han Daoguo's room, tore the lattice aside, and went in. The merchant was sitting beside Wang Liu'er, drinking.
"Ha, you doggish pair!" he cried. "I have been looking for you everywhere and at last I've found you. You had two girls in my wineshop and you haven't paid them. You haven't paid your rent either, and here you are with another woman."
He stood up at once. "Don't be angry, my friend," he said. "I am just going."
"Going, are you, you dog?" Tiger Liu said, in a furious temper. He drove his fist into the merchant's face, so that it swelled up immediately. He did not trouble about his face; he was only anxious to get to the door and run away. Liu kicked over the table and smashed all the plates. Wang Liu'er cursed him.
"Who are you, you thief? How dare you come farting here? You won't bully me."
Liu went to her and knocked her down. "Who are you, strumpet?" he said. "What do you mean by coming here and practicing your trade in secret without asking my leave? I do not permit you to stay here. Clear out at once, or you will taste my fist."
"Rogue, who are you?" Wang Liu'er said. "I suppose you think I have no one here to defend me. Well, I won't live any longer." She banged her head on the floor and sobbed loudly.
"Woman, you don't frighten me," the Tiger said. "I shall smash your belly in."
There was so much shouting and quarreling that all the neighbors came to look on. One of them said to her: "Mistress Han, you have only just come here, or you would know that this is the famous Tiger Liu, the brother-in-law of Master Zhang of the General's office. He lives at a wine house, and singing girls are his specialty. It is he who controls all the wine drinkers in these parts. You must let him have his way. You don't know how powerful he is. Nobody here ever dares to offend him."
"There must be somebody over him," Wang Liu'er said. "Why should I do what he tells me?"
Lu, seeing the Tiger in a fury, at last succeeded in getting him away. Jingji had heard the noise downstairs. He saw that the sun was setting and got up to ask what all the noise was about. Han Daoguo had disappeared, but Wang Liu'er, her hair in disorder and her face dirty, ran upstairs and told him.
"I don't know who he is," she said. "I only know they call him Tiger. They say he is the brother-in-law of Zhang at the General's office. He came here to see one of the guests and struck and insulted me. He upset the table and smashed all the plates." She cried loudly.
Jingji sent for the two managers and questioned them. They could only tell him the truth. Liu the Second, they said, had come to look for the merchant He. He saw the man he sought in Han Daoguo's room, went in, pulled up the lattice, and struck him. He ran away, and then Liu quarreled with Mistress Han. He knocked her down and people came out of the street to see.
Then Jingji remembered that this Liu was the man who had beaten him in the days when he was a priest. He knew that Liu was too much for him to deal with, so he said no more at that time, except to ask where Liu was then. "We got him out," the managers said. Jingji tried to console Wang Liu'er. "Don't worry," he said. "I am here, and I will protect you. You stay where you are. I am going home, and I shall know how to deal with him." He took the money from his managers, got into his sedan chair, and went home. It was quite dark when he arrived. He was very angry. He gave all the money to Chunmei and went to bed. The next day, he was several times on the point of telling her about Wang Liu'er, but, whenever he thought about it, he decided to say nothing. "I will wait and see if Zhang Sheng does not do something wrong," he said to himself. "Then I will tell Chunmei, and the General will put an end to him. I have never sought trouble with that fellow, but he has bullied me several times. It is his fault, not mine."
One day, Jingji went again to the wine house. He saw the mother and daughter, and they talked about the quarrel.
"Has Liu the Second been here again?" Jingji asked.
"No," Wang Liu'er said, "not since that day."
Then he asked Han Aijie if the merchant He had been to see them again, and she said he had not.
Jingji had his dinner, examined the accounts, and went upstairs to amuse himself with Han Aijie. Then he sent for the waiter, Chen the Third, and asked him if he knew anything that could be held against either Zhang Sheng or Tiger Liu. The waiter told him how Zhang Sheng was keeping Xue'e, who was now a singing girl at the wine house. He told him, too, how Liu lent money to people at a very high rate of interest, and indeed brought much discredit upon the General's administration. Jingji listened very carefully to all this. He got his money from the managers, gave Han Aijie three taels, and took the rest away. Then he rode home. He never forgot the trouble between Liu and himself, and the hatred between them was so strong that it seemed certain that, if they met, trouble was inevitable.

About this time, Huizong, the Son of Heaven, heard at the Eastern Capital that the army of Jin had attacked the frontier and even plundered places on this side. The situation was serious. The Emperor held a conference with his ministers, and it was decided that an envoy should be sent to them to declare that the Emperor was ready to pay several millions of money every year for the sake of peace. At the same time, he abdicated in favor of his son. Thus the seventh year of Xuanhe became the first year of Jinkang , and the new Emperor took the title of Qinzong. The old Emperor called himself the Supreme Daoist Emperor and retired to the Palace of Dragon Virtue. The new Emperor placed Li Gang, the Minister of War, in command of the whole imperial army, and Chong Shidao was appointed Marshal and Generalissimo.

One day an order came to Jinanfu appointing Zhou to the command of all the troops in Shandong, and instructing him to take ten thousand men to garrison Dongchangfu. There he was to join the Censor, Zhang Shuye, and check the advance of the Jin army.

When Zhou received this order, he sent at once for Zhang Sheng and Li An, placed them in charge of his treasure, and sent them home with it. He had been in Shandong for nearly a year and had amassed a considerable amount of wealth. Everything was carefully packed and the men were instructed to take the utmost care of the valuables entrusted to them. The General told them that he would set out for his new appointment from Qinghe.

When the two men reached home, they handed over the treasure to Chunmei. Jingji saw that Zhang Sheng was back again, and heard from him of the General's new appointment, and that he would be home very shortly. He decided to tell Chunmei about Zhang Sheng, so that they could both tell the same tale to Zhou when he arrived.

One day his wife, Cuiping, went to see her mother, and he was asleep in the study when Chunmei suddenly came in. There was nobody about, and they undressed and took their pleasure of one another. At that moment, Zhang Sheng was making the rounds of the house with a bell. When he came to the door in the courtyard by the study, he heard the sound of a woman's laughter. He stopped ringing his bell and went quietly to the window; so he discovered what Chunmei and Jingji were about. He heard Jingji say how he hated Zhang Sheng, and how badly Zhang Sheng had treated him. He heard him say that Zhang Sheng had ordered his brother-in-law, Tiger Liu, to go to the wine house and drive away his customers. The Tiger, with Zhang Sheng behind him, was lending money to people. Zhang Sheng was also sleeping with Xue'e, and keeping the matter dark. "I kept the matter to myself," he said, "because I didn't wish to worry you. But now the General is coming back, and so I tell you. If I don't, I shall never be able to go to the wine house to attend to my business."

"What a scoundrel the fellow is," Chunmei cried. "I sold Xue'e. How dare he sleep with her?"

"He ill-treats me and he has no respect for you," Jingji said.

"Wait till my husband comes," Chunmei said, "and we'll get rid of him for good and all."

The pair never suspected that Zhang Sheng was outside the window and could hear every word they said.

"If I don't finish them, they will finish me," Zhang Sheng said to himself. He put down his bell and went to his room. There he took a dagger and sharpened it on a whetstone. Then he went to the study.

Fortunately, Heaven saved Chunmei's life. One of her maids called her away. The baby had fallen, she said, and asked her mistress to go and see him. She had just left the room when Zhang Sheng, with his dagger, entered it. Jingji was still in bed.

"What do you want?" Jingji said.

"Uncle, I have come to kill you. I was not seeking trouble, but you dared to tell that strumpet that I must die. The proverb says: Black-headed vermin should not be spared; they eat human flesh. Don't try to escape. My knife is waiting for you. A year from today will be your year's mind."

Jingji had not a stitch of clothing on him. He could not get away, but he gripped the bedclothes tightly. Zhang Sheng pulled them off. He drove the dagger into Jingji's side and the blood gushed forth. As the young man still struggled, Zhang Sheng drove his dagger into his breast. That was the end. Zhang Sheng grasped him by the hair and cut off his head. Jingji was only twenty-seven years old when he came to this miserable end.

Zhang Sheng, still grasping his dagger, went behind the bed to look for Chunmei, but she was not there. Then he rushed to the inner court. But when he came to the second door, Li An, who was also going the rounds, saw him coming like the god of wrath, dashing towards him with the dagger raised. He asked Zhang Sheng where he was going but got no answer. Then he stopped Zhang Sheng. Zhang Sheng pointed the dagger at him. Li An laughed. "My Uncle," he said, "is Li Gui the famous Demon of Shandong. You shall know what I can do." He lifted his right leg and kicked the dagger out of Zhang Sheng's hand. It fell with a clang on the floor. Zhang Sheng fought desperately, but Li An got him down and bound him with his girdle.

Chunmei heard the noise. Li An told her that he had secured Zhang Sheng. Chunmei, who had just finished seeing to the baby, was so frightened that she changed color. She rushed to the study and saw that Jingji had been killed. Blood was still running over the floor. She screamed. Then she told servants to go for Cuiping. The young wife came. When she saw that her husband had been murdered, she shrieked and then fainted. Chunmei helped her to her feet, sent to buy a coffin, and put the young man into it. Then she gave orders that Zhang Sheng should be thrown into prison for her husband to deal with.

When General Zhou returned, Chunmei told him of the murder of Jingji. Li An put the dagger before his master and told him what he knew of the story. The General was very angry. He went at once to the hall and called for Zhang Sheng to be brought before him. Without asking a single question, he ordered the attendants to give the man a hundred stripes. So Zhang Sheng was beaten to death. Then he sent to arrest the Tiger. When Liu was taken, Xue'e feared that she too might be arrested. She went to her own room and hanged herself. When Liu was brought before the General, he too was ordered a hundred stripes, and so he died. The news created a great stir in Qinghe and tremendous excitement in Linqing.

Man should avoid deceit
For above his head, God waits.
If they who do all manner of evil
Received not their reward
Then all the ruffians in the world
Would devour each other.

By this execution, the General rid the district of two devils. He bade Li An go to the wine house and give it back to its original owner, bringing back the things that belonged to him. He told Chunmei to hold a service for Jingji, and afterwards the young man was buried at the Temple of Eternal Felicity outside the city. Then he gave orders that Li An and Zhou Yi should remain at home to look after the place, while he took with him Zhou Ren and Zhou Zhong.

In the evening. Chunmei and the Second Lady offered him wine before he left. They shed tears and said: "You are going away and we have no notion when you will come back. You must take care of yourself when you are in the battle. The barbarians are very strong, and you must not regard them lightly."

And the General said to them: "You who stay at home must be always prudent. Take care of my son. Don't trouble about me. I take the Emperor's pay, and I must render loyal service to my country. Whether I live or die is on the knees of Heaven."

The next day the troops assembled outside the city. The General took his place at their head, and they marched off. When, one day, they came to Dongchangfu, he ordered a soldier carrying a blue flag to go first into the city. This was a notification to the Commissioner Zhang Shuye that General Zhou's army had arrived. He came out with the Prefect of the place to receive the General, and they went together to their headquarters. There they discussed the military situation and sent out scouts to get news of the enemy. The next day the army set forth to defend the city.

When Han Aijie heard of Jingji's death, she cried day and night and would not take anything to eat. The only thing she could think of was going to the General's place to see the young man's body. She thought that if she could only do that she would be content. Her parents tried to console her, but still she insisted that she must go. Han Daoguo sent his old servant to get what news he could. The old man came back and told them that Jingji had already been buried at the Temple of Eternal Felicity. Then Han Aijie determined to go to the temple to burn some paper offerings for her lover. She would bewail him at his grave.

Her parents could do nothing to dissuade her, so they hired a sedan chair and took her to the temple. There they asked a monk where Jingji was buried, and the monk sent a boy to take them to the grave, behind the temple. Han Aijie got out of her sedan chair and burned some paper money. She made a reverence before the grave and said: "Oh, dearest brother, I had hoped that I might live with you always. Never did I think that you would die so young." She gave a great cry and fell fainting to the ground. Her parents were frightened and came to help her up. They called her, but she made no answer and they became more frightened still.

It was the third day after Jingji's funeral. Chunmei and Cuiping, in two sedan chairs with their servants following, came to burn papers and offer food to the dead. When they came near the grave, they saw a young woman dressed in mourning, lying on the ground, and a man and woman of middle age trying to revive her. But when she got up, she collapsed again in a faint. They were astonished and asked the man who the girl was.

Han Daoguo and his wife made reverence to them, and told them how they had known Chen Jingji, and that the girl was their daughter Han Aijie. Then Chunmei remembered her from the days in Ximen's house and recognized Wang Liu'er also. Han Daoguo told her how they had come to leave the Eastern Capital.

"My daughter was a friend of Master Chen," he said. "Now he is dead, she came to burn paper money for him. But she cried so bitterly that she fainted."

They went back to their daughter and again tried to bring her around. After a while Han Aijie spat out a little water and revived. She still sobbed, but not so loud as before. She kowtowed four times to Chunmei and Cuiping.

"Though I was only his mistress," she said, "we loved each other truly. I had hoped that I might always belong to him, but Heaven would have it otherwise and decreed his death. Now I am all alone in the world. When he was alive, he gave me a handkerchief on which he had written a poem. I knew he was married, but I was willing to serve only for his amusement. If you doubt me, look at this handkerchief." She showed it to them and they both read the poem.

"I gave him a little embroidered bag too," Han Aijie said, "and he always carried it about with him. It had double lotus blossoms on both sides, and on each of the petals I wrote a word. 'I offer this to Chen my lover,' I wrote."

Chunmei asked Cuiping if she knew of this little bag. "It was under his clothes," Cuiping said, "and I put it into the coffin with him."

When they had made their offerings at the grave, they took Han Aijie and her mother into the temple to have tea with them. It was late and Wang Liu'er wished to go home. Her daughter would not hear of it. She knelt down before Chunmei and Cuiping and wept. "I do not wish to go back with my parents," she said to them. "I wish to live with you. Then I can see his tablet every day. We were lovers, and I should like people to say that I had been his wife." Her tears fell like the water from a spring.

"Sister," Chunmei said, "I am afraid you are very young to live such a life. You will be wasting the best of your years."

"No, Lady," Han Aijie said. "For his sake, I would cut out my eyes and break my nose. I shall never marry anyone else."

"You go home, old people," she said to her parents. "I am going with these ladies."

"We have been hoping that you would support us in our old age," Wang Liu'er said, with tears. "We have only just brought you from the Dragon's Pool and then you leave us."

"I will not go back with you," Han Aijie declared, "and if you try to make me, I will kill myself.

Then Han Daoguo saw that his daughter had made up her mind. He and Wang Liu'er cried and went back to the wine house. Han Aijie got into a sedan chair with Chunmei and Cuiping and went to the city with them. Wang Liu'er thought of her daughter and wept all the time. Han Daoguo saw that it was late, so he hired two animals to take them back.

The horses are slow and the heart is eager
It is a hard road that they travel
They are like the weed that floats on the pond
The climbing plant that creeps along the wall.
The moon over the royal palace looks down Upon their parting
The parting of those who go to the east
From those who go to the west.

123
Han Ai-chieh Seeks Her Father and Mother in Hu-chou; Ch'an Master P'u-ching Rescues Souls from Perdition & the End of Ximen's House

Some words of admonition

In this human life people should not rely upon heroism;
Their degrees of skill at their jobs are sure to differ.
Even fierce tigers are bound to meet more ferocious beasts;
The most poisonous serpents are also fearful of centipedes.
His seven captures of Meng Huo made Chu-ko Liang famous;[1]
For prevailing over Kuan Yü twice Lü Meng was admired.[2]
The judiciousness of Li An marked him as a prudent man;
And enabled him to fly high and evade his predicament.[3]

When Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh returned to the Hsieh Family Tavern without their daughter, they were faced with the prospect of:

Sitting at home as their resources ran out.[4]

They therefore sent Ch'en the Third to invite Magnate Ho to visit them as before. When Magnate Ho found out that Liu the Second had been killed by the local authorities, so that the threat that he posed was eliminated, he came back and resumed his affair with Wang Liu-erh.

In the course of a conversation with Han Tao-kuo, he said, "Since your daughter, Han Ai-chieh, is preserving her chastity as a member of the commandant's household, and refuses to come back, I propose that once I have sold off my shipment of merchandise, and collected what I am owed, the two of you can come with me on my return to my home in Hu-chou. That would surely be preferable to carrying on this business of yours here."

"If you deign to be so considerate of us, sir," responded Han Tao-kuo, "that would be wonderful."

One day, after Magnate Ho had sold off his merchandise, and collected what was owed him, he hired a boat and set out for Hu-chou, taking Han Tao-kuo and Wang Liu-erh with him.

To resume our story, when Han Ai-chieh had settled into Chou Hsiu's household, she and Ko Ts'ui-p'ing both remained chaste out of respect for Ch'en Ching-chi, addressed each other as sisters, and got along very well, spending their days keeping company with Ch'un-mei. At the time, Chou Chin-ko was already five years old, Sun Erh-niang's daughter Chou Yü-chieh was nine, and the women had nothing to do but look after the children.

Who would have thought that after the death of Ch'en Ching-chi, and Chou Hsiu's departure on his military campaign, despite the fact that every day Ch'un-mei enjoyed:

Delicacies of every variety, and Clothes of satin and brocade;
while on her head:
What glitters is gold,
What is white is silver,
What are round are pearls,
What sparkle are jewels; and
She lacked for nothing;[5]
she found the nights difficult to endure:
Sleeping in solitude on her lonely pillow,[6]
While flames of desire consumed her heart.

She noticed that Li An was a handsome fellow and was impressed by the way in which, after the death of Chang Sheng, he had continued conscientiously to patrol the premises, both early and late.

One day, during the winter, he was on the night shift in the duty room when he heard someone knocking on the rear gate and promptly asked who it was; to which the only response was, "Just open the door."

Li An hastily unfastened the door only to see someone force their way inside and hide out of the lamplight. When Li An took a look at the person, he saw that it was the wet nurse Chin-kuei.

"Nurse," said Li An, "what are you doing here at such an hour?"

"I have not come on my own initiative," said Chin-kuei. "It is my mistress in the rear compound who sent me here."

"What did the mistress send you here for?" asked Li An.

Chin-kuei laughed, saying, "You wouldn't understand it. She wanted me to see if you had gone to sleep or not, and entrusted me with something to give to you."

So saying, she pulled a bag of clothing off her shoulder and said, "These are for you, and this bag also contains some women's clothing for your mother. The mistress feels much indebted to you for escorting His Honor's cartloads of luggage on the way home, and for saving her life. If it had not been for you, she also would have been slain by that rascal Chang Sheng."

When she had finished speaking, she left the clothes behind and went out the door.

After going only two steps, she turned around and said, "There is another item of importance."

So saying, she pulled out a large ingot of silver weighing fifty taels and tossed it to Li An, after which she continued on her way. The rest of the night passed without incident.

Early the next morning, Li An got up and went straight to his home, taking the clothes with him to give to his mother.

"Where did these things come from?" his mother asked.

Li An told her what had happened the night before; but when she had heard him out, his mother became upset and said, "At the outset, Chang Sheng committed a crime, for which she had him beaten to death with a hundred strokes of the bamboo. What could there be behind her giving you these things today? I am already more than sixty years old at present, and since the death of your father, you are the only person I have left to look to. If you do something that gets you into trouble, who would there be for me to depend on? You had better not go back there tomorrow morning."
"If I don't return," said Li An, "and she should send someone to fetch me, what will you have to say?"
"I will just tell them that you have come down with a severe cold," his mother said.
"If I should end up not returning," said Li An, "wouldn't that serve to make His Honor annoyed with me?"
"You might as well go visit your uncle the Shantung Yaksha Li Kuei," said his mother. "After staying there for a few months, you can come back to check out the situation."
Li An, who was both a filial and obedient son, opted to take his mother's suggestion and proceeded to pack up his luggage and set out for Ch'ing-chou prefecture in order to seek refuge with his uncle Li Kuei.
When Ch'un-mei saw that Li An had not returned, she sent a junior servant to summon him on three or five occasions. At first, his mother said that he was at home recuperating from an illness, but when she saw that people came back to check on the situation, she explained that he had returned to his native place to try to make a living. Ch'un-mei suffered heartfelt frustration at this news. But no more of this.
Time flies by swiftly;[7]
The sun and moon shoot back and forth like shuttles.[8]
The twelfth month ended and spring began,
During the primal decade of the first month.
Commander-general Chou Hsiu, at the head of his twelve thousand troops, had been encamped at Tung-ch'ang prefecture for some time, when he sent his servant Chou Chung to deliver a letter to his family, directing them to send Ch'un-mei and Sun Erh-niang to join him there, along with his children Chin-ko and Yü-chieh. When his dependents were ready to get into their carts and set out, they left only Chou Chung behind, having instructed him to go and invite Chou Hsiu's cousin Chou Hsüan to leave his country estate and come to look after the household during their absence.
It so happens that Commander-general Chou Hsiu had a cousin named Chou Hsüan who lived on his country estate, and who agreed to join Chou Chung in looking after the household along with Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh, while Chou Jen and a contingent of military guards escorted the vehicles of the other family members on their way to Tung-ch'ang prefecture. With regard to this trip, truly:
It was not to save their lives or reputations that they left their home;
But how could they have known how few persons survive such expeditions?
There is a set of verses that describes the heroic leadership of Commander-general Chou Hsiu. At this time, when the Central Plain was in a state of turmoil, it was his ambition to overcome the barbarians. Behold:
In all four quarters bandits arise like swarming bees;
The flames of beacon fires flare up turning the sky red.
A display of the general's wrath may pacify the realm;
Sweeping away the barbarians, and making them submit.
He has long chosen to prefer public over private interests;
And pledged his life to his country
as if it were not his.
His dagger-axe can shroud the sun to aid him in battle;
He is able to win the first place in the Hall of Fame.
Beyond the Yen-men Pass the autumn wind is tempestuous;
Clad in metal armor he must sleep
under the cold moon.
He has forced his steed to sweat
for twenty years;
Only to achieve streaks of snowy white in his hair.
The Son of Heaven sees his worth from miles away;
And has rewarded his efforts with praise repeatedly.
A golden seal hangs at his elbow,
as big as a dipper;
As surely befits a hero of such imposing stature.[9]
One day, under the supervision of Chou Jen, the vehicles that were carrying Chou Hsiu's dependents arrived in Tung-ch'ang. When the commander-general saw that Ch'un-mei, Sun Erh-niang, Chin-ko, and Yü-chieh, along with their attendants, had arrived, and that:
Their journey had been a safe one,[10]
he was utterly delighted and arranged for them to be housed in the rear compound of his headquarters.
Chou Jen told him, "I invited your cousin Chou Hsüan from your country estate to come and look after your household, along with my father Chou Chung."
Commander-general Chou Hsiu also asked, "Why is Li An nowhere to be seen?"
"Why bring up the subject of Li An?" Ch'un-mei expostulated. "Because I was feeling grateful to that rascal for apprehending Chang Sheng, I gave him two sets of clothes for his mother to wear. But that evening, while patrolling the premises, he went into the rear compound and made off with a package of fifty taels worth of rental income from your country estate that was lying on a table in the parlor. I sent servants to his mother's place to summon him a number of times, but he claimed to be sick and failed to return. And the last time I sent someone after him, he was told that he had absconded to his native place in Ch'ing-chou."
"That rascal," responded Chou Hsiu. "I had always treated him favorably, and he has turned out to be as ungrateful as that. When I have the time, I will send people there to arrest him."
Ch'un-mei chose not to mention anything about the affair of Han Ai-chieh. After some time had passed, Ch'un-mei observed that Chou Hsiu was preoccupied every day with military affairs and was utterly devoted to serving the national interest on the Emperor's behalf:
Straining his heart and taxing his mind,[11]
while not even taking the time to eat during the day. As for the gratification of sexual desires within the bed curtains, it was a long time since he had indulged in them. She observed that Chou I, the second son of the old family servant Chou Chung, was eighteen years old, possessed:
Clear-cut brows and sparkling eyes;
and was willing to:
Exchange looks with eyes and eyebrows.
Consequently, the two of them began a clandestine affair and became attached to each other.
Morning after morning and evening after evening, the two of them played board games and drank wine together in her room, while the only person who remained unaware of what was going on was the commander-general.
Who could have anticipated that, one day, Emperor T'ai-tsung of the northern state, the Great Chin, having overcome the state of Liao, and observed that in the Eastern Capital of the Sung dynasty Emperor Ch'in-tsung had ascended the throne, assembled a powerful contingent of barbarian troops and launched a two-pronged invasion of the Central Plain. The grand marshal Nien-mo-ho led a force of one hundred thousand infantry and cavalry through the Ching-ching Pass in T'ai-yüan prefecture in an attempt to invade the Eastern Capital; while the secondary marshal Wo-li-pu led his forces from T'an-chou in an attempt to seize Kao-yang Pass. The Sung armies defending the frontier:
Proved unable to resist them.[12]
This information threw the minister of war Li Kang and the general-in-chief Ch'ung Shih-tao into a panic, and that very night they issued urgent military dispatches ordering the commander-generals of Shantung, Shansi, Honan, Hopei, Kuan-tung, and Shensi to muster the infantry and cavalry in their six jurisdictions, and occupy the strongholds therein, in order to defend their territories, and fend off the enemy. Consequently, Liu Yen-ch'ing, the commander-general of the Shensi region, led the forces of Yen-sui; Wang Ping, the commander-general of the Kuan-tung region, led the forces of Fen-chiang; Wang Huan, the commander-general of the Hopei region, led the forces of Wei-po; Hsin Hsing-tsung, the commander general of the Honan region, led the forces of Chang-te; Yang Wei-chung, the commander-general of the Shansi region, led the forces of Tse-lu; and Chou Hsiu, the commander-general of the Shantung region, led the forces of Ch'ing-yen against the Chin invaders.
To resume our story, when Commander-general Chou Hsiu learned that a powerful contingent of barbarian troops had come to attack the frontier, and received the urgent military dispatch from the Ministry of War, he mustered his infantry and cavalry:
Donned his complete suit of armor,[13]
And marched away at double stages.
By the time his mounted scouts reached the Kao-yang Pass the Chin marshal Wo-li-pu's infantry and cavalry had already penetrated the pass and slain an enormous number of men and horses.
This happened during the first decade of the fifth month.
The armies endeavored to arrest each other; but Yellow sand flew up in all four directions, and
The tempestuous winds blinded their vision.
Chou Hsiu led his troops into battle, but the Chin commander Wo-li-pu, while urging his cavalry forward in a counterattack, launched an arrow that buried its shaft in his neck, penetrating his throat and causing him to fall off his horse and die. The enemy officers tried to secure his corpse with hooks and cords, but his own men dashed forward, seized his body, and carried it away on horseback. The soldiers wounded in this engagement were without number. Alas, on the day that Commander-general Chou Hsiu died in battle, he was only forty-six years old. Truly:
Loyal generals exert themselves to serve their home and country;[14]
But the blood of both the worthy and the stupid stains the sand.[15]
A man of yore whose thoughts on this subject were inexhaustible has left us a quatrain to express his feelings, which reads:
Victory and defeat are outcomes that military men cannot anticipate;[16]
Security and danger in the final analysis are things decided by fate.
Advancing to battle without obtaining victory
he dies before his time;[17]
The sun sets and the rivers flow in spite of one's insuperable grief.[18]
There is also a lyric to the tune "Partridge Sky" that reads:
A handsome hero whose aim it was to stabilize the state and pacify the land;[19]
His heart was motivated by correct principles[20] and the will to rout the enemy.
He was as given to planning national affairs as dealing with family matters;
And was practiced at carrying secret tallies and wearing tiger-head tallies.[21]
The barbarian cavalry was invincible,
While the prowess of his men was lax.
His troops were unwilling to risk their lives and his officers were inept.
It was a pity that he suffered such a death upon the sandy battlefield;
And that for untold years his heroic spirit could not find expression.
When the grand coordinator Chang Shu-yeh saw that Commander-general Chou Hsiu had perished on the battlefield, he immediately:

Sounded the gong for his troops to retire,[22] took stock of his losses, withdrew to defend Tung-ch'ang, and submitted an urgent memorial to the throne. But no more of this.
When the retreating troops carried Chou Hsiu's corpse back to Tung-ch'ang, Ch'un-mei and her entire household, both high and low, were so upset that:
Their cries shook the heavens, as they proceeded to encoffin the body and turn over his military credentials and official seals to the authorities. One day some time later, Ch'un-mei, along with her servant Chou Jen, took charge of the coffin and returned with it to Ch'ing-ho district. But no more of this. At this point our story divides into two.
To resume our story, ever since Ch'un-mei departed, Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh had stayed at home, where they:
Chose to consume only plain tea and simple fare,[23]
Remaining chaste and preserving their widowhood, as the days and months passed by. One day, as spring expired and the summer began, when the scenery was bright and fresh, and the days grew longer, they became weary of their needlework, and the two of them strolled out to the ornamental pavilion outside the library on the west side of the courtyard, where they saw that:
The many flowers were in full bloom,[24]
Orioles sang and swallows chattered,[25] and they were:
Touched with heartache by the scene.[26]
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's heart remained relatively unperturbed, but Han Ai-chieh could not get the thought of her lover Ch'en Ching-chi out of her mind. With regard to all things, she was:
Bereft of thought or feeling, and Saddened by whatever she saw.[27]
The mouth divulges the sprouts of the mind,[28]
And gives shape to them in poetic language.
They took turns composing some quatrains that testify to this.
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:
As flowers bloom in the quiet courtyard
the sun begins to shine;
Outside the tightly locked double doors
the white day brightens.
Collapsed against the silver screen I wake from my spring sleep;
Upon the branch of a green locust tree
I hear an oriole's cry.
Han Ai-chieh's read:
The spring season is coming to an end[29]
as the summer begins;
Meandering in my upturned shoe-tips I venture out the door.
As evening comes I lean in depression on my dressing table;
If I were to neatly paint my eyebrows[30]
for whom would it be?[31]
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:
Wiping the mirror with a red cloth by light from the window;
I paint my mothlike eyebrows so they slope to either side.
When my lotus feet are lightly animated[32]
where is there to go?
Smiling beside the stairs I pluck the pomegranate blossoms.[33]
Han Ai-chieh's read:
My countenance looks like snow and my spirit resembles jade;
I am not yet ready to banish romance for fear of defilement.
As I gaze at my visage I pity myself and also feel regret;
Who is left to savor the beauty of my newly applied makeup?[34]
Ko Ts'ui-p'ing's read:
Sedge grass spreads over the ground
as thick as a rug;
Elm pods are strewn everywhere like scattered coins.
Who could have foreseen that rascal
to be so fickle?
Drunken the whole day long he sleeps under the flowers.
Han Ai-chieh's read:
Besetting sorrow continues to cause
my brows to peak;
Why has my face looked so distressed for the last year?
Ever since we parted all day long my soul is disturbed;
There is no road to Heaven that might allow us to meet.
When the two sisters had finished reciting their quatrains, without their knowing it:
Tears trickled down their cheeks.[35]
Chou Hsüan came upon them at this point and admonished them, saying, "You two sisters ought not to disturb yourselves so. You would do better to stifle your sighs and examine your own conduct. I have had a number of dreams in the last few days that appear to be inauspicious. I dreamed of a bow hanging from a flagstaff, and the flagstaff appeared to be broken. But I don't know whether this should be interpreted as inauspicious or auspicious."
On hearing this, Han Ai-chieh remarked, "I fear it may portend that His Honor has suffered some mishap on the frontier."
As they were wondering about this, all of a sudden they saw their servant Chou Jen, dressed in mourning garments, and in a state of obvious agitation, who came in and reported, "A calamity has occurred. His Honor, thus and so, on the seventh day of the fifth month, was killed in battle at the frontier pass. The First Lady and the Second Lady, along with their dependents, have brought the cart with his bier home with them and have just arrived."
This threw Chou Hsüan into a state of consternation, and he promptly ordered that the front reception hall should be swept out and straightened up so that Chou Hsiu's coffin could lie in state there, and the sacrificial offerings could be formally presented. The entire household, both high and low, then proceeded to give voice to grievous lamentations, and Chou Hsüan made arrangements for funeral services to be held on the seven weekly commemorations of Chou Hsiu's death, and for Buddhist monks and Taoist priests to hold scripture readings on his behalf. His children, Chou Chin-ko and Chou Yü-chieh:
Donned hempen garments and put on mourning apparel;
while visitors came and went to offer their condolences. A day was chosen for the funeral procession, and he was duly buried in his family's ancestral graveyard. But there is no need to describe this in detail.
To resume our story, on behalf of his nephew the five-year-old Chou Chin-ko, Chou Hsüan submitted a memorial to the throne asking that an officially ordained sacrifice be offered at the site of Chou Hsiu's burial, and that his son should be allowed to succeed to his father's official position. An imperial decree was duly issued to the Ministry of War that read as follows:
The deceased Commander-general Chou Hsiu has devoted his life to repaying his country, and died in the course of serving the ruler. His loyalty and courage are worthy of commendation. Officers should be deputed to conduct a sacrificial ceremony at his grave site, and a tablet should be erected at the head of his tomb engraved with his posthumous title as commander-in-chief. His son should be properly nurtured until he reaches the age at which he can succeed to his father's hereditary position.
As for Ch'un-mei, when she was not caring for her son, her lascivious desires were stronger than ever, and she often kept Chou I in her perfumed boudoir for days at a time. As the mornings and evenings succeeded one another:
She indulged her lust without restraint, until one day she came down with a hectic fever and other symptoms of consumption. Although she took medication for this every day, her appetite for food and drink diminished, her temperament became depressed, and:
Her body became as thin as a stick of kindling,[36]
but her lascivious desires did not abate.
One day, sometime after the celebration of her birthday, and during the hottest period of the summer in the sixth month, she was sleeping late when, unexpectedly, as she and Chou I embraced each other on her bed, and he had just ejaculated, a burst of cold air emerged from her nostrils, her vaginal secretions formed a pool on the bedding, and:
Alas and alack,
she expired on top of Chou I's body. At the time of her death she was only twenty-eight years old.
When Chou I realized that she was no longer breathing, he was reduced to a state of panic, stole some gold and silver and other valuables from her trunk, secreted them in his clothing, and fled from the premises. The maidservants and wet nurses:
Did not dare to conceal these events,[37] and reported them to Chou Hsüan, who proceeded to put the family's senior servant Chou Chung in manacles and force him to help them track down Chou I.
Strange as it may seem,
he had gone to his aunt's home outside the city to seek refuge and was apprehended there, tied up with a length of rope, and brought back to face the music. Chou Hsüan understood what had happened but was afraid that if the scandal leaked out it might prevent Chou Chin-ko from succeeding to his father's hereditary position. He therefore had Chou I taken to the front reception hall where:
Without permitting any further explanation, he had him beaten forty strokes with the heavy bamboo, which caused him to die on the spot.
Chou Hsüan then entrusted Chou Chin-ko to the care of Sun Erh-niang and undertook to make the funeral arrangements for Ch'un-mei, having her coffin taken to her husband's ancestral graveyard and buried in the same tomb with the commander-general. He also dismissed the two wet nurses, along with the two concubines Hai-t'ang and Yüeh-kuei, so they could seek employment elsewhere and find husbands for themselves. This left only Ko Ts'ui-p'ing and Han Ai-chieh, who refused to leave, though he urged them to do so.
One day, unexpectedly, the infantry and cavalry forces of the Great Chin regime succeeded in capturing the Eastern Capital of Pien-liang and took the retired Emperor Hui-tsung and his son Emperor Ch'in-tsung into captivity in the northern regions. As a result:
The Central Plain lacked a ruler,[38]
The four quarters were disrupted,
Military weapons were everywhere,
The masses felt driven to flight.[39]
The common people faced the calamity of disruption;[40]
The populace was forced to suffer in dire straits.[41]
A large force of barbarian troops had already slaughtered its way across the borders of Shantung province with the result that among the people:
Husbands fled and wives scattered,
Specters cried and spirits howled.[42]

Even fathers and sons were no longer able to care for each other. Ko Ts'ui-p'ing was taken back by her mother's family, while:
Everyone else fled for their lives.[43]
Only Han Ai-chieh was left:
Without a place to seek protection.
She had no alternative but to pack her luggage, dress herself in plain traveling clothes, leave Ch'ing-ho district, and set out for Lin-ch'ing in order to find her parents. But when she arrived in Lin-ch'ing, she found that the Hsieh Family Tavern had been closed and its owner had fled.
Unexpectedly, she ran into Ch'en the Third, who said to her, "Last year, your parents went to Chiang-nan with Magnate Ho to live with him at his home in Hu-chou."
Han Ai-chieh, consequently, set out to seek her parents there, supporting herself along the way by singing songs and accompanying herself on the moon guitar.
When hungry she ate, when thirsty she drank;
Stopping by night and traveling by day;
As flustered as a dog who has
lost his way home;
As flurried as a fish who has
escaped the net.
Her bound feet with their upturned toes were small, and she was beset by:
A myriad pains and a thousand hardships.[44]
After traveling for a few days, she reached the area around Hsü-chou. It was getting late, and she was passing through a solitary village when she came upon an old lady in her seventies.
Her hairdo resembled two strips of snow,
Her chignon was tied into a bag of silk, and she was busy at the stove, pounding rice and preparing a meal.
Han Ai-chieh went up and bowed to her, saying, "I am a native of Ch'ing-ho district. On account of the current disruption, I am heading to Chiang-nan to seek my parents. I did not realize that it was this late and wonder if you might let me stay overnight at your place. I will leave first thing in the morning and will be sure to pay you for it."
The old lady contemplated the young woman and thought to herself, "She does not look like the maidservant of an impoverished household.
Her movements are cultivated;
Her demeanor is not ordinary."[45]
Behold:
Her raven locks have not been dressed;[46]
She is thinking only of how well-off she used to be.
Her brows are knit like distant peaks;
She recalls the wealth and distinction of former years.
During the autumn night the moon is hidden by misty clouds;
The peony blossoms have been buried beneath layers of dirt.[47]
"If you are seeking a place to spend the night," the old lady said, "please have a seat on the k'ang while I finish cooking this meal. There is a crew of men engaged in dredging the riverbed who are coming to eat it."
The old lady was tending a stove on top of the k'ang, and in no time at all she produced a large kettle's worth of dried rice mixed with beans and other grains. She also chopped up two large platters of fresh vegetables and flavored them with a pinch of salt. What should appear at this point but a crew of men whose hair was disheveled, whose legs were bare, who wore breechcloths around their waists, and whose feet were caked with mud.
Putting down their spades and shovels, they asked, "Old lady, is our food ready or not?"
"Help yourselves, and eat your fill," the old lady responded.
Thereupon, they proceeded to help themselves to the food and then went their separate ways to consume it.
As they were eating, one of them, who looked thirty-three or thirty-four years old and had a dark complexion and graying hair, asked the old lady, "Who is that person sitting on the k'ang?"
"This woman," the old lady said, "is a native of Ch'ing-ho district who is on her way to Chiang-nan to look for her parents. Since it is already late in the day, she has asked to spend the night here."
The man in question then asked her, "Lady, what is your name?"
"My surname is Han," Ai-chieh replied, "and my father is named Han Tao-kuo."
The man then came forward and took her by the hand, saying, "Sister, are you not my niece, Han Ai-chieh?"
"You look rather like my uncle, Han the Second," exclaimed Han Ai-chieh.
The two of them then:
Embraced each other by the neck and wept.
He then went on to ask, "Where are your father and mother? I thought you were all in the Eastern Capital. How do you happen to be here?"
Han Ai-chieh then proceeded from the beginning to tell him in detail what had happened and concluded by saying, "Because I had married into Commandant Chou Hsiu's household, after the death of my husband I have maintained my chaste widowhood up until now. On learning that my parents accompanied Magnate Ho to his home in Hu-chou, I determined to go in search of them. Because of the current disruption, there was no one available to go with me, and I have chosen to set out alone, supporting myself on the way by singing songs. I could hardly have anticipated that I would encounter my uncle here."
"Ever since your parents moved to the Eastern Capital," said Han the Second, "I have lacked any reliable means of livelihood. Being forced to sell my house, I have ended up working as a common laborer here, engaged in dredging the riverbed in order to earn a bowl of rice for myself. Under the circumstances, I might as well join you in going to Hu-chou in search of your parents."
"Should my uncle decide to go with me," said Han Ai-chieh, "that would certainly be wonderful."
He then filled a bowl with rice and gave it to Han Ai-chieh to eat. Han Ai-chieh sampled a mouthful but found it so coarse that she could hardly swallow it and gave up after consuming only half a bowl. Of the events of that evening there is no more to tell.
At dawn the next day, the crew of workers departed to continue their job, but Han the Second, after paying the rent he owed to the old lady, took Han Ai-chieh with him and went out the door, as they set out on their journey together.
Han Ai-chieh was delicate by nature, and her bound feet with their upturned toes were small. She had an assortment of valuables such as hairpins and combs with her, which she sold off piecemeal in order to support them along the way. On reaching Huai-an, they boarded a boat and continued to wend their way toward Hu-chou in Chiang-nan. After some days, they found their way to Magnate Ho's home in Hu-chou and were reunited with Han Ai-chieh's parents.
Who could have anticipated that Magnate Ho had already died. He had no wives or concubines in his home other than Wang Liu-erh and left behind merely a daughter who was five years old, and an estate consisting of several acres of paddy fields. In less than a year, Han Tao-kuo also died, and since Wang Liu-erh had already had an affair with Han the Second, she took her brother-in-law as her mate, and they supported themselves by farming on Magnate Ho's property.
There were numerous affluent young men in Hu-chou who noticed how clever and good-looking Han Ai-chieh appeared to be and sought to marry her. Han the Second also urged her repeatedly to take a husband, but Han Ai-chieh deliberately cut off her hair, defaced her appearance, and became a Buddhist nun, swearing never to marry anyone again. Two years later, at the age of thirty-one, she came down with an illness and died. Truly:
Before her chaste bones have been buried under three feet of soil;
Her resentful soul first finds its way to the nine-layered heavens.
Thus it was that Han the Second and Wang Liu-erh ended up as man and wife and inherited Magnate Ho's estate and landed property. But no more of this.
To resume our story, when the invading infantry and cavalry of the Great Chin regime succeeded in seizing Tung-ch'ang prefecture and threatened to make their way to Ch'ing-ho district, behold:
The officials endeavor to flee;
The city gates are shut by day.[48]
The masses are moved to flight;
Fathers and sons are separated.
Behold:
Smoke arises in all four quarters;
The sun is hidden by yellow sand.
Rapacious boars and long serpents,[49]
Attempt to swallow each other up.[50]
Dragons contend and tigers battle,[51]
Each contending for its dominance.
Black standards and crimson flags,
Overspread the suburban landscape.
Men shriek aloud and women weep,[52]
A myriad homes are terror-struck.
Foreign troops and alien generals,
Are like gathering ants or swarming bees;[53]
Their short swords and long spears,[54]
Resemble thick forests and dense bamboos.[55]
In place after place, dead bodies and human bones lie scattered higgledy-piggledy;
In pile after pile, split blades and broken swords are discarded in jumbled heaps.[56]
Every parent holds a son or embraces a daughter;
Every home closes its gates and locks its doors.[57]
Nine out of ten houses have been vacated;[58]
No longer resembling rural or urban communities.
The deer flee and the squirrels scatter;
Leaving no trace of ritual, music, or formality.
Truly, it is a case of:
The palace ladies weep into their red sleeves;
The royal sons flee in their civilian disguise.[59]
At this juncture, when Wu Yüeh-niang in the household of Hsi-men Ch'ing realized that the barbarian troops were approaching and saw that family after family had locked the gates to their houses and fled in disorder, she felt compelled to do likewise and got together some gold, pearls, and other valuables to take with her. At that time, her elder brother Wu K'ai had already died, so she set out accompanied only by Wu the Second, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and her ten-year-old son Hsiao-ko.[60] After seeing that both the front and rear doors to the residence were securely locked, they headed for Chi-nan prefecture to seek refuge with Yün Li-shou. By so doing, she hoped, on the one hand, to escape the invading army, and, on the other hand, to formalize Hsiao-ko's betrothal to Yün Li-shou's daughter.
Along the way:
Every individual they met was feeling panicked;
Each and every one of them in a state of shock.
The unfortunate Wu Yüeh-niang, dressed in her traveling clothes, along with Wu the Second and the other males and females, five of them in all, fell in with the crowds of other fleeing refugees, managed to squeeze their way through the city gate, and made their way into the suburbs. As they proceeded on their way, they arrived at a crossroads in the open countryside where they encountered a Buddhist priest whose body was clad in a purplish-brown cassock, who held a metal staff with nine rings attached to it in his hand, who wore straw sandals on his feet, and over whose shoulder he carried a calico bag containing his sacred texts.
Stepping forward in large strides, he proceeded to press his palms together in front of his chest and bow to her in the Buddhist fashion, saying in a loud voice as he did so, "Lady Wu, where are you going? Pray hand my disciple over to me."
This startled Yüeh-niang so that she:
Turned pale with consternation, and addressed him saying, "Master, what disciple is it that you are asking for?"
"Lady," the monk replied, "you had better not pretend to be:
Still asleep in dreamland.
You must remember how, ten years ago, on the eastern spur of Mount T'ai, you were being pursued by Yin T'ien-hsi and sought refuge for the night in my mountain cave. I am that same Ch'an Master Snow Cave, whose religious name is P'u-ching. You promised then to let me have your son as a disciple, so why have you not turned him over to me?"
"Master," interjected Wu the Second, "you are a Buddhist monk. How can you be so:
Unamenable to reason?[61]

In this year of political upheaval we are fleeing for our lives. It is her hope that in the future this only child of hers will be able to carry on the ancestral sacrifices. How could she bear to relinquish him to you so he could abandon lay life and become a monk?"
"Are you really refusing to turn him over to me?" the monk asked.
"Master," said Wu the Second, "don't talk such nonsense, or hinder us from making our escape. I fear that the barbarian army may show up at any moment.
Who knows in the morning what evening may bring."[62]
"Since you refuse to turn my disciple over to me," said the monk, "it is already late in the day, and you cannot proceed any further. The barbarians have not yet come this far. You might as well come with me to stay overnight at this temple, before leaving first thing in the morning."
"Master," inquired Wu Yüeh-niang, "what temple is that?"
The monk merely pointed with his finger and said, "the one up there by the side of the road."
As the monk led the way forward, they found themselves at the Temple of Eternal Felicity, which Wu Yüeh-niang recognized as the one that she had visited once before in the past. By the time they arrived there, the abbot and more than half of the resident monks had already fled, leaving behind only a handful of Ch'an monks who were sitting in the lotus position in the meditation hall in the rear, where a large glazed censer was burning incense before an effigy of the Buddha. At the time, the sun was already sinking behind the hills. Behold:
The teeming crossroads are all ablaze with the light of burning lanterns;
The Temple of the Nine Stars is enhanced by fragrant mist and tolling bells.
The wheel of the bright moon is suspended underneath the blue heavens;
A handful of scattered stars serves to light up the azure firmament.
Within the camps of the Six Imperial Armies,
The wailing of painted bugles frequently resounds;
On the upper floors of the five drum towers,
Water drips in the bronze tanks of the clepsydras.
On all four sides the evening fog,
Densely encompasses the dancing pavilions and singing platforms;
In the three markets a cloak of mist,
Faintly enshrouds the green gauze windows and vermilion gates.
Pair by pair, the strolling beauties return to their boudoirs;
One by one, the young scholars close the blinds in their studies.[63]
That evening, Wu Yüeh-niang, along with Wu the Second, Tai-an, Hsiao-yü, and Hsiao-ko, five males and females in all, spent the night in the abbot's quarters at the temple. Some of the junior monks recognized her and provided Yüeh-niang and the others with something to eat. Meanwhile, Ch'an Master P'u-ching assumed the lotus position on a platform in the meditation hall, where he kept time by beating on a wooden fish as he recited the sutras. Yüeh-niang, along with Hsiao-ko and Hsiao-yü, slept on the bed, while Wu the Second and Tai-an slept together on the floor. As people who had been suffering from alarm and fatigue, they fell fast asleep.
The only one among them who failed to sleep soundly was Hsiao-yü, who got up in the abbot's quarters and watched through a crack in the door as P'u-ching recited the sutras.
As the third watch of the night gradually approached, behold:
The metallic autumn wind grew desolate;
The slanting moon appeared more somber.
The bustle of human activity subsided;[64]
The myriad pipes of Heaven were silent.
On looking at the large incense-burning censer in front of the effigy of Buddha, she saw that it was:
Half alight but not extinguished.
When Ch'an Master P'u-ching realized that:
The empire was in a state of disorder,
The population was suffering distress,
and that:
The corpses of those killed in battle,
Appeared to be incalculable in number;
He exerted his compassionate feelings,
To dispense his boundless benevolence.
Addressing himself reverently to the Buddha, he recited a spell for dispelling enmity, intended to:
Rescue the incarcerated souls,[65]
Free them from old resentments,
Clear impediments in their way,
So they could be reincarnated,
Without any remaining residues.
Thereupon, he recited the spell for dispelling enmity more than a hundred times.
Shortly thereafter:
A cold breeze blew forlornly,
A chilly wind began to sough,[66]
and several tens of ghosts appeared, some of them:
With scorched heads and singed scalps,
Disheveled hair and mud-stained faces.
Others:
With ruptured fingers and broken arms,
Gutted stomachs and gouged out hearts.
And still others:
Without heads and with crippled limbs;
Or with:
Locked cangues hanging on their necks.
They had come to be enlightened by the Ch'an Master's recitation of the spell and:
Lined up neatly to either side of him.[67]
The Ch'an Master then addressed them, saying:
"You group of living individuals,
Seek to repay enmity with enmity,[68]
Unwilling to seek reconciliation.
Whenever can this come to an end?
You must listen carefully to what I say, if you wish to pursue your separate paths to reincarnation. There is a gatha that says:
I urge you not to harbor enmity;
Acute enmity is hard to resolve.
Enmity can arise in one any day,
But cannot be resolved for ages.
If one repays enmity with grace,
It is to pour hot water on snow.
If you requite hatred with hate,
It is a wolf meeting a scorpion.
I sense those who harbor enmity,
Permit enmity to devastate them.[69]
Those who sense this and repent,
Are able to grasp their natures,
Understand their original minds,[70]
And rid themselves of animosity.
The potency of this sacred text,
Redeems one from his evil karma.
Each of you may be reincarnated,
If you harbor no further enmity.
The head is altered and the face replaced, as the wheel of transmigration turns;
It is useless to try to grasp what awaits you in the predestined life to come."[71]
At this juncture, the crowd of ghosts thanked him and then disappeared. Hsiao-yü had been surreptitiously scrutinizing them but did not recognize anyone.
In a little while, another man appeared, who was more than six feet in stature.
His appearance was stately,[72]
He was fully clad in armor, and his breast had been pierced by an arrow.
"I am Commander-general Chou Hsiu," he said. "In the course of contending with an enemy general, I died on the field of battle. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the second son of Shen Ching, with the name Shen Shou-shan."
Before he had even finished speaking, another person appeared, dressed in impressively immaculate clothing, who said, "I am the wealthy gentleman from Ch'ing-ho district, Hsi-men Ch'ing, who died after suffering a leakage of blood in my urine. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the second son of the wealthy gentleman Shen T'ung, with the name Shen Yüeh."
Hsiao-Yü recognized him to be her former master and was too scared to utter a word.
After this, another person appeared, carrying his head in his hands, while his whole body was covered with blood, and said, "I am Ch'en Ching-chi, who was murdered by Chang Sheng. Thanks to the Master's deliverance and the power of the scriptures, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a son of the Wang family."
After this, a woman appeared who was also carrying her head in her hands, while her chest was covered with blood, and said, "I am the wife of Wu Chih, and concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, P'an Chin-lien, who had the bad luck to be slain by my enemy Wu Sung. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn in the Eastern Capital as a daughter of the Li family."
After this, another man appeared who was dwarflike in stature and whose countenance was purplish and said, "I am Wu Chih who died as a result of Dame Wang's persuading P'an Chin-lien to poison me. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in Hsü-chou as a son of the peasant family named Fan."
After this, another woman appeared whose face was thin and sallow, while her body was dripping blood, and said, "I am Li P'ing-erh, the wife of Hua Tzu-hsü and concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who died from a case of acute metrorrhagia. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as the daughter of Commander Yüan."
After this, another man appeared, who said, "I am Hua Tzu-hsü, who suffered the misfortune of being exasperated to death by my wife. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a son in Battalion Commander Cheng's family."
After this, another woman appeared with her footbindings wrapped around her neck, who said, "I am the wife of Hsi-men Ch'ing's servant Lai-wang, Sung Hui-lien, who:
Hanged herself until dead.
Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a daughter in the Chu family."

After this, another woman appeared, who had:
A sallow face and emaciated flesh,[73] and said, "I am the wife of Commander-general Chou Hsiu, P'ang Ch'un-mei, who perished from sexual exhaustion. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated in the Eastern Capital as a daughter in the K'ung family."
After this, another man appeared:
Who was stark naked with disheveled hair,[74]
Whose entire body was covered with weals, and identified himself, saying, "I am Chang Sheng, who was beaten to death. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn as a son in the impoverished Kao family attached to the Ta-hsing guard in the Eastern Capital."
After this, another woman appeared, with a rope around her neck, and said, "I am Sun Hsüeh-o, the former concubine of Hsi-men Ch'ing, who unhappily:
Hanged myself until dead.
Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated as a daughter in the family of the impoverished Yao family outside the Eastern Capital."
After this, another young woman appeared with her footbindings wrapped around her neck, and said, "I am Hsi-men Ch'ing's daughter and Ch'en Ching-chi's wife, Hsi-men Ta-chieh, who also unhappily:
Hanged myself until dead.
Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reincarnated as a daughter of Chung Kuei, a policeman who resides outside the wall of the Eastern Capital."
After this, another young man appeared and identified himself with the words, "I am Chou I, who was also beaten to death. Thanks to the Master's deliverance, I have been reborn as a son in the Kao family that resides outside the wall of the Eastern Capital and am named Kao Liu-chu."
When they had done speaking, they all suddenly disappeared.
Hsiao-yü was so astonished by this that she shivered in awe and thought to herself, "So this monk is capable of communicating with the ghosts of the departed."
She wanted to go back to bed and tell Yüeh-niang about it, but who could have anticipated that Yüeh-niang was fast asleep, and her numinous soul's true being dreamt that, together with Wu the Second and the others, she was still on her way to Chi-nan prefecture, with the string of a hundred imported pearls, and a gem-studded chatelaine in hand, in order to seek refuge from the invading army with Yün Li-shou, and finalize the betrothal of Hsiao-ko to his daughter.
Eating when hungry, drinking when thirsty;[75]
Stopping by night and traveling by day;
they arrived in Chi-nan prefecture, where she asked an elderly man where Assistant Regional Commander Yün Li-shou was stationed.
The elderly man pointed the way out to them, saying, "He is stationed at a place, some two li from here, called the Ling-pi Stockade, which faces the river on one side and the mountains on the other. This Ling-pi Stockade is located on top of the city wall, and there are a thousand troops and horses stationed there. Assistant Regional Commander Yün Li-shou is the stockade commander there."
When Wu Yüeh-niang and her companions, five persons in all, arrived at the gate of the stockade, and Yün Li-shou learned that she had come to consummate the betrothal of their children:
He greeted her like an old acquaintance,[76]
as they exchanged the customary amenities. It so happened that his wife had recently died, so he asked a neighbor called Old Mrs. Wang to keep Yüeh-niang company, provided her with a lavish feast of wine and food in the rear hall of the stockade, and saw that Wu the Second and Tai-an were entertained in another place.
In the course of their conversation, Yüeh-niang mentioned her need to flee from the invading army, and her desire to consummate the betrothal of their children. She also brought out the string of a hundred imported pearls and the gem-studded chatelaine and presented them to him as a provisional betrothal gift. Yün Li-shou accepted them but did not have anything further to say about the betrothal.
That evening, he also arranged for Old Mrs. Wang to spend the night with Yüeh-niang, and to feel her out in order to ascertain her sentiments toward himself.
In the course of doing so, she said to Yüeh-niang, "Although Yün Li-shou is a military official, he is:
A book-reading gentleman;[77] and ever since you and his wife betrothed your children to each other by exchanging cuttings from the lapels of your blouses, you have been on his mind. Unexpectedly, his wife died, and he has been living as a widower ever since. At present, he is serving as the commander of this mountainous stockade. Although his position is not high:
When mounted he commands the troops;
When dismounted he rules the people;[78] and their life and death are in his hands. If you see fit not to reject him, he would like to:
Unite with you in connubial bliss,[79]
That you may share your mutual joy.[80]
Your son would also benefit from such a marriage alliance. Once peace has been restored, it would not be too late to return home together."
When Yüeh-niang heard this proposition, she:
Turned pale with consternation,
and was speechless for some time.
Old Mrs. Wang reported what she had said to Yün Li-shou, and the next evening he prepared wine in the rear hall and invited Yüeh-niang to have a drink with him there. Yüeh-niang thought that it was only to formalize Hsiao-ko's betrothal to his daughter and lost no time in joining him there, where they sat down together.
Yün Li-shou then said to her, "Sister-in-law, you may not be aware of it, but although I am only in charge of this mountainous stockade here, I command a considerable body of both infantry and cavalry and possess quantities of money and silk, fancy clothing, gold and silver, and other valuables. The only thing I lack is a wife to take charge of my household. For some time I have thought of you:
Like a thirsty person longing for drink;
Like a parched person longing for coolness.
I could hardly have anticipated that you would show up here today in order to formalize the betrothal of your son to my daughter.
Heaven has granted this affinity,
That we may share our mutual joy.
If we end up here as man and wife:
We can enjoy a lifetime of bliss.[81]
There is nothing unfeasible about such a scheme."
When Yüeh-niang heard this proposal she was enraged and cursed at Yün Li-shou, saying, "Who could have known that you are nothing but:
The skeleton of a dog wrapped in human skin.
My late husband did not treat you with disrespect. How can you now come out with such:
Language fit only for a dog or a horse?"
Yün Li-shou only laughed at this and then, stepping forward to embrace Yüeh-niang, said to her, "Lady, you were residing in a home of your own. What did you come to my place here for? It has always been true that:
It is easier to do business when the customer comes to your door.[82]
I don't know why it is, but I no sooner set eyes on you than you captivated by soul. There is no alternative. For better or for worse, you must marry me."
So saying, he brought over some wine to share with Yüeh-niang.
"Go up front and call in my younger brother," said Yüeh-niang. "There is something I need to say to him."
Yün Li-shou laughed at this and said, "Your younger brother and your servant Tai-an have already been killed by me."
He then said to his attendants, "Bring those things here to show to the lady."
In no time at all, by the light of the lamp, they brought in the two heads of Wu the Second and Tai-an, dripping with blood. This so perturbed Yüeh-niang that:
Her complexion turned the color of dirt, and she:
Fell to the floor in tears.
Yün Li-shou responded by:
Stepping forward and lifting her up,[83] saying as he did so, "Lady:
There is no need for you to be upset.[84]
Since your brother is already dead, you can become my wife. I am a regional commander, so such a marriage:
Would not dishonor you in any way."[85]
Yüeh-niang thought to herself, "Since this lousy character has already slain my brother and my servant, if I don't go along with him, I am likely to forfeit my life as well."
Thereupon, she pretended that:
Her anger had changed to joy, and said, "You will have to agree to my conditions before I will consent to be your wife."
Yün Li-shou responded, "No matter what your conditions may be, I will agree to them."
"If you first formalize my son's marriage," said Yüeh-niang, "I will then agree to become your wife."
"That's no problem," responded Yün Li-shou.
So saying, he proceeded to call his daughter out and pushed her over to Hsiao-ko so they could:
Share a loving cup,
Tie a nuptial knot,[86]
and become man and wife. Only after that did he pull Yüeh-niang over to him and propose to engage in the game of clouds and rain together; but Yüeh-niang resisted him and refused to comply.
Yün Li-shou was enraged at this and cursed her, saying, "You worthless woman! You tricked me into consummating the marriage of my daughter to your son, and now presume that I would not dare to kill your son."
So saying, he went to the head of the bed, where he:
Picked up a sword and brought it down in a sweep,
Scattering blood for a distance of several paces.
Truly:
When the three feet of sharp blade struck the neck,
The flood of fresh blood inundated everything around.
When Yüeh-niang saw that he had hacked Hsiao-ko to death, she couldn't help uttering a loud cry, which caused her to:
Wake up with a jerk,
revealing it all to be but:
A dream of the Southern Branch.
She was so perturbed by this that:
Her whole body was covered with sweat,
And her entire anatomy oozed moisture, as she cried out, "How strange! How strange!"
"Mistress," asked Hsiao-yü, who was lying at her side, "what are you crying about?"
"Just now, I had an inauspicious dream," Yüeh-niang responded and then went on to tell her all about it.
"I was unable to sleep a little while ago," said Hsiao-yü, "and got up to go and spy surreptitiously on what that monk was doing through a crack in the door. It turns out that he has been communicating with ghosts the whole night long. Just now, my late master, the Fifth Lady, the Sixth Lady, Brother-in-law Ch'en, the commandant Chou Hsiu, Sun Hsüeh-o, Lai-wang's wife Sung Hui-lien, and Hsi-men Ta-chieh all came to speak to him and then went their separate ways."
"Many of them are buried in the graveyard behind this temple," said Yüeh-niang. "It is not surprising that:
The stranded souls of the unjustly dead, should manifest themselves during the quiet of the night."
Mistress and servant were unable to go back to sleep, and before they knew it, it was the fifth watch, and the cocks crowed. Wu Yüeh-niang hastily got up, washed her face, and went into the meditation hall in order to pay obeisance to the Buddha and burn incense.
Whom should she encounter there but Master P'u-ching, who was sitting on his meditation platform and addressed her in a loud voice, saying, "Lady Wu, have you achieved enlightenment now?"[87]
Yüeh-niang then knelt down and made him an obeisance, saying, "Permit me to inform your reverence that your disciple, née Wu, with her:
Fleshly eyes and mortal body,[88] did not recognize you to be the incarnation of an ancient Buddha. But thanks to the dream from which I have just awakened, I am now enlightened."
"Since you have already achieved enlightenment," the Master responded, "there is no need for you to continue on this journey. Should you do so, things will turn out the way they did in your dream, and all five of you will lose your lives. The fact that you and your son encountered me is something that was:
Both ordained and fated to happen to you,[89] because in days past you planted the seeds of your good fortune. Were that not so, it would have been difficult for you to avoid:
The splitting up of your flesh and blood.[90]

Initially, your deceased husband Hsi-men Ch'ing committed evil deeds and was anything but virtuous. This son of yours was reborn into your family in order to dissipate your wealth and destroy your property and would have ended up with:
His body and his head in different places.[91]
I will now undertake to lead him to salvation as my disciple. As the saying goes:
Should a single son leave the home to be ordained,
Nine generations of one's ancestors will be saved.[92]
This will also have the benefit for your late husband of:
Compensating for his evil karma, so that he too may achieve salvation. If you don't believe me, follow me, and I will allow you to see for yourself."
Thereupon, he strode into the abbot's quarters, where they could see that Hsiao-ko was still asleep on the bed. The Master raised the staff in his hand and touched him on the head with it, while telling Yüeh-niang and the others to take a look. All of a sudden, he turned over, and they could see that it was Hsi-men Ch'ing:
With a heavy cangue around his neck,[93]
And iron chains enclosing his waist.[94]
The Master then touched him again with his staff, and just as before, he appeared to be Hsiao-ko asleep on the bed. When Yüeh-niang saw this, without knowing it, she began to weep out loud, concluding that Hsiao-ko was a reincarnation of Hsi-men Ch'ing.
Before long, Hsiao-ko woke up, and Yüeh-niang said to him, "You must now follow the Master to leave home, take the tonsure, and be anointed as a priest before the Buddha."
In a piteous state, Yüeh-niang embraced him and wept bitterly, feeling that she had raised him in vain in the expectation that upon reaching the age of fifteen he would be able to inherit and perpetuate the ancestral line; and never having anticipated that on meeting this Ch'an Master he would be spirited away into a celibate life. Wu the Second, Hsiao-yü, and Tai-an were also overcome with grief.
Thereupon, Master P'u-ching took charge of Hsiao-ko, conferred the religious name of Ming-wu upon him, and bade farewell to Yüeh-niang; saying to her on the way out, "You do not need to proceed any further. Before long, the barbarian army will withdraw; the territory will be split between two separate dynasties; one to the south and one to the north; and the Central Plain will have a ruler of its own. In no more than ten days:
The armed troops will be withdrawn;
And the territory will be pacified.
You can thus return to your home and:
Spend your days with peace of mind."[95]
"Master," Yüeh-niang responded, "once you have accomplished my son's salvation:
On what day of what year,
will mother and son ever be able to see each other again?"
So saying, she instinctively took hold of Hsiao-ko and began to weep out loud.
"Lady," said the Master, "stop your crying. Another Master is arriving over there."
This fooled them all into swiveling their necks to look in the direction to which he pointed, whereupon, along with Hsiao-ko, he:
Transformed himself into a gust of clear breeze,[96] and disappeared from sight. Truly:
Having thrice descended to the mundane world where he was not recognized;
All of a sudden he flew away over the summit of Mount T'ai's Eastern Peak.
We will say no more here about how Master P'u-ching spirited Hsiao-ko away.
To resume our story, after this event Wu Yüeh-niang, Wu the Second, and the others continued to stay at the Temple of Eternal Felicity. In less than ten days time, sure enough, the Great Chin regime set up Chang Pang-ch'ang as a puppet emperor in the Eastern Capital, with a hierarchy of civil and military officials. The two Sung dynasty emperors, Hui-tsung and Ch'in-tsung, were subsequently taken to the north in captivity. The Prince of K'ang:
Escaped across the river on a clay horse,[97] and assumed the throne in Chien-k'ang. This was Emperor Kao-tsung of the Southern Sung dynasty, who appointed Tsung Tse as general-in-chief and succeeded in retaking parts of Shantung and Hopei from the Chin invaders. The country was thus split into two regimes, the Chin dynasty in the north and the Southern Sung dynasty in the south. As a result:
The realm under Heaven was once again at peace,[98] and
The people were able to resume their vocations.
When Wu Yüeh-niang returned home and opened the gate to her residence, she found that nothing of the family possessions or the household furnishings had been lost. Later on, she changed Tai-an's name to Hsi-men An and allowed him to inherit what was left of the family property. Henceforth, people addressed him as the Honorable Young Hsi-men, and he supported Yüeh-niang during her old age. She lived on to the age of sixty-nine before dying a natural death, which was the reward she had earned by doing good deeds and reciting the scriptures during her lifetime. There is a poem that testifies to this:
An idle glance at this transmitted text leaves one with confused feelings;
Who fully understands the extent to which the Way of Heaven is cyclical?[99]
Hsi-men Ch'ing's wealth and corruption made it hard to continue his line;
Ch'en Ching-chi's licentious cavorting ensured his eventual annihilation.
The goodness of Meng Yü-lou and Wu Yüeh-niang vouchsafed them long lives;
The wantonness of Li P'ing-erh and Ch'un-mei led to their early deaths.
It is not strange that P'an Chin-lien should meet with an awful fate;
And her ill repute last for a thousand years,[100] perpetuated in fiction.

The wealth and splendor of the past
Are now as nothing.
The silver screens and golden halls
Are now the stuff of dreams.
The setting sun shines on the ruined walls
And the withered rushes.
A cold mist shrouds the ancient palace
And the green moss.
In the passage below the ground
The lamp is nearly out.
The phoenix mirror in the tiring room
Is locked and sealed away.
To whom shall I speak of ruin or prosperity?
The slow moving cloud is a priest's gown
And the wind fills its sleeves.

Han Daoguo and Wang Liu'er went back to the wine house. Their daughter had left them and they had no way of making a living. They sent Chen the Third for the merchant He. Now that Tiger Liu was no more, He had nothing to be afraid of. He came back again to Wang Liu'er. He said to Han Daoguo: "Your daughter has gone and she will not come back. I suggest that, when I have sold all my merchandise and got the money, you had better come back to Huzhou with me. It is better than carrying on this business here."
Han Daoguo thanked him and agreed. That same day the merchant sold all his goods, collected the money, hired a boat and started back with Han Daoguo and Wang Liu'er for Huzhou.
At the General's house, Han Aijie wore mourning with Cuiping. They called each other "Sister" and were very great friends. They spent their days with Chunmei. The General's little son was now six years old, and his daughter ten. The women had nothing to do but look after these children.
But the General was away on duty, and Jingji was dead. Though Chunmei had the choicest food to eat and the finest clothes to wear, though she had golden ornaments and jewels and pearls, everything that she might desire, yet at night she was lonely and she could not bear it. The fires of passion consumed her. She saw that Li An was a man full of vigor. After Zhang Sheng's death, he kept watch over the house and did his duty faithfully.
One winter day, when Li An was on duty in the office, he heard a knocking at the door and asked who was there. Whoever it was, no answer was given: he was simply bidden to open the door. He opened the door. Somebody rushed in and turned with her back to the light. Li An looked closely and saw that it was the nurse.
"Nurse," he said, "what are you doing here so late?"
"I have not come on my own account," she told him. "My lady has sent me."
"Why did she send you?"
"Don't you understand?" the nurse said, smiling. "She told me to come and see if you had gone to sleep. I was to give you these." She took some clothes from over her shoulder. They were women's clothes. "They are for your mother. The other day you had much trouble, bringing back all our master's things. And you saved my lady's life. If you had not been there that day, Zhang Sheng would have killed her."
She put down the clothes and went to the door. But she had hardly taken two steps before she turned around again. "There is something else for you," she said. From her sleeve she took a piece of silver worth about fifty taels, threw it to him, and went off. Li An could not understand what all this meant.
The next morning he took the clothes to his mother. She asked him where he had got them, and he told her what had happened the night before. His mother cried bitterly.
"Zhang Sheng," she said, "did wrong and he was killed. Now she gives you these things. What does it mean? I am more than sixty years old. Your father is dead, and you are my only hope. If anything happens to you, what will become of me? Don't go to that place again."
"If I don't go back, they will only send for me," Li An said. "What shall I do?"
"I will tell them you have a bad cold," his mother said.
"We can't tell them that story always," Li An said. "And my master will be angry with me."
"Go and spend a few months with your Uncle Li Gui," his mother said, "and then we will think what we can do."
Li An was a dutiful son. He did what his mother told him, packed up his luggage and went to Qingzhou to his uncle's place. When Chunmei found that the man did not come to her, she sent a boy for him several times. At first the old woman said her son was ill. Then people came and demanded to search the house, so she told them that he had gone to his native place to get some money. Chunmei was very disappointed.
The days passed quickly. The cold season came to an end, and the days grew warmer. In the first ten days of the first month the General, who was with eleven thousand men in Dongchangfu, sent Zhou Zhong with a letter to Chunmei. It directed his two ladies and their two children to go to him. Zhou Zhong was to stay at home to look after the place and the General's younger brother would look after the estate. This brother, Zhou Xuan, lived on the estate. Zhou Zhong and Cuiping were to remain with him. Zhou Ren with an escort of soldiers took the ladies to Dongchangfu.
At last the party arrived safely. The General was very pleased. He found a place for them at the back of his headquarters. Zhou Ren told his master that Zhou Xuan had gone to live at the house and that he and Zhou Zhong were taking care of it. Zhou Zhong was Zhou Ren's father.
"Where is Li An?" the General asked.
"You do well to mention Li An," Chunmei said. "I was very kind to him. I gave him clothes for his mother, thinking how he had secured Zhang Sheng that night. But one night, when he was supposed to be on guard, he came to the inner court and stole fifty taels of silver. The money, which was on the table, had come from your brother. I sent several times for him and answer came back that he was ill. Then I sent for him again, but he had run off to Qingzhou, his native place."
"I would never have believed it of him," the General said. "Later, I will see about his arrest."
Chunmei said nothing to the General about Han Aijie.
The days passed. General Zhou devoted all his energies to the duties of his office. So careful and diligent was he that he hardly took a minute for dinner in the middle of the day. He had no time at all for lovemaking.
Chunmei came to the conclusion that Zhou Yi, the second son of Zhou Zhong, was a fine, handsome lad. He was nineteen. She made her eyes and eyebrows carry a message to him and soon began an intrigue. Morning and night, they sat together, playing chess and drinking wine. The only man who did not know what was going on was the General himself.
The King of the Jin country had conquered the kingdom of Liao in the north. Then he gathered a great force and invaded China from two directions, at the very time of the new Emperor's coronation. General Nian Muhe with a hundred thousand men came down by way of Taiyuanfu in Shanxi to attack the Eastern Capital. The second general, Gan Libu, came down from Tanzhou and made a raid upon Gaoyangguan. The troops on the frontier gave way, and the Minister of War and the Commander-in-Chief sent desperate orders to the six generals of Shandong, Shanxi, Henan, Hebei, Guandong and Shaanxi, to place their troops in the road of the invading forces and protect the cities. These generals were Liu Tingqing of Shaanxi, who was in command of the Yan Sui army; Wang Bing of Guandong, who commanded the Fen Jiang army; Wang Huan of Hebei, in command of the Wei Bo army; Xin Xingzong of Ho-nan, of the Zhang De army; Yang Weizong of Shanxi with the Ze Lu army, and Zhou Xiu of Shandong with the armies of Qing and Yan.
When General Zhou realized that the barbarians were massing on the frontier in such strength, and when letters so urgent came from the Ministry of War, he at once marshaled the army and advanced with forced marches. But when his advance guard came to Gaoyangguan, the enemy had already captured that city and there had been a great slaughter there. It was the beginning of the fifth month, and the wind suddenly raised such a sandstorm that the men could not open their eyes. The General was still advancing, when suddenly the enemy attacked. An arrow struck him in the neck and pierced his throat. He fell from his horse dead. The barbarians with hooks and cords tried to secure the body, but the General's own men recovered it and brought it back on a horse. That day many soldiers were wounded. General Zhou was only forty-seven.
When Zhang Shuye, the Commissioner, saw that the general was killed on the field of battle, he immediately ordered the gongs to be sounded as a signal for retirement. The roll was called; he found how many soldiers had been killed or wounded, and took the remainder of his forces back to Dongchang. From there he sent a report to his Majesty.
The killed were brought back by the army. Chunmei and those of her household cried so loudly that the sound shook the skies. They put the general into a coffin and returned his seal of office. Then Chunmei and Zhou Ren took the coffin and went back to Qinghe.
After Chunmei had gone away, Cuiping and Han Aijie ate only the simplest of food. They kept their word and lived as widows. One day, at the beginning of summer, when everything was fresh and bright and the days were lengthening, they took a walk and came to the summerhouse in the west courtyard. There the flowers were blooming, the orioles singing, and the swallows chattering. The beauty of the scene saddened them. Cuiping was not so much depressed, but Aijie, who was thinking of Jingji, was greatly stirred. Frequently, a familiar scene will produce this effect. She wept.

While they were in this sad state, Zhou Xuan came to them. “Sisters,” he said, “you must not be so melancholy. You must try to be cheerful. I myself have had several bad dreams these last few nights. I dreamed that a bow was hanging from a flagpole and that the flag was torn in half. I don’t know whether the omen should be taken as good or evil.”
“It may mean something about the master,” Han Aijie said.
They were trying to make up their minds when Zhou Ren came to them in mourning dress. He was in a great hurry.
“Evil news,” he said. “Our master died on the field of battle on the seventh day of the fifth month. The mistress and the Second Lady are bringing his coffin.”
Zhou Xuan hastily made arrangements to clear the outer hall. The coffin was brought in and set down there. They made offerings to the dead general, and all the members of the household cried and lamented. Then vegetarian food was prepared, and Daoist and Buddhist priests were summoned to hold a funeral service. The two children were dressed in mourning. A host of people called to offer their condolences. Finally, a suitable day was chosen, and they buried the General in the tomb of his ancestors.
Zhou Xuan, acting for his little nephew, sent a memorial to the Emperor asking that royal homage might be offered to the dead general and that some title might be conferred upon the child. The Emperor sent a document to the Ministry of War, and the Minister of War sent it on.
This dead General, Zhou Xiu, forgot his own life in the service of his country [the document said]. His loyalty and courage are worthy of the highest praise. His Majesty therefore appoints an officer to offer food to the dead and confers upon him the title of Marshal. His son shall receive a pension and, when he is of age, shall inherit his father’s rank and position.
Chunmei had nothing to live for now but pleasure, and her passions seemed stronger than ever. She often made Zhou Yi spend the whole day with her. He came to her in the morning and did not go away till evening. They enjoyed themselves without the slightest restraint. Then Chunmei began to suffer from a wasting sickness. She took medicine, but her appetite fell off. Her spirits were depressed, and her body became very thin. Still, she never gave up the joys she most loved.
It was the sixth month, and her birthday was past. The weather was hot. She did not rise early but stayed in bed with Zhou Yi. They were doing the work of love, when suddenly, her breath grew cold. Water came from her cunt, and she died with Zhou Yi still upon her body. She was twenty-nine years old.
The young man was alarmed. He opened Chunmei’s boxes and stole gold and silver and all the jewels he could lay his hands on. Then he fled. The maids went to tell Zhou Xuan. The old man, Zhou Zhong, was put in chains and they went to find his son, Zhou Yi. He was arrested as he was going to his aunt’s house. Zhou Xuan knew this, but he was afraid that all the dirty business would come out and that, if it became public property, it would be very unpleasant for his young nephew when he came of age. So he asked Zhou Yi no questions but simply ordered him to be given forty stripes. So Zhou Yi died. Jin’ge and the Second Lady were both present.
Chunmei’s funeral was hastily arranged, and she was buried with the General. Zhou Xuan dismissed the two nurses and sent away the two girls, Haitang and Yuegui. Only Cuiping and Han Aijie still remained. Han Aijie refused to go.
Then the army of the Jin people captured the Eastern Capital. Both the reigning emperor, and his father were taken and sent to the north. So China was without an emperor and the empire was completely disrupted. Soldiers and war were everywhere, and men and women wandered over the face of the land. The common people cried as though they were drowning in mud, as if they were hung up by their legs. Then the barbarians invaded Shandong, and the people ran away in such a flurry that husband and wife often went in different directions. Fathers and sons lost each other. Devils cried, and Gods screamed.
Cuiping’s mother took her away, and they fled for their lives. Han Aijie was left alone. She dressed herself simply, packed a few things, and set off for Linqing to find her parents. But, when she got to the wine house, the place was closed and the managers had fled. Fortunately, she met Chen the Third. He told her that her parents had gone to Huzhou with the merchant He. She went on. She had taken a moon guitar with her, and on the way she sang songs for the people. Day and night she traveled, like a stray dog escaping from confinement or a fish slipping out of the net. Her feet were very small and the journey was hard for her. After several days she came to Xuzhou. It was very late when she came to a lonely village. There she went to an old lady about seventy years old who was standing before a fire cooking rice. Han Aijie went to her and made a reverence.
“I am a native of Qinghe,” she said to the old woman, “and I am on my way to find my parents because the country in the north is in such a disturbed state. It is late and I should like to spend the night with you. I must set off again early tomorrow. I will pay you.”
The old woman realized that this was no poor girl. Her manner was too gentle and her face too beautiful. She asked the girl to come in and sit down. “I must get on with the cooking of this rice because the men want it,” she said.
The old woman put more fuel on the fire. She prepared rice and beans, chopped up some vegetables, and put them with salt on two plates. Then a few men came in, all barelegged and rough-haired. They were wearing short trousers covered with mud. As they came in, they set down their shovels.
“Now, Mother,” they said, “is dinner ready?”
“Come in and help yourselves,” the old woman said to them. Each took his own food and vegetables and ate it by himself.
There was one man who seemed about forty-five or forty-six. He had a very red face and his hair was light. “Who is that sitting on the bed?” he said to the old woman.
“It is a lady from Qinghe. She is going south of the river to find her parents. It is very late, and she came and asked me if she might spend the night here.”
The man asked her name.
“My name is Han,” the girl said. “My father is called Han Daoguo.” The man went over to her and took her hand. “Are you not my niece, Han Aijie?” he asked her.
“You must be my uncle,” Han Aijie cried.
They threw their arms around each other and wept. He asked where her parents were and why they had come back from the Eastern Capital, and how she had come to be there. Han Aijie told her uncle the whole story. “I married a man at General Zhou’s place,” she said. “Then my husband died and I did not marry again. Father and mother went to Huzhou with a merchant called He, and I am going to them. But the country where I have come from is in such an unsettled state that I could find no one who would take me there. So I came alone, and I have been singing on my way to get the necessaries of life. Then I met you.”
“After your parents went to the Eastern Capital,” Han said, “my business went to bits, so I sold the house and came here as a worker on the river. Every day, I earn just about enough to keep me. I will go with you to Huzhou.”
“That will be splendid,” Han Aijie said.
Her uncle gave her a bowl of rice, but it was such coarse stuff she could only swallow a mouthful. Finally, she succeeded in finishing half a bowl.
The next day, when all the other men had gone to their work, Han the Second paid the old woman and set out with Han Aijie. She was delicate and her feet were very small. The only property she had was a few pins and ornaments, and she sold these to pay for things on the journey. When they got to Huai An, they took a boat and came to Huzhou by river.
So, after a very long journey, they found Han Daoguo and his wife at Merchant He’s place. He had died and left no wife, so Wang Liu’er was looking after his daughter, who was now six years old. He had left a few acres of rice fields. A year after the merchant’s death, Han Daoguo died too. Wang Liu’er had been intimate with her brother-in-law before. Now they married regularly and worked in the fields to keep themselves alive.
Several of the rich young men of Huzhou wished to marry Han Aijie, when they saw how beautiful and clever she was. Her uncle urged her to marry one of them, but she cut off her hair, went to a temple, and became a nun. In her thirty-first year she fell ill and died.
The Jin army plundered Dongchangfu and came on to Qinghe. When they came there, the officers had fled and the city gates were closed, even by day. The people fled in all directions and fathers and sons lost each other. There was dust and mist everywhere, and yellow sand obscured the sun. The wild pigs and the great snakes attacked and devoured one another. Dragons and tigers fought for supremacy. Black banners and red flags appeared in the outskirts: men cried, women sobbed. There was tumult in every house. Valiant soldiers and heroic generals swarmed like ants and bees. Short daggers and long spears were as a thick bamboo forest. Here were corpses; there, decaying bones scattered on the ground. Broken swords and broken daggers lay about. People gathered their babies in their arms, bolted their doors, and shuttered their windows. They fled like rats. Nowhere was any trace of Music or the Rites.
Wu Yueniang learned that the barbarians had arrived and that people were fleeing. She took such valuables as she could and set off to Jinan with Uncle Wu the Second, Daian, Xiaoyu, and Xiaoge, who was now fifteen years old. She proposed to take refuge with Yun Lishou. Uncle Wu was dead. She locked all the doors of the house. She went to Yun Lishou; not only to escape the barbarians, but because she wished Xiaoge to marry there. On the way everybody she saw seemed terribly excited and afraid. The poor Yueniang, dressed in her plainest clothes, followed with the crowd. There were five of them altogether. They struggled and got out of the city. Then they hastened onward. At last they came to a crossroads. There stood a monk wearing a purple gown, a staff with nine rings in his hand. He had straw sandals and, on his shoulders he carried a cloth bag that contained his sacred books. He strode up to Yueniang and made a reverence to her.
“Lady,” he said, “‘where are you going? You must give my disciple to me now.”
Yueniang was frightened and changed color.
“Father,” she said, “what disciple do you mean?”
“Lady, don’t pretend you do not know,” the monk said. “Many years ago, when you were being pursued by Ying Tianxi at Taishan, you came to my cave and spent the night there. I am the old monk of that snow cave and my name is Pujing. You promised that I should have your baby for my disciple. Why have you not given him to me?”
“Master,” Uncle Wu the Second said, “you are a priest, and you must not be so unreasonable. These are troublous times, and we are fleeing for our lives. She wants her son to continue the family. How can she let you have him?”
“Are you sure you will not give him to me?” the monk said.
“Don’t talk like this, Master,” Uncle Wu said. “We must be going on our way. The soldiers are behind us. Time is precious.”
“It is late,” the monk said. “You can go no farther now. If you will not give me the boy, come to my temple and go on your way tomorrow. Even if the Jin soldiers are coming, they will not be here yet.”
“Where is your temple, Master?” Yueniang said.
The monk pointed to the other side of the road. “There is my temple,” he said, and showed them the Temple of Eternal Felicity.
Yueniang had been there before and recognized the place. When they reached it, they found that the superiors had gone and there were only a few monks sitting in the hall at the back. A great glass lamp was still burning before the image of Buddha, and incense was burning too. It was nearly sunset.
Yueniang, Uncle Wu, Daian, Xiaoyu and Xiaoge spent the night in the temple. One or two of the young monks knew them and set out food for them. The old monk sat down in the hall and began to beat a wooden fish and recite the sacred books.
Yueniang, Xiaoyu, and Xiaoge slept in the same bed. Uncle Wu and Daian slept together in some other room. They were all very tired and, except for Xiaoyu, went straight to sleep. She got up and went to the room where the old monk was. Through a crack in the door she peeped in. He was still reading there.
It was the third night watch. The west wind was melancholy and the moon very dim. It was quiet everywhere. There was not a sound to be heard. The light before the statue of Buddha was very low.
Seeing the disturbed state of the Empire and the pitiful condition of the people, of whom so many had perished, the old monk was sorry. With all his heart he prayed to Buddha that their sad spirits might be purified and that hatred might cease among men. He wished to clear the path so that all might come to paradise. A hundred times he recited the same text, which was for bringing peace to the minds of men.
After a while, the cold wind came sadly. Several scores of ghosts appeared. Their heads were burned, their cheeks torn, their hair was tou-sled and their faces dirty. Some had broken arms and legs, some had their bellies ripped open so that their bowels protruded. Some had no heads and some no limbs. Some had died by hanging and some had chains and cangues about their necks. They all came to the old monk and stood on either side of him while he prayed for them.
“You are men who have always repaid evil by evil,” the old man said to them. “You have never had a thought of reconciliation in your hearts. I ask you: when shall this hatred cease? Listen to me, and I will send you to the place of your desire.”
I exhort you
Hate not one another
For hate deep rooted in the heart
Can never be done away.
Hatred may arise in a single day
But in ten thousand days it will still exist.
If you use hate to combat hate
It is as though you cast water upon snow.
If you return hatred for hatred
It is as though a wolf meets a scorpion.
Of men that quarrel, none, I know
Escapes the bitterness of hate.
This is a year of gloom
I wish to make you understand.
Regard your own true nature
Then hatred and ill will will melt away to nothing.
I look deep into the sacred texts
To find salvation for all evildoers.
Go now to be born again
And forgo hate forevermore.
The ghosts all bowed to the old monk and vanished.
Xiaoyu looked at them carefully but could not recognize any of them. After a time, there entered a tall man, seven feet high. There was an arrow in his breast. This was General Zhou. After his death on the field of battle against the barbarians, he came to the Teacher to receive his blessing. Then he went to the Eastern Capital to be born again there as Cheng Shoushan, the son of Cheng Zhen.
The General had only just gone when there came a man in beautiful clothes. He said he was a wealthy citizen of Qinghe and his name was Ximen Qing. He had died from a trouble of the blood. He received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to be born again as Cheng Yue, the son of Cheng Dong.
When Xiaoyu recognized Ximen Qing, she was afraid, and dared not make a sound.
Then came a young man with his head in his hands and his body all covered with blood. He said he was Chen Jingji and that he had been killed by Zhang Sheng. He received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to become the son of a certain Wang.
When he had gone, there came a woman. She, too, held her head in her hands and her bosom was covered with blood. She said she was the wife of Wu Da and Ximen Qing’s concubine, Pan Jinlian. Wu Song, her enemy, had killed her. She received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to be born as the daughter of a certain Li.
Then came a short man with a purple face. He said his name was Wu and that he had been poisoned by Jinlian with the connivance of old woman Wang. He thanked the Teacher for his blessing and went to Xuzhou to be born as the son of a countryman named Fan.
He was followed by a woman, whose face was pale and thin. Water and blood issued from her body. She said she was Li Ping’er, the wife of Hua Zixu and a concubine of Ximen Qing. She received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern capital to be daughter of General Yuan.
Another man followed who said he was Hua Zixu. He had died, he said, as a result of his wife’s misdeeds. He received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital as the son of Captain Zheng.
Then came a woman whose face was pale and thin. She said she was Chunmei, the wife of General Zhou, and that she had died from overindulgence in the pleasures of love. She received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to be the daughter of a wealthy man.
Then a woman whose head was bound with the wrappings of a woman’s foot. She said she was the wife of Ximen Qing’s servant, Laiwang. She had hanged herself. The Teacher’s blessing was granted to her, and she went to the Eastern Capital to become the child of a certain Zhu.
Then came a man, naked, and with his hair all in disorder. His body was covered with bruises. His name, he said, was Zhang Sheng and he had been beaten to death. He received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to be the son of a poor man named Gao.
He was followed by another woman who had a long white cloth wound around her neck. She said she was Sun Xue’e, a concubine of Ximen Qing. She had hanged herself. Now she received the Teacher’s blessing and went outside the Eastern Capital to be the daughter of a poor man called Yao.
Then came a young woman who said she was Ximen’s daughter and Chen Jingji’s wife. She had foot ribbons about her neck. She had hanged herself. Now she received the Teacher’s blessing and went outside the Eastern Capital to be the daughter of Zhong Gui, who was servant to a foreigner.
She was followed by a young man who said he was Zhou Yi. He had been beaten to death. He received the Teacher’s blessing and went to the Eastern Capital to be the son of a certain Gao. He was going to be called Gao Liuzhu. Then he vanished.
Xiaoyu was terrified and shivering. She realized that this monk could indeed speak to the ghosts. She wished to tell Yueniang what she had seen, but Yueniang was fast asleep and dreaming. She dreamed that she and those with her had with them a hundred large pearls and a ring of great value. They were going to Jinanfu to see Yun Lishou. They reached the city and asked for Yun’s place. Then people told Yun, and he knew that she had come about their children’s marriage. They greeted one another as old friends. Mistress Yun had recently died and Yun sent for his neighbor, old woman Wang, to entertain Yueniang. She was taken to the inner court and given a great feast. Uncle Wu the Second and Daian were entertained elsewhere.
Then Yueniang talked about the marriage of their children and the troubles in the country. She offered the hundred pearls and the precious ring. Yun Lishou took them but said nothing about the marriage. In the evening, he told old woman Wang to sleep with Yueniang. He wished her to talk to Yueniang and find out what she thought.
The old woman said to Yueniang that, although Yun Lishou was only a military officer, he was an educated gentleman. Since they had arranged the marriage between their children, he had taken a great fancy to her. Now his wife was dead and he had not remarried. Though his position was not very high, he rode on horseback and had soldiers under his command. When he dismounted, he attended to public business. He had powers of life and death.
“Lady,” the old woman said, “unless you think he is too far beneath you, he would ask you to marry him and it will be to the advantage of you both. Your son can marry too and he can go home when peace returns.”
When Yueniang heard this, she was amazed. For a long time she could not speak. Then the old woman went to Yun Lishou and told him. The next evening, Yun Lishou prepared a great feast in the hall and invited Yueniang. She believed it was to celebrate the wedding of their children and went gladly. When she sat down, he said: “Sister, this is but a poor city, but I have a number of soldiers under my command. I have gold, property, clothes, and jewels in plenty. But I have no wife to manage my home for me. I have been thinking of you all this time, and now I feel like a man dying of thirst who craves for water to drink, or as one who seeks coolness in the broiling heat. You have come here, Lady, for your son’s marriage. It is surely the will of Heaven that we should arrange not one but two marriages. If we marry, we shall be happy all our lives here. And I see no reason why we should not.”
Yueniang was very angry. “I did not realize,” she said, “that beneath a human form you hid the carcass of a dog. My husband always treated you well, yet now you speak to me in the language of dogs and horses.”
Yun Lishou smiled and went closer to her. He put his arms about her and pleaded.
“Lady,” he said, “why did you come here? You came and, why I cannot tell, my spirit seemed to become wholly yours the moment I saw you. I cannot help it, and we must marry.”
He offered wine to her.

"Send for my brother," Yueniang said.
"Your brother!" Yun Lishou said, laughing. "I have killed both him and Daian." He ordered a servant to bring proof of what he said. Two heads, blood still dripping from them, were brought in. Yueniang looked at them in the candlelight and her face became as pale as yellow earth. She cried and fell to the floor. Yun Lishou raised her up.
"Lady," he said, "you must not be sad. Your brother is dead, but I am asking you to marry me. I am not unworthy of you. I am a military officer of high rank."
"This man," Yueniang thought, "has murdered my brother and my servant. If I do not yield, he will kill me too." She began to smile.
"You must do what I wish," she said, "and then I will marry you."
"I will do anything you ask, no matter what it is," Yun Lishou said.
"First let your daughter marry my boy, and then I will marry you."
"Good!" Yun Lishou said. He sent for his daughter and pushed her over to Xiaoge. They drank wine together, exchanged the knotted heart, and so were married. Then Yun Lishou pulled Yueniang to him, and wished to make love to her, but she struggled with him. He was furious.
"You whore!" he cried, "you have deceived me. You got me to marry my daughter to your son. Do you think I am afraid to kill your son?" He drew his sword, and with one blow struck off the boy's head. The blood spurted for yards.
When her child was killed, Yueniang shrieked.
Then she woke up. It was a dream. She was so terrified that her body was drenched with sweat. "Strange! Strange!" she murmured.
"Lady, why are you crying?" Xiaoyu said to her.
"I have had a terrible nightmare," Yueniang said, and told her everything she had dreamed.
"A little while ago," Xiaoyu said, "I found I could not sleep. I went to watch the old monk. He was speaking to the ghosts. I saw him talking to my master, the Fifth Lady, Chen Jingji, Sun Xue'e, General Zhou, Laiwang's wife and your daughter. Then they all disappeared.
"Some of them were buried outside this temple," Yueniang said, "but they died such miserable deaths that they come to the monk. It is so quiet too."
The two women talked until the fifth night watch. The cocks began to crow. Yueniang washed her face and dressed her hair. Then she went to the sanctuary and burned incense before the statue of Buddha. The old monk was there, sitting on a low stool. "Lady," he said in a loud voice, "I think you know now what I mean."
Yueniang knelt down. "Holy Master," she said, "with my fleshly eyes and human body, I did not know that you were Buddha himself. Now, since I have had that dream, I know everything."
"You understand," the old monk said, "so now there is no need for you to go to that man. If you do go, you will find that things happen exactly as they did in your dream. You will all die. It is fortunate for your son that you have met me. It is a reward for your good heart. Had it not been for this, you and your son must soon have parted. You remember what a bad man your husband Ximen Qing was. Your son is your husband. He would spend all your money, ruin your estate, and die by having his head cut off. Now I bless him, and take him as my disciple. You know the proverb that says when a son becomes a monk there is salvation for nine generations. If he becomes a monk, your husband's misdeeds will be forgiven. If you do not believe me, come and see."
He rose and went quickly to the other room where Xiaoge was asleep. The old monk lifted his staff and gently touched the boy's head. He turned around suddenly, and Yueniang saw that it was Ximen Qing. Upon his neck was a heavy cangue and there were chains about his waist. The old monk touched him again with his staff, and again Xiaoge lay upon the bed.
Yueniang cried. She realized that Xiaoge was another incarnation of Ximen Qing. After a while the boy woke up.
"You are going to stay here," his mother said to him, "and become the disciple of this holy teacher. He will cut off your hair and give you orders in the name of Buddha."
Yueniang took the lad in her arms and cried bitterly. She felt that she had brought him up in vain. He was fifteen years old, and she had hoped that he would inherit the property and continue the family. Now the old monk was taking him. Uncle Wu the Second, Xiaoyu, and Daian were all sad. The old monk took the boy and called him Mingwu (Bright Enlightenment).
When Yueniang was going away, the old monk said to her: "You need go no farther. The Jin army is going to retreat. Then land will be divided between two dynasties and we shall have an Emperor again. In ten days all the soldiers will withdraw and peace will be restored. Go home then and spend the rest of your days in peace."
"Master," Yueniang said, "you have blessed my child. When shall I see him again?"
She clasped the boy in her arms and cried aloud. "Lady, don't cry," the old monk said. "Look, there is a Holy Master coming."
They all turned their heads to look, but when they turned around again, the old monk had vanished and become a pure vapor. He took Xiaoge with him. Yueniang, her brother, and the others stayed ten days more at the temple. Then indeed the Jin people made Zhang Bangchang Emperor at the Eastern Capital, and set up a new administration, both civil and military. The two emperors, Huizong and Qinzong, were taken to the north. Then Prince Kang crossed the river on a clay horse and established himself as Emperor Gaozong at Jiankang. He appointed Zong Ze as his commander-in-chief and took back Shandong and Hebei. Thus the empire was divided into two parts. Soon peace was restored, and people returned to their old occupations. Yueniang went home. She opened all the doors and windows. Nothing had been disturbed. She gave the name Ximen An to Daian who, in due course, came into the property. People called him Master Ximen. He lived with Yueniang. When she was 70 years old, Yueniang died. Her end was peaceful, a fitting reward for her kindness and virtue.

The record of this house must make us sad.
Who can deny that Heaven's principle
Goes on unceasingly?
Ximen was mighty and a lawless man
He could not maintain the issue of his house.
Jingji was wild and dissolute
And met a violent death in consequence.
Yueniang and Yulou lived long
And ended their days in peace.
Chunmei and Ping'er were wanton
And soon made their way to Hell.
It is not strange, therefore,
That Jinlian reaped the reward of evil,
Leaving a foul reputation to be spoken of a millennium.

124

Wu Song makes an offering some human Heads as Memorial Sacrifices for real

At the sound of Wu Song's voice, Ximen woke up from his ong nightmare, farted with terror, and pissed in his pants. He scooted out of the backdoor and left via Grandma Wang's shop. "Please have a seat," the girl called. "I'll be right with you."
She hadn't worn mourning after poisoning her husband but had adorned and beautified herself everyday and revelled with her lover. She hastily washed off her make-up, removed her hair ornaments, pinned her wanton locks into a severe bun in the back, and quickly exchanged her red skirt and figured tunic for drab mourning garments. Then, sobbing, she descended the stairs. "Sister-in-law, don't cry," said Wu Song. "When did my brother die? What's wrong with him? What medicines did he take?"
Weeping, Golden Lotus replied, "About twenty days after you left, he had severe pains in the heart. He was ill for eight or nine days. I prayed, I gave him every kind of medicine but nothing could cure him and he died! Now I'm miserable and alone!"
Grandma Wang could hear them through the wall. She was afraid Golden Lotus would make a slip, and she came over to help her. "My brother never had that ailment before," said Wu Song. "How could his heart have killed him?"
"Now, Constable," interjected Grandma Wang, "don't you know the saying: 'The winds and clouds in the sky are unfathomable. A man's luck changes in an instant'? Who can guarantee against misfortune?"
"If it weren't for godmother, here, I would have been helpless," the girl added. "She was the only one of the neighbours who came to my aid."
"Where is he buried?" asked Wu Song.
"I was all alone. How could I go looking for a suitable burial place? There was no other way to do it. After three days, I had him cremated."
"What was the date of his death?"
"In two more days it will be the end of the Seven Times Seven period."
Wu Song was silent for several minutes. Then he left and returned to his quarters. He unlocked the door, went in, and changed into clean sober garments. He had a soldier make a hempen rope which he tied around his waist and concealed on his person a thick-backed and sharp-edged knife. He took some silver and went out, instructing the soldier to lock the door behind them. In the shops in front of the county office, he bought rice and flour and spices, as well as candles and paper replicas of gold and silver ingots. In the evening he went to his brother's house and knocked on the door. Golden Lotus opened it. Wu Song told the soldier to prepare the sacrificial dishes. He lit the lamp before the memorial tablet and laid out wine and tidbits. By the second watch, all was in readiness. Wu Song dropped to his knees and kowtowed. "Brother, your soul's near! In life, you're weak and timid, and the cause of your death's unclear. If you're abused and murdered, come to me in a dream and I'll avenge you!"
He sprinkled wine on the ground, burned the paper money replicas and cried so heart-brokenly that all the neighbours were moved. Inside, the girl also pretended to weep. Finally, Wu Song gave the sacrificial wine and food to the soldier to drink and eat. He got two mats and ordered the soldier to sleep by the door between the inner and outer rooms. He himself bedded down before the memorial tablet. Golden Lotus went upstairs, bolted the door at the head of the stairs, and retired. Wu Song tossed and turned, unable to sleep. It was nearly the third watch. He looked over at the soldier. The fellow was snoring away, motionless as the dead. Wu Song sat up and gazed at the dim glass lamp in front of the tablet. He heard three beats of the watchman's drum and three stick taps. Wu Song sighed. "My brother's a soft mark all his life," he said to himself. "I still don't know how he died."
Before the words were out of his mouth, an icy vapor twisted out from under the altar table, and swirled through the dimness. The lamp before the altar suddenly went out. The paper money on the wall danced wildly. Wu Song's hair stood on end. He stared. A figure had emerged from beneath the altar table. "Brother," it said, "I died a cruel death!"
Wu Song couldn't hear clearly. He moved forward. But the cold vapor had vanished, and the figure was gone. Wu Song fell back in a sitting position on his mat. Was it all a dream? He turned and looked at the soldier. The man was fast asleep. "There must be something wrong about brother's death!" he thought. "He came to tell me but my living essence scattered his shade ..."
Wu Song decided to say nothing now, and wait for morning. Gradually the sky lightened. The soldier got up and heated some water, and Wu Song rinsed his mouth and washed. Golden Lotus came down the stairs. "Brother-in-law, you're restless last night."
"Sister-in-law, what exactly did my brother die of?"
"How can you have forgotten? I told you yesterday evening. His heart pains killed him."
"Who prescribed the medicines?"
"I've the prescription here."
"Who bought the coffin?"
"I asked Grandma Wang, next door, to do it."
"Who were the pall-bearers?"
"Men from Coroner Ho. He took care of everything."
"I see. I have to go down to the county office and check in for roll-call."
Wu Song departed with his soldier orderly. When they reached the end of Purple Stone Street he asked: "Do you know Coroner Ho?"
"Don't you remember, Constable? He came to congratulate you when you received your appointment. He lives in a lane off Lion Street."
"Take me there."
The soldier escorted him to Ho's door. "You can go now," said Wu Song. The orderly left. Wu Song raised the door curtain.
"Is Coroner Ho home?" he called.
Ho had just got up. When he heard that it was Wu Song he trembled hand and foot. He couldn't even put his head kerchief on. Hastily he took out the silver and the bones and concealed them on his person. Then he came out and greeted his visitor.
"When did you get back, Constable?"
"I returned yesterday. I'd like a few words with you. Please come with me."
"Certainly. But first let me give you some tea."
"That's not necessary. I don't want any."
The 2 went to a tavern down the street and sat down. Wu Song ordered 2 drams of wine. Ho rose politely to his feet. "I haven't yet given you a welcome-home feast. You'd really not be so courteous to me."
"Be seated," said Wu Song shortly.
Ho could guess what was on his mind. The waiter poured the wine. Wu Song drank in silence. Ho broke into a sweat. He tried to make conversation but Wu Song did not respond. They consumed several cups. Suddenly, from inside his clothes, Wu Song whipped out the sharp knife and stabbed it into the top of the wooden table. The waiter watched, bug-eyed. Of course, no one dared come near. He turned a greenish yellow. He was afraid to breathe. Wu Song rolled up his sleeves and grasped the hilt of the knife. "I'm a crude fellow. I know only that 'The culprit must pay for his wrong, the debtor for his debt.' You needn't be frightened. Just tell me the truth. I want to know exactly how my brother died. You won't be affected in any way. If I hurt you, I'm no true man! But tell me so much as half a lie and this knife will let daylight into you in four hundred places! Now, start. What's the condition of my brother's body when you saw it?"
Hands on his knees, Wu Song fixed Ho with a burning stare. The coroner drew a bag from his sleeve and placed it on the table. "Calm yourself, Constable. Important evidence's here in this bag!"
Wu Song opened it and looked at the blackened bones and the 10-ounce bar or silver. "Why's this important?"
"I don't know what happened before or after but on the twenty-second of the first lunar month, Grandma Wang who keeps the teashop came to my home to ask me to inspect the body of Wu the Elder for encoffining. On my way I was met at the entrance to Purple Stone Street by Ximen Qing who runs the medicinal drug shop in front of the county office. He insisted that I go with him to a tavern and join him in a bottle of wine. There, he gave me this bar of silver and said: 'Put a cover over everything when inspecting the body.' I knew the fellow was a knave but he wouldn't let me refuse. I drank the wine, took the silver, and went to Wu the Elder's house. When I raised the shroud I saw dried blood in your brother's nose and ears, and gnawed lacerated lips—all signs of poisoning. I wanted to speak out but there was no one here to take his part, and his wife had announced that he died of heart pains. So I said nothing but bit my tongue till it bled and pretended I had been taken by an evil spirit. I was carried home.
"I told my assistants to approve the encoffining but not to accept a penny on my behalf. On the third day, the body was carried off for cremation. I bought some paper money and followed to pay my respects. I managed to get Grandma Wang and your sister-in-law away from the pyre and secretly took these two pieces of bone and brought them home. They're black and flaky—proof of death by poisoning. On this sheet of paper is the date of the cremation and the names of those who attended. That's my story. You're welcome to check it."
"Who is the adulterer?"
"I don't know. But I've heard that a boy called Yunge, who sells pears, went to the teashop with Wu the Elder to catch them. Everyone on this street has heard about it. If you want the details, ask Yunge."
"Right. Since there is such a person, let's go together."
Wu Song sheathed his knife, paid the bill, and went with Ho to Yunge's house. At the front door, they saw the boy returning with a willow basket on his arm. He had been out buying rice. "Do you know who this constable is?" Ho asked him.
"Since the day he killed the tiger! What do you two want with me?" Actually, the lad had already guessed and he added, "There's only one thing. My father is in his sixties and has no one but me. I can't go playing around with you in a court case."
"Here, little brother," Wu Song handed him five ounces of silver. "Give these to your father and then come with me for a chat."
"This will cover the old man's expenses for four or five months," thought Yunge. "It won't matter if I get tied up in court."
He took the money and rice in to his father and accompanied his callers to a restaurant on another street. They went upstairs. Wu Song ordered food for three and turned to Yunge. "Although you're still very young, little brother, you're a filial son who supports his family. That silver I gave you is only for expenses. I need your co-operation. When this affair is finished, I'll give you another fourteen or fifteen ounces and you'll be able to set up in business. Now tell me in detail: How did you and my brother go about catching the adulterers in the teashop?"
"I'll tell you but you mustn't rage. On the thirteenth of the first lunar month, I went looking for Ximen Qing with a basket of snowy pears to earn a bit of change from him. I couldn't find him anywhere. When I asked, I was told: 'He's in Grandma Wang's teashop on Purple Stone Street with the wife of Wu the Elder, the bun seller. They're hooked up together. He's there everyday.' I went directly to the teashop but that old bitch wouldn't let me set foot in the back room! When I said I knew her secret, she pounded me on the noggin, hustled me out, and threw my basket of pears into the street! I was furious! I went to your brother and told him all about it. He wanted to go and nab them right away. I said: 'That's not practical. Ximen Qing is a tough man with his punches and kicks. If you don't catch them in the act, he'll sue you and you'll be in trouble. I'll meet you at the entrance to the street tomorrow. Don't make too many buns! When I see Ximen enter the teashop, I'll go in first. You put your things away and wait. As soon as I toss out my basket, you rush in and nab the adulterers!'

"The next day I went to the teashop with a basket of pears and cursed the old bitch. She pitched into me. I flung out my basket butted her with my head and pinned her against the wall. She couldn't stop your brother when he came charging in because I was holding her but she yelled: 'Wu the Elder is here!' The two inside closed the door. While Wu was shouting, Ximen suddenly pulled the door open, rushed out, and kicked him to the floor. I saw the wife come out. She tried to raise Wu up but couldn't. I got out of there, fast! About a week later, I heard that he was dead. I don't know how he died."
"You're telling the truth? You'd better not lie to me!"
"I'd say the same thing in court!"
"That's it, then, little brother."
The three ate, Wu Song paid, and they went down into the street.
"I must be going," said Ho.
"Stay with me," said Wu Song. "I need you two as witnesses."
They accompanied him to the county office, where the magistrate was holding court.
"Do you have a complaint, Constable?" the official asked when he saw Wu Song.
"My brother Wu the Elder was poisoned and murdered by his wife and Ximen Qing, who were cohabiting in adultery. These two men are witnesses. I request Your Honour to do justice."
The magistrate questioned Ho and Yunge, then discussed the case in private with several county clerks and functionaries. All of these gentlemen, to say nothing of the magistrate himself, were tied up with Ximen. And so they reached a common accord—Don't touch it.
Returning to the courtroom, the magistrate said to Wu Song: "You're a constable in this county. You ought to know the law. Since ancient times the rule of proof has been: 'For adultery catch the pair, for robbery find the loot, for murder produce the body.' Your brother's body is no more, and you didn't catch them in the act. Just the testimony of these two isn't enough to prove murder. You haven't got a case. Don't act rashly. Think it over. We can only do what's appropriate."
From inside his robe, Wu Song brought out the two blackened pieces of bone, the ten-ounce silver bar and the sheet of paper. "Surely Your Honour will see that these're no fabrications."
The magistrate looked at them. "You may rise. I must confer about this. You'll be notified. If proper, we'll bring them in for questioning." Ho and Yunge went with Wu Song to his quarters. Ximen was informed the same day of what was brewing. He quickly sent a crony to dispense silver among various county officials and functionaries
The next morning Wu Song again appeared before the magistrate and urged him to take action. But the official was greedy for bribes. He returned the bones and the silver and said: "Wu Song, you'd not let people provoke you against Ximen Qing. The case isn't at all clear. It's difficult to deal with. As the sages said: 'Even what you see with your own eyes may not be true. How can you believe what is said behind people's backs?' You mustn't be so rash."
Also present was the warden of the prison. "Constable," he said, "in murder cases you need five factors: the body, the wound, the ailment, the instrument, and evidence of presence of the accused. Only then can you investigate."
"Since Your Honour won't accept my complaint," Wu Song said to the magistrate, "I'll have to think of something else."
He gave the silver and the bones to Ho and asked him to keep them for him again. Then he returned to his quarters with the coroner and the boy and instructed his orderly to feed them. "Wait here for me," he requested. "I'll be back soon." Carrying ink and a brush-pen, he left the county office compound with 3 soldiers and bought 4 or 5 sheets of paper that he concealed on his person. He ordered 2 of the soldiers to buy a bull's head, a goose, a chicken, 2 casks of wine, some fruit, and bring them to his brother's house. At mid-morning, he also arrived with the third soldier. Golden Lotus knew by then that he had failed in his accusation, and no longer feared him. Boldly, she waited to see what he would do. "Come down, sister-in-law," he called. "I've something to say."
The girl leisurely descended the stairs. "What is it?"
"Tomorrow is the last day of the Seven Times Seven mourning period for my brother. The neighbours have gone to a lot of trouble for you. I've bought some wine to thank them on your behalf."
"What do you want to thank them for?" Golden Lotus demanded nastily.
"Manners must be observed," said Wu Song. On his instructions, the soldiers lit two large candles and placed them, brightly gleaming, before the altar table. They also lit incense in a burner, hung strings of paper money replicas, piled sacrificial dishes before the spirit tablet, and laid out the wine and edibles for the guests. Wu Song retained one soldier to heat the wine, told two others to arrange a table and some benches in the outer room and then stand guard at the house doors front and back. "Sister-in-law," he said, "entertain the guests. I'll invite them in."
He went first to Grandma Wang, next door. "You shouldn't trouble," she said. "There's nothing to thank me for."
"We have good reason. We've caused you a lot of inconvenience. It's only a snack and a little wine. You can't refuse."
Grandma Wang took down her teashop sign, locked the front door, and went over through the back yard.
"Sit at the head of the table, sister-in-law," said Wu Song. "Godmother, sit opposite."
The women had heard from Ximen, and they drank wine unconcernedly. "What can he do about it!" they thought.
Wu Song also invited a silversmith neighbour, Yao Wenqing, whose shop was on the other side of the house.
"I'm pretty busy," said Yao. "I won't bother you, Constable."
Wu Song pulled him. "Just a cup of weak wine. It won't be for long. Over at our place."
Yao couldn't get out of it. Wu Song seated him beside Grandma Wang. He went next to two shops across the street. The one that sold paper horses for funeral burning was run by Zhao Zhongming. "I can't leave my business," said Zhao. "I won't be able to join you."
"Don't be like that. All the other neighbours have come." Wu Song wouldn't take no for an answer. He practically dragged him home. "You're of our father's generation," he said. He seated Zhao next to Golden Lotus.
Then he invited Hu Zhengqing, who sold chilled wine across the street. Hu had once been a small functionary. He could sense that something was wrong and didn't want to come. But Wu Song paid no attention to his excuses. He hauled him over and sat him next to Zhao.
"Who lives on the other side of your shop, godmother?" Wu Song queried.
"Grandpa Zhang. He peddles noodles."
It happened that Zhang was home. He was startled to see Wu Song. "Is there something on your mind, Constable?" he asked.
"Our family has been a nuisance to you neighbours. We'd like you to have a cup of weak wine with us."
"Aiya, I've never shown your family any special courtesy," protested the old man. "Why should you invite me?"
"It's not worth mentioning. Please come."
Wu Song hustled Grandpa Zhang over and requested him to sit next to Yao the silversmith.
Why, you might ask, hadn't any of the earlier arrivals left? Because there were soldiers at the doors, front and back, standing guard!
Wu Song had invited 4 neighbours. These, plus Grandma Wang and Golden Lotus, made a total of six. He pulled over a stool, sat down at the end of the table, and directed the soldiers to close the doors, front and back. The soldier who had remained in the rear room now came and poured the wine. Wu Song hailed the assemblage politely. "Neighbours, forgive my crudeness and drink a few cups with me."
"We never gave you a feast to welcome you home from your journey," the neighbours courteously replied, "and yet you go to so much trouble!"
Wu Song smiled. "It's nothing at all. Please don't laugh at our humble fare."
As the soldier poured the wine, the neighbours could sense something was brewing but they didn't know what to do about it. After three cups, Hu the chilled-wine merchant stood up. "I'm rather busy..." he began.
"You can't leave, now that you're here," Wu Song said loudly. "No matter how busy you are, you'll have to stay."
Hu's heart clanged like fifteen buckets in a single well. "Since he was polite enough to invite me here for wine," he thought, "how can he treat me like this? Why does he refuse to let me go?"
Nevertheless, Hu resumed his seat. "Another round of wine," ordered Wu Song.
The soldier filled the cups for the fourth round. By the time they reached the seventh, the guests were very apprehensive. "Remove the cups," Wu Song shouted to the soldier. "We'll have more later."
Wu Song wiped the table, and the neighbours started to leave. He spread his arms and stopped them. "Now we're going to talk. Is there someone among you respected neighbours who is able to write?"
"Hu Zhengqing writes extremely well," said Yao the silversmith.
Wu Song addressed Hu courteously. "Permit me to trouble you."
He rolled up his sleeves and from inside his garments whipped out his knife. Four fingers clutched the hilt, his thumb pointed at his chest, his eyes glared round and fierce. "In the presence of you honourable neighbours, 'the culprit must pay for his wrong, the debtor for his debt.' I ask only that you be witnesses."
With his left hand he grasped his sister-in-law, with his right he indicated Grandma Wang. The 4 neighbours stared and gaped. At a loss, they looked at each other. None of them dared utter a sound. "Please don't reproach me," said Wu Song. "There's no need to be alarmed. I'm crude but fearless. My motto is 'An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.' No harm shall come to any of you. I request only that you witness this. But if anyone tries to go, don't be surprised if I change my tune and stick him half a dozen times, or even take his life, though I pay for it with my own."
Bug-eyed, the neighbours sat petrified. Wu Song glared at Grandma Wang. "Now listen carefully, you old bitch. You are responsible for my brother's death. I want you to answer my questions."
He turned and faced Golden Lotus. "Trollop! How did you scheme and kill my brother? Tell the truth and I'll spare you."
"Brother-in-law, you're acting outrageously! Your brother died of pains in the heart. It had nothing to do with me!"
Before the words were out of her mouth Wu Song rammed the knife into the table, grabbed her hair with his left hand and clutched her bodice with his right. He kicked the table over, lightly lifted her across, placed her on her back before the altar table, and stood on her. Again he seized the knife in his right hand and pointed at Grandma Wang. "Speak, old bitch. And make sure it's the truth."
The old woman knew there was no escape. "Don't lose your temper, Constable," she said. "I'll talk!"
Wu Song directed the soldier to bring the pen and paper and ink and lay them on the table. With his knife he indicated Hu the former functionary. "Write this down, please—word for word."
Hu stammered his consent. He ground the ink, added water, took up the pen, smoothed the paper and said: "Grandma Wang, give us the facts."
"It has nothing to do with me. What shall I say?"
"Old bitch," Wu Song grated. "I know everything. You can't lie your way out of it. If you don't talk, first I'll carve up this harlot and then I'll kill you, old dog."
He flashed the knife twice close to Golden Lotus's face. The girl was panic-stricken. "Spare me, brother-in-law! Let me up! I'll speak!"
Wu Song picked her up and set her kneeling before the altar table. "Speak, wanton, and be quick about it."
Golden Lotus was scared witless. She had no choice but to tell the whole story, starting from the day she beaned Ximen Qing with the curtain pole. How they used the sewing of the burial garments as a means of getting into bed together, how Ximen kicked Wu the Elder, how they arranged to poison him, how Grandma Wang taught them and egged them on—she related everything from beginning to end. Wu Song made her pause after each sentence so that Hu could write it down.
"Treacherous snake," cried Grandma Wang. "You've spilled it all! How can I deny anything? You've put me on the spot!"
The old woman also confessed and her every word was noted by Hu. Then both women were compelled to impress their thumbprints and make their marks. The four neighbours signed their names and made their marks also. Wu Song had the soldier tie Grandma Wang's hands behind her back with his sash. He rolled up the confessions and put them inside his robe. Wu Song told the soldier to put a bowl of sacrificial wine before the altar table, and then he pushed the two women to their knees in front of the memorial tablet. "Brother, your spirit's near," Wu Song cried. "Today I'll avenge you."
He ordered the soldier to light the paper money replicas. Golden Lotus could guess what was coming. She opened her mouth to scream. Wu Song yanked her over backwards by the head, planted a foot on each arm, and tore open her bodice. Quicker than it takes to tell, he plunged the knife into her breast and cut. Then, clenching the knife in his teeth, he ripped her chest open with both hands, pulled out her heart, liver, and entrails, and placed them on the memorial tablet. Another slash of the knife, and he cut the girl's head off. Blood gushed all over the floor.
The staring neighbours covered their faces. Terrified by Wu Song's savagery, they could only obey his commands. Wu Song sent the soldier upstairs for a quilt, and wrapped Golden Lotus's head in it. He wiped his knife, stuck it in his boot, washed his hands, and spoke to the four neighbours respectfully.
"I hope you won't mind but I must ask you to wait upstairs. I will return shortly."
The neighbours exchanged glances. They dared not refuse. They went upstairs and sat down. Wu Song instructed the soldier to take Grandma Wang upstairs too and keep her under guard. He locked the door to the upper story and told the other two soldiers to stand watch below.
With the head of Golden Lotus wrapped in a quilt, Wu Song went directly to Ximen's medicinal drug shop. He hailed the manager.
"Is Right Honourable in?"
"He just left."
"Please walk with me a few steps. I've something to say in private."
The manager recognized Wu Song. He dared not refuse. Wu Song led him to a secluded lane. Suddenly Wu Song's face hardened. "Do you want to live or die?"
"Constable, I've never done you any harm ..."
"If you want to die, don't tell me where Ximen's gone. If you want to live, tell me truly where he's at."
"He just went... with an acquaintance to ... to that big tavern at the foot of Lion Bridge ..."
Wu Song turned and strode off. The manager was paralyzed with fright. It was several minutes before he was able to totter back to the medicine shop.
At the Lion Bridge tavern Wu Song asked a waiter: "Who is the Right Honourable Ximen drinking with?"
"An acquaintance. They're upstairs in the room overlooking the street."
Constable Wu charged up the stairs. Through a window in the lattice wall, he looked in. Ximen was sitting in the host's place. His guest was seated opposite. 2 singsong girls sat one on either side.
Wu Song shook open the quilt and rolled out the bloody head. He picked it up with his left hand, grasped his knife with his right, swept the door curtain aside, plunged into the room, and threw the gory head in Ximen's face.
Ximen saw that it was Wu Song. "Aiya!" he exclaimed.
He leaped on a bench and swung one leg over the windowsill, intending to flee. But he was too high above the street to jump. Ximen was in a panic. Quicker than it takes to tell, Wu Song vaulted onto the table and kicked off the cups and dishes. The two singsong girls were petrified. The wealthy guest, hysterically scrambling to get out of the way, fell to the floor. Because Wu Song was coming at him in a wild rush, Ximen feinted with his hands and lashed out with his right foot. Wu Song dodged but the kick caught his right hand and sent the knife flying. It dropped clattering to the street. Ximen took heart. He feinted with his right, and threw a swift left jab at Wu Song's chest. Wu Song ducked and came in under it. With his left hand, he seized Ximen between the head and shoulder, with his right he grabbed Ximen's right leg, then lifted him high. "Down you go," he shouted.
For Ximen, firstly, he was harassed by the wronged ghost of Wu the Elder. Secondly, he had offended against Heaven's laws. And thirdly, how could he cope with Wu Song's super human strength? Head down, feet up, he plummeted into the centre of the street and landed on his noggin with a crunch that left him half-senseless, startling the passers-by. Wu Song reached under a stool, picked up Golden Lotus's head, then leaped through the window down into the street. He picked up the fallen knife and approached his foe. Ximen was lying flat, already half dead. Only his eyes moved. Wu Song pressed down on him and with one sweep of the knife cut off his head. He tied the two heads together by the hair. Holding them in one hand and the knife in the other, he hurried back to Purple Stone Street and shouted for the soldiers to open the door. He placed the heads as sacrifices before the memorial tablet and ceremoniously spilled a bowl of wine onto the floor. "Brother, your spirit is near," he said, weeping. "Go up to Heaven. I've avenged you—killed the adulterous pair. Now let me burn your memorial tablet."
He told the soldier to ask the neighbours upstairs to come down, and instructed him to bring down Grandma Wang. Again taking up his knife and the two heads, he confronted the neighbours. "Please listen. I've still something to say."
The 4 neighbours clasped their hands and stood politely. "Speak, Constable. We're listening." Wu Song said a few words and as a result, the hero of Jingyang Ridge became a prisoner in a jail, the constable of Yanggu County was changed into a wandering monk.

His Nibs shit himself when he heard Wu Song's shout after waking up from his long nightmare. He fled at once, by the back way and out through Mrs. Wang's. "Please have a seat, brother-in-law, I'll be with you in a minute," Jinlian shouted. Now, since the time she poisoned her husband, not once had she worn mourning for him. Instead she had dolled herself up in the most garish fashion for the benefit of his Nibs and in aid of their mutual pleasures. When she heard Wu Song downstairs, she rushed to wash and clean off all the powder and paint, tore off all her jewellery, her pins and her earrings, discomposed her artfully arranged tresses and removed her red skirt and embroidered robe, replacing them with the rough shirt and skirt of mourning. This done, she descended, snivelling and moaning, to the room below.
"Sister-in-law, enough, stop crying!" said Wu Song. "Tell me when my brother died. What did he die of? And whose medicine did he take?"
Between sobs she replied: "Just ten days or so after you were gone he began to have terrible heart pains. It went on for about eight or nine days. He consulted fortune-tellers but he wouldn't take any medicine. The doctors couldn't do anything for him. He just went and died. He has left me heartbroken!"
Next door, Mrs. Wang heard the noise and her heart misgave her. She hurried round to assist her neighbour in dealing with this crisis. Wu Song was just saying: "But my brother never had an illness of this kind before. How could he suddenly get sick and die just like that?"
"How can you say that?" interrupted Mrs. Wang. "Like the storms of the sky that arise without warning, human misfortune strikes at any time. Who can count on tranquillity for long?"
"I was so thankful for this lady's help," Jinlian added. "I was so helpless. She was the only one, none of the other neighbours offered me any help."
"Where is he buried?" Wu Song asked.
"I was all alone," the girl said. "I didn't know how to find a burial plot. What could I do? After three days we cremated him."
"How long is it since he died?"

"In two days it will be time for the seventh week ceremony."
Wu Song remained plunged in thought for a long time. Finally, he left and went to the government offices, where he unlocked his door, entered and changed into mourning clothes. Then he asked a soldier to prepare him a piece of rope that he tied about his waist. He also concealed on his person a knife with a long blade and short handle, sharp-edged but thick, together with a quantity of silver. He told the soldier to lock the door, and they went off to purchase rice, flour, seasoning and so on, opposite the government offices, and also some incense, candles and paper money. With these supplies they headed back to Wu Da's house. It was evening when Wu Song knocked on the door.
When Jinlian opened, Wu Song told the soldier to go and prepare the food for the offering. He lit a lamp and placed it before the altar with his own hands, and arranged the wine and the dishes. At nine o'clock, when everything was ready, he prostrated himself before the altar and spoke: "Brother, your soul is still near. In life you were weak and helpless, and now your death is unclear. If you were the victim of ill-treatment or injustice, if anyone harmed you in any way, appear to me in a dream and I will avenge you." So saying he poured the wine and burnt the paper money, and then began loudly to lament. He wailed so loudly that the neighbours trembled, every one of them. Jinlian in her room accompanied him with feigned weeping.
When the display of grief was done, Wu Song gave the food and wine of the offering to the soldier. He asked for two mats and told the soldier to sleep in front of the door, while he spread his mat out and slept before the altar. Jinlian retired upstairs to sleep, closing the upstairs door.
Shortly before midnight Wu Song, who had been tossing and turning, unable to sleep, looked at the soldier and saw that he lay there as motionless as if he were dead, snoring loudly. He got up and looked at the glass lamp before the altar. The flame was vacillating and weak. He heard the watch: three beats and three taps, signifying midnight. He sighed and sat down on the mat again. He began muttering to himself: "My brother was always weak and unresisting and I still can't be sure about his death." Hardly had he formulated this thought when from beneath the altar there arose a current of cold air that seemed veritably to curl itself about his bones and fill him with ice. The lamp went out. The paper money on the wall began to flutter and fly in all directions. This glacial emanation made Wu Song's hair stand on end. As he gazed fixedly at the altar, a vague figure crept out from beneath it and cried: "Brother, I had a terrible death!" Wu Song had no time to see clearly. When he approached to question the apparition, the cold air ceased and the figure vanished. Wu Song fell back onto the mat. He sat there asking himself if he was dreaming or not. He turned to look at the soldier. The soldier was still sleeping soundly. "There must be something wrong with my brother's death," Wu Song decided. "He wanted to tell me about it but my vital force frightened the spirit away."
He decided to keep this experience to himself and wait till daylight before making up his mind what to do. The poem says:

In life an idiot, ridiculed by most,
The Three-Inch Midget's now a clever ghost.
The power that in a brother's feeling lies
Can make the injured spirit materialize.

Slowly day dawned. The soldier got up and heated some water. Wu Song washed and rinsed his mouth. The woman came downstairs and said to Wu Song: "You seem to have had a bad night, brother-in-law."
"Tell me," Wu Song said, "what did my brother really die of?"
"How is it you've forgotten?" she said. "I told you last night, he died of heart disease."
"What medicine did he take?"
"I can show you, it's here."
"Who ordered the coffin?"
"I asked the neighbour, Mrs. Wang, to buy it for me."
"And how was it carried out?"
"Mr. Ho, the coroner, supervised everything."
"Well, now I know everything I must go and report to the office. I'll be back later." He left, followed by the soldier but at the entrance to Redstone Road he asked the soldier: "Do you know this Mr. Ho, the coroner?"
"How come you don't remember, Your Honour?" the soldier said. "He came to congratulate you only a little while back. He lives in an alley off Lion Avenue."
"Take me there."
When they reached Uncle Ho's front door, Wu Song said: "You can go now" and the soldier departed. Wu Song raised the curtain and shouted: "Is Mr. Ho there?"
Uncle Ho had just got up. When he heard Wu Song was looking for him, he was so scared he felt his hands and feet begin to shake. He didn't even wait to put on a headdress but went and got the silver and the bones that he concealed on his person before going to greet Wu Song. "When did you get back, Captain?" he asked.
"I got here yesterday. I'd like to have a word with you. Would you be so good as to spare me a few minutes?"
"Of course, Captain. But let me offer you some tea."
"Please don't trouble."
The two men went to a little wineshop on the corner of the street and seated themselves. When Wu Song ordered two measures of wine, Uncle Ho rose to his feet protesting: "You refused my offer just now, Your Honour, how can I accept hospitality from you?"
"Please be seated," Wu Song said.
Now Uncle Ho already pretty well guessed what was coming. However, when the landlord poured the wine, Wu Song simply drank his without saying a word. This made Uncle Ho even more apprehensive. His hands were sweating. He tried making conversation but Wu Song still said nothing, he simply didn't open his mouth. Eventually, after a number of cups, Wu Song suddenly reached inside his clothing, took out the knife and slammed it into the table!
The landlord looked on in horror but certainly he was not going to intervene! Uncle Ho went green. He scarcely dared to breathe. Wu Song rolled up his sleeves, pulled the knife out of the table, pointed it at Uncle Ho and said: "I don't know much about fine manners but I do know that every crime has its author and every debt has to be paid. Don't be afraid. Just tell the truth. Tell me in detail everything you know about my brother's death. If you do this I won't touch you. On my honour I promise you that. But if you're anything less than completely honest with me, I swear this dagger will put five hundred holes in you and turn you into a sieve. So watch out and just tell me straight, what did my brother's body look like?" When he finished speaking, he gripped his knees with his hands and fixed Uncle Ho with a ferocious gaze.
Uncle Ho responded by producing the bag that was concealed in his sleeve and which he now placed on the table, saying: "Don't be angry, Captain. This bag is capital evidence."
Wu Song took the bag and opened it up. Inside he saw the two pieces of blackened bone and the ten taels of silver. "How is this evidence?" he asked.
"I am afraid I do not know all the circumstances of this case," Uncle Ho began. "What I do know is that on the twenty-second of the first month I was sitting at home when Mrs. Wang, the teashop proprietress, came to fetch me to examine the body of Mr. Wu. As I was approaching Redstone Road on the same day, I met Mr. Xi-men, the owner of the medicine shop. He stopped me and asked me to go with him to a wineshop to drink a bottle of wine. Once there he took out a quantity of silver which he gave to me and said, 'When the body is prepared for burial, make sure everything is done properly.' Well, I knew him for a crafty devil and didn't see how I could refuse. After drinking and taking the silver, I went to Mr. Wu's house. When I lifted the shroud I could see traces of blood around the orifices and teeth-marks on the lips that are all signs of death by poisoning. I would have denounced the crime but there was no plaintiff. The wife of the deceased had already said that he died of heart disease. Knowing it would be dangerous to speak out, I bit the end of my tongue and pretended to have a fit. They carried me home and it was my assistants who went to perform the routine preparations for burial. I received no payment for it myself, not a penny. Three days later I heard that they were taking the body off for cremation, so I bought some paper money and went there to the mountain pretending to pay my respects. I managed to shake off Mrs. Wang and the wife of the deceased and secretly collected these two pieces of bone that I took home with me. The fact that they have turned black is proof of death by poisoning. On this piece of paper I have written the exact date and the names of those present. That is my statement, Captain. You may check it for yourself."
"And the lover's name?" Wu Song asked.
"I know nothing about that," Uncle Ho said. "But I heard a rumour about a certain Yunge, known as the Young'un, who sells pears. This young lad, it seems, went with Mr. Wu, your brother, to the teahouse with the intention of catching the lovers at it. The whole street knew about it. If you want the exact details, Captain, you'd better question this Yunge."
"Very well!" said Wu Song. "In that case we'll go and look for him together." He put away his knife, packed up the bones and the silver again, and paid for the wine. Then he set off with Uncle Ho for the Young'un's house.
They reached the Young'un's door just as the young monkey appeared, toting a wicker basket, on his way back from buying rice. "Hey there, Young'un!" Uncle Ho called out. "The Captain here is looking for you. Do you know who he is?"
"I seen him the day they brought in the big tiger," the Young'un said. "Wotcha want with me?"
Actually the young rascal had more or less guessed, so he quickly added: "There's just one thing. Me old dad's over sixty and there' ain't no one else to look after 'im, so I wouldn't want to have to go and sit in gaol on account of you!"
"Don't worry young man," said Wu Song, taking out five taels of silver. "Take this for your father's living expenses and then come with me because I want to talk to you."
The Young'un thought to himself: "This will cover a good three or four months expenses. So even if I do have to go to the tribunal with him, it don't signify." He went in to give his father the silver and the rice and then accompanied the other two to a winehouse on the corner of the street. Wu Song ordered food for three and then addressed the Young'un. "Young man, you're very young but you carry all the responsibility of supporting your old father, that's why I wanted you to have the funds I've just given you. You can be useful to me, and if matters are satisfactorily concluded, I shall give you another fifteen taels or so, to provide you with a little capital. Now please tell me in detail how it came about that you went with my brother to the teahouse to surprise the lovers."
"If I tells yer," the Young'un said, "please, yer mustn't get angry. It were on the thirteenth of the first month. I 'ad a basket of pears and I were looking for Mr. Xi-men, 'oping to make a sale but I couldn't find him nowhere. Then while I were making inquiries someone said: "Is Nibs's at Mrs. Wang's teashop in Redstone Road. He's with the wife of Wu Da, what sells the bread. He's having it off with her, an' he goes there everyday now.' Well I goes straight round there to find 'im. But that old bitch Mrs. Wang stops me and won't let me go inside. I told her what I thought of her and she started beating me and chucked me out — threw my pears all over the street, too. I were so angry I went and found your brother and told 'im everything. So 'e got this idea of going there to catch them in the act. 'Don't be in such a hurry,' I told him. 'That Xi-men Qing's a crafty bugger and 'e knows how to fight; if yer don't get 'im the first time 'e'll accuse you and you'll be the one what's in the shit. Look, I'll meet you here tomorrow at the end of the street. You go and finish yer sales quickly and I'll watch to see if 'is Nibs goes into the teahouse. If he does, I'll go in first. You get rid of yer carrying-pole and wait. When I throw out the basket, you rush in and catch them at it.' So I goes back to the teahouse with another basket of pears. I give the old bitch a taste of my tongue and she came and 'it me and I threw me basket out into the street and butted the old cow and pushed 'er up against the wall. When Mr. Wu barged in I held her back so she couldn't stop 'im but she got to shout 'Wu Da's coming!' So of course them two inside blocked the door. So there's Mr. Wu 'ollering away outside the door that was all 'e could do. And then suddenly that bastard Xi-men Qing opens the door and charges out. He floored Mr. Wu with one kick. I see the woman come out and she went to help Mr. Wu up but 'e weren't moving. So I got out quick. About a week later I 'eard that Mr. Wu was dead. But I don't know 'ow 'e died."
"Is all this true?" Wu Song asked. "You'd better not lie to me!"
"If it were in front of the judge I'd say exactly the same," the Young'un said.
"I believe you young man," said Wu Song. He told the landlord to bring the food and paid the bill when they'd finished eating, and then the three of them left. As they went downstairs Uncle Ho said: "I have to be going now."
"Oh no, please come with me," Wu Song said. "I need the two of you as witnesses." He took them both with him to the magistracy.
"Well, what is it Captain?" the magistrate said when he saw them.
"My brother, Wu Da, has been cruelly murdered, poisoned by my adulterous sister-in-law and her lover, Xi-men Qing. I request justice, Your Honour!"
The magistrate questioned Uncle Ho and the Young'un. Then he called a meeting of his staff. Now all of these officials, not to mention the magistrate himself, received money from Xi-men Qing, so the unanimous verdict was: "This matter is too hot to handle." The magistrate went back to Wu Song and said: "Wu Song, you're a member of my administration, you really ought to know the law better. What it says is, 'For a charge of adultery produce the two lovers; for a charge of theft show the stolen goods; for a charge of assault demonstrate the wounds.' Now you haven't even got your brother's body. Nor did you catch the lovers in the act. All you've got to go on is the word of these two. And you want to base criminal charges on that? It would just look like a personal vendetta. You can't rush into it like that. You'd better go away and think it over. We've got to observe the proper procedure."
Wu Song took out the two blackened bones, the silver and the paper and said: "Here is my reply, Your Honour. No one can say I invented this!"
After examining the objects, the magistrate said. "Very well, you had better go now and leave the matter in my hands. If there is a case to answer I will have the culprits arrested and questioned."
While the magistrate continued his deliberations, Wu Song detained Uncle Ho and the Young'un in his quarters. Meanwhile, his Nibs had heard about it and sent a trusted friend to the government offices to offer money to everyone. Consequently when Wu Song returned to the court next morning to urge the magistrate to make the arrests, what did he find? The magistrate had been bought. He simply returned the bones and the silver saying: "Wu Song, people want to make trouble between you and Xi-men Qing and you shouldn't listen to everything they say. This affair is most unclear, your case would never succeed. Remember the words of the philosopher, 'If that which is before your eyes can prove illusory, what trust should be put in words spoken behind your back?' You must temper your impetuousness." The superintendent of prisons also put his oar in: "In a criminal offence of this nature, Captain, it is necessary to be able to show a body, wounds, physical effects, circumstantial evidence and the culprit's traces. In the absence of any one of these five elements, one cannot instigate an inquiry."
"If Your Honour will not accept the case," Wu Song said to the magistrate, "I shall have to change my tactics." He collected the bones and the money and returned them to Uncle Ho's safe-keeping. Then he went back to his quarters and told the orderly to serve Uncle Ho and the Young'un with food and drink. Telling them to wait, because he would be back soon, he left, taking a number of soldiers with him. He provided himself with an inkstone, brush and ink. He bought four or five pieces of paper that he carried himself, and told two of the soldiers to buy a pig's head, a goose, a chicken, a bucket of wine and an assortment of dried fruit, all of which was to be prepared in the house. It was late afternoon when he and the soldiers reached Wu Da's. Jinlian had already heard that the magistrate had rejected his case and was full of confidence. Feeling she had nothing to fear, she received them quite insolently.
"Please come down, sister-in-law, I'd like a word with you," Wu Song said.
She took her time. When she finally came down, she said: "Well, what is it?"
"Tomorrow is the end of the seven week period. Since you must have caused the neighbours a lot of distress lately, I've brought some wine in order to thank them on your behalf."
"There's no reason to thank them!" she said scornfully.
"One should always be polite," Wu Song said. He told the soldiers to place two candles in front of the altar, brightly illuminating it, and to burn a stick of incense and arrange some paper money. Next the offerings were laid out, the plates piled high with food, together with the wine and assorted fruit. One of the soldiers was sent to warm the wine at the back, while others arranged tables and chairs by the door, and still others guarded the entrance. When he was satisfied with these arrangements, Wu Song called his sister-in-law: "Get ready now to receive your guests. I'm going over to invite them."
He went first to Mrs. Wang's. "There's no reason to trouble yourself, Captain, there's nothing to thank me for," she said.
"I know you've had a lot of trouble, Mrs. Wang," he said. "Of course there's a reason. You must come and take a cup of wine and something to eat, you can't refuse!"
In the end she accepted the invitation. She locked up and went round to Wu Da's by the back way.
"You take the host's place, sister-in-law," Wu Song said, "and let Mrs. Wang sit in front of you."
The old woman had already heard from his Nibs that Wu Song's attempt to bring a case had failed, so she sat down and drank with an easy mind. Both of them were thinking: "There's not much he can do now."
Wu Song also invited another neighbour, Yao Wenqing, proprietor of a silver shop. "I'm overwhelmed with work, you must excuse me," Yao said. "Besides, I don't want to bother you."
But Wu Song wasn't having it. "A cup of weak wine won't take long," he said. "Please come." Wu Song went round to another neighbour's. This was Mr. Zhao, Zhao Zhongming, that is, who had a shop selling the paper objects that are burnt at funerals. "I'm afraid I can't leave the shop," Zhao said. "You'll have to excuse me."
"Impossible," said Wu Song, "the other neighbours are already there." Mr. Zhao found he couldn't get out of it and Wu Song dragged him back to the house. "Old people must be honoured like relatives," he said. "Please sit beside my sister-in-law."
Next, Wu Song went to invite Hu Zhengqing, who had a shop across the road selling cold wine. Mr. Hu had formerly worked for the government and he found the invitation somewhat suspicious. But although he did not at all want to go, Wu Song dragged him off willy-nilly and seated him next to Mr. Zhao.
Then Wu Song asked Mrs. Wang who lived next door to her. "Old Mr. Zhang who sells stuffed dumplings," she replied. Mr. Zhang was at home and had quite a shock when he saw Wu Song coming. "Captain, what can I do for you?" he said.
"Our house has disturbed everyone in the neighbourhood," said Wu Song. This old man was also prevailed upon by Wu Song to come to the house, where he was made to sit next to Mr. Zhao.
And why, you may ask, had the earliest guests not gone away by now? Because the soldiers were guarding the doors of course, front and back, they were all being watched like prisoners.
So now Wu Song had invited these four neighbours, together with Mrs. Wang and Jinlian making six people in all. He moved a chair for himself and sat down a little to one side. The soldiers were told to lock the front and back doors and the one at the back was called on to pour the wine. At this point Wu Song bowed to the company and announced: "Esteemed neighbours, please pardon my lack of courtesy and the informality of this invitation."
They all replied: "But we did nothing to celebrate your return. We oughtn't to let you go to all this trouble."
Wu Song only smiled. "It's so little. Please, I shall think you are laughing at me."
The soldier went on pouring the wine. The neighbours were secretly fearful, because they just didn't know what was going on. After three more rounds had been drunk, Mr. Hu got up to leave, saying: "I'm a busy man, you know."
Wu Song cried out: "You can't leave. Now that you're here you must stay a little longer. I don't care how busy you are."
This left Mr. Hu in a quandary, like the well with fifteen buckets, seven going up and eight going down. He said to himself: "If he really wanted to invite us out of politeness, why should he treat us like this, refusing to let us go?" Nevertheless he was obliged to sit down again.
"More wine," Wu Song said, and the soldier poured a fourth round. In the end they had seven rounds, and everyone felt as if they'd been at a thousand of Empress Lü's banquets, where those who refused a cup were beheaded. Then at last Wu Song called the soldier to clear away the cups, saying they'd drink again later. He wiped the table clean but when everyone got up to leave he stopped them with a gesture: "I've something to say first. Is there any one of you good people who can write?"
Mr. Yao said: "Mr. Hu here writes beautifully."
"Then may I trouble you, Mr. Hu?" Wu Song said, rolling up his sleeves and suddenly producing the sharp knife. He gripped the handle in his right hand, resting his thumb against the guard, and glared round at the company ferociously.
"Worthy neighbours," he began, "seeing that every crime has an author and every debt has to be paid, I need your help as witnesses." At this point he seized his sister-in-law with his left hand and pointed at Mrs. Wang with his right. The four neighbours were so shocked they could only stare, dumbfounded. Though they looked at each other in horror, no one dared utter a sound. Wu Song continued: "Please forgive me, friends but you have nothing to fear. Although I'm a rough and ready sort of fellow and I fear nothing, not even death, and it's my principle that crimes must be paid for, injustice avenged, I certainly intend you no harm. I merely need you as witnesses. However, if any of you should try to leave before the end, I'm afraid you will have to allow me to change my mind. I should be obliged to give him six or seven cuts with my knife, and it would make no difference if I had to answer for it with my life." Everyone continued to stare open-mouthed and no one dared raise a finger.

Wu Song now looked at Mrs. Wang and began to shout: "Now you old bitch hear this! My brother's death is all on your head and I shall be dealing with you in my own time!" Then he turned to Jinlian: "As for you, you trollop, listen to me! If you have any hope of being spared, you'd better tell me the whole truth about how you plotted against my brother's life!"
"Brother-in-law, you're talking nonsense!" Jinlian said. "Your brother died of a weak heart, what fault is it of mine?"
Before she could even finish, wham! Wu Song's knife stuck quivering in the table! Wu Song seized her by the hair with his left hand and punched her in the chest with his right. He kicked over the table and swung the girl over it, forcing her down in front of the altar, where he stood on her to keep her from moving. He pulled the knife from the table with his other hand and pointing it at Mrs. Wang said: "Confess, you bawd!" Seeing there was no way for her to escape, the old woman said: "Don't be angry, Captain, I will tell you everything."
On Wu Song's orders one of the soldiers brought paper, ink, brush and inkstone and laid them out neatly on the table. Wu Song pointed his knife at Mr. Hu and said: "May I trouble you to write everything down, exactly as you hear it."
"I will, I will," Mr. Hu stammered. He ground some ink, took up the brush, spread out the paper and said: "Now then Mrs. Wang, your confession!"
"It's really nothing to do with me," she said, "I don't know what you want me to say."
"I know everything, damn you! You've no way out! If you don't start talking I shall cut this one's head off and then I shall kill you!" He drew the blade of his knife softly across the girls face, twice. She began to scream: "Brother-in-law, forgive me! If you'll let me go I'll tell everything!"
Wu Song flung her on her knees before the altar and bellowed: "Talk then, slut!"
Half fainting with terror, she began to confess. She told everything, from the moment she was lowering the curtain and dropped the pole on Xi-men Qing to the making of the clothes which led to the affair. Finally she came to the part where the Midget was kicked and the plan to poison him was devised, and how Mrs. Wang incited her. She told it all, from start to finish, and Wu Song had Mr. Hu write everything down.
"You ungrateful wretch!" Mrs. Wang cried, "You've told them everything, what am I supposed to say now? You've left me no chance!" And so she too was obliged to make a clean breast of it and Mr. Hu also wrote down her declaration. When the record was complete, from beginning to end, the two accused were made to sign it and then the four witnesses added their full names. Wu Song told the soldiers to take off their belts and used them to tie the old woman's hands behind her back. He rolled up the declaration and put it in his breast pocket. He told the soldiers to bring a bowl of wine and placed it as an offering before the altar. Then he dragged Jinlian to the altar and forced her to her knees. He told the old woman to kneel beside her. Then he said: "Brother, whose spirit is not far from here, your little brother will wash away the injury which was done to you!" He told a soldier to burn some paper money. The girl now understood that her situation was desperate and set up a terrified shrieking. But Wu Song pulled her over backwards and planted both feet on her shoulders. He tore the clothing from her breast and — it's slow in the telling but happens in a flash — with one slash of the knife he opened her up. Placing the knife between his teeth he plunged both hands inside and tore out the heart and liver and placed them on the altar. Then, wham! one more blow cut off the head. There was blood everywhere. The four horrified neighbours covered their faces. They were so shocked by this savagery that no one dared to stir. No, they would do whatever he said. Wu Song sent one of the soldiers upstairs to fetch a bed cover that he used to wrap the head in. He wiped the knife and returned it to its sheath, washed his hands and then announced: "Worthy neighbours, I apologize to you. But I must still ask you to go upstairs and wait for me till my return." The neighbours looked at each other but no one thought of disobeying, so upstairs they went. Wu Song told a soldier to take the old woman up too and lock the door. Two soldiers were left on guard downstairs.
Taking the head with him, Wu Song now hastened to Xi-men Qing's medicine shop. When the manager appeared, Wu Song greeted him and said: "Is your boss there?"
"He's just gone out," the manager said.
"Please step this way with me," Wu Song said. "I want a word with you."
The manager was not unacquainted with Wu Song's ways and he dared not refuse. Wu Song led him apart into a quiet alley and then turned to him and said: "Do you want to die or do you want to live?"
"Please, Captain!" the man protested. "I am sure I have never done anything to offend you!"
"If you want to die, you can refuse to tell me where your boss has gone. But if you want to live you'd better tell me truthfully where he is."
"He ... he ... he went with a friend," the man stammered, "to have a drink ... in the wineshop, the wineshop under Lion Bridge."
Wu Song was off like a shot. The manager however stood there as if paralysed and it was quite some time before he returned to the shop.
When he reached the wineshop under Lion Bridge, Wu Song barged straight in and asked the landlord. "Who is Mr. Xi-men drinking with?"
"Some kind of merchant, I think. They're upstairs, in the room overlooking the street."
Wu Song tore up the stairs. He paused outside the room. His Nibs was in the window seat playing host. Opposite him was his guest and there were two hostesses sitting one on either side. Wu Song shook the head loose from its wrapping. It rolled out, still dripping with blood. Taking the head in his left hand and the dagger in his right, he lifted the curtain and as he entered tossed the head right in his Nibs' face!
His Nibs recognized Wu Song at once. With a cry of horror he leapt onto the chair and started to climb onto the window sill, thinking to escape that way. But when he saw the street below he knew it was too high to jump. Panic seized him. Then Wu Song — it's slow in the telling but happens in a flash — placed a hand on the table and vaulted onto it. With his foot he swept off all the plates and dishes, the two hostesses watching paralysed with fear. The other guest, the merchant, had fallen over backwards in his eagerness to get out of the way. His Nibs in desperation feinted with his hand and launched a flying kick. Wu Song was too intent on getting to grips with him; though he had seen the kick coming, it caught his right hand and sent the knife flying out of the window, to land in the middle of the street below. Seeing his attacker disarmed, his Nibs' confidence revived. He feinted with his right and hit out with his left, aiming at Wu Song's chest. Wu Song ducked and came in under his opponent's guard; with his left hand he grabbed the back of his adversary's neck while with his right he seized his left leg and gave a heave, crying "Down you go!"
Now, one, Xi-men Qing was hampered by the spirit of the man he had wronged; two, heaven's tolerance was ended; and three, he was no match in strength for Wu Song. So he went hurtling through the window, head over heels, to smash in the street below, where he lay, as they say, in extremis. Imagine the shock of those who were passing on either side of the street! Next thing, Wu Song bent to pick up the head of the adulteress beside the chair, rushed with it to the window and leapt down into the street. First he picked up his dagger. Then he went to inspect Xi-men Qing, where, half dead already, he lay stiffening on the ground with only his eyes moving. Steadying him with one hand, Wu Song cut off his head with a single blow. He tied the two heads together, and with the heads and his knife sped back to Redstone Road. When the soldiers opened up for him he went to offer the two heads on his brother's altar. He poured the libation of cold wine and proclaimed: "Brother, whose spirit is not far off, may you soon enjoy the peace of heaven! Your brother has avenged you. I have killed the betrayer and his paramour! Soon I will burn a memorial tablet."
Wu Song now told the soldiers to bring the neighbours downstairs. Mrs. Wang was placed in front, closely guarded. Still holding the knife, Wu Song raised the two heads and addressed the group as follows: "I have just one more thing to say to you all and then I am done."
The four of them crossed their hands deferentially and said: "Please speak Captain, we are listening." What Wu Song had to say is of some importance, because of some later consequences:

The hero of Jingyang Pass into prison hurled;
Yanggu's captain turned monk, wandering the world.

At the time when he heard Wu Song say whatv he said, he was panic-stricken and rushed out of the backdoor to Grandma Wang's house after waking up from his long nightmare. Jinlian called out, "Brother-in-law, please sit down, and I will come down in a moment." Now although her husband had been dead only a short time she was not in mourning. So she hurriedly washed the rouge off her face, took the jewellery out of her hair, and ruffled up her hair. She took off her red embroidered skirt and coat, and put on the white mourning clothes. She then commenced an imitation of crying.
Wu Song called out for her to stop crying, and to tell him when his brother had died; and of what sickness and who had given medicine to him.
She replied between her sobs, "Your brother was suddenly seized with some heart disease, about twenty days after you had left. He was sick for about nine days, and then he prayed to the gods, and sought to ascertain by divination whether he would get better. He took all kinds of medicine but they did him no good, and at last he died. He left me with nothing but grief."
Now in the next house Grandma Wang was listening at the partition wall, and when she heard this she was afraid that Wu Song would soon find out the truth. So she at once hurried to come across to Jinlian's assistance, by interjecting evasions.
But Wu Song continued, "My brother had never had any heart trouble how could he die of this illness?"
Grandma Wang who had just arrived replied, "Inspector Wu, why do you ask such a question? There is a saying, 'Man's fate is as uncertain as the weather.' Who can guarantee at any time what is going to happen?"
"I was like a crab without legs," said Jinlian. "I could do nothing, and I am much indebted to this lady and many neighbours who helped me."
"Where was he buried?" he asked.
"I was by myself so how could I go to find a burial place?" replied Jinlian. "After three days I had his remains cremated."
"How long is it since my brother died?"
"In two days more it will be the seventh week since the funeral," Jinlian replied.
Wu Song was wrapt in thought but said nothing, and then he left the house, and went to the yamen. He unlocked the door of his quarters, and put on white mourning clothes. He summoned a soldier to bring a hempen rope which he tied round his waist according to custom. He then concealed in his clothes a very sharp dagger, and some silver. He then ordered the soldier to lock the door and go with him to buy some rice, flour, vegetables, incense, candles, and paper joss money.
When this had been done it was evening and they went again to Wu the Elder's house, and Jinlian opened the door, and Wu Song ordered the soldier to prepare a meal. He then lighted a candle, and placed it with some food in front of the memorial tablet. All was ready by about 10 P.M. when Wu Song knelt down and offered sacrifices to the spirit of his brother, and prayed, "Elder brother, your soul is not far away. When you were alive you were good-natured; but now that you are dead you cannot tell me who cheated you. But if anyone has injured you I ask you to give me the information in a dream, and I will take vengeance for your wrong." He then poured the sacrificial wine on the ground, burnt the paper money, and sobbed bitterly. The neighbours on both sides heard him crying, and could not help being sorry for him. Jinlian in the inner room also kept up her imitation wailing. When Wu Song had stopped weeping he took the sacrificial food and wine and invited the two soldiers to join him in eating some. He then asked for two mats, and told the soldiers to sleep on them at the two doors of the room. He himself lay down near the mourning curtain to sleep. Upstairs Jinlian fastened the trapdoor of her room before going to sleep. But Wu Song could not sleep, and frequently turned over on his mat. The two soldiers however were sound asleep, and he heard them snoring. At last about midnight he got up, and noticed that the light in the glass lamp was just flickering. The watchmen outside were beating the hour of midnight on their drums. He heaved a sigh, and sitting down on the mat he soliloquized, "My brother was always weak, and now that he is dead his spirit will be weak." Just then there came a strong gust of cold wind from underneath the curtains that whirled round in a circle, blew out the flickering flame in the lamp, and blew the paper money around the room. The hair on Wu Song's head stood on end, and looking around he saw the shape of a man come from under the curtain and say, "Younger brother! I died a miserable death." But as Wu Song was not sure whether he had heard correctly he looked fixedly but then he failed to see anything, and the cold wind had also gone. He sat down on his mat, and wondered whether he had seen and heard anything or was it really the dream he had expected. The two soldiers were certainly still there snoring. He thought that his brother must have died of an unknown trouble, that his spirit might have come to tell him about it but had been vanished in the presence of his valor at once. But Wu Song kept all this to himself, and did not speak to anyone about it.
At last the dawn came, and the soldiers arose to boil some water. When Jinlian came downstairs she asked Wu Song whether he had slept well. Wu Song did not reply to this but asked, "Sister-in-law, of what sickness did my brother die?"
"Brother-in-law, how is it that you forget it? I told you all about it yesterday. He died of some disease of the heart."
"But whose medicine did he take?"
"I have the prescription for the medicine here," she replied.
"And who bought the coffin?"
"It was bought by our neighbour Grandma Wang."
"And who bore the coffin away?" he asked.
"That was arranged by the neighbourhood chief—He Jiushu."
"So it was like that. Well, I must now go and attend roll call at the yamen." He then left with the two soldiers, and when outside on the Zishi Street he asked them if they knew He Jiushu, the neighbourhood chief. They replied that they knew him well, and that he lived on the Shizi Street. He asked them to take him there, and when they reached the house he dismissed them.
Wu Song pushed the door open, and called out, "Is He Jiushu at home?" When He Jiushu heard this he was very flurried but he quickly got the parcel containing the bones and silver and hid them in his clothes; he then went to meet Wu Song. He greeted him with the question, "Inspector, when did you return?"
Wu Song replied that he had come back yesterday, and as he had something to discuss with him he asked him to accompany him to some other place.
"Inspector, I will accompany you but before we go please take a little tea."
Wu Song declined the invitation. They both then went to a restaurant in an alley, and ordered wine.
"Inspector, you have just arrived, and I ought to ask you to drink wine. It is contrary to the usual procedure for you to ask me to take wine." He Jiushu however really had a good idea of what was coming. The waiter brought the wine, and they drank it but still Wu Song did not speak. He Jiushu did not like this continued silence, and became confounded as to the outcome, so he thought he might introduce some other matter but Wu Song paid no attention to anything he said. When, however, they had drunk several cups of wine, Wu Song at last took off his coat, and seizing his dagger, stuck it in the table where it stood erect. The waiter was startled at this, and retreated to a distant part of the room. He Jiushu's face turned yellow, and he was holding his breath. Wu Song rolled up his sleeves, and grasping the dagger with one hand, he pointed with the other at He Jiushu and said, "I am a rough fellow but still I know 'a wrong has its instigator, and a debt has its lender.' You need not be afraid, as I only want you to speak the truth. Tell me the cause of my elder brother's death, and nothing shall trouble you. If I hurt you I would not be a man. But if there is the slightest attempt at deceiving me I will take this dagger, and drill several hundred big holes in your body. Tell me clearly the conditions of my brother's body." So saying he planted both hands on his thighs, and looked fixedly at He Jiushu with wild, fierce staring eyes.
He Jiushu took the parcel from his sleeve, and placing it on the table said, "Inspector, please restrain your temper. Here is the important proof." Wu Song opened the parcel, and saw two brittle black bones and an ingot of ten taels of silver. He asked how these things could be proofs, and He Jiushu then explained all that had happened.
"Who is the adulterer?" asked Wu Song.
"I do not know who he is," replied He Jiushu, "but I have heard people say that a boy named Yun Ge went with Wu the Elder to a tea-house to seize the adulterer. In this street I think everybody knows who he is. If you want to go into this matter carefully, you better see the boy Yun Ge first."
"Very well," said Wu Song, "we will go together, and find him." He took his dagger, and put it back in the sheath; hid the bones and silver in his clothes, and paid the bill for the wine. They then departed, and soon reached the home of Yun Ge. There they saw the boy with a basket made of willow twigs over his arm, containing rice which he had evidently just been out to buy.
"Yun Ge!" called out He Jiushu, "do you recognize this Inspector?"
"Of course, ever since the big beast was killed and carried to the city," replied the boy. "But what do you two want with me?" Really the boy had a good idea what it was about but he continued, "There is, however, one thing; my father is sixty years old, and has no one to look after him so that I cannot take part with you two in a court dispute."
"Good younger brother," said Wu Song, "here take these five taels of silver to your father, and then come back as I have something to say to you."
Yun Ge knew that the silver would be enough to cover their living expenses for about four months. So he thought that he might run the risk even of presenting himself at the court. He gave the money and basket of rice to his father, and then accompanied the two men to a restaurant in an alley. Wu Song ordered rice for all three, and then spoke to the boy, "You are a very young boy, yet you know your filial duty of supporting a family. I have already given you five taels of silver but I have a matter for you to do, and when that is satisfactorily settled I will give you another fifteen taels which you may use as a capital. Now tell me, how did you go with my brother to a tea-house to seize an adulterer?"
Yun Ge then recited all the details of the affair omitting nothing, and when he had finished Wu Song asked him, "Is this really true? You must not tell me any lies."
"Even if you took me to the yamen I would say exactly the same," replied the boy.
Wu Song was satisfied and when they had eaten the rice he paid the money, and they all three left. He Jiushu wanted to go home but Wu Song asked him to accompany them to the yamen to make a statement there. So they all went to the yamen, and when the magistrate saw them he asked what accusation the Inspector had to make.
Wu Song stated, "My brother's wife has committed adultery with Ximen Qing, and also poisoned my brother. These are my two witnesses. I request you to take action in this case."
The magistrate then heard what He Jiushu and Yun Ge had to say. The magistrate discussed the matter with his officers but as they were all on intimate terms with Ximen Qing, they did not like to act in the matter. The magistrate then spoke to Wu Song, "You are an Inspector in the yamen, and should know the law in these matters? There is an ancient saying, 'In arresting adulterers you must get both; in arresting a thief you must get the stolen goods; when a man is killed you must see the wound.' In this case you have not seen your dead brother's corpse but have listened to these people's statements so there may be some mistake somewhere. You had better consider the matter carefully, and if you find it correct then we will act."
Wu Song produced the two bones, the ingot of silver, and the paper with the names on, and gave them to the magistrate. He appealed again to him. "I again press my case. These proofs have not been fabricated."
The magistrate replied, "You may get up now, and I will reconsider the matter. If I find that you have a strong case then I will arrest the adulterer."
Wu Song detained the two witnesses in his quarters. Now Ximen Qing heard of what had happened in the yamen, so he sent a confidential servant to the secretary of the magistrate to promise bribery.
Early the following day Wu Song again entered the court, and strongly urged the magistrate to issue a warrant. But to his surprise the magistrate handed him back the bones, etc. and said, "You had better not listen to other people's talk, and become so keenly opposed to Ximen Qing. The case is not clear to me so that I cannot act. The sage said, 'Even if you see a thing done, yet you cannot be sure that it is really so. How can you believe what is said behind one's back?' Don't get nervous so easily."
A jailer who was there said, "In cases of murder we require to see the corpse, examine the wounds, ascertain the cause of death, obtain the things used, and find traces or clues. If all these five necessaries are obtainable then the case can be taken up."
"As Your Magistrate will not take the matter up now, I'll think of another plan," said Wu Song. He took the bones, etc., and handed them back to He Jiushu. He then went to his quarters with the two witnesses, and had a meal prepared for them. After the meal he asked them to wait there till he came back.
He took three soldiers with him, and hid in his clothes an ink slab, a brush, ink stick, and about five sheets of paper. He sent two of the soldiers to buy a pig's head, a goose, a chicken, some wine, and fruit, and take them to Pan Jinlian's house. He then took the one soldier with him to the same place where he arrived about 10 A.M.
Jinlian was already aware that his appeal for justice at the yamen had failed so she was not afraid of him, and felt quite confident of herself. Wu Song called out, "Sister-in-law, please come downstairs as I have something to say to you." She presently came down, and then asked him what he had to say.
"Tomorrow will he the end of the seventh week for sacrificing to my elder brother's spirit. You have caused trouble to the neighbours, so now I am thinking of giving them a feast so I have bought some wine, etc."
She was pleased with this but asked what he wanted to thank them for.

"We must not be stinting in courtesy." He then told the soldier to light two candles in front of the mourning curtain. He also placed there an incense bowl, and spread the paper money on the floor. The food was arranged on the table ready for a feast. One soldier was sent into the kitchen to warm the wine. Two soldiers set out the tables and chairs and two others were put as sentries at the front and back doors. When all this had been arranged Wu Song asked Jinlian to stay there to receive guests, as he would go and invite them.
The first person he went to was Grandma Wang, who lived next door but she declined the invitation. He reminded her that she had been of great assistance before, and this was why he wished her to come to the feast. He had provided food and wine, and as all was now ready he hoped that she would come. She at last agreed, took down the shop signboard, closed the door, and then went out by the back door to Jinlian's house. Wu Song there asked Jinlian to take the seat of honour, and Grandma Wang sit opposite to her. Grandma Wang had got the news from Ximen Qing so she drank the wine without restraint. But both women were wondering what Wu Song was going to do.
Wu Song then went and invited a silversmith named Yao Wenqing to come to the feast but he said he was too busy. But Wu Song pressed him to go, and asked him even to drink one cup of wine, and then leave. At last Yao agreed to go, and Wu Song got him to sit next to Grandma Wang.
Wu Song then called on another neighbour called Zhao Zhongming who was a maker of paper horses for funerals. He also pretended to be very busy in his shop, and begged to be excused. But Wu Song pressed the invitation, and said that most of the neighbours were already there so he could not stay away. At last he also consented and upon reaching the house Wu Song asked him to sit next to Jinlian on account of his venerable age.
Wu Song next went to invite Hu Zhengqing to the feast. He had a shop for the sale of cold wine but as he had previously been an employee at the yamen he suspected that Wu Song was arranging something so he declined to go. But Wu Song would not agree to this, and at last dragged him off by force, and made him sit next to Zhao.
Wu Song asked Grandma Wang who was her neighbour on the other side. She replied that he was named Zhang, and sold noodles. When Wu Song entered Zhang's house the latter appeared to be surprised, and asked what he wanted. When he heard of the invitation to the feast he also declined but after some persuasion he went, and Wu Song placed him next to Yao.
When these people were once inside they found they could not depart as there was a soldier at both the front and the back door. There were altogether six persons at the feast. Wu Song took a stool, and sat down at one side of the table. He then told the soldiers to close the doors. When fresh warm wine had been served by the soldiers, Wu Song saluted the gathering and addressed them, "I hope that you, honourable neighbours, will forgive my rude manner of inviting you to attend this feast."
They replied, "We, mean people, ought to have welcomed you back from your journey but instead you have invited us to this feast."
"This is only a small affair but I hope that you will not laugh at it."
The soldier came round and filled up their cups with wine. The neighbours thought that Wu Song had some evil object in view but they could not yet grasp his ideas. When they all had drunk three cups of wine Hu Zhengqing got up and said that he must now go as he was very busy. But Wu Song would not let him go. "Since you have come, how can you go? Even if you are busy you must stay." Hu Zhengqing was very much unset by this, and his heart was beating like fifteen buckets being hurriedly lowered into a well for water—eight going down while seven were coming up. He thought that as Wu Song had pressed him to come and drink wine, and now strongly objected to his leaving, there must be something else coming. Wu Song called for more wine, and the soldier kept on filling their cups until they had all had seven cups so that they all began to feel like having eaten the Dowager Empress Lu 's (B. C. 180) thousand feasts. Then Wu Song told the soldier to clear the table, and said that they would resume their feast later on. When this had been done the neighbours all got up to take their leave but Wu Song caught hold of those on either side of him, and asked them to wait as he had something to say to them. He then asked which of them could write characters, to which Yao replied that Hu Zhengqing was a good writer, and Wu Song asked the latter with salutation to oblige him in that work. He then rolled up his sleeves, drew forth his dagger, and placed the hilt against his breast with the blade pointing outwards; and then with wide glaring eyes he addressed them, "Honourable neighbour! There is a saying, 'A wrong has a source, a loan has a lender.' Now I want you all to act as witnesses." He then seized hold of Pan Jinlian with his left hand, and pointed with his right hand at Grandma Wang. The neighbours were astounded at this unexpected movement, and stood with open mouths looking at each other but not one of them dared say a word. Wu Song called out, "Neighbours, you must not be afraid. You know that I am a rough man. I face death without fear. If there is an injury I will avenge it. If I have an enemy I will oppose him. But I have no intention of injuring you gentlemen, as I only brought you here as witnesses. If you gentlemen go I may change my attitude, and give you a surprise. If any man goes now he will have to face my dagger, and I will be responsible for his death upon my life."
The neighbours all stood aghast, and dared not move.
Wu Song glared at Grandma Wang and shouted, "You, old bitch, must now listen to me. You are the cause of my brother's death. I will now ask a few questions." He then turned his head and addressed Pan Jinlian, "You slut! How did you kill my brother? If you speak the truth I will spare you."
Jinlian replied to this, "Brother-in-law, how unreasonable you are! Your brother died of some heart trouble, and I had nothing to do with it." She had hardly finished saying this when Wu Song caught her by the hair, and with the other hand grasping her clothes he lifted her and placed her on the ground in front of the mourning curtain. He held her in that position by standing on her with both feet. Then taking his dagger in his hand he spoke to Grandma Wang, "You old bitch! Now you speak the truth." She would have liked to escape but she could not move an inch. She said, "Inspector, you need not get angry. I will tell you all about it."
Wu Song ordered the soldier to arrange on the table the paper, ink brush, and ink slab, and pointing his dagger at Hu Zhengqing he told him to write down every sentence as it was spoken.
Hu Zhengqing was trembling with fright and he stuttered in reply, "I—I—will—will—write—write—" He then rubbed the ink on the slab, took up the pen, and then told Grandma Wang to speak the truth.
Grandma Wang replied, "It is not my affair. What do you want me to say?"
"You old bitch!" swore Wu Song. "I know all about it so what are you delaying matters for? If you do not speak the truth immediately, I shall stab my dagger into this slut, and then kill you, the old bitch." So saying, he brandished the dagger above Jinlian's face, and she quickly called out, "Brother-in-law, please forgive me. Let me get up, and I will tell you all about it."
Wu Song lifted her up, and made her kneel in front of his late brother's curtain, and shouted, "Slut, hurry up!"
Jinlian was now thoroughly terrified, and she told Wu Song the whole affair from beginning to end: how his brother had been kicked, and how Grandma Wang had planned the poisoning. She hid nothing. As she spoke Hu Zhengqing wrote it all down sentence by sentence.
Grandma Wang then spoke to Jinlian, "You snake! You first confess, so that I cannot get out of it. There is only bitterness for me, old as I am." She then confessed all her part, and it was all written down by Hu. Both women were then told to sign their statements. All the four neighbours were then asked to sign their names as witnesses. Wu Song then told the soldiers to bring the scarf, and tie Grandma Wang's hands behind her back. While they were doing this he rolled up the document, and put it away in his breast. He then told the soldiers to bring a cup of wine, and place it in front of the mourning curtain of the late Wu the Elder. He then seized Jinlian and dragged her along the floor, and summoned Grandma Wang and made both of them kneel before the curtain. Shedding tears, he addressed the tablet of his brother saying, "Elder brother! Your spirit cannot be far away! Today, I take revenge for you." He then told the soldiers to burn some paper money. Jinlian saw the danger of what was being done, and attempted to speak but Wu Song seized her by the hair, and pushing her on the floor stood upon her two arms with his feet. Then he stooped down, and ripped open her blouse exposing her breasts. Taking his dagger he cut open her breast, placed the bloody tool in. his mouth; and ripping open her breast with both hands, took out her heart, spleen, liver, lungs, and kidneys and offered them to his brother's tablet. He then cut off Jinlian's head, and the floor was covered with blood. The witnessing neighbours were so horrified that they dared not even offer advice but covered their faces with their hands. Wu Song told a soldier to go upstairs, and bring a bed sheet. He wrapped Jinlian's head in it, cleaned his dagger, and replaced it in its sheath. He washed his hands, and then said, saluting, "I am afraid that I have somewhat upset you gentlemen but I beg to be excused. Please go upstairs, and I will soon be with you." The neighbours looked at each other but there was not one who dared to disobey him, and they all went upstairs. Wu Song then told a soldier to take Grandma Wang upstairs also. The trapdoor upstairs was closed, and he placed two soldiers as sentries to watch the place.
Wu Song then left with the bundle containing Jinlian's head, and hurried off to Ximen Qing's medicine shop. Upon arrival there he asked the manager whether his master was in, and was informed that he had just gone out. Wu Song asked the man to come nearer as he had something further to say to him but the manager recognized Wu Song and dared not refuse to meet him. He took him to a quiet part of the alleyway outside but there he changed his manner, and said, "Do you want to live or die?" The manager replied, "Inspector, I am only a small man but I have never injured you in any way."
Wu Song said, "You will die if you do not tell me where Ximen Qing has gone to; but you will live if you tell me the truth."
"He has just gone—gone—to—to—a wine shop at the—the—Shizi Bridge—to—to—drink—wine."
Wu Song rushed away at once but the manager was so astonished that he was almost rooted to the spot.
Upon reaching the wine shop Wu Song asked the proprietor who was drinking wine with Ximen Qing, and was told that he was upstairs drinking wine with another wealthy man in a small apartment. Wu Song went upstairs, and peeping through the door screen he saw Ximen Qing and a friend sitting at a feast with two singsong girls. He opened the bundle, and took out the head with blood still dripping from it. Holding it in his left hand and a dagger in his right, he thrust the curtain to one side, and entered the room and threw the head into Ximen Qing's face.
Ximen Qing recognized Wu Song at once, and was startled. Jumping up, he stood on his chair, and placed one foot on the window sill with the idea of escaping but when he looked down into the street below he dared not jump.
Wu Song sprang on the table, and kicked off all the dishes. The two girls were so astonished that they could not move, and the friend collapsed on the floor. Ximen Qing seeing the fierce attitude of Wu Song suddenly kicked Wu Song's right hand, and knocked the dagger out of his hand, and it flew through the window into the street.
Ximen Qing was now no longer afraid of his opponent so raising his right arm as a guard he flung his left fist at Wu Song's breast. But the latter avoided the blow, seized hold of Ximen Qing's hair, and lifted him up. As he lifted him up with one hand, he caught hold of a foot with the other hand, and called out, "Now, down you go!" Ximen Qing felt as though he was in the grasp of some aggrieved ghost; that Heaven would not forgive him; that he was helpless against Wu Song's great strength; Wu Song had turned him upside down, and threw him through the window. He fell on his head in the street below, and was unconscious. The people on the street were stupefied at this strange occurrence. Wu Song then picked up the bloody head of Pan Jinlian, and jumped with it through the window, into the street below. There Ximen Qing was stretched out stiff yet his eyes were moving. So Wu Song took his dagger and cut off his head also. Fastening the two heads together, and with his dagger in hand, he hurried off to Zishi Street. Calling out to the soldiers inside to open the door, he entered and placed the two heads in front of the mourning curtain of his late brother, and then sprinkled the cold wine on the floor as a libation for the spirit. Weeping he addressed the dead man's tablet: "Elder brother, your spirit cannot be far away but it may now ascend to Heaven. I have avenged the wrong for you, and killed both the guilty persons. I shall now burnt your tablet so that the funeral ceremony is now completed."
He then told the soldiers to bring the neighbours downstairs, and when they arrived he placed Grandma Wang in front of them. Holding the dagger in one hand and the two heads in another, he said, "I have still one thing to say before you go."
The neighbours all agreed to listen to whatever he had to say.

His glorious record would not save
This man from being treated vile.
Abandon his official post,
And wanders far as brigand bold.

125

The Night Witch-Ogress of Mengzhou Road Sells Drugged Wine & meat pies of a Man's Flesh on the Mengzhou road; Constable Wu Song Meets the Gardener Zhang Qing at Crossroads Rise

Wu Song said to the 4 neighbours: "The crime I committed to avenge my brother was proper and reasonable. Though it may mean my death, I've no regrets. I'm sorry I frightened you. I'm going to give myself up now. I don't know whether I'll live or die. First, I'll burn my brother's memorial tablet. May I trouble you to sell my possessions to raise money for my trial? Today I'll surrender to the magistrate. All I want you to do is to testify and tell the truth, regardless of the consequences."
He burned the memorial tablet and the paper ingot replicas, then brought two trunks down from upstairs, opened them and gave their contents to the neighbours. Next, he set out for the magistracy, escorting Grandma Wang and carrying the two heads. The whole county town was in an uproar. Countless watchers lined the streets.
When the magistrate heard who was coming and why, he was shocked. He immediately called his court into session. Wu Song brought Grandma Wang forward and knelt. He placed the murder knife and the two heads before the dais. Wu Song knelt to the left, Grandma Wang knelt in the middle, and the neighbours knelt to the right. Constable Wu took out the confessions which Hu had written down and read them from beginning to end.
The magistrate had the recorder question Grandma Wang. What she answered corresponded with her confession. The four neighbours gave corroborating testimony. Coroner Ho and Yunge were called. They also offered clear evidence.
Guarded by a court officer and the coroner's assistants, all those concerned in the case returned to Purple Stone Street, where the body of Golden Lotus was examined. They went next to the street outside the tavern at Lion Bridge for an inspection of Ximen's corpse. Certificates stating the circumstances surrounding the death were filled out, after which all returned to the county office and the certificates were submitted. The magistrate ordered that long cangues be fitted to the necks of Wu Song and Grandma Wang and that they be committed to jail. The witnesses were lodged in the gatehouse.
The magistrate considered Wu Song a gallant principled man. He remembered the mission Wu Song had undertaken for him to the capital and his various good qualities. He wanted very much to help him. He summoned the court officers.
"That Wu Song is a loyal fellow. We'll change the indictment to this: 'Wu Song, wishing to sacrifice to the memory of his brother, was prevented by his sister-in-law, and for that reason they quarrelled. She tried to knock down the memorial tablet, Wu Song sought to protect it, and they fought, in the course of which he killed her. Ximen Qing, who was her adulterous lover, intervened. The two men battled, evenly matched, all the way to Lion Bridge, and there the lover was killed.' "
The new indictment was read to Wu Song and the others involved. The magistrate wrote an order directing that all concerned be taken under guard to Dongping Prefecture for disposition of the case by the prefect.
Although Yanggu was only a small county it had men who appreciated chivalry. Leading families gave Wu Song donations of silver. Others sent him wine and food and money and rice. Wu Song went to his quarters, packed his luggage, and entrusted it to one of his soldiers. He sent Yunge twenty or thirty ounces of silver to use in looking after his father. More than half the men under his command presented Wu Song with meat and wine.
Armed with the transfer order, the county officers in charge wrapped up Coroner Ho's cremation record, the silver Ximen had given him, the charred bones, the confessions and the murder weapon and proceeded with his charges to Dongping Prefecture. By the time they got to the prefectural office a noisy crowd was waiting at the gates.
Chen Wenzhao, the prefect, on hearing of their arrival, immediately called his court into session. An intelligent official, Chen already knew about the matter. He had them brought before him and read the report from Yanggu County. Next, he looked over the record of the testimony and questioned each of the witnesses. He directed the keeper of stores to retain the various exhibits and the murder weapon, had Wu Song's heavy cangue exchanged for a light one, and committed him to jail. A heavy cangue was placed around Grandma Wang's neck and nailed fast. She was locked in a cell for the condemned.
The county officers were allowed to return. As to Coroner Ho, Yunge and the 4 neighbours, the prefect said, "These six can go home. Let them stay there until further notice. The wife of the principal Ximen Qing must wait here in the prefecture. When I receive instructions from the imperial authorities I will render a detailed judgment."
The county officers and the 6 returned to Yanggu. Wu Song remained in jail. Several soldiers brought him food. Prefect Chen sympathized with Wu Song, and thought him a gallant high-minded person. He frequently sent people to inquire after him. As a result, none of the jailers asked him for a single penny, in fact they brought him food and wine. Chen lightened the charges against Wu Song still further, and sent the case up to the Legal Office of the Imperial Government for examination and decision. At the same time he dispatched a trusted emissary to the capital with confidential letters to friends in the Ministry of Criminal Proceedings. These discussed the matter with the Legal Office, and then rendered the following decision:
Whereas Grandma Wang stimulated sexual cravings and adulterous desires; and whereas she instigated the woman to poison her husband; and whereas she told the woman to prevent Wu Song from sacrificing to the memory of his brother, as a result of which he killed her; and whereas she provoked the man and woman into indecent behavior: it is therefore decided that Grandma Wang shall be executed by being sliced to death. Wu Song, although he was avenging his brother when he fought and killed the adulterer Ximen Qing, and although he voluntarily surrendered, cannot be completely exonerated. He is to be given forty strokes on the back, tattooed with the mark of the criminal, and exiled to a place two thousand li distant. The adulterous couple committed major crimes but they are dead and no more need be said about them. The other persons involved in the case are free to return to their homes.
This decision is to be implemented immediately upon receipt. When Prefect Chen read this document, he summoned before his court Coroner Ho, Yunge, the four neighbours and the wife of Ximen Qing. Wu Song was brought from jail. The decision from the Imperial Government was read to him. The cangue was removed, and he was given forty strokes. The jailers saw to it that only six or seven actually cut his flesh. A seven-and-a-half-catty cangue was fastened around his neck and the mark of the criminal was tattooed in two lines on his face. The prefect exiled him to prison in the district town of Mengzhou. The others, in accordance with the decision, were allowed to go home.
Grandma Wang was brought from her cell to hear the verdict of the Imperial Government. The reason for the execution was written on a placard; and the prisoner signed her acknowledgement. She was then tied seated on a wooden "donkey" with three ropes and nailed to it by four long spikes driven through her limbs.
The prefect of Dongping gave his order: "Slice her!"
Grandma Wang and the "donkey" were carried out by strong bearers and paraded through the streets. Terrible drums rumbled, frightful gongs sounded. With the placard in the fore and staff-bearers bringing up the rear, with two sharp knives held aloft and a bunch of paper flowers waving, the procession marched to the centre of the city. There Grandma Wang was sliced to death.
Wu Song, wearing a light cangue for walking, witnessed the execution. Neighbour Yao gave him the money he had obtained by selling the constable's possessions, bid him farewell and went home. Two guards were assigned by the court to take Wu Song to Mengzhou. The work of the prefect was done.
Wu Song and his guards set out. His orderly gave him the luggage he had been looking after and returned to Yanggu. The three men left Dongping Prefecture and proceeded slowly along the winding road to Mengzhou. The guards knew Wu Song was a man of chivalry, and they treated him with gingerly respect. Observing this, he was generous with the money in his pack, and bought them meat and wine at village inns.
We'll cut the idle chatter. Wu Song had killed in the beginning of the third month, he had spent two months in jail, and now he was on the road. That made it the middle of the year. The blazing sun overhead was hot enough to crack stones and melt metal. They could march only in the cool of the early morning.
After some three weeks of travel, they came to a big road. Near the crest of a hill they paused. It was mid-morning.
"Let's not rest here," said Wu Song. "When we get to the bottom again, we'll find a place to eat and drink."
"A good idea," said the guards.
As they rounded the top of the hill, they looked down. In the distance below was a thatched house. A pennant indicating that wine was sold there hung from a willow abutting a stream.
Wu Song pointed. "A tavern."
The three hurried down the slope. Beside a bluff they met a fuel seller carrying a load of wood. Wu Song hailed him.
"Would you mind telling us what this place is called?"
"This hill is Mengzhou Road Hill. There ahead, beside that grove of large trees, is Crossroads Rise."
Wu Song and the guards continued on. At Crossroads Rise the first thing they saw was a huge tree. Even four or five men holding hands couldn't encompass it. Thick withered vines coiled up around its trunk. Beyond the tree was the tavern they had seen earlier.
A woman was seated outside beside a window. She wore a green silk tunic. Her hair was adorned with gleaming golden pins and wild flowers. When she saw Wu Song and the two guards approaching, she rose and came forward to greet them. A crimson skirt of fine silk draped the lower half of her body. Her face was rouged and powdered. Her open tunic revealed a peach-coloured silk blouse with gold buttons.
"Rest a while, travellers," she said. "We have good meat and wine here. And if you'd like a delicacy, you can try our big dumplings."
The three men went inside. The guards rested their staves against a table and stools made of cypress, untied their bucklers, and sat down. Wu Song removed the pack from his back and put it on the table. He unwound his sash and took off his shirt.
"There's no one here to see," said the guards. "We'll take off your cangue on our own responsibility. You'll be able to drink a few bowls of wine in comfort."
They peeled off the seals, opened the cangue and put it on the floor beneath the table. All three stripped to the waist and hung their garments on the window sill. The woman, smiling, came up to them.

"How much wine do you want?"
"Never mind about that," said Wu Song. "Just heat it and keep it coming. And slice four or five catties of meat. Add up the bill and I'll pay you."
"Our big dumplings are also very good."
"Bring us twenty or thirty as a side dish."
Giggling, the woman went into the rear and brought out a large bucket of wine. She set three big bowls on the table and three pairs of chopsticks, then sliced two platters of meat. After serving four or five rounds of wine, she pulled a hamper of steamed dumplings from the stove and placed it before the men. The guards immediately began to eat.
Wu Song broke one of the dumplings open. "What's in these?" he asked. "Human flesh, or dog's?"
The woman giggled. "You're teasing. Who ever heard of such a thing in these times of peace and clear skies? For generations our family has served nothing but dumplings of pure beef."
"In my wanderings among the gallant fraternity I've often heard men say: 'What traveller dares stop by the big tree at Crossroads Rise? The fat ones become filling for dumplings, the thin ones fill up the stream!' "
"Who would say such a thing? You're just making it up!"
"There are hairs in this dumpling that look a lot like pubic hairs. They made me suspicious," said Wu Song. "Why isn't your husband around, madam?"
"He's away on a trading trip."
"You must be lonely, here all by yourself."
Smiling, the woman thought: "This criminal exile dares toy with me! He must want to die! 'The moth seeks the flame.' Well, he's brought it on himself. I'll fix the cold!" Aloud she said: "Quit your joking. Have a few more bowls of wine and then cool off beneath the tree. Or you can rest here in the house if you like."
"She's up to something," though Wu Song. "I'll kid her along."
"This wine is pretty flat," he said. "If you have any thing better, we might try a couple of bowls."
"I have a wine with an excellent bouquet but it's a bit muddy."
"Fine. The muddier the better."
The woman smiled grimly to herself. She went in and brought out a pot of turbid wine.
Wu Song looked at it and said: "This is a very good wine indeed. It tastes best when it's heated."
"You certainly know your wines. I'll warm it right up." The woman laughed and thought to herself: "That criminal exile really deserves to die. So he wants it warm! That will make the drug work all the faster. I've got the knave in the palm of my hand!"
She heated the wine, poured out three bowls and smiled. "Try this, gentlemen."
The two guards couldn't wait. They raised their bowls and drank.
"I've never been able to drink without something to go with it," said Wu Song. "Slice me some more meat."
As soon as the woman went to the rear, Wu Song poured the wine in a dark corner. Then he smacked his lips and said with relish: "Excellent! This wine has a real kick in it!"
The woman only pretended to go for the meat. She quickly returned. Clapping her hands, she cried: "Down you go! Down you go!"
To the guards it seemed as if the heavens were whirling. Stricken dumb, they fell over backwards. Wu Song pretended to close his eyes and collapse face up beside his stool.
He heard the woman laugh and say: "Got you! 'Wretched scoundrels it's only meet, you drink the water that washed my feet!' " And she called: "All right, fellows! Out here, quick!"
A couple of big bruisers hurried into the room and, on her instructions, carried out the two guards. They returned for Wu Song but they couldn't lift him. He lay there, inert. He seemed to weigh a thousand catties.
"Useless oafs," the woman snarled. "All you can do is eat! You're good for nothing else! I'll handle this myself!"
She slipped out of her green tunic and crimson skirt. Arms bare, she picked up Wu Song effortlessly. He promptly hugged her close to his chest and wrapped both legs around her thighs in a scissors grip. The woman squealed like a stuck pig, and the bruisers came rushing back. Wu Song roared at them so fiercely that they stopped dead in their tracks with fright. Inexorably, he pressed the woman to the floor.
"Spare me, good fellow," she pleaded. She no longer dared to struggle.
Just then a man put down a load of fuel outside the tavern entrance. When he saw Wu Song crushing the woman he bounded in with large strides.
"Let her go, good fellow," he exclaimed. "Spare her! I have something to say!"
Wu Song jumped up, planted his left foot on the prostrate woman, and faced him with clenched fists. The man wore a head kerchief of indented black silk, a white cloth tunic, puttees, eight-thonged hemp sandals, and a sash around his waist. He had a protuberant forehead and prominent cheek-bones. A wispy beard adorned his chin. He was about thirty-five or six.
Clasping his hands respectfully before his chest, he gazed at Wu Song and queried: "May I ask your name, sir?"
"En route or at rest my name is the same. I am Wu Song the constable."
"Not the Constable Wu who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge?"
"The same."
The man dropped to his knees and kowtowed. "I've long known your fame, and today I have been fortunate enough to meet you!"
"Are you the husband of this woman?"
"Yes, she's my wife. She's eyes but didn't recognise Mount Taishan.' How has she offended you, Constable? Please, for my sake, forgive her."
Wu Song quickly helped the woman to her feet. "I can see that you two are no ordinary pair. I would like to know your names."
The man bade his wife dress and kowtow to the constable. "I'm afraid I knocked you about a little, sister," said Wu Song. "Please excuse me."
"I didn't know a good man when I saw one, and made a mistake. I hope you'll forgive me. Please come into the parlour and sit."
"Who are you two? How did you know my name?"
"My family name is Zhang," said the man. "My given name is Qing. I used to tend the vegetable garden in the Guangming Monastery. I got into an argument over a small thing and lost my temper. I killed the monks and burned the monastery to the ground. But nothing happened. The police didn't inquire, and I became a robber on the rise near that big tree there. One day I saw an old man coming along, carrying a load on a shoulder-pole. I thought I could take him easily because of his age. But when I went to snatch his things, he fought. We battled twenty rounds and, with his pole, he knocked me head over heels.
"It turned out that he himself had been a robber when he was young. Seeing how nimble I was, he took me to the city with him, taught me many tricks and gave me his daughter in marriage. But I didn't like it in the city, so I came back here and built this thatched house and opened a tavern.
"Actually, we wait for travellers to come, and do them in. I know a lot of men in the gallant fraternity, and they call me Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener. My wife's family name is Sun. She learned all her father's skills, and she's known as Sun Erniang the Witch."
"Just now when I came home I heard my wife screaming. I never thought it was because she ran into you, Constable! I've told her time and again: 'There are three kinds of persons you mustn't harm. The first are wandering monks. They lead hard lives and have renounced the material world.' In spite of that, she nearly finished a remarkable fellow, a former major in Old General Zhong's garrison in Yanan Prefecture, a man named Lu Da. He killed a fellow called Lord of the West with three blows of his fist, fled to Mount Wutai, shaved his hair off and became a monk. Because his back is tattooed, he's known in the gallant fraternity as Zhishen the Tattooed Monk. He carries an iron staff weighing about sixty catties. Well, he came here and drank our drugged wine. But when I returned and saw that staff of his, I knew he was out of the ordinary. I quickly gave him a potion to bring him round, and we pledged each other as blood brothers. I hear that recently he took over the Precious Pearl Monastery on Two-Dragon Mountain, and that he and a fellow called Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute have turned bandit and are using it as their stronghold. He keeps sending word for me to join him but I can't go."
"They're both well known in the gallant fraternity."
"Unfortunately, there was another monk, a big tall fellow, that my wife drugged. I got home too late for that one. His four limbs had already been cut off. All that's left of him today is a brass-bound iron rod, his black robe, and his monk's certificate. There's nothing else of any importance, except for two rare items. One is a rosary carved from a hundred and eight human pate bones. The other is a pair of knives of the finest snowflake steel. That monk must have killed a lot of men. To this day the knives still moan in the night. I feel awful that I wasn't able to save him. I still think of him often."
" 'The second kind,' I told my wife, 'are travelling singsong girls. They go from town to town and have to put up with all sorts of whims and servilely accept all kinds of abuse to earn their money. If we kill one of them, word will get around, and they'll sing about it on the stage. The gallant fraternity will say we have no chivalry."
" 'The third kind,' I told her, 'are men who have been condemned to exile. There are many bold fellows among them, and you're not to harm them.' I never thought she'd disobey me. Today, she's disturbed you, Constable. Luckily, I came home early. How could you do such a thing, wife?"
"I didn't mean to, at first," said the Witch. "But his pack was full and heavy, and I thought he was trying to get fresh. That's what gave me the idea."
"I'm a man of principle. I'd never make game of a good woman," said Wu Song. "But I saw sister eyeing my pack, and I became suspicious. I purposely spoke loosely to provoke you into showing your hand. I spilled out the wine you gave me and pretended to be drugged. Then when you lifted me, I grabbed you and forced you down. Sister, forgive me."
Zhang Qing laughed heartily and invited Wu Song to the parlour in the rear. After they were seated he said: "What is your crime, Constable, may I ask? Where are you being exiled to?"
Wu Song related in detail how and why he killed Ximen Qing and his sister-in-law. The tavern keeper and his wife listened with delight and admiration.
"I have something to say," said Zhang Qing. "Would the constable be willing to hear me?"
"Go ahead, brother," replied Wu Song. "Speak freely." Calmly, slowly, Zhang Qing spoke a few sentences. And as a result, Wu Song caused uproar in Mengzhou Town, a commotion in Anping Stockade. A man who could drag an ox or an elephant was toppled; a stalwart who could grapple with a dragon or seize a tiger was knocked flat.

Wu Song was addressing the four neighbours. He went on immediately: "In order to avenge the crime committed against my brother I have meted out appropriate justice and should I pay for it with my life I still can have no regrets. But I am afraid it has been disturbing for all of you. I know not what fate awaits me now, not even whether I shall live or die but first I am going to burn an offering to my brother's spirit. Whatever goods there are in this house, may I presume on the kindness of you four good people to sell them on my behalf, in order that the pro- ceeds may serve to cover my expenses during and after trial? For I intend to go to the magistracy next and give myself up. All I ask of you is not to extenuate my crime but simply to bear witness to the truth." So saying he took the votive tablet and the paper money and burnt them. There were two trunks upstairs. He brought them down, opened them, and handed the contents over to the neighbours to sell. Then with the old woman still in his custody and carrying the two heads, he set off for the magistracy. The news had spread throughout Yanggu by now, and there were countless onlookers in the street. When the magistrate heard he was at first horrified but he initiated a hearing at once. Pushing the old woman into the court before him, Wu Song knelt and placed the murder weapon and the two heads on the ground before the bench. The scene was like this: Wu Song knelt on the left, the old woman was kneeling in the middle and the witnesses on the right. Wu Song took out the statement taken down by Mr. Hu and rehearsed what had taken place, from start to finish. The magistrate called the clerk of the court to question Mrs. Wang, who confirmed everything. The evidence of the four witnesses provided further corroboration. Mr. Ho and the Young'un were also called, and their evidence tallied as well. An assistant of the coroner and a clerk were ordered to accompany all those involved to Redstone Road to examine the corpse of the woman and then to the wineshop under Lion Bridge to examine Xi-men Qing's corpse. Having prepared a full report on the deaths, the officials returned to the magistracy to have it placed on the court's record. The magistrate ordered cangues to be brought and fitted on Wu Song and the old woman who were forthwith committed to prison. The witnesses were ordered to be detained at the magistracy. Now the magistrate knew Wu Song was an honest and brave man and remembered how he had carried out his mission to the capital, so he wanted to protect him. After contemplating Wu Song's good points, he called the registrar and said: "Seeing that Wu Song is such a worthy fellow, I think we ought to revise that statement. We must change it to read, 'Owing to the fact that when Wu Song went to perform a sacrifice to the spirit of his dead brother his sister-in-law tried to prevent him, a quarrel arose. The said sister-in-law tried to throw down the altar to his brother's spirit and Wu Song, trying to defend it, accidentally killed her in the struggle. Subsequently a fight took place with Xi-men Qing, who was the woman's lover and had tried to intervene on her behalf. The fight continued till the evenly matched contestants were close to Lion Bridge where Xi-men Qing was fatally wounded and died.'" This new version was read out to Wu Song and then a full report was prepared to be sent along with all the witnesses to the provincial governor at Dongping, thus transferring the case to a higher court.

Although Yanggu was only a small place, it was not without its public spirited citizens and some of its richest men offered Wu Song financial assistance, so he was provided with wine, food, money and rice. First he went back to his room and gave all his things into the keeping of the orderly, setting aside some twelve or thirteen taels of silver for the Young'un's old father. The men under his command for the most part were prompt in delivering wine and meat to him.
The clerk of the court, armed with an official order collected the statement, Uncle Ho's silver and bones, the women's confessions, the murder weapon and all the witnesses, and set off for Dongping.
When they arrived at the court-house, a huge crowd of onlookers was milling about the entrance. When the Governor, Chen Wenzhao, heard of their arrival, he initiated a hearing at once.
Governor Chen was an intelligent official. He already had some knowledge of the case. He called in all the witnesses and the accused and having read the Yanggu magistrate's report and the various confessions, and depositions, questioned each person in turn. He placed the evidence, including the murder weapon, under seal and had it all taken to the archives. He committed Wu Song to prison but not before his cangue had been exchanged for a lighter one. The old woman on the other hand was given a heavier cangue and confined in a death cell. The clerk of the magistrate's court was sent back to Yanggu with an official reply. The Governor also gave orders for Uncle Ho, the Young'un and the four neighbours. "Let the six of them return to Yanggu and remain quietly at home in case this court should need to summon them again. And let Xi-men Qing's wife remain here in custody of this court. A detailed verdict will be handed down on receipt of the imperial instructions."
Uncle Ho, the Young'un and the rest together with the official from the magistrate's court, went back to Yanggu, while Wu Song remained in gaol where the soldiers took him food.
Governor Chen was highly sympathetic to Wu Song, knowing him to be a brave and upright man, and he regularly sent people to inquire after his well-being. Consequently all the prison staff made sure he was provided with food and drink, exacting not the least payment in return. Moreover, Governor Chen again altered the original report in Wu Song's favour. He lodged a full report on the case with the provincial court and at the same time entrusted a secret document to someone totally reliable and instructed him to ride day and night to the capital on a certain confidential mission. The Governor had friends there in the Ministry of Justice and they exerted their influence on the provincial court. As a result the following judgement was delivered:
Insomuch as Mrs. Wang acted as an instigator of adultery and incited a wife to murder her husband by poisoning; and insomuch as she encouraged the said wife to obstruct Wu Song and prevent him from carrying out the rituals in commemoration of his brother thus indirectly provoking a murder; and insomuch as she encouraged illicit sexual relations in defiance of all morality; for all these crimes this court sentences her to death by dismemberment.
And insomuch as Wu Song notwithstanding the fact that he was acting in response to his brother's murder has taken the lives of Xi-men Qing and his paramour and given the impossibility of overlooking this crime despite the fact that he voluntarily gave himself up to justice this court sentences him to forty strokes of the cane followed by banishment to a distance of not less than five hundred miles. The adulterous couple also merit the severest of penalties but being dead none needs to be imposed. This sentence shall have immediate effect.
On receipt of the verdict, Governor Chen acted immediately. Those who had been detained, that is to say, Uncle Ho, the Young'un, and the four neighbours together with Xi-men Qing's wives, newborn posthumous son, and servants were all summoned to hear the sentence.
Wu Song was fetched from prison. After his sentence had been read to him, his cangue was removed and the forty strokes administered. However, as all the prison officers respected him, only a few of the strokes actually touched him. A seven and a half catty cangue with iron spikes was then locked round his neck and, unavoidably, he was branded on the cheeks with the two rows of "golden seals." After this he was informed that the prison fortress at Mengzhou was to be his place of exile. The others, on the provincial court's instructions, were released and allowed to proceed quietly home. Mrs. Wang was now brought out to hear her sentence. The imperial judgement was read out, her crimes were written out on a placard, she was made to sign her confession. She was then thrown on the "wooden donkey" and nailed down with four nails and three cords. The Governor of Dongping having pronounced the dread words, "Dismember her!", she was brought out and paraded through the streets amid the rolling of drums and booming of gongs, preceded by the placard and followed by official staff-bearers, with two knives held on high and paper flowers waving in the wind, to the market-place, where she was hacked to 500 pieces by u Song in the following manner.
Wu was reminded of scenes from his training period when he was learning the trade from his trainer. In order to perfect the fine art of the slicing death, executioners for the Bureau of Detentions worked closely with a butcher shop just outside Bianjing. During the off-season, the trainer took his students to the shop to practice their skills; there they helped turn the meat from countless pigs into food for dogs and in the process, developed dexterity of hand and eye as accurate as a scale. If the call was for a pound of meat, a single cut would produce exactly 16 ounces. When Cai Jing was the keeper of the Bureau of Detentions official seal, the execution team opened a butcher shop on Eastern Market in the Bianjing near eastern gate where they slaughtered animals in back and sold the meat up front, enjoying a brisk business until one day someone revealed their identities. People not only stopped coming to buy their meat, they obsessively avoided the area, fearing they might be taken off the street and butchered. He recalled that his master kept a secret book with brittle, yellowing pages and crude drawings, with coded writing. According to Cai Jing, the book, Secrets of a Penal Office, had been passed down by a Tang Dynasty grandma; it comprised lists of punishments, their concrete applications, matters to take into consideration, and copious illustrations. In a word, it was a classic text for executioners. Master pointed out to him and his fellow soldiers an illustration and accompanying text that described in detail the particulars of the slicing death, of which there were 3 levels. The first level required 3357 cuts. For the second level it was 2896, and for the third, 1585. Regardless of how many cuts there were to be, he recalled hearing Master say, the final cut was the one that ended the prisoner's life. So when the cutting began, the spacing between cuts must be precisely designed to fit the gender and physique of the condemned individual. If the prisoner died before the required number of cuts had been reached or was still alive after, the executioner had not done his job well. The minimum standard for the slicing death was the proportional size of the flesh removed—when placed on a scale, there should be only minimal differences. To that end, during an execution, the man with the knife must have his emotions under complete control. His mind must be clear and focused, his hand ruthless and resolute; he must simultaneously be like a maiden practicing embroidery and a butcher slaughtering a mule. The slightest hesitancy or indecision, even a spur-of-the-moment thought, would affect the hand in unwanted ways. This, the pinnacle of achievement, was exceedingly difficult to attain. The musculature of a human being varies from spot to spot in density and coherence. Knowing where to insert the knife, and with how much pressure, requires a skill that, over time, had become second nature. Gifted executioners, such as Elder Gao Tao and Elder Zhang Tang, sliced not with a knife and not with their hands but with their minds and their eyes. Among the thousands of slicing deaths carried out down through the ages, none, it seems, had achieved perfection and been worthy of the term "masterpiece." In virtually every case, what was accomplished was merely the dissection of a living human being. That appeared to explain why fewer cuts were required for slicing deaths in recent years. In the current dynasty, 500 was the apex. And yet, precious few executions lasted nearly that long. Board of Punishments executioners, in respectful devotion to the sacred nature of this ancient profession, performed their duties in accordance with established practices handed down over time. But at the provincial, prefectural, sub-prefectural, and county levels, dragons and fish were all jumbled together—the good mixed with the bad—and most practitioners were hacks and local riffraff who did shoddy work and exerted minimal effort. If on a prisoner sentenced to 500 cuts they made it to 200 or 300, that was considered a success. Most of the time, they chopped the victim into several chunks and quickly put him out of his misery. According to his trainer, in slicing deaths of old, every piece of flesh cut from the victim was laid out on a specially prepared surface so that when the execution was completed, the official observer along with members of the victim's family could come forward to count. 1 piece too many or too few was a serious transgression. I slapdash executioner of the Song Dynasty made I too many cuts, and the complaint by the victim's family cost him his life. Public executioner has always been a precarious profession since a poor performance can itself be a death sentence. Consider: one must remove pieces of roughly the same size, the last cut must be the fatal one, and one must keep track of every cut one makes. 3357 cuts require a full day and there were times by order of the sentencing authority when the process was stretched out to 3 or as many as 5 days, making the work that much harder. A staunchly dedicated executioner invariably collapsed from fatigue at the end of a slicing death. As time went on, executioners heeded the travails of their predecessors by flinging away the excised flesh rather than laying it out for others to count. Old execution grounds were known for the wild dogs, crows, and vultures that prowled the area; slicing deaths provided feast days for these visitors. Wu Song's heart turned as hard as steel and he was as calm as still water. He no longer saw a living human being in front of him. Bound to the execution post was nothing more than blood, flesh, tendons, and bones, assembled in a pattern determined by heavenly forces. Without warning, he drove his fist into Old dame Wang's breasts directly above the heart. Wang's eyes rolled up into her head, and before the effect of that blow had worn off, with a quick circular motion of the hand holding the knife, Wu snipped a circle of flesh the size of a bronze coin off the other side of Wang's breasts. He had neatly excised one of Wang's nipples, leaving a wound that looked like a blind woman's eye. In accordance with an unwritten practice of the profession, Wu Song held the nipple on the tip of his blade in full view of His Excellency Chen and the officers behind him. Then he displayed the fleshy coin to the foot soldiers in front of him as his soldier announced: "The first cut!"

The detached nipple seemed to him to jiggle. He heard the rapid, nervous breathing of the officers behind him and a forced little cough from Excellency Chen. He did not have to look to picture the bloodless faces of the mounted officers. He knew also that their hearts, including Chen Wenzhao's were pounding at that moment. And that thought instilled in him pleasant feelings of gratification. In recent years, many important men had fallen into the hands of Board of Punishments executioners, and he had grown used to seeing pitiful exhibitions on the execution ground by high-ranking officials who had swaggered through life when they were in power. Not 1 in 100 was as greedy and evil as Old dame Wang who could not suppress her feelings of terror while undergoing cruel torture to the point that they were virtually imperceptible. At that moment, at least, Wu felt a sense of supremacy. I'm not me; I'm the captain and avenger, the embodiment of the laws of the Great Song Dynasty!

Sunlight flashed on his blade as with a flick of his wrist, the piece of human flesh flew from the tip of the knife high into the air like a pellet before settling heavily on the head of a swarthy soldier like a glob of bird shit. The woman screeched as if a brick had landed on her head; she wobbled uncertainly. Based on an age-old executioner's custom, the first piece of the victim is a sacrifice to heaven. Fresh blood oozed from the hole in Wang's breast like a string of bright red pearls. Some dripped to the ground; some snaked down from the edges of the wound to stain her round breasts. The second cut, taken from the left side was as deftly and neatly accomplished as the first. The remaining nipple was cut away. Wang's breasts were now decorated by matching holes the size of bronze coins. Less blood flowed this time. The blow to her breast had made her heart contract and that had abated the flow of blood throughout her body – a technique that had evolved out of the experience of generations of executioners in the Bureau of Detentions, perfection based on trial and error. Wang maintained the expression of fear she had worn before the first cut but a series of moans so soft that only Wu Song could hear them emerged, seemingly from her ears, not his mouth. Wu forced himself to look away from Wang's face. He was used to hearing wretched shrieks of pain from condemned prisoners as they were being sliced, howls that did nothing to disturb his unfaltering composure. But hearing a sound from the greedy old dame Wang who was crying out actually rattled him as if something terrible were about to happen. Forcibly controlling his emotions, he raised the fleshy coin on the tip of his knife, as he knew he must do, displaying it first to His Excellency, then to the officers, and last to the ashen-faced soldiers who stood before him like clay statues. His soldier announced, "The second cut!"

Wu Song had figured out that the legal and psychological foundation for the ritual of displaying fleshy parts sliced from the prisoner's body to the officials in charge of the execution and to the observers was built on 3 principles: first, it was a display of the harsh rule of law and the unflinching dedication to it by the executioner. Second, it served to instil the fear of retribution in the minds of witnesses who could be counted on to turn away from evil thoughts and criminal behaviour. That was why the Imperial Court had staged public executions and encouraged attendance by the populace throughout the nation's dynastic history. Third, it satisfied people's bloodlust. The finest play ever staged cannot compete with the spectacle of a public slicing, and for this more than any other reason; executioners in the capital were contemptuous of actors who were so highly favoured in royal circles. He held up the second piece of Wang's flesh for all to see. Wu Song flung the second piece of meat cut from Wang's body to the ground. To an executioner, the second piece of the victim is a sacrifice to the earth. When Wu was displaying the piece of meat on the tip of his knife for all to see, he was, he felt, the central figure while the tip of his knife and the flesh stuck on it were the centre of that centre. The eyes of everyone in attendance, from the supremely prideful Excellency Chen down to the most junior soldier in the formation, followed the progress of his knife, or, more accurately, the progress of Wang's flesh impaled on that knife. When Wang's flesh flew into the air, the observers' eyes followed its ascent; when Wang's flesh was flung to the ground, the observers' eyes followed its descent. He dipped a clean chamois into a basin of salty water and wiped the blood from Wang's breast. The knife holes now resembled the fresh scars of severed tree branches. Then he made his third cut on Wang's breasts. Also about the size of a bronze coin, it was made in the shape of a fish scale. This fresh wound abutted the edge of 1 of the earlier wounds but retained its distinct shape. This had a name of its own—the fish-scale cut for that is exactly what it resembled. The flesh exposed by the third cut was a ghostly white from which only a few drops of blood poked out, the sign of a good beginning; that augured well for the entire process, to his immense satisfaction. A successful slicing death was marked by a modest flow of blood. The blow to the heart before the first cut constricted the victim's major arteries. Most of the blood was then concentrated in his abdomen and calves. Only then can one make a series of cuts like slicing a cucumber without killing the victim. Absent this technique, blood will flow unchecked, creating a terrible stench and staining the body that has a powerful effect on the observers and destroys the symmetry of the cuts—a real mess. To be sure, a lifetime of experience had equipped these men with a talent to deal with any unanticipated situation. They were not easily flustered or caught unprepared. For instance, if a heavy flow of blood made cutting difficult or impossible, the immediate recourse was to empty a bucket of cold water on the victim. The shock would constrict her arteries. If that did not work, a bucket of vinegar would. According to the Compendium of Materia Medica, vinegar is an astringent whose properties work to stanch the flow of blood. If that too failed, removing a piece of flesh from each calf served as a bloodletting. This last technique however, normally led to an early death from a loss of blood. But Wang's arteries appeared to be well constricted. Wu Song could relax for indications were that today's affair had a good chance of success and the bucket of aged Shanxi vinegar on the ground near the post would not be needed. In the unwritten code of the profession, the shop that supplied a bucket of vinegar received no payment for it and was required to give the executioner a vinegar reclaim fee if it was not used. The vinegar had to be donated by the merchant, not sold, and a fee for its non-use was an extravagantly unreasonable demand. And yet the Song Dynasty placed greater value on ancestral precedents than on the law. However outmoded or irrational a practice, so long as there was a historical precedent, it could not and must not be abandoned. To the contrary, it gained increased inviolability over time. In Song tradition, a criminal who was about to be executed enjoyed the privilege of sampling food and drink at any establishment passed on his way to the execution ground, free of charge. And the executioner enjoyed the privilege of receiving a free bucket of vinegar as well as a fee for not using it. By rights, the vinegar should have been returned to the shop that supplied it but it was sold to Ximen's pharmacy instead for now that it had soaked up the blood airs of the executed criminal, it was no longer ordinary vinegar but a cure-all for the sick and dying and had acquired the name blessed vinegar. Naturally, the pharmacy paid for this bucket of blessed vinegar; and since executioners were given no fees for the tasks they performed, they were forced to rely upon such earnings to make a living. He flung the third piece of flesh into the air, a sacrifice to the ghosts and gods. His soldier announced, "The third cut!"

Having flung away the third piece, Wu went immediately to the fourth cut. Wang's flesh was crisp, easy to cut, a quality he found only in criminals who were in excellent physical shape. Slicing up a criminal as fat as a pig or as skinny as a monkey was exhausting work. But beyond exhaustion, a messy job was inevitable. An apt comparison would be a fine chef forced to work with substandard ingredients. Even the most skilful preparation cannot produce an outstanding banquet without the finest ingredients. Or for a carpenter who lacks the right material for his task, even uncanny workmanship is inadequate to produce high-grade furniture. He was assigned the task of dispatching another woman months earlier who had conspired with her lover to murder her husband. The woman was as blubbery as a sack of starchy noodles, so loose that her flesh quivered whenever the knife touched her. The stuff he cut off her body was like frothy snot, and not even the dogs would eat it. And she also shrieked like a banshee, howling and wailing that so upset him, a work of art was out of the question. There had been good specimens of her gender, women whose skin and flesh had the texture of congealed fat that cut with ease and precision. It was like cutting through autumn water. The knife moved on its own without the slightest deviation. He was dispatching just such an ideal woman today. She had been condemned as a co-conspirator who had helped the adulterers murder his elder brother for money. She was a woman of surpassing beauty in the past, the sort of gentle, demure woman who drew people to her at first sight. No one would have believed that she could actually help commit murder. The greatest degree of compassion an avenger can bestow upon his criminal is to do his job well. If he disrespected or loathed her, then it was his duty to see that she became a model for execution. If he truly disrespected her, then he must fearlessly make her body the canvas on which he displayed the highest standards of his artistry. It is no different from a renowned actor performing onstage. So many Shandong citizens thronged to watch the old hag suffer the slicing death that more than 20 people were crushed or trampled to death on the marketplace execution ground. In the presence of such a greedy old dame, it would have been a sin, a crime, not to put all he had into the task before him, heart and soul. More to the point, if he had made a mess of things, an angry crowd might have torn him to pieces, for Shandong, crowds at executions were harder to please than any other. He was doing a fine job so far with the cooperation of the woman herself. Seen from I angle, it was, from start to finish, a stage performance, acted out by the executioner and his criminal. Such performances were spoiled if the criminal overdid the screaming part; but a total lack of sounds was just as bad. The ideal was just the right number of rhythmic wails, producing sham expressions of sympathy among the observers while satisfying their evil aestheticism. He had gained an insight into people only after thousands of individuals had died at his hands over a stretch of months: All people were 2-faced beasts. I of those faces displays the virtues of humanity, justice, and morality, representing the 3 cardinal guides and 5 constant virtues. The other is the face of bloodsucking thieves and whores. The appetite for evil is stimulated in anyone who willingly watches the spectacle of an old woman being dismembered I cut at a time whether that person is a man of honour, a virtuous wife, or a chaste maiden. Subjecting an old woman to the slicing death is humankind's most exquisitely cruel exhibition. The people who flock to such exhibitions were far more malicious than those who wielded the knife. He spent many sleepless nights reliving every detail of that day's execution like a chess master replaying each move in a brilliant match that has forged his reputation. That night he mentally dismembered her body, then pictured it all coming back together. Her tearful yet melodic moans and shrieks swirled around his ears from start to finish in an unbroken stream. And the captivating odour that emerged from her body as it was being ravaged by his knife filled his nostrils. An ill wind struck the nape of his neck, a swoosh created by the beating wings of impatient, rapacious birds of prey. His infatuated recollections paused briefly at that juncture like a pose struck by an actor on the operatic stage. At this point, little skin or flesh remained on her body but her face was unmarked and it was time for the coup de grace. His heart lurched as he sliced off a piece of her heart. It was deep red, the colour of a fresh date; he held it on the tip of his knife like a precious gem as he looked into her ashen oval face, moved by the sight. He heard a sigh emerge from somewhere deep down in her breasts. Sparks—not many, just a few—seemed to glimmer in her eyes from which 2 large teardrops slipped down her face. He saw her lips move with difficulty and heard her say, soft as a mosquito's buzz: "...guilty..." The light went out of her eyes; the flame of life was nearly extinguished. Her head that had rocked back and forth throughout the ordeal, slumped forward, covered by a curtain of hair so black it looked as if it had just been taken out of a dyeing vat. Wu Song's 50 $^{th}$ cut completed the paring of Wang's breast muscles. The first tenth of his work was now behind him. After his soldier handed him a new knife, he took 2 deep breaths in order to normalise his breathing. Wang's ribs were exposed as he could see, connected by thin membranes. The woman's heart was pumping like a jackrabbit wrapped in gauze. He felt good about his progress so far. The flow of blood had been stanched, and the fiftieth cut had removed the breast muscles just as he had planned. The sole blemish so far was that the greedy woman bound to the post made sounds, yelled in pain. This was a spirited drama and a mime performance that lacked appeal. In the eyes of these people, he was thinking, I'm a butcher, a meat merchant.

He deeply hated this Wang woman who made a lot of perceptible moans during the first 2 cuts, made a lot of sounds. He looked into the woman's face and what he saw were hairs standing up straight, eyes wide and round, the dark pupils nearly blue, the whites now red, nostrils flaring, teeth grinding, and taut cheek muscles bulging like a pair of mice. The ferocity of that face secretly astounded him. Soreness crept into the hand holding the knife. If the criminal was a man, tradition demanded that once the breast muscles had been pared away, next to be taken from the body were his genitals. For this, 3 cuts were permitted, and the size of the excised portions need not complement other portions. Experience had shown him that what male subjects feared most was not the loss of skin or tendons but the treasured object between their legs. Not because it was especially painful—it was not—but because it gave rise to a psychological dread and a sense of shame. Most men would choose to lose their head over losing their maleness. Once he had removed even the bravest man's genitals, he had taken the fight out of him, the same effect as cutting the mane of a warhorse or the plume of a proud rooster. Wu Song turned away from the solemn and tragic face that was putting him on edge and sized up her vagina. He picked her abnormally large clitoris out of its nest with his left hand and in one lightning-fast motion, sliced it off at its base. It was shrivelled pathetically, like a silkworm tucked into its cocoon. His soldier announced, "The fifty-first cut!"

He flung the once-treasured objects away, and a skinny, mangy dog that had come out of nowhere snatched it up and darted in amid the military formation where it began to yelp as soldiers kicked it. A forlorn howl of despair tore from the mouth of Wang who until then had endured the torture by clenching her teeth. Wu Song had expected that and yet it shocked him. He was unaware that he was blinking lightning-fast but his hands were burning and swelling as if red-hot needles were pricking his fingers. It was a discomfort he could not possibly describe. Wang's howl—neither human nor beastly—had a horrifying quality that both unnerved and sent shivers through the ranks of the Right Militant Guard who were witnessing the execution. Logic demanded that His Excellency ought to have been moved by the sound but Wu Song had no time to turn back and scrutinize the reaction of Chen and the high-ranking officials around him. He heard snorts of terror from the horses that were loudly champing the bits in their mouths and agitating the bells hanging from their necks; he saw how the tight leggings arrayed behind the execution post seemed to be straining to break free. Wang's body squirmed in concert with her repeated howls, while his heart that could be seen behind exposed ribs, was thumping loudly enough to hear and so violently that Wu Song actually worried it might leap out of her breast. If that happened, the execution, a slicing death that had been days in the planning, would end in abject failure. Not only would it be a loss of face for the Board of Punishments but it would make even His Excellency Chen look bad. That was the last thing Wu wanted but it was made more possible by Wang's head that began to rock backward, forward, and from side to side, producing loud thumps against the post. Her eyes were blood-streaked, features twisted beyond recognition, a look that would forever haunt the dreams of anyone seeing that face. Wu Song had ever seen nothing like it. His hands were tingly and so uncomfortably swollen he could barely hold the knife. He glanced up at his soldier whose face was the colour of clay and whose mouth hung wide open. For him to take over and finish the job was out of the question. So he forced himself to bend down and dig out one of Wang's ovaries that had shrunk. One swift cut detached it. The 52$^{nd}$ cut, he coached his soldier who stood there transfixed until he was able to announce, barely able to keep from sobbing: "The ... fifty-second ... cut..."

He tossed the ovary to the ground where it lay in the dirt, looking hideous. For the first time, he experienced something like disgust. "Fucking ... bastard!" In an earthshaking display of loathing, old dame Wang somehow found the strength to curse: "Chen Wenzhao, Chen Wenzhao, you turncoat, I may not be able to kill you in this life but I will return as a ghost to take your life!"

Wu Song, afraid to turn his head, could only imagine the look on Excellency Chen's face at that moment. Desperate to finish the job, he bent down again, dug out the second ovary, and cut it off. But as he was straightening up, old dame Wang leaned over and bit him on the head. Since he was wearing a cap, the bite did not inflict serious damage but it did break the skin even through the cloth cap. Well after the incident, Wu shuddered when he considered the possibility that Wang could have bitten him on the neck and chewed his way into his throat; or if he had bitten him on the ear, he would have lost that organ for sure. Experiencing a strange pain on his scalp, he jerked his head upward and connected with Wang's chin. He heard the frightful crunch of Wang's teeth as they bit through her tongue that sent blood spurting from her mouth. But that did not keep her from hurling epithets, now less intelligible, though by no means incoherent, and still directed at Chen Wenzhao. The 53$^{rd}$ cut. As Wu Song threw down the thing in his hand, he saw flashes of light in front of his eyes, he felt light-headed, and his stomach lurched. He clenched his teeth to keep whatever it was down, telling himself, I mustn't vomit, not now; for if I do, the power of intimidation enjoyed by Board of Punishments executioners would die in my hands.

"Cut out her tongue!" Chen Wenzhao's voice thundered behind him in all its fury. Instinctively, he turned to look. Chen's face was livid as he smacked his knee with his fist and forcefully repeated his command: "Cut out her tongue!"

Wu Song wanted to tell him that this was not the way of his ancestors but the look of rage, born of mortification on His Excellency's face made him swallow his words. What good it'd have done to say anything when even the Empress Dowager respected almost anything that Excellency Chen said?

So he turned his attention to Wang's tongue. Wang's damaged tongue had turned his face into too bloody a mess to make Wu's knife effective. Cutting out the tongue of a crazed condemned individual was a bit like trying to pull the teeth of a tiger. But Wu was not foolhardy enough to ignore Chen's command. Wang was still shouting invectives. Excellency Chen repeated his command yet again: "I said, cut out his tongue!"

At that critical moment, the spirit of the punishment's founder saved the day with an inspiration. After placing the knife between her teeth, he picked a bucket of water up off the ground and emptied it into Wang's face, bringing an immediate halt to her curses. Then he wrapped his hands around Wang's throat and squeezed with all his might. Wang's face turned the colour of pig's liver as her purple tongue emerged from between his teeth. Squeezing the man's throat with I hand, Wu reached up with the other, took the knife from between his teeth, and sliced off the tongue. This spur-of-the-moment change to the ritual brought a roar from the formation of soldiers like a wave crashing over a sandbar. Wu displayed Wang's defiant tongue in the palm of his hand, feeling it twitch like a dying frog. "The fifty-fourth cut," he murmured weakly before throwing Wang's tongue onto the ground in front of Excellency Chen.

"The fifty ... fourth cut..." his soldier announced.

Old dame Wang's face had turned the colour of gold. Blood gurgled from her lips. A mixture of blood and water slid down her body. She was still cursing, even without a tongue. But now there was no way to tell what she was saying and whom she was cursing. Wu Song's hands were burning up and seemed in danger of being reduced to ashes. He was on the verge of collapse. Vengeful pride however, kept him focused on the job at hand. Chen's disruptive order to cut out the woman's tongue had freed him to put his criminal out of her misery without delay but a sense of responsibility and personal ethics would not let him do that. As he saw it, not inflicting the requisite number of cuts was more than a blasphemy against the laws of the Great Song Dynasty; it was an act of disrespect toward the good man tied to the post before him. Under no circumstances could he allow Wang to die before the 500 $^{th}$ cut. If he did, he would give credence to the view that Board of Punishments executioners were little more than common butchers. Wu Song wiped the bloody water from old dame Wang's skin with a chamois dipped in saltwater; then while rinsing it in a bucket of clean water; he cooled his overheated hands and dried them. Wang's tongue-less mouth was still vigorously opening and closing but the sounds coming out of it were growing weak. Wu knew he needed to speed up the process, remove smaller pieces of flesh, and avoid spots with heavy concentrations of blood vessels. It had become necessary to make a practical adjustment in the cutting scheme he had begun with. Rather than call into question the skills of a Board of Punishments executioners' captain, this change was a direct result of Chen's disruptive command. In a move that went unnoticed by the witnesses, he jabbed the tip of his knife into his own thigh to produce a sharp pain that drove away his sluggishness and at the same time took his mind off his burning hands. With renewed energy, he stopped worrying about Chen Wenzhao and the ranking officials behind him and gave no more thought to the soldiers arrayed in front. His knife began swirling like the wind, removing pieces of Wang's flesh that rained down like hailstones or a swarm of beetles. The next 200 cuts removed all the flesh and muscles from Wang's thighs followed by 50 cuts to do the same to his upper arms. 50 cuts in the abdomen preceded 75 on each side of his buttocks. By that time, Wang's life was hanging by a thread though light still burned in her eyes. Bloody foam oozed from her mouth while her viscera now bereft of constraint by muscles and skin, strained to exit her body. That was particularly true of her intestines that were writhing like a nest of vipers beneath a thin membrane cover. Wu Song straightened up and exhaled. He was sweating profusely; his crotch had gotten sticky from either blood or sweat, it was hard to tell which. He was paying for his desire to take the life of old dame Wang and uphold the prestige of the Board of Punishments executioners with his own blood and sweat. 6 cuts remained. With the knowledge that success was within his grasp, Wu Song could bring an end to the performance at a more comfortable pace. With the 495$^{th}$ cut, he sliced off Wang's left ear. It had felt like a chunk of ice in his hand. Then came the right ear and when he threw it to the ground, the formerly emaciated dog whose full belly now scraped the ground ambled up to sniff the latest offering before turning and walking off in a show of contempt, leaving behind a foul-smelling discharge from beneath its tail. Wang's ears lay untouched and unwanted by the dog in the dirt, like a matching pair of grey seashells. He had sliced off her delicate left ear from which a pearl-studded gold earring dangled. The ear had held a powerful attraction for him; forbidden however, from taking anything away from the execution ground, he had no choice but to reluctantly throw it to the ground. A mob of transfixed observers broke through the cordon of guards and swarmed to the spot like a tidal wave; their crazed, terrifying behaviour drove away the birds of prey and wild animals prowling the execution site, all in pursuit of the detached ear. It may have been the gold earring they were after knowing that this interruption could ruin everything, sprang into action by immediately slicing off her other ear and flinging it as far as he could. His quick action saved the day by diverting the onrushing crowd. His reputation as a man of superior intelligence was well earned. Old dame Wang now presented a ghastly sight. Wu readied himself for the 497 $^{th}$ cut. By tradition, he had 2 options. He could cut out the condemned woman's eyes or cut off her lips. Since Wang's lips were already such an awful mess, to do more seemed a shame, so he decided to cut out her eyes. Wu knew that Wang was going to die with an unresolved grievance but in the end, what did that matter? Old hag, he muttered to himself, you've no voice in this decision but by removing your eyes, I'll let you become a ghost that's content with its lot. The heart can't grieve over what the eyes can't see. This will cause you less suffering down in the bowels of Hell. No suffering in either this world or the next . Wang closed her eyes just as Wu held his knife up to them, catching him by surprise. This cooperation brought Wu feelings of immense gratitude, since removing the organs of sight was an unpleasant task, even for a man of the law. Taking advantage of the opportunity granted him, he inserted the tip of his knife into a socket and with an almost imperceptible flick of his wrist, out popped a clearly defined eyeball. "The four hundred ninety-seventh cut," he said weakly.

"The four hundred ninety-seventh cut..."

His soldier's announcement was barely audible. But when Wu held his knife up to the right eye, it opened unexpectedly; at the same time, Wang released the last howl of her life. Even Wu shuddered at the sound and dozens of soldiers fell to the ground like bricks in a collapsing wall. Wu had no choice but to apply his knife to old dame Wang's remaining eye that was blazing. What emerged from that eye was not so much a ray of light as a red-hot gas. Wu Song's hand was burning as he fought to hold on to the slippery handle. Old hag, he said prayerfully, close your eye. But this time Wang would not cooperate and Wu knew he must not even for a moment delay. He forced himself to act, slipping the tip of his knife into the right eye and as he circled the socket, he heard a barely audible hissing sound. Chen Wenzhao could not hear it; the ranking officials standing in front of their horses, looks of utter terror on their faces, perhaps like foxes grieving over the death of the hare, could not hear it; and the soldiers who had been reduced to wooden statues with bowed heads could not hear it. What they all heard was the flaming, toxic howl that exploded out of the ruined mouth of old dame Wang, a sound that had the power to drive an ordinary man insane. But it had no effect on Wu Song. What had affected him, nearly rocked him to his soul was the hissing sound the tip of his knife made as it circled the eye socket. For a brief moment, he went blind and deaf as the hiss entered his body, encircled his viscera, and took root in the marrow of his bones. It would not leave easily, not then and not later. "The four hundred ninety-eighth cut," he said.

His soldier lay passed out in the dirt. Dozens more soldiers fell headlong to the ground. Wang's eyes lay brightly on the ground, sending gloomy, deathly blue-white rays through the mud that all but covered them as if staring at something. Wu Song knew exactly what they were staring at—it was Chen Wenzhao—and the thought that crowded his mind was: would Chen recall the gaze from those two eyes in his memories of that day?

Wu Song was beyond exhaustion. Not long before this, he had beheaded 6 men of the failed Manichaean religious ban decree, an event that had caused a national, even an international sensation. In appreciation of their great leader's talents in front of his soldiers, he had sharpened the sword named Generalissimo that had become rusty and saw-toothed until it could not cut a hair that fell on it in half. The other 5 men owed their swift, painless deaths to their association with their leader. When he lopped off their heads with Generalissimo, it was lightning fast and he was sure that all they felt when their heads were separated from their bodies was a momentary breath of cool air on their necks. Owing to the speed of decapitation, some of the headless bodies flopped forward, and others jerked upward. The faces all had the appearance of being alive and he believed that long after the heads were rolling in the dirt, clear thoughts continued to swirl inside. After the 6 gentlemen had been dispatched, talk of miracles created by a Board of Punishments executioner swept through the capital. All sorts of fanciful tales relating to the 6 executions passed from mouth to ear. 1 story for instance, related how the headless body of Jiang Gongwang of Muzhou ran up to Excellency Cai Jing, the official in charge of the executions, and slapped him across the face. In another, as it rolled along the ground, the head of Jiang Gongwang intoned a poem in such a loud voice that thousands of witnesses heard it

*

Even an event of this magnitude had failed to tire Grandma Wang and yet on this day in the city of Shandong, the responsibility of carrying out the slicing death on an insignificant old woman had so enervated the pre-eminent executioner of the land that he could barely stand. Even stranger was the fact that he could not keep his hands from feeling as if they were burning up. The nose fell at the 499$^{th}$ cut. By then, nothing emerged from Wang's mouth but bloody froth—no more sounds. Hes head, once supported by a strong, rigid neck, now hung limply to her non-existent breasts. The final cut—the coup de grace—entered Wang's heart, from which black blood the colour and consistency of melted malt sugar slid down the knife blade. The strong smell of that blood once again made Wu nauseous. He cut out a piece of the heart with the tip of his knife and with his head slumped, announced to his feet: "May it please Your Excellency, the five hundredth cut."

While Wu Song, who was already wearing a lighter cangue for the journey after the execution, was performing the execution of Mrs. Wang, one of the former neighbours, Mr. Yao came with the money that had been obtained from selling the things in the house. He left after handing it over to Wu Song. The court now issued an official order and 2 guards were detailed to escort Wu Song and deliver him safely to Mengzhou in accordance with the Governor's instructions. Before they left, the orderly gave Wu Song back his things and returned home. Then Wu Song and his escort set out on the road to Mengzhou. The 2 guards knew very well what a good reputation Wu Song had and they looked after him most attentively, taking good care not to insult him in any way. Since they treated him so well and made no difficulties, Wu Song used the funds he was carrying liberally. At each wayside inn where they stopped he bought food and drink and shared it with them. But enough of this.

The murders had been committed around the beginning of the third month and Wu Song had been in gaol for two months, so it was nearly the sixth month as they travelled towards Mengzhou and the sun was blazing down, weather to roast a stone and melt metal. The only way to travel was in the cool of the early morning. One day when they had been going a little more than three weeks they came to a highway, and at about noon they were on top of a ridge. "Let's not stop here," Wu Song said. "It's better to go down the other side and look for somewhere to buy food and drink."
"Agreed," said the two guards.
They hurried down the hill. Away in the distance they saw a group of thatched cottages under a cliff; and the sign of an inn showed among some willows beside a stream. "Look!" exclaimed Wu Song. "Isn't that an inn?" As they hastened on down they came upon a woodcutter carrying a load of firewood. "Can you tell us what place this is?" Wu Song asked him. "This here be the Mengzhou road," he answered. "And over there, by that wood, see, at the bottom of the hill, that be the famous Crossways Rise."
So Wu Song and his guards pressed on till they reached Crossways Rise, where they found a huge tree, so immense that four or five men together could not have encompassed its girth, all twined about with a mass of withered creepers. A little way beyond this tree was an inn. A woman was sitting outside, beside the window. She wore a green bodice and she had a great many gold pins and rings on her head and wild flowers stuck in her hair. When she saw Wu Song and the guards approaching, she rose to greet them. Her skirt was of bright red silk and her face was thickly rouged and powdered. The bodice was cut low, revealing a peach-coloured gauze undershirt, and it had a row of gold buttons. Here is her picture:
Her lowering brow betrays a fearsome spirit, her eyes gleam with murderous light; her waist is coarse as a pulley block, her arms and legs clumsy as a workman's mallet; her rough skin is thickly daubed with make-up and a double layer of grease-paint reaches to the edge of her matted hair; gold bracelets bind the she-devil's arms, a red skirt reflects her hellish nature.
Leaning against the door, she greeted them: "Come in and rest your feet, gentlemen. We've good wine and good meat here, and good pies too if you've a fancy for them."
Wu Song and the guards entered. The tables and stools were made of cypress wood. The guards put down their batons and took off their packs, and everyone sat down. Wu Song removed his pack and put it on the table. He divested himself of his belt and his cotton shirt. Then the guards said: "There's no one here to see. We'll take it upon ourselves to relieve you of that cangue, so you can enjoy a cup or two of wine more freely." They opened the seals, removed the cangue and put it under the table. Then they too took off their shirts and hung them on the window-sill. The woman now approached and said, with a friendly smile: "How much wine is it to be, gentlemen?"
"No need to ask how much," said Wu Song, "just warm it and bring it, and cut us four or five catties of meat as well. We'll pay for it all together."
"We've also got some lovely pies," the woman said.
"You can bring us twenty or thirty, then, as a snack," said Wu Song.
With a gleeful chuckle the woman disappeared inside and came out holding a big pitcher of wine. She laid three bowls and three sets of chopsticks on the table and then brought two plates of meat. After three or four rounds of wine had been served and drunk without a pause, she returned to the kitchen and brought out a basket of pies which she placed on the table. The two guards began to help themselves. Wu Song took one and opened it up to see what was inside. "What's in them, hostess?" he said. "Human flesh or dog meat or what?"
The woman giggled and said: "You are a caution sir! Where in the wide world would you find pies like that, made with human flesh or dog meat? Our pies have always been made with good buffalo meat."
"Well, I've had many dealings with the rivers and lakes fraternity," said Wu Song, "and I've often heard the saying, 'To the great tree at Crossways Rise what traveller dares to venture? There the fat ones are chopped up for pies, the thin ones go to the bottom of the river.'"
"Wherever did you get that story from, sir? You must be making it up!"
"There are some hairs in this pie meat, and they look to me remarkably like pubic hairs. That's what makes me suspicious."
Wu Song continued his questioning. "How come your husband's not around?" he asked.
"My husband's gone out on business and he isn't back yet."
"So you're all on your own here then," he said.
She smiled to herself. "The bastard's really asking for it, he thinks he can make a pass at me! It's like the moth seeking the flame in which it will perish! No one can say as I'm the one that started it but I'll settle his hash, never fear." Aloud she said: "You oughtn't to pull my leg, sir. Come on, have another bowl or two and then you can go and rest in the shade of the tree. If it's peace and quiet you want, you'll find it in this house and no mistake!"
When Wu Song heard this he thought to himself: "The woman's up to something. I'll play along with her for a bit." Out loud he said: "This wine of yours is a bit thin. If you've got something better, let us try a few cups."
"We've got a really first-rate brew," she said, "but it's a bit cloudy."
"Excellent. The cloudier it comes the better I like it!"
Secretly exulting, she went in and fetched a pitcher of the cloudy wine. Wu Song examined it and said: "Now that's what I call good wine, only it would be better warm."
"You're a real connoisseur, aren't you sir? I'll warm it up and we'll see how you like it then." To herself she was thinking: "It's the poor devil's fate. He even wants it warmed! That'll just make the drug work faster. Played right into my hands, he has!"
When she'd warmed it she brought it back and poured three bowls, saying: "Try this then gentlemen!"
The two guards had no thought of holding back, they attacked the wine with gusto. But Wu Song said: "It's not my custom to drink without food, hostess. Cut us some more of that meat to go with it." He waited till she had gone back inside and then emptied his bowl in a dark corner. Then he smacked his lips and exclaimed: "Ah, now that's good wine! That's a wine that really warms the cockles of the heart!"
Needless to say, the woman had not gone to cut any meat. All she did was take a turn round the house. When she returned, she clapped her hands and cried: "They're going, they're going!" And sure enough, the two guards found the sky was spinning and the earth swaying under their feet, and in a moment, paf! they fell flat on their backs with their mouths open. Wu Song also shut his eyes tight and collapsed beside the bench. He heard the woman say, with a chuckle: "Got you, now, you cheeky twit, you've drunk the water that washed my feet!" Then she shouted: "Number two, number three, in here, double quick!" At this two yokels shambled in and carted the two guards off inside, while the woman went to the table and picked up Wu Song's backpack and the packs belonging to the two guards and felt them carefully. Reckoning that there was some quantity of gold and silver inside, she said delightedly: "That's three good pieces of merchandise I've got us today, that'll easily do for two days' supply of pies. And on top of it there's this!" She took the bags inside and then came back to watch while her two minions tried to move Wu Song. But try as they might they couldn't shift him. Stretched out inert upon the floor, he seemed to weigh a ton. Watching the two of them straining away and unable to move him, she began to curse them: "You feeble buggers, all you know how to do is eat and drink, you're useless! I suppose I shall have to come and lend a hand myself. Well, this ugly great so-and-so thought he was going to make a pass at me. He'll sell as good buffalo meat, the great fat lump! The other two bastards are stringier, they'll only do for water-buffalo. Let's get this one inside, we'll cut him up first." As she was speaking she took off her green bodice and removed the red skirt. Thus stripped for action, she approached Wu Song and lightly heaved him upright. Thereupon Wu Song grasped her firmly, pinning her arms to her sides and pressing her to his chest, while he caught her legs in a scissors grip, using the whole weight of his body to subdue her. She squealed like a pig having its throat cut. Her two assistants were about to come to her aid but Wu Song let out such a roar that they hung back in terror.
The woman was forced to the ground. All she could do was gasp: "Please sir, have mercy!" All the fight had gone out of her. It was a case of:

She thought to drug the tiger beater,
She looked to bake a load of pies:
Only she couldn't take the banter,
Or the true hero recognize.
Now instead of selling the meat,
She squeals like a pig whose throat is slit.

At this moment a man carrying a load of firewood appeared. He put his load down by the door and seeing Wu Song pinning the woman to the ground bounded into the room, shouting: "Easy now! Let her off, sir, please! I'd like a word with you."
Wu Song spun round and put up his fists, keeping his left foot on the woman to hold her down. He looked at the newcomer who was wearing a black silk cap, pinched in at the sides, a white cotton tunic, breeches with knee-guards, hemp shoes and a belt with pouches. His face was craggy, with prominent cheekbones and covered with a ragged stubble. He looked to be about thirty-five.
The man returned Wu Song's stare and with his arms tightly crossed said: "Can I ask your name?"
"I make no secret of it," Wu Song said, "neither on the road nor at home. I am Captain Wu Song."
"You're not the one who killed a tiger on Jingyang Pass, are you?" said the other.
"You've got it!" said Wu Song.
The man bowed and prostrated himself, saying: "I've heard so much about you, what an honour to be able to meet you!"
"Would you happen to be this woman's husband?"
"That I am, and I regret that she couldn't see what was staring her in the face. Please tell me how she has offended you, Captain. I beg you to pardon her, for my honour's sake." It was a case of:

Violence surrenders to a smile;
And manners get the better of ill will;
The good man's truth and manliness, no less
Subdues the jealous spirit of the Ogress.

Seeing the husband's manner was so correct, Wu Song quickly released the woman and asked: "You two are evidently something out of the ordinary. Would you tell me your names?"
The man ordered his wife to get dressed quickly and come and prostrate herself before the Captain.
"I was a little rough just now," Wu Song said, "please forgive me, dear lady."
"No, I've eyes but I couldn't recognize a good man," she said. "I was very wrong, Uncle, please pardon me. And please come inside and sit down."
Wu Song asked again: "What are your names, you two?"
"I am Zhang Qing," the man said, "and I used to be gardener at the Guangming Temple. But I lost my temper in a stupid argument, did in the monks, and burnt the temple down. Seeing as there were no witnesses the police let me alone, so I was able to come here and set up as a highwayman under the big tree. Then one day this old fellow with a carrying-pole comes by, and I thought because of his age I could easily get the better of him. We fought, and after more than twenty passes a blow from his pole knocked me right off my feet. It turned out that in his youth he'd been a famous footpad. Anyway, he saw I was pretty nifty on my feet and he took me back with him to the city, where he taught me all his tricks and even made me a present of this lady, his daughter, so I became his son-in-law. But how can anyone make a living in the city? There was nothing for it, I had to return to my old haunts. I came back here, built a thatched house and started this wineshop. Actually what we do is, we keep an eye out for travellers and merchants. Any likely looking customers, we poison their drink and when they're dead we chop 'em up to sell as buffalo meat. We turn the skinny ones into mince meat for pie fillings. Everyday I take a load round the villages to sell, that's what I do in the daytime. I've a good many connections among the rivers and lakes fraternity and they call me Zhang Qing, the Gardener. And as for this woman of mine, her family name is Sun. She learnt all her father's old tricks and people call her Sister Sun, the Ogress.
"Well, anyway, I heard the missis screaming when I came home just now but I'd never have guessed it meant I was about to meet you here, Captain! I've told her about this you know many a time. 'Sister Sun,' I said, 'there's three kinds of people you should never touch. The first are those monks, what they call the wandering monks. In the first place they're not much good to us anyway, and secondly, they're people who've renounced the world.' And you know, we nearly did do one of the buggers in the other day, an incredibly powerful fellow, used to be commandant under the orders of old Marshal Zhang of Yanan district. Lu Da his name used to be, he had some trouble over killing a certain Master of Guanxi with three blows of his fist and had to flee to Mount Wu Tai, shave his head and become a monk. Because he's got tattoos all over his back the rivers and lakes folk know him as the Flowery Monk, Lu Zhishen. He's got a solid steel staff, you know, that weighs a good sixty catties. Well, when he came through here, my old lady, she thought he looked good and fat so she chucked the drug in his drink and carted him off to the workshop. She was just about to start carving him up when I came home, thank God! The moment I clapped eyes on that incredible staff of his, I gave him the antidote, pronto. After that I paid him my respects and we became brothers like. They do say he's recently seized the Temple of the Precious Pearl on Twin Dragon Peak and fortified himself there, together with some fellow they call Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast. I've had letters from him inviting me to join him but I haven't been able to make it yet."
"Yes, I've often heard about those two among the rivers and lakes," Wu Song said.
"Now the thing I really do regret is, there was one of those shaven-pates, giant of a man he was, that really did come to grief here. I came back just a bit too late, she'd already got the arms and legs off. All that's left to show for him now's one of those iron circlets monks have, a black cassock and his monk's certificate. Nothing much in any of that, you'd say. But there was these two remarkable objects he had with him. One was this rosary made of little skulls, a hundred and eight of them all told. The other was a pair of monk's swords, made of the purest white steel. I reckon that old monk had accounted for quite a few men in his time, because, do you know, even now you'll hear a strange moaning out of those swords in the middle of the night! I'm really sorry I didn't get back in time to save that man! I often think of him.
"Well, as I was saying, I told the missis, 'The second kind you mustn't touch is those young performing women who wander the rivers and lakes. They're on the go all the time, moving from one province to the next, giving performances, and it's really tough for them to make a living. If you meddle with one of them, the word'll get round, and they'll proclaim it from the stage that us daredevils of the rivers and lakes aren't gentlemen at all.' That's what I told the wife, see. And I said to her, 'There's a third kind you must leave alone, that's the convicts and escorted prisoners, there's plenty of good fellows among them, you don't want to harm them.' I never dreamed she would disobey my instructions like this and give offence to you, Captain. Lucky I came back a bit early. Sister Sun, whatever gave you such an idea?"
"I didn't mean to do anything," the Ogress replied. "But I could see the gentleman's bag was well stuffed, and besides, I was annoyed because he made an improper suggestion, that's what made me do it."
"Cutting off heads and wading in blood is more in my line, I don't go around insulting ladies," said Wu Song. "But I just happened to notice you were showing a lot of interest in our bags. I got suspicious, so I said something a bit suggestive on purpose to encourage you to show your hand. I poured that bowl of wine away and pretended to be drugged until you tried to move me. Then I grabbed you, and even thumped you. I'm afraid my dear lady, I do beg you to forgive me."
The Gardener became very jovial. He invited Wu Song to step inside and be their guest. Wu Song said, "Won't you first rescue the guards, Brother?" The Gardener led him into the workshop, where a number of human skins were stretched on the walls and from the beams hung five or six human legs. The two guards had been flung down on the carving block. "Please release them now, Brother," Wu Song said.
"Can I ask what your crime was? And where you were being sent to?"
Wu Song recounted how he had killed his sister-in-law and her lover, omitting no detail, while the Gardener and his wife made no secret of their admiration. At the end of it, Zhang said: "I'd like to make a suggestion, if you'll let me?"
"Please, speak frankly." Wu Song said. The Gardener then slowly unfolded his idea. There were to be important consequences for Wu Song:

He'll kick up a row in the town of Mengzhou,
And create quite stir in the Fortress of Peace.

Truly, he was the kind that can ...

Throw down an elephant, vanquish a buffalo,
Lay hands on a dragon or capture a tiger.

Wu Song spoke to the 4 neighbours, "I have revenged my brother's injury and I should feel no resentment if I had to die for it. I am sorry for having frightened you. I must leave now but I do not know whether I shall live or die. I had better now get my brother's mourning curtain burnt. I however want you to sell all the furniture here, as I can make use of the money in the yamen when the case comes up. But whether the case is taken seriously or lightly I hope that you will be my witnesses and speak only the whole truth." He then took his brother's tablet and burnt it. Upstairs were two boxes which were accordingly brought below, and opened, and he requested the neighbours to sell the contents. He then took the heads, and escorted Grandma Wang to the yamen. The news of the murder had spread all over the town so that the streets were crowded with people. When the magistrate heard about the murder he was surprised, and got ready to hear the case.
Upon Wu Song entering the court with Grandma Wang under arrest, he knelt down in front of the bench, and placed the two heads and his sword just below the steps leading to the bench. He knelt on the left, Grandma Wang in the centre and the four neighbours on the right. Wu Song took the signed document from his breast, and read it all out. The magistrate instructed the clerk of the court to cross-examine Grandma Wang, and her evidence agreed with the document. The four neighbours, and also He Jiushu, and the boy Yun Ge, who had also entered, gave their evidence quite straightforwardly. The magistrate then deputed an officer to go with the coroner, and take all the persons concerned to the house on the Zishi Street and make a careful investigation there. They went to Wu the Elder's house and afterwards to the wine shop near the Shizi Bridge, and examined the bodies of Pan Jinlian and Ximen Qing. All the details were recorded and, upon their return to the yamen the same were duly reported to the magistrate. That official then ordered that large cangues be put on Wu Song and also Grandma Wang, and that they be both sent to the jail, while the witnesses were to be detained in the waiting room near the entrance.
Seeing that Wu Song had been moved by his righteous spirit, and that he had done the business in the capital in a proper manner, the magistrate wished to save him from the trouble. So he consulted with his secretary. "From the evidences I see that Wu Song acted from a keen sense of justice so I want you to rewrite those documents to the effect that as Wu Song was paying homage to his late elder brother's memorial tablet Pan Jinlian not only refused to let him worship but knocked over the sacrificial table. Because of this Wu Song was very angry, and attacked her and in his passion he killed her. Also that Ximen Qing was a lover of Pan Jinlian and when he heard of this he took the opportunity of meeting Wu Song near the Shizi Bridge, and there they fought. And in this fight Wu Song killed his opponent."
The secretary did this, and read the new documents to both the prisoners and the witnesses also who were then sent to the Prefect with a dispatch asking him to give judgment.
Now Yanggu County was only a small place but the inhabitants were upright so that many subscribed money to present to Wu Song, while others sent wine and food to him in prison. Before his departure, he was allowed to go to his quarters and pack up his things, and place them in charge of his orderlies. He also sent about twelve taels of silver to Yun Ge's old father. His soldiers even sent him food and wine as presents.
The yamen officials took the necessary dispatches, and then sent them with the prisoners and witnesses to Dongping Prefecture. Upon reaching that place they found large crowds around the entrance to the yamen. The Prefect having been informed of the affair took his seat on the bench. The Prefect Chen Wenzhao was a very intelligent official, and after reading the dispatches and cross-examining the witnesses he had the bones, dagger, and other material evidences sealed up and locked up in the storeroom. He ordered that Wu Song's cangue should be replaced by a much lighter one, and that he be remanded to prison. But on the other hand he ordered that Grandma Wang should have a much heavier cangue fastened round her neck, and that she be sent to the prison where criminals were awaiting execution. He then told the official from Yanggu County that he could return, and that the witnesses also could return to their homes. The wife of Ximen Qing had also come to watch affairs, and she was ordered to remain in the Prefect's yamen until the Imperial authorities' decision was known.
Prefect Chen knew that Wu Song was a righteous and honest man, and from time to time he deputed men to look after him. For the same reason the jailers gave him food and wine without asking for any money.

The Prefect in making his report to the Provincial Governor made the case as trivial as possible. He then dispatched a confidential clerk to the capital with private letters, with instructions to arrange for the case to be settled. The official in charge of the Imperial Board of Punishments was on good terms with the Prefect Chen Wenzhao, and he talked the case over with the Provincial Governor: Regarding Grandma Wang she had beguiled them to commit adultery, and had instigated Pan Jinlian to poison her husband. She had told Pan Jinlian to send Wu Song away so that he could not sacrifice to his elder brother's spirit, and that was why he had killed Pan Jinlian. Grandma Wang had interfered between husband and wife, upsetting the harmony of married life, and should therefore suffer death by being sliced to death. [20] Regarding Wu Song—he had killed the adulterer Ximen Qing out of revenge for his brother's death but he could not be acquitted for his crime. He should be beaten forty times with the bamboo and then banished to the frontier. Both the adulterer and the adulteress had committed a grievous crime, and they deserved their deaths. The witnesses should all be allowed to return to their homes. The Provincial Governor wrote a judgment in accordance with the above, and dispatched it to the Prefect, and the latter carried out the sentence accordingly.

Grandma Wang was brought from her cell to hear her fate. The reason for execution was written on a signboard and she was made to sign her acknowledgement. She was then seated on a wooden frame known as the "donkey," tied to it with three ropes and had four nails hammered through her limbs to the frame. The Prefect gave the order to slice her, and she was paraded through the streets to the pounding of drums and the crash of gongs. Carried by bearers, with the signboard in front and with a pair of sharp swords raised high and with a bunch of paper flowers, she was taken to the square in the centre of Dongping market square where she was sliced to death.

Wu Song was beaten with forty strokes but the jailer saw to it that only six or seven blows actually broke the skin. He was branded on the face, and sent to the prison at Mengzhou. He was escorted by 2 men who treated him well on the road, as they knew that he was a good man. Wu Song saw that they were taking care of him, so he did not find fault with them. He had silver and gold in his bundle from the sale of his possessions by the neighbour Yao Wenqing, and when they stopped at inns in village on the way, he paid all the expenses out of his purse. He had committed the murder at the beginning of the third month, after remaining under arrest for more than two months, it was now about the middle of the year, and the blazing sun was hot enough even to melt the gold in the quartz. Therefore, they always walked during the early morning when it was a little cool. After about twenty days on the way the three men got on a big road which took them over a mountain range. When they had reached the top of the pass it was about 10 A.M., and as they were all tired Wu Song told his escort to take it easily, and to have a drink at the first inn when they got down the hill. They agreed to this, and hurried down the hill. They soon saw in the distance a hillock with a number of straw huts on it. There were some willow trees by the side of a stream, and flying from the top branches was a wine-shop flag. They all hurried their steps down the road, and when they were near the bottom, they met a woodcutter carrying a bundle of firewood.

Wu Song asked him what was the name of that place, and the man replied that it was called the Cross Road. When they reached the village they saw a gigantic tree with a trunk that five men could not have encircled, and hanging from it were dead creepers that had twined round its branches. A few steps away from the tree was an inn, and a woman was sitting inside near an open window. Her coat was of green gauze, and in her hair was a golden-coloured hairpin. At both of her temples were flowers in the hair. When she saw the three men arriving, she got up to receive them at the door. They then saw that her short skirt was of brilliant red silk, and that she had red and white powder on her face. Her dress was open exposing an inner pink cotton waist belt. On her dress were golden buttons. She welcomed them, saying, "Guests, please come inside and take rest. We have good wine, good meat, and excellent refreshment." The three men entered and sat down. The tables and stools were made of cedar wood. Wu Song took off his bundle, and placed it on the table. He removed his belt and outer garments, and put them in the same place.

The two soldiers saw that there was no man about to see what they were doing, and so they removed the cangue from Wu Song's neck, and placed it under the table. They then also removed their outer garments, and placed them on the windowsill.

Now the woman with a smiling face, asked how much wine they wanted. "You need not ask how much," replied Wu Song. "You just keep on bringing it, and also bring about five jin of meat. I will pay you when we have finished."

"We have also very good dumplings."

"Then bring us about forty."

She gladly went inside and soon brought out a large jar of wine, with three large cups, three pairs of chopsticks, two dishes of meat, and a basket of dumplings. The two soldiers partook of the meal but Wu Song took one dumpling and opening it looked inside and called out, "Is this human flesh, or dog's flesh?"

The woman laughed, and replied, "Please do not make me laugh so much. In this peaceful empire and general tranquillity how could there be human flesh, or dog's flesh in the dumplings. In our house we have never put anything in dumplings except beef."

"I have travelled extensively," replied Wu Song, "and I have heard that very few people dare pass the tree at this Cross Road, that fat men are cut up for making the dumplings, whereas thin men are just killed and used for filling up the river."

"Where did you hear that nonsense? It must be your own fabrication."

"I see human hair in this dumpling, that look a lot like pubic hair, so I still have my doubts. How is it that there is no man in this place?"

"My husband has gone to visit a friend and has not returned yet" she replied.

"Then you must feel lonely in this dismal place."

She laughed at this, and said to herself. "Is this exile not to find death? He likes to flirt with me! You are really the moth that flies into flame only to get yourself burnt to death. I would not make trouble with you but now I have a plan to deal with you." So she replied, "Don't try to flirt with me. Drink your wine, and then go and cool yourself under the tree. Or if you want to rest, you can rest in the inn."

When Wu Song heard this he came to the conclusion that the woman had some bad intention and he decided to put her to the test. So he remarked, "Woman, this wine is rather weak. If you have better wine let us have it."

"I have excellent wine with a lovely taste but it does not look quite clear."

"Splendid! The duller it is the better."

The woman was laughing at this in secret and going inside she took out a jug of dark coloured wine on a tray. Seeing this, Wu Song said, "This is really good wine but it would taste better when warmed." The woman said, "This gentleman is indeed an experienced drinker; I will warm it for you." Laughingly she added to herself, "That banished thief ought to die now, as he wishes to drink hot wine which will make the medicine soon produce the desired effect. That fellow will soon be in my hands." When the wine was warmed she took it in, and poured out three cups full. Laughingly she said, "Gentlemen, please try this wine."

How could those two soldiers restrain their thirst? They fell to the wine immediately. Wu Song said, "I am not used to drinking pure wine. Please bring us some meat to eat with this wine." When the woman had gone to do this, he scattered the wine on the floor in a place where it could not be seen, and then making the sound of drinking, he said, "What good wine! It certainly has a 'kick' in it."

But the woman had not gone to bring the meat, and just then returning she clapped her hands and called out, "At last! At last!" when she saw that the two soldiers who had drunk the wine had fallen backwards with tightly closed mouths. Wu Song then closed his eyes, and intentionally fell off his stool, and he heard the woman laugh and say, "That's all right! I am not afraid of you cunning devils now that you have drunk the water in which I washed my feet. Come, Small Two and Small Three!" He then heard two stupid fellows rush in, and seize the two soldiers and carry them into the inner room. The woman came and took the bundles and belts lying on the table. She felt the silver inside, and laughingly said, "I have got three men today so that I shall be able to make plenty of dumplings; I get plenty of booty too!" She took the belts and bundles away, and upon returning she ordered the two stupid fools to carry Wu Song inside also. But Wu Song lay rigidly flat on the ground so that they could not move him. The woman seeing this abused them, "What stupid clowns! You eat and drink but are of no use for anything else! Do you expect me to pick him up? Does this big fellow expect to play with me? Such stout flesh will sell as yellow beef but those two soldiers are so thin that they can only be put to vend as water-buffalo beef. But we must carry this man inside as I will kill him first." So saying she took off her coat of green gauze and skirt of red silk so that she was entirely naked above the waist, and she took hold of Wu Song to lift him up. But as she stooped down Wu Song embraced her, and pressed her to his breast. He twined both his legs round the lower part of her body, and held her tight. She squealed like a pig going to be slaughtered. The two fellows were on the point of coming to her assistance but Wu Song shouted at them in such a loud voice that they could not move. The woman feeling helpless called out, "Sir, please forgive me!" But he would not release her. Just then he saw a man set down a load of firewood at the door, to rest a while. When he saw the pair on the floor he sprang forward and said, "Sir, restrain your anger! Forgive her, and I will say something to you," At this Wu Song got up, planted his left foot on the woman, and placed himself on the defensive with his two fists ready. He saw that the man was wearing a black crape cap, a white coat, puttees round his legs, hempen sandals; a money purse was round his waist and his cheek bones were prominent. He had a small beard; and appeared to be about thirty-five years of age. He clasped his hands over his heart, and addressed Wu Song, "May I inquire what is your name?"

"Whether I travel or stay at home I do not change my name, I am Drill Instructor Wu Song."

"So are you the man who killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge?"

"Certainly."

The man knelt down, and kowtowed saying, "I have heard of your fame for a long time, and today I fortunately meet you."

"Are you the husband of this woman?"

"Yes, I am sorry that I did not recognize you. I do not know how my wife offended you but I hope that you will forgive her."

Wu Song lifted the woman up and said, "I see that you two, husband and wife, are not average people. What is your name?"

The woman went and put on her dress again and then came and kowtowed to Wu Song who said to her, "Excuse my intrusion! Please do not blame me!"

"I did not notice that you are a fine man. It was my mistake of a moment. I hope that you will forgive me. I request you to come inside and take a seat."

"But what is your name, and how do you get to know my name?"

"My name is Zhang Qing," said the man, and previously I was in charge of the vegetable garden of the Guangming Monastery near here. At one time in a fit of temper I killed the monks, and burnt down the monastery. After that I had no enemies, and as the officials did not come here to investigate the matter I started business as a highwayman. One day an old man passed here carrying a load of fuel, and I attacked him. We had about twenty bouts but at last that old man knocked me down. In fact, that man had himself been a highwayman some time before, and he took me to his home in the town and there taught me all the tricks of the trade. While there he induced me to marry this woman who was his daughter. But I did not care to live in the town so I came here, erected this house, and opened it as an inn. But in fact I am on the lookout for the rich people to intoxicate them with a drug and when they are unconscious I cut off their flesh, and sell it as beef, and mince the smaller bits to put inside the dumplings. Everyday I take the flesh to the village for sale, and this has been going on for a long time. I am on intimate terms with many brigands, and they call me Market Gardener Zhang Qing. My wife has the surname Sun but people always call her, 'Sun the Night Witch.' Upon returning to my home just now I heard my wife shrieking but did not expect to meet you Drill Instructor. I have repeatedly told my wife that there were three types of men whom she must not harm. First—traveling monks: they lead a thrifty life, and moreover are homeless, how can we harm such poor people? Once we nearly destroyed a celebrated man. This was Major Lu Da who was in the army of the General Old Zhong at Yanan Prefecture, and who killed the butcher Zheng Guanxi, and became a monk at Mount Wutai. He had figures tattooed on his back, and is therefore known by brigands and others as the 'Tattooed Monk' Lu Da Zhishen. He carried an iron monk staff of sixty jin weight, and passed here at one time. My wife seeing that he was a big man and very stout, put a drug in his wine, and was going to have him carried into the next room to be killed when I just arrived. I at once saw by the huge staff who he was, and administered a counter-remedy so that he recovered, and I adopted him as my elder brother. I have heard that he is now at the Baozhu Monastery on the Lianglong Mountain with Yang Zhi, the 'Blue Faced Brute,' where they act as brigands. He has written me many letters inviting me to go and join them but so far I have not been able to go."

"I've often heard of the fame of those two men," said Wu Song.

"My wife drugged another monk. What a pity that a giant monk should have died! I came back too late when his legs and arms had been cut off. But I kept his iron crown, his monk's gown, and his monk's certificate. But these are of no importance when compared with the two other things I have kept. I have his string of beads made from the bones of the one hundred and eight skulls, and also his two wonderful broad swords. Because of these things I think that monk must have killed a good many people and even now his sword makes a hissing sound in the night. I was sorry that I could not save his life, and I often still think of him. Secondly, there are the journeying prostitutes who wander about from place to place, and carefully adapt themselves to the company they meet. Their money is hard earned, if we kill them then many people are bound to get to know about it, and we should have the reputation of not being very brave men. So I instructed my wife not to kill such women. Thirdly, there are the banished prisoners among whom there are often very fine men and they also must not be killed. I never thought that my wife would not pay attention to what I said, and so she commit the fault of seizing you Drill Instructor, and fortunately I came back in time to save your life." Turning to his wife he asked, "How is it that you had such an idea today?"

"At first I did not intend to hurt this man," said the Night Witch. "But I saw that he had a very heavy bundle, and also he talked as though he had the intention of flirting with me."

"I killed vile people and shed their blood," said Wu Song, "so how could I dally with an honest woman? I saw that you were taking a keen interest in my bundle, so I became suspicious, and intentionally spoke lightly so that you would think I should easily fall into your hands. I poured the wine on the ground, and pretended to be poisoned, and you quickly came and seized hold of me. So I took hold of you at the same time. I hope that you'll pardon me."

Upon hearing this Zhang Qing burst into loud laughter, and then invited Wu Song to come and sit down in an inner room. Wu Song however asked that his escort should be released. Upon going into the kitchen where men's flesh was prepared, he saw men's skin stretched out on the walls. Hanging from the rafters were several men's legs, and the two soldiers were stretched out on a bench.

Wu Song said, "Brother, please enable these two men to get up."

"What's your crime and to what place are you going?" asked Zhang Qing.

Wu Song then told him in detail how he had killed both Ximen Qing and Pan Jinlian. Both Zhang Qing and his wife were pleased upon hearing the details, and the former said, "I'd like to tell you something but I wonder if you'd like to listen to it." Wu Song asked him to proceed and Zhang Qing spoke slowly and deliberately. A man with strength of elephant's defeated by the tiger-slayer.

126

Wu Song cuts a dash in the Fortress of Peace, Astonishes the Prisoners, & hi s Prestige Shakes Anping Stockade; The Young Master's ousted from Happy Woods, the Kuaihuo Forest Is Restored to Shi En, & he Retakes Happy Grove

"It's not that I'm a wicked man," said Zhang Qing, "but wouldn't it be better instead of suffering hardships in prison, to knock off these two guards and stay here for a time? If you want to head for the hills, I'll take you to Precious Pearl Monastery on Twin-Dragon Mountain and you can join up with Lu Zhishen. How about it?"

"That's very considerate of you, brother. There's just one thing: All my life I've fought only tough rogues. These guards have been very kind to me all along the road. If I kill them, Heaven will not forgive me. Save them, if you respect me. Don't do them any harm."

"Since you're so chivalrous, Constable, I'll bring them round."

Zhang Qing had his men remove the guards from the chopping block, and his wife concocted a brew. Pulling the guards' ears, Zhang poured the medicine down their throats. Before long, they awakened as if from a dream and crawled to their feet. They looked at Wu Song. "How did we get so drunk? That certainly is fine wine! We didn't drink much, but we really got sozzled. We must remember this place, and stop here for some more on the way back."Wu Song laughed, and Zhang and his wife chuckled. The guards were mystified.

The two assistants slaughtered chickens and geese, cooked a meal, and laid a table with cups and platters. Zhang told them to put it in the rear garden beneath the grape arbor, where he invited Wu Song and the guards to be seated. Wu Song had the guards sit at the head of the table. He and Zhang sat opposite. The wife sat at the side. The assistants kept pouring wine and bringing platters of food.

Zhang drank with Wu Song until dark. He showed the constable the pair of knives. They were indeed of the finest steel, and obviously hadn't been made in a day. The two spoke of feats of good fellows in the gallant fraternity, of deeds of murder and arson.

"Song Jiang of Shandong, or Timely Rain as he's called, is a loyal, generous man of magnificent courage," said Wu Song. "Because of something that's happened, he also had to take refuge in Lord Chai's manor."

When the guards heard who their prisoner's friends were, they grew petrified with fear. Dropping to their knees, they kowtowed.

"I've put you two to the trouble of bringing me this far," said Wu Song. "Would I have let you do that if I intended to kill you? No need to fear when I talk of the gallant fraternity. I've never harmed a good person. Just relax and drink your wine. Tomorrow, when we get to Mengzhou, I'll show my appreciation to you both."

That night, all rested in Zhang Qing's home.

The next day Wu Song wanted to leave, but Zhang Qing wouldn't hear of it. He entertained him for three days in succession. Wu Song was very grateful. The two pledged each other as blood brothers, with Wu Song as the younger, since Zhang was nine years his senior.

Finally, Wu Song took his departure. Zhang gave him a farewell drinking party, then returned his luggage, pack and purse, presented him with ten ounces of silver, and handed two or three silver pieces to the guards. Wu Song gave his ten ounces to the guards as well. He put on his cangue, which again was sealed. Zhang and his wife walked with him to the gate. Wu Song said goodbye with tears in his eyes and set off for Mengzhou.

He and the guards reached the town before noon. They went to the prefectural court and presented the documents from Dongping Prefecture. The prefect read them, accepted charge of Wu Song, wrote a receipt of prisoner for the guards and told them to return. Of them we'll say no more.

Wu Song was taken to the prison. Above the entrance was a plaque, with the words: "Anping Stockade." The local guards put him in a room by himself, turned over his papers and got a receipt. No more need be said of that.

A dozen or so ordinary prisoners came over. "If you have a letter of introduction or any silver in your pack, good fellow," they said, "take them out, and when the head keeper comes, give them to him. Then they'll go easy on you when they give you the Spirit-Breaking Beating. It'll be cruel if you have no present for him. We're ordinary prisoners like yourself. That's why we're letting you know. 'When the rabbit dies, the fox mourns. All are of the same animal kingdom.' You're new here. We were afraid you might not have heard."

"Thank you for telling me. I happen to have a few things with me. If he asks me nicely, I'll give him some. If he acts tough, I won't give him a penny!"

"Don't talk like that," cried the prisoners. "You know the old sayings: 'Fear not the authorities—except those that have authority over you!' and 'Neath a low-eaved roof who dares raise his head?' It's better to be careful!"

Before they had finished speaking, someone said: "Here comes the head keeper!" They all scattered.

Wu Song opened his pack and sat waiting in his room. The man entered the building and inquired: "Which one of you is the new prisoner?"

"I am, sir," said Wu Song.

"You've got eyes, haven't you? Why must you wait for me to ask? I hear you're the man who beat the tiger to death on Jingyang Ridge and was a constable in Yanggu County. I thought you'd know a thing or two. How can you be so dull-witted? In this place of mine, here, you'd better not hit so much as a cat!"

"All this talk is because you want me to give you a present, I suppose? Not half a penny! Maybe you'd like a taste of my fine two fists? I've got money, but I'm keeping that to buy myself wine. What are you going to do about it? If you don't like it, you can sent me back to Yanggu County!"

The head keeper stamped off in a rage. Once more the other prisoners crowded around.

"You shouldn't have talked back to him," they exclaimed. "Now you're going to suffer. He'll tell the warden, and you'll surely be killed!"

"I'm not afraid. He can do what he likes. I'll be civilized if he will. If it's battle he wants, I'll give it to him."

Just then three or four guards came and shouted for the new prisoner.

"Here is your lord," said Wu Song. "I haven't left. What are you yelling about?"

The guards escorted him to the examination room, where the warden was formally seated. Half a dozen soldiers pushed Wu Song forward. The warden directed them to remove the cangue.

"Prisoner, know this," he said. "The Emperor of Military Virtue, first emperor of Song, decreed that all exiles, when they first arrive, shall be beaten a hundred blows to break their spirit. Guards, hold him prone!"

"Don't move, not one of you! If you want to beat me, go ahead. No one need hold me. If I dodge one blow, I'm no true man. You can start all over from the beginning. I'm not the courageous fellow from Yanggu County if I utter a single cry."

The onlookers laughed. "That lunatic wants to die. We'll see how much he can take!"

"Hit hard. Merciful blows only annoy me."

This remark provoked more laughter from the people on both sides of the room. Just then a young man standing beside the warden whispered something in the official's ear. Of average height, he was about twenty-five, with a fair complexion, a mustache and goatee. A white kerchief bound his head, and he wore a black silk tunic. One hand was bandaged with white silk strips.
The warden addressed the prisoner: "Wu Song, were you ill during your journey here?"
"No, I drank wine, I ate meat and rice, and I walked without falter."
"This scoundrel was sick on the way," the warden announced. "I can see from his complexion that he's just recovered. We'll put the beating off for the time being."
"Say you were ill, quick," the beaters on either side of Wu Song whispered. "The warden is giving you a break! Say you were sick and be done with it!"
"I wasn't sick. I wasn't! Beat me. Get it over with. Let's have no delays. I don't want deferred payments that you can collect at any time!"
Again the onlookers laughed, and the warden joined them.
"Not only were you ill, but you must be still running a high fever to talk so deliriously! Pay no attention to him. Guards, take him back to the single room."
Three soldiers returned Wu Song to his quarters. The prisoners all hurried over to question him. "Did you bring a letter from some good friend of the warden?"
"Not I."
"Then postponing the beating is not a good sign. Tonight, they'll certainly finish you off!"
"How?"
"In the evening they'll bring you two bowls of dry brown rice. When you're full, they'll take you to an earthen dungeon, tie you, roll you up in a straw mat, stuff your seven openings, and put you, head down, against the wall. In less than half a watch you'll be dead. That's called the 'upside down bowl' method."
"Is that their only way?"
"Another is also to tie you up, then put a huge sack of sand on you. You're finished in less than a watch. That's called the 'sack of earth' method."
"What else do they do?"
"Those two are the most frightful. The others aren't so bad."
Just then an army man entered with a hamper. "Which one is the new prisoner Constable Wu?" he asked.
"I am," said Wu Song. "What's on your mind?"
"The warden told me to bring you this snack."
Wu Song looked. There was a measure of wine, a platter of meat, another of noodles, and a large bowl of broth. "Does this mean they're going to work on me when I've finished?" he wondered. "I'll eat first and think about that later!"
He drained the wine at one go, then he ate all the meat and noodles. The man collected the dishes and left. Wu Song sat musing in his room. He laughed coldly. "Let's see what they're going to try!"
At dusk, the man came again with the hamper.
"What do you want?" asked Wu Song.
"I was told to bring your evening meal," the man replied. He laid out several vegetable dishes, another large measure of wine, a big platter of fried meat, a bowl of fish soup, and a large bowl of rice.
"They're sure to kill me after I've finished this," Wu Song said to himself. "Let them! At least I'll be a well fed ghost! Eat first, and decide what to do later!"
Wu Song consumed the meal. The man collected the dishes and departed. Not long after, he returned with another fellow. One carried a bathtub, the other a bucket of hot water.
"Your bath is ready, Constable," they said.
"Will they strike after I've bathed?" Wu Song wondered. "Who cares! I'll have a good wash first!"
The men poured the water into the tub, and Wu Song jumped in and scrubbed. When he was through, they handed him a large towel. He dried himself and put on his clothes. One man spilled out the water and went off with the tub. The other hung up mosquito netting and laid a rattan mat and a woven bamboo pillow on his bed, for coolness. He said good night and departed.
Wu Song closed and bolted the door of his room. "What is all this, anyhow?" he thought. "It's up to them. We'll see what we shall see!"
He lay down and slept. Nothing happened that night.
He rose at dawn and opened the door. The man who had come the previous night again arrived with a bucket of hot water. After Wu Song had washed his face and rinsed his mouth, a man came and combed his hair with a fine comb, piled it in a neat knot on the top of his head, and bound it with a kerchief. Another man brought a hamper, from which he extracted a vegetable dish, a large bowl of meat broth, and a big bowl of rice.
"Whatever you may be up to," Wu Song thought. "I'm going to eat!"
When he was through, they served him a cup of tea. Only when he had finished that, did the man who brought the food speak.
"This place isn't very comfortable. If the constable would move to that room, there, we could give better service."
"Here it comes!" Wu Song thought. "I'll go with you and see what happens!"
One man gathered Wu Song's belongings and bedding. The other led him to a room nearer the front and pushed open the door. Inside was a spotlessly clean bed, and a newly placed table and stools. Wu Song entered.
"I thought they were taking me to the earthen dungeon, and instead they bring me here," he mused. "This is much better than that other room."
He sat alone and rested till noon. Again the man came with the hamper and a pitcher of wine. He took out four kinds of fruit, a cooked chicken, and many steamed rolls. He segmented the tender chicken, poured the wine, and invited the constable to tuck in.
"What's going on here?" Wu Song wondered.
In the evening there was another large meal, followed by a bath and relaxation in the cool air. "I believed what those prisoners told me. Why am I being treated so well?" he said to himself.
Food and wine were delivered as usual on the morning of the third day. After breakfast, Wu Song strolled around the stockade grounds. Prisoners were carrying water, chopping kindling, and doing various odd jobs neath the open sky. It was the middle of summer, but they had no place to avoid the heat.
Hands clasped behind his back, Wu Song asked: "Why are you working in the broiling sun?"
The prisoners laughed grimly. "For us this is Heaven," they said. "Who would dare hope for shade and a chance to sit down! There are others who weren't able to pay any bribes. They're locked in the big dungeon, more dead than alive, spending their days in heavy chains!"
Wu Song made a circuit of the prison temple. Beside an urn for burning written prayers was a huge stone with a hole in the middle that was used on occasion as a base for a flagpole. Wu Song sat down on it for a while, then returned to his room. He was sitting there, thinking, when the man came again with meat and wine.
But enough of idle chatter. Wu Song had been in the new room for several days, during which time he was continually wined and dined, with no sign of anyone wanting to harm him. He was quite puzzled. When the man brought his meal at noon and put down the hamper, Wu Song could restrain himself no longer. He put his hand on the hamper.
"Whose household are you from?" he demanded. "Why do you keep serving me food and wine?"
"I told you the other day, Constable. I'm a trusted servant in the home of the warden."
"Who, specifically, instructs you to bring these meals? What do they oblige me to do?"
"I'm acting on orders of the warden's son."
"I'm a prisoner, a criminal. I haven't done a thing to benefit him. Why should the warden's son send me food?"
"I wouldn't know that, sir. My instructions were to deliver meals and not say anything for three to six months."
"Very peculiar," Wu Song said. "Are you trying to make me soft and fat, and then finish me off? I can't figure it out. If I don't know what's behind this food and wine, I can't consume them in peace. What sort of person is the warden's son? Where did he meet me? Unless you tell me, I won't eat his meals."
"Do you remember the man in the examination hall with the white head kerchief and the bandaged right hand, the day you first arrived? That was the warden's son."
"He wore a black tunic and stood beside the warden?"
"That's right."
"Was he the one who saved me from the Spirit-Breaking Beating, then?"
"That's right."
"Strange! I'm from Qinghe County, he's from Mengzhou. We've never met before. Why is he treating me so well? There has to be a reason. I must ask you. What's his name?"
"Shi En. He's skilled with fists and staves, and everyone calls him Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub."
"Sounds like a good man. Ask him to come. If he's willing to meet me, I'll eat your food. If not, I won't touch a morsel!"
"He instructed me not to give you any details, and not to talk about a meeting until three months to half a year had passed."
"Nonsense! Ask him to come and see me."
The servant was scared, and very reluctant. But Wu Song grew angry, so he had no choice but to comply.
Shi En hastened over. He dropped at Wu Song's feet and kowtowed. The constable at once returned the courtesy.
"I am a prisoner, under your rule," said Wu Song. "I have never had the honor of knowing you. Yet you saved me from a beating the other day, and now you sent me food and drink. It's really not right. And you haven't asked me to do a single thing. Such unmerited kindness disturbs my sleep and spoils my appetite."
"Elder brother's fame has long thundered in my ears. I hated the long distance that separated us. Today we meet at last. I wanted to pay my respects earlier, but I had no suitable gifts, and I was ashamed. I dared not call on you."
"Your servant said you didn't want to speak to me until after three months to half a year. What did you want to see me about?"
"That rustic has no tact. He shouldn't have said anything."
"Must you give me this ceremonious palaver? You've got me bursting with curiosity. What exactly do you want with me?"
"Since my servant has already spoken, I might as well tell you. Because you are a big hero, a real man, there is something I must beg of you. Only you can do it. I didn't want to ask you right away, since you've travelled a long distance to get here. I thought I'd give you a few months to regain your strength."
Wu Song laughed heartily. "Last year, after a three-month bout of malaria, I got drunk and fought a big tiger on Jingyang Ridge. With three punches and two kicks I killed it. What couldn't I do today!"
"I don't think I'd better speak yet. Recuperate a little longer. When you've completely recovered, I'll tell you the whole story."
"You mean I haven't got my strength back? All right. How heavy is that big stone in front of the temple?"
"Probably four or five hundred catties."
"Let's take a look. I wonder whether I can move it."
"Please have some wine first."
"There'll be time enough for that when we come back."
The two men walked to the temple. The prisoners on the grounds bowed and hailed them respectfully. Wu Song shook the stone slightly. He laughed.
"This soft life is spoiling me. I'll never be able to pick it up!"
"You shouldn't scoff," said Shi En. "That stone weighs four or five hundred catties!"
Wu Song grinned. "You really think I can't lift it? Get back, you men, and watch this."
He slipped off his tunic and tied the sleeves around his waist. Embracing the stone, he raised it easily, then tossed it away with both hands. It dropped with a thud, sinking a foot into the earth. The watching prisoners were astonished.
Wu Song grasped the stone with his right hand and lifted. With a sudden twist, he flung it upwards. It sailed ten feet into the air. He caught it in both hands as it came down and lightly put it back in its original place. He turned and looked at Shi En and the prisoners. His face wasn't flushed, he wasn't even breathing hard, his heart beat calmly.
Shi En threw his arms around him, then kowtowed. "Fantastic, brother! Truly a god!"
The prisoners all dropped to their knees. "A god indeed!"
Shi En took Wu Song to his private residence and begged him to be seated.
"Tell me now," said the constable. "What is it you want me to do?"
"Please sit a while. My father will be here soon to see you. Then I'll deign to trouble you."
"You want a person to do something, don't be so wishy-washy! That's no way to get things done. Even if it needs a stab or a hack, I'll do it! If I'm toadying to you in the least, I'm no man!" Clasping his hands respectfully together, Shi En finally spoke. And as a result, Wu Song displayed his man-destroying skill, he showed again his tiger-killing prowess. Truly, his two fists pounded like thunder, his flying kicks startled the wind and rain.

Well, what the Gardener said to Wu Song was this: "Don't think I'm nasty-minded, Captain, but rather than you go and suffer in prison, wouldn't it be better if we finish off those guards of yours right now? You could stay here with us for a while. Afterwards, if you agree to become an outlaw, I'd personally send word to the Temple of the Precious Pearl on Twin Dragon Peak and arrange for you to join Lu Zhishen's band. What do you say?"
"It is very good of you, Brother, to show such concern for my welfare," said Wu Song, "but there's just one thing. All my life I've fought only with bullies. These two guards have been kind to me and looked after me well, they've done everything they could for me on the journey. If I let any harm come to them, heaven will not pardon me. If you really want to please me, for my sake let them off, don't do them any harm."
"Since you're so magnanimous, Captain, I'll give them the antidote at once."
The Gardener told the two assistants to get the guards down off the carving block. His wife prepared a bowl of the antidote and then he pulled them by the ears and made them swallow it. In less than an hour they awoke as if from a dream and sat up. When they saw Wu Song, they said: "However did we get so drunk in this place? That wine must be really something! We hardly touched a drop and it knocked us out cold. We must remember this place. We'll come and try their wine again on the way back."
Wu Song couldn't help laughing, and the Gardener and the Ogress joined in. The guards couldn't make out what was going on. Meanwhile the two assistants went and slaughtered chickens and geese and cooked them and set out dishes and cups. The Gardener ordered a table and chairs to be placed under a vine-covered trellis at the back and invited Wu Song and his guards out into the garden.
Wu Song made the guards take the place of honour, while he and Zhang the Gardener sat with the Ogress on one side. The two assistants poured the wine and came and went with plates of food. The Gardener plied Wu Song with wine. When evening came he got out the two monk's swords to show Wu Song. They were indeed of the very finest steel and more than one day's work had surely gone into their making. The two men reminisced about the heroes of rivers and lakes and told many a tale of killing and burning. At one point Wu Song said: "That noble and generous fellow, Song Jiang of Shandong province, known as the Opportune Rain, has had to take refuge with Mr. Chai in his country residence, because of some affair he got involved in." On hearing this talk the two guards suddenly became terrified and threw themselves down on their knees. Wu Song said: "Surely you can't suppose I intend you any harm, after you've looked after me for such a space? All this talk of the heroes of rivers and lakes is nothing to be frightened of, there's no way we would want to harm good people. Just drink up and tomorrow when we reach Mengzhou I'll give proof of my gratitude."
They spent the night at the Gardener's. Wu Song wanted to leave in the morning but the Gardener wouldn't let him go and insisted on their staying another three days. Wu Song was moved by the attentions of the Gardener and his wife and since Zhang was his elder by five years formally pronounced him his elder brother.
Now Wu Song announced his intention of leaving again, but not before the Gardener had organized a send-off party. The Gardener returned all their things to them, the duffle bag and the packs, and gave ten taels or so of silver to Wu Song and two or three taels in loose change to the guards. Wu Song divided his among the guards. Then the cangue was fitted again and the seals replaced. The Gardener and his wife saw them to the gate and they set off for Mengzhou. As the poem says:
His new brother's counsel
Is to join the robber rout.
But he's no mind to cancel
The justice meted out

For his killing of the woman
Who acted like a whore:
For he's no common felon
Without regard for law.

It was not yet noon when they reached the city. They went straight to the government offices and presented the documents from Dongping district court. When the governor had examined these, Wu Song was taken into custody and a receipt was sent back with the two guards. We say no more of them.

Wu Song was immediately consigned to the prison fortress. When he arrived there, he found a big plaque bearing three characters which read: "Fortress of Peace." The guards took him to his cell and then went to hand in the documents and get a receipt. No more of this.

Once Wu Song was ensconced in his own cell, a dozen or so of his fellow inmates came to see him. "You're new here," they said, "so if you happen to have anything in your pack there, a letter of recommendation or some spare cash, you'd better have it ready. The chief warder will be here in a minute and you'll need to give him something. Then if they do give you the disciplinary beating, that's meant to soften you up, they'll go easy on you. But if you haven't got anything for him you'll really cop it! We're all in the same boat here, that's why we're warning you. You know the saying, 'When the rabbit dies the fox mourns; creatures feel for their own kind.' We were afraid since you've just come you might not know about these things, that's why we thought we'd better tell you."

"Thank you all for your good advice," Wu Song said. "I do happen to have something here, and if he speaks to me nicely I shall reward him. But if he's rude, I shan't give him a cent!"

"Oh no!" the others exclaimed, "That's not the way at all. You know what the ancients said, 'Fear not the law but him who wields the law.' And there's that proverb too, 'When you walk under the eaves, better keep your head down.' You want to watch out you know!"

They'd hardly finished speaking when someone shouted: "The chief warder's coming!" At this they all dispersed.

Wu Song took off his pack and sat down in his cell. Next thing, in comes the gaoler shouting "Where's the new prisoner?"

"That's me," said Wu Song.

"What's the matter with you? Are you blind or something? Why wait for me to ask? Aren't you the fellow who killed the tiger on Jingyang Pass and was made captain in Yanggu? You oughter be smart, how come you don't know what's what? Think you can face me out, do you? Why, you couldn't even beat up a cat!"

"And you're just making a big noise because you think I ought to bribe you! Well you won't get a cent!" Wu Song said. "All you'll get is a taste of my fists! I have got some money, but I shall keep it to buy myself wine. What are you going to do about that? Why, you haven't even got the power to send me back to Yanggu!"

After the head warder had departed in high dudgeon, the other convicts crowded round Wu Song. "Now you've done it!" they said. "In a minute you're really going to be sorry! He'll have gone off to report to the Warden, you can count on it. It's not likely you'll get off with your life!"

"I'm not scared of him. I'll treat him the same way he treats me. If he's reasonable, I'll be reasonable too; if he wants a fight, that's what he'll get!"

Hardly had he finished speaking when three or four prison guards marched in demanding to know where the prisoner, Wu Song, was. "Here I am, you fools, did you think I'd run away?" Wu Song answered sarcastically. "I don't see the need for all this shouting!" Ignoring this they marched him off to the administration office to see the prison Warden. Several guards brought him in and the Warden barked out orders for the cangue to be removed. "Prisoner, in accordance with the original decree of Emperor Wude, our forefather, every newly arrived prisoner receives one hundred disciplinary lashes. Guards, secure the prisoner and administer the punishment!"

"Keep your hands off!" Wu Song warned. "If you want to beat me, go ahead, but you don't have to hold me. If I dodge a single blow, you can call me a coward and start again. If I so much as make a sound, you can say I'm not the hero of Yanggu!"

All the onlookers laughed. "The fellow's crazy," they said, "he's committing suicide! Well, let's see how he can take it."

"Come on then, if you're going to beat me try to do it properly," said Wu Song. "Don't hold anything back or I shall feel insulted."

This provoked further mirth. But as the guards took up their sticks in readiness, a cry rang out. Standing by the Warden's side was a man of about twenty-five, of average height and pale complexion, bearded and bewhiskered, his head bound about with a white scarf and sporting a black silk tunic. One hand was wrapped in a white bandage. He now spoke a few words in the Warden's ear. Thereupon the latter said: "Newly arrived prisoner Wu Song, tell us about the illness you contracted on the journey."

"I contracted no illness on the journey," Wu Song said. "I drank, I ate everything available, and I marched."

"The fellow was sick on the way here," the Warden said. "I can see from the look of him he's only just recovered. The beating will be postponed."

The guards on either side whispered to Wu Song: "Quick, say you've been ill. He's doing you a favour. All you've got to do is say you're feeling bad."

"But I'm not, I'm perfectly fit," Wu Song protested. "Beat me and be done with it. I don't want to put this beating in store and have it hanging over me. Let's get it over with as soon as possible."

Again there was laughter all round. Even the Warden was grinning. "The man's obviously still delirious with fever. He's sweating and spouting nonsense, I shall pay no attention to him. Take him back to the lock-up."

Several guards escorted Wu Song back to his cell. The other convicts gathered round and said: "Are you really going to tell us you didn't have some special letter of recommendation for the Warden?"

"Definitely not."

"In that case this postponement doesn't look good at all. They'll come and finish you off in the night."

"And how do you think they'll do it?"

"This evening they'll feed you two bowls of dry brown rice and some salted fish. As soon as you're full, they'll take you down to the dungeons, tie you up and roll you in straw mats, stop up the seven apertures and put you upside down on the wall. In less than an hour you'll be gone. It's what they call 'hanging the pot'."

"Is that the only method they've got?"

"There's another where they tie you up and get a sack and fill it full of sand and squash you under it. Same as before, in less than half an hour you're a goner. That's called 'sandbagging'."

"What else can they do?"

"Isn't that horrible enough? What would they need more for?"

Hardly had the convicts finished speaking when a guard entered, carrying a hamper, and asked: "Which of you is the new prisoner, Captain Wu?

"I am," said Wu Song, "what do you want with me?"

"The Warden sends this snack for you."

Inside the hamper were a big pot of wine, a plate of meat, a bowl of noodles and a big bowl of broth.

"I suppose they're giving me this snack because they're coming to kill me later," Wu Song thought to himself. "Well anyway, I may as well eat now, let's take things one at a time."

When he had drained the wine and polished off the meat and noodles, the man returned and cleared away the things.

Alone in his cell, Wu Song considered his situation. "Now we shall see what they're going to do with me," he thought fatalistically. But as night fell, the same man entered again with another hamper. "What have you come for?" Wu Song asked him.

"I've been sent to give you your dinner."

He had brought several plates of vegetables, another big pot of wine, a plate of roast meat, a bowl of fish soup and a big bowl of rice. "After all this," Wu Song said to himself, "they'll definitely be coming to kill me. Well, let them. At least I won't be a hungry ghost when I die. So let's eat first and think about things after."

As soon as he had finished, the man collected the dishes and left. But in a little while he returned with another man. One was carrying a bath-tub, the other a big bucket of hot water. "Your bath, Captain," they said.

"I suppose they'll start on me when I've had my bath," he thought. "Well, I'm not afraid of them. I may as well spruce myself up a bit."

The two men filled the bath and he got in. When he'd washed, they handed him a bathrobe and a towel. He dried himself and dressed and then one of the men poured away the bath water and removed the bath, while the other brought a rattan mat and a mosquito-net. After hanging the mosquito-net, spreading the mat and placing a cool pillow on it, he bade Wu Song good night and departed.

Wu Song closed the door and bolted it. "What does all this mean?" he was thinking to himself. "Well let them do what they like. I'll know sooner or later." He laid his head on the pillow and slept soundly all night.

At daybreak Wu Song unbolted the door of the cell and the man who had served him the day before reappeared carrying hot water for washing. He invited Wu Song to wash his face and rinse his mouth with the water he provided for the purpose. He also brought a barber who combed Wu Song's hair, tied it in a knot on top of his head and covered it with a cap. Following this another man entered with a hamper from which he produced plates of vegetables, a big bowl of broth and a big bowl of rice. "I've no idea what you're up to," Wu Song thought, "but I'm going to eat anyway." When he'd eaten, a pot of tea was produced, and when he'd drunk the tea, the man who'd brought the food came back and said: "You're not very comfortable here, Captain, you'll be better off if we move you into the next room. It's a more suitable place for us to serve your tea and food."

"This is it!" Wu Song thought. "But I'll just go with him and see what happens."

While one man collected Wu Song's pack and bedding, another led him from his cell to somewhere on the opposite side of the corridor. They opened the door and inside was a spotlessly clean bed, with table and benches recently placed along either side. When he saw this, Wu Song thought to himself: "Here was I thinking they were about to take me down to the dungeons, how come they bring me somewhere like this! It's much better than the cell."

Wu Song sat there till midday, when the man came again with a hamper and a bottle of wine. Opening up the hamper he laid out fruit of four kinds, a cooked chicken and a quantity of steamed rolls. He carved the chicken, poured out the wine and invited Wu Song to eat. "What is going on?" Wu Song wondered. In the evening, there was more food and Wu Song was invited to bathe and lie down in the cool. "I believed it would be exactly as the other convicts said," he thought. "Then how is it they keep treating me so nicely?"

On the third day they brought him food and wine, same as before, and when he had breakfasted he went out for a stroll in the prison grounds. There he came upon a gang of convicts carrying water, chopping firewood and doing a variety of jobs, all under the baking noonday sun. It was high summer and nowhere was there any relief from the heat. Standing with his hands behind his back, Wu Song asked these convicts: "Why are you working in the sun like this?"

The convicts laughed. "Listen, friend, simply to be allowed to work this way is heaven on earth for us. How on earth could we expect to sit on our arses keeping cool? Them as don't have the means to bribe the gaolers are locked up in the great dungeon, live or die, it's all one to them, they'll pass the rest of their days like that, loaded down with chains."

After this Wu Song went to take a turn around the Temple of the Heavenly Prince. Next to the paper-burner was a block of granite with a hole in it, a massive stone, which served as occasional support for a flag-staff. He went and sat on this stone for a while, and then went back to his room and sat on the floor, turning things over in his mind, till the man came again with wine and food. To cut a long story short, Wu Song spent several more days in that room, and each day good food and wine was brought him and no attempt whatsoever was made to harm him. He simply did not know what to make of it.

Finally one day when the man came at noon with food and drink, Wu Song could hold back no longer. Placing his hand on the hamper, he asked: "Who is your master? Why do you keep bringing me all this?"

"I told you, didn't I? I'm a servant of the Warden's household."

"But you still haven't answered my question. This food and wine you bring me each day, who is it told you to bring it? And what does he want of me?"

"Actually it's the Warden's son who's sending it."

"But I'm only a convict, I haven't even halfway done anything for the Warden, so why send me all this?"

"Who am I to say? I'm just obeying the Young Master's orders. He says to go on bringing you the stuff for five or six months and then he'll explain."

"Stranger and stranger! Are they trying to fatten me up before they do me in? It's a bloody conundrum and I just don't see how I'm ever going to solve it. But there's something fishy about all the food, so how can I be comfortable eating it? Tell me, this Young Master of yours, what's he like? How does he know me? I won't eat any more unless you answer."

"Remember when you'd just arrived, sir, in the administration office, the one who had a white dressing and a bandaged hand? That's the Warden's son."

"Do you mean the one in the black tunic standing right next to the Warden?"

"That's the one."

"Wasn't he the one who told them to stop when they were about to give me the beating?"

"Right sir. It was the Young Master that spoke up for you, that's why they didn't beat you."

"This is really odd! I'm from Qinghe, he's from Mengzhou, we've never met before, so why's he so concerned about me? There's got to be a reason. Listen, this Young Master of yours, what's his name?"

"His name's Shi En, and he's a martial arts expert, so people call him the Golden-Eyed Tiger."

"He's obviously a good man. Ask him to come here and see me. If you do that I can accept his food and wine. If you don't get him to come, I refuse to touch anything."

The servant began to object. "The Young Master told me not to say anything about it. He said I was to serve you five or six months before he'd meet you."

"Shut up. Just tell your Young Master to come here and meet me."

At first the man was too scared, but when Wu Song began to lose patience he was obliged to go back and report what Wu Song had said.

After a long wait the Young Master rushed in and prostrated himself before Wu Song, who hurriedly returned the compliment, saying: "I am a convicted criminal under your jurisdiction, I cannot claim the honour or your acquaintance, yet recently you saved me from a severe beating and now every day you provide me with excellent food and wine, all of which I have done nothing to deserve. I have done you no service. To be thus rewarded without reason renders one unable either to eat or sleep in peace."

"I have long been familiar with your name, my friend, it has sounded like thunder in my ears," said the Young Master, "but an unfriendly fate kept us apart and I could not contact you. Now it is my good fortune that you are here and I would have come to greet you at once, only I was ashamed because I had nothing suitable to give you."

"I believe I heard your servant say that I was supposed to wait several months and then you would speak to me about something. What exactly was it you wanted to speak to me about?"

"The idiot doesn't know how to behave. He had to blurt it all out when he ought to have been keeping his mouth shut!"

"Really sir!" Wu Song protested, "all this shilly-shallying about, you'll drive me crazy. For heaven's sake, can't you tell me right out what it is you want of me?

"Well, since the clod has let the cat out of the bag, I suppose I'd better explain. Because you're such a strong man, there is something I'd like to ask you to do, no one but you is capable of it. But because you must be tired from the journey here and haven't had time to recuperate, I want you to rest for a few months first. Then, when you've fully recovered your strength, I'll tell you all about it."

"Your Honour," Wu Song said scornfully, "last year on Jing-yang Pass after I'd been sick with malaria for three months, and was drunk into the bargain, I was able to throw down a great tiger and kill it with just three blows of the fist and a couple of kicks. What do you suppose I'm capable of now?"

"But I'm not going to tell you today. Not till you've had a bit more rest and got your strength back fully."

"You still think I'm not strong enough? All right. There's a big block of stone I saw yesterday outside the Temple of the Heavenly Prince, what do you suppose it weighs?"

"I should think about four or five hundred catties."

"Let's go and see if I can lift it."

"Finish this wine first."

"Time enough for that when we come back."

The two men went to the Temple of the Heavenly Prince. When the convicts saw Wu Song with the Warden's son, they all bent low and saluted. Wu Song began to rock the stone a little. He grinned and said: "I'm really getting out of shape, I can't shift it."

"A stone that weighs four or five hundred catties, that's not to be taken lightly," said the Young Master.

"Do you really believe I can't lift it?" Wu Song said scornfully. "All right, everyone, stand back and watch this!" He removed the upper part of his robe and tied it about his waist, and then with single jerk lifted the stone clear off the ground. Then he threw it with both hands. It plunged to the ground, sinking in to a depth of a foot. The onlookers marvelled at what they saw. Wu Song went to the stone and lifted it again and tossed it into the air. It rose to a height of ten feet. Wu Song caught it in both hands as it descended and replaced it gently in the original spot. He turned to the Young Master and the crowd. His face was un-flushed, his heartbeat regular and his breathing easy. The Young Master stepped forward, embraced him, and then prostrated himself, saying: "You're not just an ordinary human! You're a god!" The convicts all echoed his words: "A god, truly a god!"

His strength is a miracle, wondrous to see.
He's filled with true power in the highest degree.
The hand of this hero the universe appals
He tosses the stone like a juggler his balls.

The Young Master now took Wu Song into his private residence and made him sit down.

"Now you must tell me what it is you want me to do for you," Wu Song said.

"Let's just sit a little till my father comes, then I'll be ready to explain it to you."

Wu Song did not conceal his disgust: "Now look here, Your Honour, if you want someone to do something for you, it's no good messing around like a young girl, never coming out with anything clearly, that's not a man's way of going about it. Even if it's something terrible, I'll do it for you. But don't imagine I'm going to flatter you, you'll not catch Wu Song doing that!" So the Young Master, standing quite still with his hands clasped together, expounded the business to Wu Song. And it was because of this that Wu Song was to display his fearsome aptitude for killing, to bring to bear once more the full force of his tiger-killing might. Truly, when his 2 fists strike, a thunderbolt falls, a flying kick from him raises a storm.

ZHANG QING said, "As you are on your way to be imprisoned we can kill your escort, and then you can stay here for some time. If you are willing to become a bandit I will go with you to the "Lianglong Mountain' where we can make the acquaintance of Lu Da and join his band."

"It is very good of you to arrange for me this way but there is another matter. I have always been keen on fighting against strong men, but those two soldiers have treated me quite well on the road, so that if I now ill-treat them Heaven will not tolerate it. If you admire me I hope you will at once help them to recover instead of injuring them."
"Drill Instructor, you are an upright man, and I must save these men's lives," said Zhang Qing. He thereupon ordered two waiters to release the soldiers lying on the bench. Sun Er Niang, the Night Witch, prepared the antidote, and gave it to Zhang Qing, who forced it down the throats of the unconscious soldiers. In less than an hour the soldiers recovered as from a dream and got up. They recognized Wu Song and asked him, "How did we get drunk in this place? The wine must have been so good! We did not drink much so how did we get drunk? We must remember this place so that we can have some more of this wine on our way home."
Wu Song, Zhang Qing, and Sun Er Niang all laughed upon hearing this, but the two soldiers did not understand why. The two waiters killed a chicken and a goose, and after cooking them brought them in with wine and other food. Zhang Qing told the servants to arrange a table under the vine frame in the garden at the back, and then requested Wu Song and the two soldiers to go there and partake of the feast. Wu Song asked the two soldiers to take the seats of honor, and he and Zhang Qing sat down opposite to them while Sun Er Niang took her seat at the side of the table.
The two servants served the wine and food. It was evening before they had finished the meal, and then Zhang Qing brought out the monk's swords for Wu Song to inspect. It was indeed made of excellent steel, and must have taken a long time in making. The two men talked about bandit adventures, killing of men, and incendiarism.
"There is a Shandong man called Song Jiang, nicknamed 'Welcome Rain,'" said Wu Song, "who has sought refuge just now with Squire Chai."
The two soldiers upon hearing such talk were astonished, and rising kowtowed to Wu Song. Wu Song spoke to them, "You two treated me well on the road, so I will never ill-treat you. We are only speaking about bandits and robbers so you need not be afraid. We certainly would not injure good men like you. Take no notice of what we say, but just drink your wine, and tomorrow when we reach Mengzhou I will reward you."
They stayed at that place for the night, but next morning when Wu Song wanted to depart, Zhang Qing was not willing to let him go. He gave way and stayed there for three days more. At last he recognized the generosity of Zhang Qing and his wife. Zhang Qing was nine years older than Wu Song, and therefore he adopted the latter as his younger brother. At last when Wu Song decided to depart Zhang Qing prepared the parting cup of wine, and bade him farewell, and gave him about ten taels and the two soldiers about three taels of silver. Wu Song gave his silver to the soldiers, and put on again his cangue. Upon leaving Wu Song could not avoid shedding tears at the kindness received from Zhang Qing and his wife.
Wu Song and his escort reached Mengzhou the following morning. They went straight to the yamen, and presented the dispatch from Dongping Prefecture. After the magistrate had perused the dispatch, he wrote a reply, handed it to the soldiers who returned to Dongping. Wu Song was sent to the prison, but just as he got to the entrance he noticed a signboard with the three characters, "Anping Stockade." He was put in a cell by himself. He had not been there long before about ten men in the adjoining cell came to speak to him saying, "Kind sir, if you have any letters of recommendation or any money, you must not forget to hand them to the man who will come to search you. If you give him money he will see that the blows with the bamboo are only light, but if he gets no money the blows will be extremely severe. We are criminals like yourself, and therefore tell you what to expect. Do you not know the saying, 'When the hare dies the fox mourns; and so animals grieve for their kind.' As you have only just arrived we thought it better to tell you about this."
"I am much obliged to you for the information," said Wu Song. "I have something at my side, and if the man is polite to me I will give it to him. But if he demands anything I will not give him a cent."
A prisoner said, "Sir, you should not talk like that. There is an ancient saying, 'Fear not the authorities, except those that have authority over you.' When you are under the eaves of a low house you have to bend your head. It would be better if you took a little care." While he was saying this another prisoner called out, "Here comes the head jailer!" At this all the prisoners dispersed. Wu Song fastened his belt, and sat down in his cell. Soon the head jailer entered and asked, "Where is that new prisoner?"
"I am the man," replied Wu Song.
"Well, you seem to have eyes, ears, and yet you have got to be told," said the head jailer. "You are the man who killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge and was a Drill Instructor at Yanggu County, so I suppose you know how matters are arranged. How dare you come here where I am! There is not even a cat here that you dare beat."
"Did you come here to talk and expect me to give you something?" asked Wu Song. "But I have not got anything to give you except my two fists. I have, however, a little silver, but I shall want that to buy food and wine for myself. So what shall you do? How would it do if you took me back to Yanggu County?"
The head jailer retired in an angry mood, and immediately the prisoners crowded forward, and said, "Sir, you treated him roughly, and it won't be long before you are in trouble. He will certainly go and speak to the warden of the jail and put an end to your life."
"I am not afraid," replied Wu Song, "let him try and do his worst. Civility meets civility; violence meets violence."
While he was saying this about four jailers came and entering his cell called out in a loud voice, "Now, where is that new prisoner Wu Song?"
To which Wu Song replied, "I am here! I will not go away! But why do you shout like that?"
The men did not reply to this, but took him away to the Inspection Office where the warden was seated. About six soldiers took charge of him, and placed him in front of the warden who ordered that the cangue be removed. The warden then addressed him. "Prisoner, are you aware of the old decrees of the Emperor Taizu, that the newly arrived exile should receive one hundred severe blows with the bamboo?"
"There is no need for many men to be employed in that," said Wu Song. "If you want to beat me there will be no need for men to hold me down. If I flinch from a single blow I forfeit my reputation of being a tiger-killer. You need not be too careful in keeping a count of the blows as it won't matter if there are a few extra. If I make any noise I forfeit my name of being the brave man of Yanggu County."
The bystanders laughed at this, and one said, "This foolish fellow is looking for death! We shall see how he can stand the torture."
Wu Song continued, "Make the blows as hard as you like, show no kindness to me. I shall not be pleased if you show me any favor."
The audience on both sides again laughed. Two men seized the bamboo, and shouted as he advanced. Standing at the side of the Prefect, however, was a very tall man of about twenty-five years of age. He had a fair complexion and a small beard of three tufts. He wore a white crape girdle round his waist. That man whispered something into the warden's ear who then spoke, "Prisoner Wu Song, what illness had you on the way to this place?"
"I had no illness at all but just drank and ate on the journey."
"This man must have been taken ill on the road, judging by his appearance," said the warden, "so perhaps I ought to postpone beating him with the bamboo."
The two men who were ordered to beat him whispered to Wu Song, "You say at once that you are sick. The warden wishes to show mercy to you. You better offer an excuse."
"I am not sick," said Wu Song. "I do not want to stop them from beating me. Let them beat me and so finish the matter. If they don't do it now, I shall always be expecting it."
The audience and also the warden laughed at this, and the latter said, "I think that he must have a fever, and he is talking in this delirious way because he has not had a good sweat to get the fever out. We will not listen to what he says now, and put him in solitary confinement."
About four soldiers took him back to his cell, where all the other prisoners crowded outside and asked, "Did your friend write a letter to the warden?" Wu Song denied this and they continued, "In that case it is not good, because they will now come in the night and kill you."
"How will they kill me?"
"They will bring you two big bowls of rice, and after you have eaten that, they will take you inside the prison. There they will swathe you tightly in cordage, stop up your nostrils, ears, and mouth, and then turn you upside down and leave you against the wall. In less than an hour you will be dead."
"What else might they do?"
The prisoners replied, "They might bind you with ropes, and then get a sandbag and press it tightly on your body. Again, if they do that you will die in less than an hour."
"Have they any other way of killing me?" asked Wu Song.
"Those two are what most men are afraid of, and the others are not as bad." While they were speaking a soldier came bearing a basket and asked where Drill Instructor Wu Song was. Wu Song laughed and said, "Here I am! What have you to say?"
The man replied that the warden had sent some refreshment for him. Wu Song looked and saw a bowl of wine, a plate of meat, a bowl of vermicelli, and a bowl of soup. He wondered what their plan was in sending him such food. He thought it better to partake of the meal, and wait for developments. He did this, and had soon finished the food. The soldier took all the vessels away, and then Wu Song sat down and soliloquized, "I wonder what they will do next." When it was nearly dark the head jailer came with a round box, and said, "I am sent here with your supper." Wu Song saw that there was vegetable, wine, meat, fish soup, and rice. He thought, "Surely they will kill me after I have eaten this meal! If I eat all this and then die I shall at least be a well-fed ghost. Let they do what they may. After supper I will think of some scheme."
The soldier waited until Wu Song had finished the meal, and then removed the dishes. But he soon came back with another soldier, one carrying a tub, and the other a bucket full of hot water, and they asked Wu Song to take a bath. Wu Song thought that they would kill him after the bath. "But I am not afraid of them, so I will take my bath." The soldiers emptied the hot water in the tub, and Wu Song had his bath. When finished he was supplied with a towel, and told to dress. One soldier emptied the water, and took the tub and towel back. The other soldier spread the gauze silk mosquito net, arranged the cool bedding and pillow, and then withdrew. Wu Song put the bar across the door, and then sat down to think matters over. "What is their intention in all this? Let them do as they like. I will watch the proceedings?" So he went to sleep and nothing happened during the night.
He was awake quite early and opening the door of his cell he saw the same soldier who had waited on him the previous night, and he had now brought a basin of water for Wu Song to wash his face. He had also brought a cup of cold water with which Wu Song rinsed his mouth. A barber came and dressed Wu Song's long hair into a knot on the top of his head, and then inclosed the knot in a small hood. Still another man entered with his breakfast of rice, meat-soup, and vegetables. He ate his breakfast, and then drank a cup of tea. Just then the man who brought the food asked him to remove to another cell which was much more convenient, and would save time at meal. He agreed to this, and the servant took him to another room and when the door was opened he saw that the apartment was very clean and the bed nice and tidy. The furniture appeared to be quite new. But Wu Song was still perplexed as to why they had brought him to such a comfortable place. The room was very much better than the place he had been in. He sat down there until noon, when a man brought him a jug of wine with four kinds of fruit, roasted chicken, and some steamed buns. The man took the chicken in his hands, and tore it into small pieces. He poured out the wine, arranged the chopsticks, and invited Wu Song to dine. Wu Song was however still perplexed as to the mystery of all this fine treatment.
In the evening they brought his supper, and allowed him to enjoy the cool in the open. He could not help but think of what the other prisoners had predicted, so this treatment made him more and more perplexed.
During the third day he was treated in the same way, and he even went for a stroll in the prison yard after breakfast. He saw many prisoners in the sun cutting firewood, carrying water, and doing various odd jobs. It was a very hot day in the sixth lunar month, and he was sorry that they had no shade from the heat of the sun's rays. Walking up to them with his hands behind his back he asked why they worked in the sun. They laughed at the question and one man replied, "Sir, we have been sent here to work, and this place is like heaven compared with some other places. We should not care to think that this place is too hot. Many prisoners are not so well treated, but remain chained up in cells, and whether they wish to live or die makes no difference."
Wu Song walked away to the prison shrine to the King of Heaven where by an urn for burning papers he noticed a large stone block which had a hole in the center to hold a staff. He took his seat on it for some time and then returned to his apartment, where a servant brought his food again.
But we need not go into the details of his daily life. For several days he got his food and wine, and he was still doubtful as to the outcome of it. But one day he could not endure this suspicion any longer so when the servant brought his food he asked him who was his master, and how it was that he sent him nice food every day. The man replied that he had previously told Wu Song that he was the confidential servant of the warden.
"But who tells you to bring me this food and wine every day?"
"It is the warden's son who instructs me to do this."
"But I am a criminal and I have not done anything for the warden's son so why does he treat me in this way?"
"That I do not know. But he told me that after three months like this he would explain matters fully."
"How strange! It seems to me that they are just feeding me so as to fatten me ready for killing. It is quite a riddle, and how can I guess its real meaning? How can I eat the food with ease, if the matter is not explained clearly? What kind of man is your young master, and where did we meet before? If I knew that, I might eat the food with contentment."
"He is the same man who stood on the right of the warden with his forehead wrapped in white cloth when your case first came into court."
"So he is that man? When I was on the point of being beaten he said something to the warden, and thus saved me from that, I suppose."
"That is so," said the man.
"How strange! I am a Qinghe County man, whereas he is a Mengzhou man, and as we are not acquainted with each other how is it that he treats me like this? I think he must have a reason for this, but what is it? But I ask you one more question: What is his name?"
"He is Shi En with the nickname, 'Golden Eyed Tiger Cub.' He is skillful with the cudgels."
"He must be a good fellow. You go and request him to come here, and have an interview with me. When he does that then I will partake of his food. If you won't go and ask him to meet me then I won't eat any more."
"But he told me also that I was not to speak with you much, as after about three months he would come and explain matters to you himself."
"Don't talk nonsense! You go and ask him to come here now, and that will settle the matter."
The man was afraid, and was unwilling to do this. Seeing this Wu Song was vexed, and sprang up. The man at once withdrew to carry out the request.
After quite a long time Shi En came hurriedly, and upon seeing Wu Song knelt down. Wu Song ran forward to raise him up, and said, "I am a criminal, and have not had the honor of meeting you before. A few days ago I was beholden to you for saving me from a beating, and since then I have been honored by your kindly sending me food and wine. This you ought not to have done. You have not given me any work to do, so I am a useless fellow, and in eating your food I feel guilty and uneasy."
"I have long heard of your name like a crash of thunder," said Shi En. "But unfortunately we have ever been separated by impassable roads so that I could not meet you. Fortunately we meet today and I must pay you respect. I am sorry that as I had no suitable presents for you, I did not dare to approach you before."
"Your servant told me that in about three months you would have something definite to say to me. Now, what is it you wish to say?"
"My servant was simply outspoken to your question, but he did not know anything about the matter. How could he talk in that reckless manner?"
"You evade my question with literary skill! But why not tell me now instead of leaving me in a melancholy frame of mind? Please speak outright! Do you want me to do something?"
"As the servant has said this, I will tell you. As you are a great hero and a straightforward man, I have one thing to request you to do for me, which nobody else can do. But you came from a good distance, and must have been tired upon your arrival here, and have not had time to regain your strength. So if you will now rest for a few months to restore your strength, I will tell you something when you are in better form."
Wu Song burst into loud laughter upon hearing this, and said, "Last year I was very ill with fever for three months, but when passing Jingyang Ridge I being somewhat tipsy killed a tiger with only three blows of my fist and a couple of kicks. Am I not better today than on that occasion?"
"I cannot tell you about the affair just now. We had better wait until you are quite in good health, and then I will tell you."
"But why do you think that I am not strong now? Well, yesterday I was at the King of Heaven's Shrine, and saw there a large boulder. What is the weight of that?"
"I am afraid that it may be about four hundred jin in weight," said Shi En.
"I will go there with you to see whether I can lift it or not."
"Let us finish our wine, and then I will go with you," said Shi En.
"I would rather go first, and drink the wine when we come back," replied Wu Song.
So they both went to the King of Heaven's Shrine, and when they arrived the prisoners there stood to attention, and gave salutations.
Wu Song took hold of the boulder, and moved it. He laughed and said, "I am now so delicate that I cannot move it?"
"That is a very heavy stone, and you cannot make little of it," said Shi En.
"So you really think I cannot lift it up? All of you get out of the way, and watch me lift it." He then took off his upper garments, and tied them round his waist, and easily lifted the stone up. He threw it away, and it fell with a thud on the ground making a hole about a foot deep. All the bystanders were thunderstruck at this. But Wu Song had not finished. He now seized the stone with one hand, drew it out of the hole, and hurled it about ten feet high. As it fell he caught it in both hands, and gently placed it in its original place. He immediately turned round and faced the crowd of spectators, and they could see that his face was not red; his heart was not palpitating, and that he was not out of breath from his exertion.
Shi En embraced Wu Song and paid his respects kneeling to Wu Song, and said, "Elder brother, you are an extraordinary man. You have supernatural powers."
The prisoners standing round also knelt down, and saluted Wu Song saying, "You really have supernatural powers."
Shi En took Wu Song to his private apartment, where they sat down. Wu Song said, "Now, I hope, sir, that you will tell me what that business is."
"Wait a little, until my father comes, when I will tell you all about it," replied Shi En.
"If you want to tell me to do a thing, then don't act in such a childish way," said Wu Song. "This doesn't look manly. Even if it's a matter of the sword, I can do it. If I refuse to do a man's job, then I'm no longer a man." Shi En clasped his hands over his heart, told Wu Song about the affair which involved killing of men, and equalled in grandeur the killing of a tiger. He raised his fists—the thunder roared and wind and rain were shaken.

127

The Young Master Shi En Reestablishes himself & Once More Controls & reigns at his Mengzhou Road Establishment; Wu Song drinks his fill & Strikes the Door God, Jiang Gate Guard Giant While Drunk

"Please be seated, brother," said Shi En, "and I'll tell you my story in detail."
"Don't pussyfoot around. Just give me the main points," said Wu Song.
"Since childhood I learned jousting with spear and staff from masters in the gallant fraternity. I became known around Mengzhou as the Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub. Outside the East Gate of this town is a market village called Happy Grove. Merchants from all over Hebei and Shandong go there to trade. There are over a hundred large inns in the village, and twenty or thirty gambling houses and money exchange shops. Since I was a skilled fighter, I went to Happy Grove with eighty or ninety tough prisoners and opened a tavern. Every enterprise had to pay me regular tribute. Even singsong girls, passing through, had to see me first before they could ply their trade. Money kept coming in. There wasn't a month when I didn't collect two or three hundred ounces of silver.

"But then Zhang, the stockade garrison commandant, came from East Luzhou. He brought with him a man named Jiang Zhong, known in the gallant fraternity as Jiang the Gate Guard Giant because he's so huge and strong. What's more, he's very skilled in weapons, and he's a marvel at rough and tumble fighting and wrestling. He says boastfully: 'I spent three years competing on Mount Taishan and never met my match. There's no one like me under the sky!' He simply moved in and took over my territory. When I tried to stop him, he gave me such a drubbing I couldn't get out of bed for two months. You saw me the other day, with my head bound and my hand bandaged. My wounds still haven't fully healed.
"Originally, I was going to take my men and have it out with him. But he has the backing of Commandant Zhang's garrison. If I created a row, it would cause dissension with the garrison. So here I've been, burning with rage and no way to get revenge. I've known for a long time what a great fighter and man of justice you are, brother. If only you can help me hit back at that rogue, I'll be able to close my eyes peacefully when I die. But I've been afraid because you've had a long hard journey that you haven't regained your strength. I wanted to wait several months till you recovered completely, then tell you about it. I didn't expect that clod of a servant to be so loose-mouthed. That's the whole truth of the matter."
Wu Song laughed. "How many heads has Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, and how many arms?"
"Only one head and two arms. How could he have more?"
"If he had three heads and six arms, like the ogre Nezha, I might be a little worried. But since he has only one head and two arms, why should I be afraid?"
"The problem was I just wasn't strong and skilled enough to beat him."
"I'm not bragging, but all my life I've been beating tough guys and virtueless scoundrels. Since the situation is what you say, what are we doing here? Get some wine and we'll drink it on the way. I'll go with you. You can watch me pummel him like I did the tiger! If I hit him too hard and kill him, I'm quite willing to pay for it with my life!"
"Sit and wait a bit longer, brother. My father wants to see you. When it's time to go, we'll go. We mustn't be rash. Tomorrow, I'll send a man to look around. If the knave is at home, we'll go the day after. If he's not, we'll discuss this further. Barging in will only stir up the grass and alert the snake. It won't be any good if he plays a trick on us."
"No wonder he beat you up! You don't behave like a man at all! If we're going, let's go now! Never mind tomorrow, or the day after. Come on! Who cares if he expects us!"
Just then the old warden rounded a screen and entered. "I've been listening for some time, warrior," he said to Wu Song. "I'm glad to meet you. To my son you're the sun emerging from the clouds! Please join me in the rear hall for a while."
Wu Song followed him, and the old man invited him to be seated.
"I'm prisoner," protested Wu Song. "I wouldn't dare sit in the presence of Your Honor."
"Don't talk like that, warrior. My son has been very fortunate to find you. No need for ceremony."
"Forgive me, then," begged Wu Song. He sat down opposite the warden. Shi En stood beside them.
"Why are you still standing?" asked Wu Song.
"My father is keeping you company, brother. Please make yourself at home."
"I feel uncomfortable when you act so formally."
"Since the warrior insists, and no outsiders are around..." said the warden. He indicated for his son to be seated.
A servant brought wine and tidbits. The warden personally handed Wu Song a filled cup. "Everyone has great respect for your courage, warrior. My son was doing business in Happy Grove not because he was greedy for gain, but to improve the appearance and atmosphere of our district. Then that Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, relying on the garrison's backing, muscled in and openly took over. Only a warrior hero like yourself can avenge this insult. Don't refuse my son. Drain this cup and accept his four kowtows. Let him call you elder blood brother as a sign of his respect."
"How can I, a man of no talent or learning, do that? I'd be pushing my luck too far."
But Wu Song downed the wine and Shi En kowtowed to him four times. He quickly returned the courtesy, and they pledged each other as blood brothers. Wu Song drank freely. He became very drunk, and had to be helped to his room. Of that we'll say no more.
The next day Shi En and his father conferred. "He must be feeling the effects of all that wine he had last night. We can't ask him to go today," said the warden. "We'll tell him that the man we sent to inquire says Jiang is not at home, and put it off another day."
Shi En acted accordingly when he saw Wu Song, adding: "We'll start tomorrow morning, after breakfast."
"All right," said Wu Song. "I'll just have to suppress my wrath another day!"
They finished their morning meal, had some tea, and went for a stroll outside the prison grounds. When they returned, they chatted in the guest hall about lance techniques, and put in a few practice rounds with fists and staves.
At noon Shi En invited Wu Song into the residence, where they ate and drank many cups. Wu Song was ready to go on drinking, but he noticed that Shi En kept plying him courteously with more food. He wasn't too pleased and later, when he returned to his room, he asked the two servants, who came with his bath water, about it.
"Why did the young master give me only meat instead of letting me have more wine?"
"To tell you the truth, Constable, the warden and the young master talked it over. Originally they were going to send you to Happy Grove today, but they were afraid you wouldn't be up to it because you were drunk last night. They held back on the wine so that tomorrow you'll be in shape to go."
"They thought because I was drunk, I wouldn't be fit?"
"That's it."
Wu Song could barely wait for daybreak. He rose early, washed and rinsed his mouth. He bound his head with a kerchief tied in a swastika knot, put on an earth-brown tunic, a red silk waist sash, leg-wrapping to the knee, and eight thonged hemp sandals. He covered with a plaster the tattoo of the criminal on his cheek. Shi En came and invited him to his house for breakfast.
When Wu Song had finished eating Shi En said: "We've horses saddled at the stable, ready to go."
"What do I need a horse for? I don't have small feet. There's only one thing I must ask."
"Speak freely, brother. Is there anything I'd refuse you?"
"After we leave the town, let's operate on the principle of 'Don't pass one without having three.' "
"What do you mean by that? I don't understand."
Wu Song laughed. "If you want me to beat up Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, you've got to invite me to three bowls of wine at every tavern we pass."
"It's fourteen or fifteen li from the East Gate of the town to Happy Grove," Shi En thought, "and there must be a dozen taverns on the way. If he has three bowls in each, that means thirty-six bowls before he gets there. He'll be drunk. That will never do."
Again Wu Song laughed. "You're afraid I won't be able to fight? Actually, I'm no good without wine. The more I drink, the better I am. It's only when I'm really drunk that I have my full strength. If drink hadn't given me courage on Jingyang Ridge would I have been able to beat that huge tiger? I need to be soused before I go into action. Then I've strength and spirit, both."
"I didn't know, brother. We have plenty of good wine at home. I was afraid drinking would slow you down, that's why I didn't dare ask you to drink your fill last night. Since drink only makes you stronger, I'll send a couple of servants on ahead with some of our best wine and something to eat, and have them wait for us on the road. Then we can indulge at leisure as we travel."
"That's more like it. I'll be primed by the time I fight Jiang the Gate Guard Giant. Without wine, I'd never have the skill. I'll give him such a drubbing for you that everyone who sees will laugh!"
Shi En made the necessary preparations. He told two servants to set out with hampers of wine and food and to take some copper coins. The warden quietly directed twenty stalwart men to trail behind Wu Song to meet any emergency.
Shi En and Wu Song left the Anping Stockade and departed from Mengzhou Town through the East Gate. Before they had gone five hundred paces they saw beside the road a building with a wine pennant sticking out from beneath its eaves. The two servants with the food and wine were already there, waiting. Shi En and Wu Song sat down in the tavern. The servants laid out the tidbits and produced the wine.
"I want a large bowl, not a small. Three portions," said Wu Song.
A servant put a large bowl down in front of him and filled it. With no further ado, Wu Song downed three bowls in succession. The servants collected the crockery and hastened on. Wu Song laughed.
"That just whetted my appetite. Let's go."
They left the tavern. Although the golden autumn breezes had started, it was still the heat of summer, and the two unbuttoned their tunics. After travelling another li or so they reached a place that was neither village nor hamlet. But they could see a wine pennant hanging high on a tree. In a grove by the road they found a little shop which sold a simple local brew. Shi En halted.
"They have only rustic grog here. Does this count as a tavern or not?"
"It has a wine pennant, so it comes under the rule of 'Don't pass one without having three.' "
The two men entered and sat down. The servants set out the bowls and tidbits and poured the wine. Wu Song downed three and rose. The servants gathered the utensils and hurried on ahead. Shi En and Wu Song left the inn. Before they had gone two li they saw another tavern. Wu Song polished off three bowls and continued on his way.
To make a long story short, he had three bowls at every tavern they encountered. But it seemed to Shi En, even after ten or more stops, that Wu Song was not particularly drunk.
"How much further to Happy Grove?" asked the constable.
"Not much. It's just beyond. Over there in the distance, where those trees are."
"When we get there, go somewhere and wait. I'll find him myself."
"Fine. I know just the place. Be careful. Don't underestimate your foe."
"Never mind. Let the servants go with me. If there are any more taverns, I still want to drink."
Shi En had the servants accompany Wu Song, and he himself departed.
During the next three or four li, Wu Song consumed more than ten bowls of wine. By then it was noon, and very hot, though there was a slight breeze. The warmth from the liquor welled up in Wu Song in a wave. He spread open his tunic. He was only half drunk, but he pretended to be completely intoxicated, and he weaved and staggered. As they neared the grove, one of the servants pointed.
"That's Jiang's tavern at that three-forked crossroads."
"All right. Keep away and stay out of sight. You can come after I've knocked him down."
Wu Song skirted around the back of the grove. A big tough fellow wearing a white tunic and holding a fly-whisk was seated in a folding armchair in the shade of a locust tree. Still feigning drunkenness, Wu Song glanced at him.
"That must be Jiang the Gate Guard Giant."
He plunged on past. After another forty or fifty paces, he could read the pennant on the pole beneath the eaves of the large tavern: Riverside View. Attached to a rail, painted bright green, before the door were two gold-spangled banners reading respectively: In drunkenness the universe is large and In the wine pot the days are long.
A shed on one side of the yard contained a butcher's table, block, knives and skewers. The shed on the other side housed a stove and hamper for steaming buns.
Inside, three great wine vats in a row were half sunk into the earthen floor, and each was more than half full. A young woman sat at an enclosed counter in the middle of the room. She was the concubine Jiang had recently obtained in Mengzhou, where she had been a talented singer of court opera arias of many kinds in the houses of pleasure on the west side of town.
Wu Song observed all this with his drunken eyes, then entered the tavern and sat down opposite the counter. He placed both hands on the table and gazed fixedly at the young woman. When she became conscious of his stare, she turned her head and looked elsewhere.
There were six or seven waiters. Wu Song pounded on the table. "Where is the host?" he shouted.
The head waiter came over. "How much wine would you like, sir?"
"Two drafts. But let me taste a sample, first."
The waiter told the woman behind the counter to draw two measures of wine. From the bucket she filled he ladled out one bowlful and heated it. He placed the bowl before Wu Song.
"Here you are, sir. Try this."
Wu Song sniffed, and shook his head. "No good. Change it." The waiter saw that he was drunk. He walked over to the counter. "Humor him, mistress, and give him something else."
The young woman poured back the rejected wine and ladled out some first-quality liquor. Again the waiter heated a bowlful and brought it over. Wu Song tasted it.
"This wine isn't any good either. Change it, quickly, and I'll forgive you."
Swallowing his anger, the waiter returned to the counter. "Change this again for something better, mistress," he urged. "There's no use arguing with the likes of him. He's drunk and looking for trouble. Let's give him some top quality."
The woman ladled out a measure of the best wine. The waiter brought the bucket to the table and heated a bowlful. Wu Song tried it.
"Now this wine has something to it! Tell me, what's the host called?"
"His name is Jiang."
"Why isn't it Li?"
The woman heard him. "Where did that oaf get so drunk?" she muttered. "Who asked him to come here and get fresh?"
"He's just some stupid rube from the sticks," said the waiter, "talking a lot of crap!"
"What did you say?" Wu Song demanded.
"We were having a private conversation. Drink your wine, sir, and mind your own business."
"Waiter, tell that girl behind the counter to come out and have some wine with me."
"Watch your mouth! She's the host's wife!"
"So what? Drinking with me won't hurt her."
The young woman was furious. "Coffin bait," she screamed. "So you want to die!" She pushed open the counter, preparing to charge out.
Wu Song removed his earth-brown tunic and stuffed it into his waistband. Raising the bucket, he sloshed the wine all over the floor. He strode in through the counter, colliding with the girl who was trying to come out. Of course she was no match for him. With one hand he grasped her waist, with the other he seized her hair, mussing her carefully piled coiffure, then lifted her over the counter and tossed the poor girl into one of the open wine vats. She landed with a splash.
Immediately, he emerged again from behind the counter. Several of the more agile waiters rushed him. Wu Song grabbed one and threw him head first into another wine vat. A second he also flung into a vat of wine with one quick move. Two more waiters he downed with a punch and a kick.
With three in the vats unable to climb out, and two on the floor unable to get up, all were farting and pissing in terror. Only one managed to get away.
"The lout is sure to tell Jiang the Gate Guard Giant," thought Wu Song. "I'll go and meet him halfway! If I beat him up on the road I can let everyone see and give them a good laugh!"
He stepped out briskly. The varlet had indeed hurried to report to the Gate Guard Giant. Jiang was astonished. He kicked over the folding chair, cast aside the fly whisk and lumbered into motion. He met Wu Song on the open road. Although Jiang was big, recent bouts of wine and sex had weakened him, and the news which brought him forward in such a rush had been a severe shock. How could he cope with Wu Song who was as strong as a tiger and determined to best him?
But Jiang was scornful of his foe, thinking that he was drunk, and he closed in rapidly. Quicker than it takes to tell, Wu Song flourished his two fists at Jiang's face, then turned and started away. Enraged, Jiang raced after him. Wu Song lashed out backwards with his left foot and kicked him it the groin. As Jiang clasped his injured section and doubled over in pain, Wu Song whirled around and swung his right foot in a flying kick to the forehead that slammed the big man over on his back. Wu Song planted one foot on his chest and, with keg-like fists, began pommelling Jiang's head.
This maneuver we just described—the flourishing of fists and turning away, the backward left kick, the whirling around and the forward right kick—is called "The Jade-Circle Steps with Duck and Drake Feet." It was one of Wu Song's most skilful fighting moves. A remarkable trick!
Jiang, on the ground, begged for mercy.
"If you want me to spare you, you must promise me three things."
"Not three, but three hundred, if you let me live!"
Wu Song pointed at him and made his demands. And as a result: Appearance was changed and a patron was sought, hair was cut in long bangs and a man went forth to kill.

Now when the Young Master stepped forward and said: "Brother, please be seated and I will recount to you in full a matter of the utmost importance to me," Wu Song replied: "Hold nothing back, if you please. But stick to the point and tell it straight."

"I had the fortune to acquire in my youth," the Young Master began, "some degree of competence in the martial arts, from masters who belonged to the rivers and lakes fraternity. That is why in Mengzhou they have bestowed on me the name of Golden-Eyed Tiger. I run a little trading centre here, outside the East Gate, at a place called Happy Woods. We get a crowd of merchants from the north, and there are over a hundred lodging houses, together with twenty or thirty money changers and gaming houses. Partly relying on my own powers and partly by conscripting some eighty or ninety hardened convicts from the prison camp, I have been able to set up an establishment of my own and also to receive contributions from all of the money changers and gaming houses.

"At least, that's how it is normally. Even the travelling singers and other ladies of easy virtue are obliged to speak to me first on arrival before they are allowed to ply their trade. These affairs provide a regular income, bringing in something like two or three hundred taels of silver a month. It's what I live on.

"Recently, however, one Colonel Zhang was posted to the prison garrison here from Dongluzhou, and he brought with him a certain individual named Jiang Zhong, an enormous fellow, immensely strong, known therefore throughout the rivers and lakes as Jiang the Door-God. And in addition to his size and strength he's an expert fencer with sword or staff, equally good with his fists and feet, and a formidable wrestler! He boasts of remaining unbeaten three years running in the contest on Mount Taishan and insists he hasn't a rival in the world! So now this villain marches in and appropriates my territory. I didn't want to let him get away with it, but he beat me up so badly I was in bed for two months! The other day when you came my head and hand were still bandaged and even now the scars haven't healed completely.

"Well, I had thought of getting together a group of my people and going to pay him back, but the trouble is he can call on the support of Colonel Zhang and his guard, so if I attack him I'm going to have problems right here in the prison fortress. I'm eaten up with rage and there's nothing I can do to get even. But I've heard so much about your reputation for valour, so what would you say to helping me get my own back? If you did I'd be able to die in peace. I was only afraid that after such a hard journey you'd not have the necessary energy and strength, that's why I said I'd wait a few months before putting this proposition to you. My fool of a servant couldn't keep his mouth shut and blurted it out. Anyway, that's the truth of it."

Wu Song laughed when he heard all this, and said: "This Door-God, how many heads has he got and how many arms?"

"Just one head and two arms, what do you expect?"

"Well, supposing he had three heads and six arms now, and all the strength of Nazha the Ogre, then perhaps I might be afraid of him. But you say he's only got one head and two arms and he's nothing like Nazha. So what's there to be afraid of?"

"I just don't have the strength or the skill to defeat him."

"I don't want to brag but all my life I've used what powers I have to combat bullying and injustice. If it's like you say, then why are we sitting here? If you've got some wine, bring it along, we'll drink it on the way. I'm going there with you right away. You'll see, I shall give that scoundrel the same treatment I gave the tiger. And if I should punch him a bit hard and he dies, well, I'm quite prepared to forfeit my life."

"Sit down, brother, please. Wait till my father comes. We'll go when the time's right, there's no point in rushing things. Tomorrow I'll send someone to reconnoitre and find out if our man is at home. If he is, we'll go the next day. If he's away we'll reconsider. It would be a pity to go all the way there for nothing. Besides, we might just alert our quarry and give him a chance to play some trick on us."

"Small wonder he defeated you!" Wu Song replied impatiently. "That's not the way a man does things. If we're going to do it, come on! Forget all this talk about today and tomorrow, let's go! What difference does it make if he's expecting us or not?"

Just at this moment, as the son was attempting in vain to restrain Wu Song, the father came out from behind the screen and said: "Bravo! I've been listening to you all this time. I'm delighted to see you. Your presence here is like a ray of sunshine, so far as this son of mine is concerned. Please come with me into the back room for a moment."

Wu Song followed him inside. The Warden requested him to be seated.

"I am a convict, Your Honour, how can I sit in your presence?" Wu Song said.

"Nonsense! My son is most fortunate to have found a champion of your stature. There's no call for false modesty."

So Wu Song, with a deprecatory bow, sat down. But the Young Master remained standing. "Why don't you sit down too?" Wu Song said to him.

"In the presence of my father?" he replied. "Please brother, just make yourself comfortable." "How can I, with you standing like that?"

"If that's how you feel, since there's no one else present ..." said the Warden, motioning his son to sit down.

Servants brought wine, fruit and nuts and a variety of other snacks. The Warden with his own two hands offered Wu Song a cup, saying: "Everyone pays tribute to your great courage, my friend. Now, this business venture of my son's at Happy Woods, it's not just a question of personal gain, you know, it actually helps Mengzhou to grow, improves the tone of our district, you might say. But that so-called Door-God has seized control by force, in full public view. Without the benefit of your help there's no way we can satisfy our need for revenge. Don't refuse my son. Empty this cup of wine, accept his sincere homage and allow him, as a mark of the respect in which he holds you, to call you elder brother."

"I have no talent or learning, who am I that your son should honour me like this?" Wu Song said. "It's tempting fate to accept unmerited praise." But he drank the wine and the Young Master prostrated himself four times. Wu Song immediately returned the compliment and henceforth they called each other brother. Wu Song went on drinking enthusiastically that day till he was very drunk and had to be helped to his room. We say no more of this.

Next day father and son had a talk. "Wu Song was dead drunk last night," they agreed, "he must be still affected. How can we expect him to go today? We'd better pretend the man we sent to reconnoitre has told us the enemy is not at home and we have to postpone the mission." So the Young Master went to Wu Song and said: "It can't be today. The scout has learnt that the fellow is away. Let us go tomorrow after lunch."

"No matter," said Wu Song. "If it has to be tomorrow, it gives me another day to stoke up my anger."

When they had breakfasted and drunk tea, the Young Master and Wu Song went for a stroll outside the camp. On their return they discussed spear technique and compared some moves with the fist or staff. Since it was midday, the Young Master invited Wu Song to the residence and ordered wine for him and some dishes to go with it. Impossible to say how many cups were drunk. But Wu Song began to notice that when he wanted to drink the Young Master only pressed more food on him, and he started to feel rather annoyed. After lunch they parted and Wu Song went back to the guest-room. When the two servants came to prepare his bath, Wu Song asked: "Your Young Master today kept urging me to eat more but he wouldn't offer me any more wine. Why was that?"

"I can tell you about that, sir, because actually this morning the two of them was talking about it. They wanted you to go today, see, only they thought you was pissed last night. They was afraid you couldn't bring it off 'cos you'd have a hangover. That's why they didn't want to give you wine. They're going to ask you to go and finish the business tomorrow."

"You mean they think that if I'm drunk I'll make a mess of it?"

"That's about the size of it."

That night Wu Song couldn't wait for dawn to come. He rose early and washed and rinsed his mouth. He put on a swastika scarf and an earth-coloured tunic, tied at the waist with a red satin belt. He bound his legs with gaiters reaching to the knee and wore eight-buckled canvas shoes. He stuck plasters over the convict's tattoos on his cheeks. Soon the Young Master came to take him to breakfast in the residence. When Wu Song had eaten and drunk tea, the Young Master said: "A horse is ready for you in the stables."

"There's nothing wrong with my legs, what do I need a horse for," Wu Song said. "There's just one thing I need you to do for me."

"Tell me what it is without fear. I couldn't possibly refuse."

"When we leave the camp, I want to observe the rule of 'For every sign take three'."

"Tell me please, what is this rule? I've never heard of it."

"I'll explain. If you want me to defeat the Door-God, every time on our journey we lay eyes on an inn sign, you must invite me to have three bowls of wine. Without those three bowls you won't get me past an inn. That's the rule of 'For every sign take three'."

This gave the Young Master pause. "From the East Gate to Happy Woods, it's a good five miles," he said. "Establishments where they sell wine, well, at a guess there must be twelve or thirteen of them. Three bowls in each, that'll come to something like thirty-six bowls before we get there. You'll be drunk, won't you? Then how can you deliver the goods?"

Wu Song found this exceedingly funny. "You think if I'm drunk I don't have strength," he said. "But it's the opposite, if I'm not drunk I don't have strength. With a little drop of wine in me I've got a little bit of strength, if I'm half drunk I've got half my full strength. But when I'm completely drunk something seems to inspire me! If I hadn't had all the force of being drunk, how do you think I'd have killed the tiger on Jingyang Pass? I was totally pissed that day and I did the job easily, I was brim-full of strength and energy."

"I didn't realize you were like that," said the Young Master. "Our wine is very good, too, I was just afraid that if you got too drunk you wouldn't be able to do the job, that's why I didn't offer you more and let you drink your fill. Since the wine only increases your strength, we'd better send two of the servants on ahead with some of our good wine, some fruit and nuts and other dishes, to wait for us along the road. Then we can enjoy the journey."

"Now that's very much to my liking," said Wu Song. "That'll put me in exactly the right mood for tackling the Door-God. Without wine, I might not know how to go about it. I'm going to knock him into kingdom come for you, people will laugh to see him in such a state."

The Young Master made the arrangements at once, sending two servants off with the wine and food on a carrying-pole, providing them also with a small sum of cash in coppers. Meanwhile the Warden, unbeknownst to the others, selected a dozen stalwart men whom he ordered to follow at a distance in case there was need of assistance.

So the Young Master and Wu Song set off from the Fortress of Peace, leaving Mengzhou by the East Gate. They had not gone more than a few hundred yards when beside the highroad they saw an inn, its sign sticking out from under the eaves. The servants were there already, waiting for them. The Young Master invited Wu Song inside and made him sit down. The servants had the wine ready and were about to serve it, when Wu Song said: "None of your tiny cups, please. Serve it in big bowls and make sure there are three of them." The servants accordingly produced big bowls and poured the wine. Wu Song did not hang back. He drank off three bowls at once and rose to go. The servants hurriedly cleared up the things and rushed on ahead. Wu Song gave a satisfied smile. "That's beginning to work now. Let's go!" he said. So off they went.

It was late summer, fiercely hot, though a little autumn breeze had started up, and the two men loosened their clothing. They had not gone half a mile when they came to a place not quite big enough for a village, where they could see another inn sign emerging from a clump of trees. Penetrating this grove, they found themselves before a little country inn:

Along the old road in the village stands an inn beside a stream. Willows cast deep shade before the door, lotus are aflutter in a pool; the inn flag dances in the autumn breeze, a short screen of rushes excludes the sun's harsh rays. On the dresser pitchers of rough wine glimmer, by the stove a heady young brew steams. Even before a bottle is unstoppered the scent carries five miles, making three neighbouring households drunk.

The Young Master paused at the door and said: "This is just a country tavern, selling cheap rough wine, do you have to drink here?"

"Sour or salt, sharp or rough — just as long as it's wine, I've got to have my three bowls. That's the rule, 'For every sign take three'."

So in they went and sat down, while the servants produced fruit and nuts to go with the wine. Wu Song drank off his three bowls and got up to go. The servants hurriedly cleared up and rushed off again. The two friends left the inn and in less than a mile they found another inn beside the road. Wu Song entered, drank his three bowls and left. But enough of this. Wu Song and the Young Master continued their journey thus: at each inn Wu Song entered and drank his three bowls. Yet although he must have drunk something like ten bottles, he was not, so far as the Young Master could see, drunk.

"How much further is it to Happy Woods?" Wu Song asked his companion.

"Not far. Do you see that wood over there, on the horizon? That's it."

"Since we're nearly there, you'd better go and wait for me somewhere. I'll go and find him on my own."

"That's fine by me. I know where to go. But do be careful. Don't underestimate him."

"Don't worry about that. Just tell the servants to stay with me. If there are any more inns on the way I shall want to drink more."

The Young Master told the servants to follow the same procedure as before and then went his own way, while Wu Song continued on. In a little more than a mile he downed another nine cups or so. It was around noon and the sun was exceedingly hot, in spite of the light breeze, and the wine began to mount to his head. He opened the front of his tunic. Although less than three quarters drunk, he pretended to be totally intoxicated, deliberately lurching and stumbling, tilting one way, then swaying back. When he reached the wood, the servants pointed and said: "That's Jiang, the Door-God's inn, over there where the road forks."

"We've arrived then," said Wu Song. "You lot had better go and hide and keep well clear till I've knocked him out." Skirting the wood in order to approach from behind, he saw a man in a white linen tunic, built like the wooden guardian at a temple door. This character had set up a folding chair under a locust tree and was sitting there with a fly whisk in his hand, enjoying the cool. Here's the description of him:

The face devilish, the countenance coarse; the body a mass of purple flesh, with bulging blue veins; the face adorned with brown curling whiskers and a few wild strands beside the lips. Crazy staring eyes, glinting beneath the brows like stars. This is truly one of the two ugly door-gods, not the god-like semblance of a hero!

Still feigning drunkenness, Wu Song staggered along, casting sideways glances at the man and saying to himself: "That big fellow must be the Door-God." He gave him a wide berth. Thirty or forty paces further on at the fork in the road he came upon an impressive inn. A flag-pole sticking out from under the eaves carried a sign on which was written in four large characters: "Bellavista Wines and Beverages." A closer look revealed a green railing in front of the entrance on which were displayed two banners respectively bearing the following messages, in gold characters: 'In drunkenness the world grows bigger' and 'In the wine pot the days grow longer.' An outhouse on one side of the inn yard contained a butcher's table, with chopping-block, chopper and other tools of the trade, while on the other side was a stove and firewood for making steamed bread; inside the main building was a row of huge wine vats, half buried in the ground and more than half full. In the middle was a counter behind which sat a very young girl: this was in fact the Door-God's concubine, recently acquired in Mengzhou, where she had been a hostess in one of the houses of pleasure in the entertainment district and known for her renderings of operatic songs.

Leering drunkenly at the girl, Wu Song erupted into the room and sat down at a place opposite the bar. Pressing both hands on the table, he ogled the girl, who responded by turning her head away.

There were five or six waiters on duty. Wu Song pounded the table and shouted: "Who's in charge here?" A waiter approached and asked: "'Ow much wine was you wantin', sir?"

"I'll have two measures first, just to try."

The waiter went to the bar and asked the girl to serve out two measures of wine. From the bucket she ladled out a bowl and warmed it, then presented it to Wu Song, saying: "'Ope you enjoys it, sir."

Wu Song picked it up and smelt it. He shook his head. "This is dreadful stuff, dreadful! Change it!"

The waiter saw he was drunk. He went back to the bar and said: "Better just give him something else, miss."

The girl took the wine and poured it away, then drew off some wine of a better quality. The waiter warmed a bowl and took it to Wu Song, who sipped and exclaimed: "This isn't any good either! Change it, double quick, or you'll be sorry."

Swallowing his annoyance, the waiter took the wine back to the bar and said: "Reckon as 'ow you'll 'ave to change it again, miss. Best not to argue — 'e's drunk an' 'e's looking to pick a quarrel. Just give 'im some of the best."

The girl ladled out some of the best wine and gave it to the waiter, who set the pitcher down and warmed a bowl. Wu Song drank it and said: "Now, this is more like it!" After a while he asked: "Tell me, waiter, what's the owner's name?"

"'Is name's Jiang," the man replied.

"Are you sure it's not Pimp?" Wu Song said, smirking.

The girl heard this and said to herself: "The swine's pissed, he's come here looking for trouble."

The waiter said to her: "'E's from the back of beyond, you can see that, 'e don't know nothink, don't you listen to 'is bleedin' nonsense!"

"What was that you said?" Wu Song asked.

"It's a private conversation," the waiter said. "Just shut up and drink your wine!"

"Waiter, tell the young lady behind the bar to come over here and have a drink with me," Wu Song said.

"Are you crazy or something? She's the boss's woman."

"So what? That doesn't prevent her having a cup of wine with me does it?"

"You lousy beggar!" the girl shouted in a fury. "You oughter be dead!" She flung open the bar flap and was about to rush out.

But Wu Song had already slipped his arms out of that earth-coloured tunic of his and knotted the sleeves around his waist. Pouring the pitcher of wine over the floor, he dashed behind the bar, colliding with the girl. With Wu Song's strength what hope did she have against him? One arm grasped her by the waist, while the other demolished her elaborate coiffure. Lifting her bodily over the bar, he hurled her towards where the wine was stored. With a resounding splash, the unfortunate girl landed right in the middle of a big vat of wine. As Wu Song bounded out from behind the bar, some of the more athletic waiters tried to rush him. Wu Song was ready for them. He caught one and lifted him easily, flinging him away so that he landed head first in a wine vat. Another charged and he grabbed him by the head and hurled him into another wine vat. Two more charged and he knocked them both down, one with a punch and the other with a kick. The first three were now in the wine vats and struggle as they might they could not get out. The next two lay motionless on the floor. Most of the establishment's forces had now been reduced to a pile of shit. There was just one who got away. "That bastard's gone off to get the Jiang the Door-God," Wu Song said to himself. "I'd better go and meet him. If I beat him up out on the road, it'll give the people something to laugh at." So saying he strode out of the inn.

The other waiter had indeed rushed off to tell Jiang the Door-God. The latter received quite a shock. He struggled to his feet, knocking over the folding chair and flinging away the fly whisk. Wu Song was waiting for him. They met in the middle of the road. Now although Jiang the Door-God was big, his strength had been sapped by recent bouts of drinking and sex, together with the unexpectedness of the event. He was in such a hurry he had no time to stop and think. Wu Song was built like a tiger and equally determined to beat him. Deceived by Wu Song's appearance of drunkenness, the Door-God rushed in without thinking. It's slow in the telling but happens in a flash. Wu Song started by feinting with a right and left to the head, then turned suddenly and danced away. Enraged, the Door-God lunged after him and was caught with a flying kick to the groin. As he doubled up, clutching himself with both hands, Wu Song whirled around and caught him again with his right foot, fair and square on the temple, toppling him over backwards. Stepping forward and planting a foot on his chest, Wu Song raised that fist the size of a barrel and began pounding him in the face.

Now this routine we have just described — that's to say, feinting with both hands, turning, kicking with the left foot, landing, turning again and kicking with the right foot — has a name. It's called 'jade bracelet steps and mandarin duck footwork.' It was something Wu Song had practised all his life, he had no equal for it.

Jiang the Door-God now lay beaten on the ground and crying for mercy. "I'll spare you, but only on three conditions," Wu Song told him.

"Spare me sir, I beg you. Even three hundred conditions, I accept them all," cried the Door-God, prostrate at Wu Song's feet. Pointing a finger at Jiang, Wu Song proceeded to tell him the 3 conditions. And as a result, certain changes occurred c hanges are made to head and face, a new master is sought; the hair is cut, the eyebrows plucked, a man goes forth to kill.

"Sir, please select the more important part, and tell me that at once without any attempt at literary skill," said Wu Song.

"In my youth I had a teacher who trained me so well that I got the nickname in the Mengzhou district of the 'Golden Eyed Tiger Cub.' Just outside the East Gate of this town there is a market place called 'Kuaihuo Forest.' The merchants there all come from Shandong and Hebei provinces. At that spot there are over one hundred inns and about thirty gambling dens, besides many money-changing shops. Previously I relied upon my athletic skill and opened an inn there where I employed about eighty criminals as assistants, and supplied all the gambling dens, shops, and inns with meat and wine. Moreover, all the prostitutes who came to that place had to see me first, and I controlled their affairs. I made plenty of money, and every month my income was about three hundred taels of silver.
"Recently a Drill Instructor named Zhang came here with a man named Jiang Zhong from East Luzhou. The latter is a tall fellow—over six feet high, and because of this, people give him the nickname Jiang the 'Door God.' He is quite skilled with lance and cudgel, and also at hand combat. He used to boast that no man is his equal in those matters, that for three years he has established himself with no rivalry and that no one throughout the empire can contend with him. He once fought with me over the Kuaihuo Forest and gave me such a beating that I was confined to my bed for two months. When you arrived here I had my head bandaged, and my arm in a sling, and even now I have not quite recovered. I was waiting until I could find a man who would fight him, because he has the soldiers from Drill Instructor Zhang who would easily repulse any attack that I could make. I am extremely annoyed because I cannot avenge myself. I have heard that you are a great hero, and if I could get you to help me against this boastful fellow and get my hatred satisfied, I would be contented even on my death. I was afraid that after your hard journey you would not be in good health so I gave instructions that you were to be fed and treated well. I would wait until you recover your full strength, and then we can discuss the matter. I did not expect that my servant would have broached the matter so soon, but as he has told you, I cannot conceal the real situation from you."
"How many heads and arms has this Jiang the 'Door God'?" asked Wu Song laughingly.
"Of course," replied Shi En, "he has only one head and two arms. How could he have more?"
Wu Song laughed again and said, "I thought that perhaps he had three heads and six arms, like Nezha, son of Li Jing, but as he is only an ordinary man why should I be afraid of him?"[1]
"As I have no particular skill I cannot oppose him successfully," said Shi En.
"I do not wish to boast, but I am always confident in my own skill to fight the strong but evil men of the empire. Now this being the case why should I remain here? I will go straightway without waiting for another drink. You come with me, and see how I crush that beast. I will forfeit my life if I happen to kill him with my fist."
"Elder brother, please wait a bit," said Shi En, "until my father arrives. If he approves of our plan you can go. We must not be reckless in this matter. We had better send a man tomorrow to inquire whether Jiang the 'Door God' is at home, and if he is there then we can go the following day, and if he is not there then of course we shall have to wait. If we went there without preparation it would only scare him out of his cover, and he would be on his guard hereafter."
Wu Song was anxious to go, and said, "Sir, do you think he would try to hit me if I went there? Is this a man's job? Let us go at once and not wait for any tomorrow. If we are decided then we must go at once, and not be afraid of any preparation he may make."
Shi En could not induce him to alter his mind, and just as he had given up the idea, the warden came from behind a screen close to where they were sitting, and said, "Hero, I have been eavesdropping for some time. Today I am very fortunate in meeting such a hero. My son is as enlightened as beholding the sun blazing forth from a cloudy sky. I request you to come with me to an inner room where we can have a chat for a short time."
They accordingly adjourned to the inner room where the warden asked Wu Song to be seated, but the latter declined as he was a criminal, and dared not be seated in the presence of an official.
"Do not talk like that," replied the warden. "Hero, my stupid son has been extremely fortunate in meeting you so why should you be so polite?"
Wu Song begged to be excused, and then sat down, but asked why Shi En should not also sit down.
"My father is sitting with you, please do not worry about me."
"If you remain standing I shall not feel comfortable," said Wu Song.
"Hero," said the old warden, "as you take things like this I will ask my son to be seated, seeing that there is no other person present."
The servant brought in wine, food, and fruit, and the old man personally offered a cup of wine to Wu Song, and said, "Hero, who would not pay respect to such a brave man as you? Previously my son was engaged in some business at the Kuaihuo Forest, not for coveting wealth and profits, but to improve the prospects of the town, and add something to the atmosphere there. It was unexpected that such a man as Jiang the 'Door God,' relying solely on his brutal strength, could have taken the trade from him, This injury and wrong would never be avenged without such a hero and righteous warrior as you. I hope that you will not forsake my son, and if you will pledge me by drinking this cupful of wine, my son will give you four kowtows, and respect you as his elder brother."
"I am not skillful in arms so how dare I receive your son's respects? If I should vainty would ruin my chances of old age." He however drank the wine, and Shi En kowtowed to him four times. Wu Song hurriedly returned the respects, and made a sign of their brotherhood.
That day Wu Song was very happy, and so drunk that he had to be led to his room by a servant.
The next day the old official spoke to his son, Shi En, "Yesterday Wu Song got quite intoxicated so how can we ask him to start on that errand? We had better get a man to tell him that Jiang the 'Door God,' is away from home just now, and that he had better wait for a day or two."
So Shi En went himself to Wu Song, and spoke to that effect. He said they might start off the following day.
"Tomorrow will do just as well," said Wu Song. "But I have to keep my anger for one day."
So after they had had breakfast they went together for a stroll in front of the hall. They discussed matters relating to military drill, fencing, and fighting. At noon they had their meal together, and Shi En noticed that Wu Song was liable to get drunk again before the day was out so he served few cups of wine. After lunch they both retired to their own quarters. Two servants brought hot water for Wu Song to have a bath. Wu Song asked them, "How is it that at lunch there was such a lot of food and so little wine?"
"We dare not deceive you," replied the servants. "This morning the old warden and his son were talking about you. They noticed that you had drunk a lot of wine, and they were afraid that if you had plenty of wine today it might delay the business they have in view for you. Therefore they did not offer you much wine. Tomorrow they will certainly ask you to undertake that affair."
"It means that if I get drunk the matter will be spoiled?"
"That is what they thought," replied the servant.
That night Wu Song awaited the daybreak with impatience. As soon as it was daylight he got up, and after a wash, put on a turban with a "Wan 〃swastika decoration; a coat of yellow color with a waist belt of red silk; hempen shoes, with puttees folded up to the knees. He told the servant to bring him a plaster which he put on his face to cover the branded mark there indicating that he was a criminal.
Shi En soon came, and invited him to have breakfast with them. After the meal Shi En told him that there was a horse standing at a trough at the back, ready for him to ride.
"My feet are not small," said Wu Song, "so why should I ride? There is one matter however that I should like you to attend to."
"Elder brother, speak plainly, as there is nothing that I would not do for you."
"When you go with me outside the town I want you to give me a 'don't pass one without three.'"
"What is that?" asked Shi En. "I do not understand you."
Wu Song laughed and replied, "I will tell you. When you want me to fight Jiang the 'Door God,' you will invite me to drink three cups of wine at each inn we pass by on our way. If I do not get three cups of wine then I shall not be able to go any further. That is the meaning of 'don't pass one without three.'"
Shi En said, "From here to the Kuaihuo Forest is about five 〃; and on the way there are about twelve inns. So if you have three cups at each inn that will be thirty-six cups of wine before we get there. You will get drunk, and that will make you unable to succeed in the matter."
Wu Song laughed, and said, "Are you afraid that I will get drunk, and then not be able to do the work? But if I get no wine I shall be unable to act. If I have only a little wine I cannot do much business; if I get only half I can do only half; but if I get a full quantity I can exert all my strength and skill and do anything. If I get drunk I have great courage. If I had not been drunk how could I have killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge? When I fight with Jiang the 'Door God,' I must be drunk, and then I shall be able to exert my power to the full."
"I did not know that you were like this," said Shi En. "We have plenty of good wine here, but I was afraid that if you get drunk, you would not be able to attend to business. Therefore last night I did not offer you, my elder brother, much wine. But as things are as you say, then I will tell two servants to get a good supply of wine, and eatables, and take them ahead so that you can partake of them stage by stage on our journey."
"That is just my idea," said Wu Song, "and it will encourage me in fighting against Jiang the 'Door God.' If I had no wine how could I exert all my skill? Now let me give him a good beating today so that many people will have a loud cheer."
So Shi En prepared a lot of wine and food, and also plenty of cash, and sent two servants with them in advance. His father also secretly selected about twenty stout men to form a rear guard in case of need.
Shi En started off with Wu Song, and when they were about three hundred paces from the East Gate of Mengzhou they saw an inn at the side of the road. There they found the two servants, who spread the food and wine on a table. Shi En invited Wu Song to sit down and partake of the feast.
"I do not want small cups," said Wu Song. "Bring me three big bowls."
The servants brought three large cups, and filled them with wine. Wu Song without any ceremony drank the wine, and immediately got up. The servants hurriedly packed up the things, and went off again ahead of Wu Song.
Wu Song laughed, and said that he now felt much better in his stomach. They started off again. It was then the month of July, and the weather was very hot, with refreshing breezes. They loosened their coats. They had not gone a third of a 〃when they came to a few houses on the roadside, and there among some trees was another inn. Upon coming closer they saw that it was a small inn which sold homemade wine.
Shi En stopped and asked, "This is only a very small inn—shall we stop here?"
"It will do. I will drink only three cups of wine," said Wu Song. "If I cannot get three cups of wine we cannot go on."
They entered the inn, and the servants again spread the food and wine on the table. Wu Song again drank three cups of wine. The servants packed up the things, and went on ahead.
The two men resumed their journey, but they had not gone a 〃before they came to another inn. There again Wu Song drank three large cups of wine. We need not recite how many times they went through this process of drinking wine, but after about ten inns Shi En saw to his surprise that Wu Song was by no means drunk.
Wu Song at last asked how far they were from the Kuaihuo Forest Village. Shi En replied that it was in the forest which they could now see in the distance. Wu Song asked Shi En to wait for him in some other place as he would go himself and find his man. Shi En agreed to this, but he asked Wu Song not to treat his opponent too lightly.
"Never mind," said Wu Song. "Let these two servants go with me, and show me the way. If we come to any more inns however, I will still stop and drink wine."
Shi En instructed the servants accordingly, and he then departed.
In the next 〃Wu Song drank about ten cups of wine. It was getting near noon, and the day was very hot with only a little cooling breeze. Wu Song was beginning to feel the effect of the wine, and he unloosened his clothes. He was not quite drunk, but pretended to be intoxicated and staggered along. When they reached the forest the servants pointed out the inn belonging to Jiang the 'Door God,' which was at a crossroad.
Wu Song told the servants to hide themselves some distance away, and that they were only to come for him when he had given Jiang a good beating. He then entered the forest by the back entrance. He came across a very big man, dressed in a white silk gown, with a fly whisk in his hand. He was seated in a chair in the shade of an ash tree. Wu Song exaggerated his stumbling gait, but did not omit to steal glances at the man whom he thought must be Jiang the 'Door God.' Wu Song however continued on his way, and he had not gone more than about fifty strides when he came to the crossroad where there was an inn with a long pole sticking out from the eaves flying a cloth flag bearing four characters meaning, "Delectable Snuggery." As he came to the front he saw a green varnished railing, with two flags on which were golden characters, reading:

"When, drunk the universe seems big,
In the pot there is plenty of time."

On the one hand inside the railing was a stall with meat, and a large chopping block, with knives, choppers, etc. On the other side was a stall with bread on it, and a steam stove. Further inside were three big jars arranged in a line half sunk into the ground and half full of wine. In the center of the room there was a counter with a young woman sitting behind it. She was Jiang the 'Door God's concubine, and had previously been a singsong girl. Looking askance at the girl Wu Song entered the room, and sat down on a chair just opposite to the counter. He placed both hands on the table, and deliberately stared at the girl. She turned her head away. Wu Song saw that there were about seven waiters in the inn. He tapped the table and called out, "Where is the proprietor of this establishment?"
A waiter came forward and asked Wu Song how much wine he wanted.
"I want four cups of wine," replied Wu Song, "just to see what it tastes like."
The waiter went to the counter, and got the wine from the girl, and placed it in a pan of hot water over a fire to warm. When quite warm he served it to Wu Song who smelt at it, shook his head and said, "Bad! Bad! Bad! Bring some better stuff!"
The waiter thought that Wu Song was drunk, and he went to the counter again, and whispered to the girl, "Please change this wine for him." The girl changed the wine for a better quality, and the waiter warmed it at the fire as before. When he served it Wu Song tasted it, and said, "This is also bad! Change it at once, and I will let you off this time."
The waiter smothered his rising anger, and went to the counter and said to the girl, "Please change this wine again and don't be captious with him. He is evidently drunk, and is in a quarrelsome mood." The girl changed it for a still better quality, and the waiter heated it on the fire as before. He served it to Wu Song who drank it, and said that it was much better. He then asked the waiter what was the name of his master. When Wu Song heard that it was Jiang, he asked why it was not Li. The girl hearing this called out: "Where did this man get drunk, and comes here to try and make trouble?"
The waiter remarked, "He is evidently a yokel from some other village, and he is just farting, not saying anything important."
"What do you say?" asked Wu Song.
The waiter replied: "We are just talking between ourselves. Guest, take no notice, and just drink your wine."
"Waiter, tell that girl at the counter to come here and drink wine with me."
"Don't be absurd!" said the waiter. "She is the wife of the proprietor."
"What does it matter if she is?" replied Wu Song. "It is not a serious thing if she drinks wine with me."
"You are dead!" yelled the girl. "You are a deadman!" Instantly she pushed open the wicket in the counter, and came forward. Wu Song jumped up, stripped off his upper garments, and tied them round his waist. Throwing a bowl of wine on the floor, he stepped towards the girl, and seized hold of her. His grip was so forceful that she could not move. One hand was round her waist, and the other hand stripped the ornaments off her head and dashed them to pieces on the ground. He then grasped her hair, lifted her over the counter, and dropped her in one of the wine kangs. There was a great splash of wine, and it was really pitiable to see the girl in such a position. There were several waiters who now rushed to attack Wu Song. But Wu Song was in no hurry. As they came up he quietly seized them, and dropped them one by one into the wine jars. Two of them he knocked down with his foot or fist. Those in the jars could not get out, and the two he had knocked down could not get up. They were all in a mess. One servant had however run away, and Wu Song knew that he was going to report the affair to Jiang the 'Door God,' so he went after him. He thought if he met him on the way it would only be an opportunity for people to watch the fun and enjoy the sport. The servant told Jiang the 'Door God,' who was startled, and jumped up knocking over the chair. He threw down his fly whisk and hurried off. He soon met Wu Song at a place where the road was quite wide. Jiang had been indulging in women and wine so that he was not strong and was startled at this unexpectedness. He saw that Wu Song was approaching like a tiger, and began to wonder how he should deal with him. He noticed that the latter appeared to be drunk so he decided upon a sudden attack. The movements of both were very rapid. Wu Song first shook both fists at Jiang, but stepped quickly to one side. Jiang angrily sprang forward, but Wu Song whizzed round and kicked Jiang in the crotch. Jiang clasped both hands to his crotch and stooped down. Wu Song kicked again, and striking Jiang on the forehead, knocked him backwards. Taking a step forward Wu Song planted his foot on Jiang's breast, and then stooped down to hit him in the face with both his great fists. Wu Song's methods of using his fists and feet is called, the "Jeweled Ring Swing" and the "Mandarin Duck Kick," and in both of these he was quite an expert. Jiang still lying on the ground pleaded for mercy. Wu Song replied that if he wanted to save his life he must agree to do three things. Jiang asked to be forgiven and said that instead of three Wu Song could make three hundred demands, and all would be agreed to.

Disguise is useful when one meets,
A bully who will disdain reason;
The hair is cut; the eyebrows trimmed,
When death demands a quick conclusion.

128

The Young Master makes 3 visits Shi En to the Condemned Cell of Death Row; Wu Song Goes Wild, Creates a Disturbance, & reaps havoc at Flying-Clouds Quay/Pond/Pool

"One," said Wu Song, "you must leave Happy Grove and return all equipment to its original owner Shi En the Golden-Eyed Tiger Cub. Who told you to take his things?"
"I promise, I promise!" Jiang said hastily.
"Two, I'm going to spare you today, but I want you to round up all the head toughs in Happy Grove and have them apologize for you to Shi En."
"I promise that, too!"
"After you've turned everything over I want you to leave Happy Grove and go back directly to your native village. You're not allowed to live in Mengzhou Prefecture. If you don't get out, I'll beat you up every time I see you. If I meet you ten times, I'll beat you up ten times! A light job will leave you half dead, a real going over will take your life! Do you promise?"
Jiang wanted very much to live. "Oh, yes, I do," he cried. "I agree completely!"
Wu Song hauled him to his feet. Jiang's face was black and blue, his mouth swollen, his neck twisted, blood flowed from a cut on his forehead. Wu Song pointed a finger at him.
"To a man who killed the huge tiger on Jingyang Ridge with only three punches and two kicks, what's a scurvy knave like you? Return everything to Shi En and be quick about it! You'll get another drubbing if you dally, and this time I'll finish you!"
Now that he knew his adversary was Wu Song, Jiang could only piteously beg for mercy.
By then Shi En and twenty or thirty stalwart soldiers arrived as reinforcements. But they saw that Jiang was already defeated, and they surrounded Wu Song delightedly.
"The original owner is here. Move out immediately," Wu Song directed. "And bring those other proprietors over to apologize, quick!"

"Please come and sit in the tavern, sir," said Jiang.
Wu Song went with his following. Wine was all over the floor. There wasn't a place you could set your foot. The two varlets were still trying to scramble out of the vats. The woman had just crawlingly emerged. Her face was battered, her soaked skirt was dripping wine. The waiters had long since disappeared.
Wu Song sat down with his party. "Clean this place up," he shouted.
Jiang got a cart for the woman, loaded on her belongings and sent her off. Then he found a few uninjured waiters and had them ask over the dozen or so other big personages. They all came and apologized to Shi En on his behalf. Jiang brought out his best wine, laid a table, and invited everyone to be seated. Wu Song asked Shi En to sit at the head of the table, above Jiang. A large bowl was placed before each guest, the wine was poured, and all drank several rounds. Wu Song then addressed the gathering.
"Honored neighbors, when I was exiled here after killing certain persons in Yanggu County I heard that this tavern had been taken by force by Jiang the Gate Guard Giant from Shi En, depriving him of his livelihood. You needn't think that Shi En is my master. There is nothing between us. It's just that I have always fought wicked men. If I see injustice on the road, I draw my sword and pitch in, even though it may mean my life! I meant to destroy Jiang today, and rid this place of a plague. But out of consideration for you honorable neighbors I decided to spare the rogue. I have ordered him to leave this district tonight. If he doesn't, the next time I meet him I'll do to him what I did to the tiger on Jingyang Ridge!"
When the guests heard that before them was Constable Wu, the famed tiger-killer, they all rose and apologized for Jiang. "Cool your wrath, gallant constable," they said. "Let him return the premises to its owner and move out."
Jiang was too frightened to speak. Shi En checked the equipment, and took over the tavern. Shame-faced, the big fellow thanked all present, loaded his belongings on a cart, and departed. Wu Song plied the neighbors with wine until all of them were drunk. It was late in the evening when they left. He slept right through till the following morning.
On hearing that his son had regained possession of the Happy Grove tavern, the old warden got on his horse and rode to thank Wu Song. He remained several days, drinking in celebration. Everyone in and around the village, learning of Wu Song's prowess, came to pay their respects. The tavern was repaired and went back into operation. The warden returned to Anping Stockade. No one knew where Jiang and his woman had gone, though Shi En sent men out to inquire. He devoted himself to business and thought no more of his former foe. Wu Song remained with him. Profits were from thirty to fifty per cent higher than before. The proprietors of the various other enterprises—the inns, the gambling houses, the money exchange shops—sent Shi En regular contributions, twice as much as before, and he gratefully honored Wu Song like a father. His fall control of Happy Grove was restored. Of that we'll say no more.

Time passed quickly. Soon a month had gone by. The heat gradually lessened, and jade-like dew brought coolness. The golden winds marked the end of summer and the beginning of autumn. To make a long story short, one day Shi En was chatting in the tavern with Wu Song of barehand fighting and staves and spears when three military men arrived at the gate, leading a horse.
They entered and asked the host: "Which one is the tiger-killer, Constable Wu?"
Shi En recognized them. They were adjutants of General Zhang Mengfang who commanded the garrison in Mengzhou Prefecture. Shi En walked up to them and said: "What do you want Constable Wu for?"
"The general has heard of Constable Wu's gallantry and has sent us with a horse to fetch him. Here is His Excellency's invitation."
Shi En read it. "Zhang is my father's superior," he thought, "and can give him orders. Wu Song, as an exiled prisoner, is of course also under him. He'd better go."
To Wu Song he said: "These gentlemen have been sent to fetch you by General Zhang. They've even brought a horse for you. What do you think, brother?"
Wu Song was a straightforward fellow who never beat around the bush. "Since he's sent for me, I'll go," he replied, "and see what he has to say."
He changed his clothes and head kerchief, summoned a servant to accompany him, got on the horse and went with his escort to Mengzhou Town. Before the general's residence he dismounted and followed the adjutants into the hall where Zhang was waiting.
The general was cordial. "Bring him here and let me meet him," he cried.
Wu Song came forward, kowtowed, then stood to a side with his hands clasped courteously.
"I've heard that you're a splendid man, a hero without peer, a fearless fighter who stands by his friends to the death. I need someone like you. Would you be willing to serve under me as an adjutant?"
Wu Song dropped to his knees. "I'm an exile in the prison. If your Excellency is kind enough to raise me, I will gladly be your groom, holding your whip and running by your stirrup!"
Zhang was very pleased. He ordered that tidbits and wine be brought and plied Wu Song with liquor until he was very drunk. Then he had him escorted to rest in a room prepared for him in a wing off the main building.
The next day a man was sent to Shi En's to fetch his things. Thereafter, Wu Song remained in the residence. The general frequently called him to the rear chambers to eat and drink. He was allowed to pass through any room, and was treated like a member of the family. A tailor was summoned to make him autumn clothes, new inside and out.
Wu Song was quite happy. "The general seems keen on advancing me," he thought. "Ever since I arrived he keeps me by his side every minute. I haven't even had time to go to Happy Grove and see Shi En. Although Shi En sends people to inquire about me, apparently they're not permitted to enter the residence."
The general was extremely partial to Wu Song. Whenever anyone sought Wu Song's help on some matter, he had only to make a request, and Zhang granted it. People outside sent him gifts of money and silks and satins. He had to buy a box of woven willow to keep them in, all under lock and key. But no need to speak of that.
Soon it was the eighth lunar month. General Zhang laid a feast in the Duck and Drake Bower deep in the rear courtyard to celebrate Mid-Autumn Festival. He invited Wu Song. When Wu Song saw that the general's wife and other female members of the household were present, he drank one cup and turned to leave.
"Where are you going?" the general called.
"With the ladies here, I had better withdraw."
Zhang laughed. "Nonsense. I respect you as a man of principle and especially invite you to drink with us like a member of the family. Why should you go?" He told Wu Song to sit down.
"I'm just a prisoner. How can I sit at the same table with Your Excellency?"
"Must you act like a stranger? There's no one here but our own people. It's perfectly all right."
Wu Song made several more polite attempts to leave, but the general wouldn't hear of it. He insisted that Wu Song join them. Finally, apologizing for his presumption, the young man sat, but a good distance from his host, and turned slightly on his chair so that he wouldn't be facing him directly. Zhang instructed the bondmaids to pour wine for Wu Song. After the constable had downed six or seven cups, the general ordered more fresh tidbits to go with the wine. Then two courses of food were served. Zhang chatted with Wu Song, asking questions about jousting with staves.
"A true man like you shouldn't be drinking from such a small cup," he said, and shouted: "Bring a big silver flagon for this warrior!"
Zhang's urgings to drink came at Wu Song like a flurry of arrows. He finished several flagons, and by the time the moon was shining in the east windows he was half drunk. Forgetting all courtesy, he continued drinking steadily.
The general ordered a bondmaid called Jade Orchid, of whom he was very fond, to sing a ballad. "There are no outsiders here," he said. "Only my trusted Constable Wu. Sing us a mid-autumn song about the moon. That's what we'd like to hear."
Jade Orchid took a pair of ivory clappers, came forward and curtsied to each of the diners. Then she sang a mid-autumn lay by the poet Su Dongpo. It went like this:

When is there a bright moon?
Ask the sky, cup in hand.
Who knows what year it is
In the palaces of heaven.
Long to go there, riding the wind,
But the cold I cannot stand
In that lofty jade firmament:
I dance alone with my shadow,
As if in another world.
With the beaded curtains rolled high,
The moonlight, streaming through the open window,
Drives away sleep.
I should not be resentful, but why
Is the moon always roundest at parting?
As people have their sorrows and joys, separating and reuniting,
So has the moon its bright and dark, waxing and waning.
Since ancient times, it has always been thus!
If we cannot for long be heart to heart,
Let us enjoy the same moon, far apart!

Her song finished, Jade Orchid put down her ivory clappers, again curtsied to each guest, and stood to one side.
"You serve a round, too," Zhang directed.
The young woman picked up a tray of cups and another bondmaid poured. Jade Orchid presented one to the general, one to his wife, and a third to Wu Song. Zhang ordered that they be filled to the brim. Too embarrassed to raise his head, Wu Song accepted the cup, keeping himself as far from Jade Orchid as possible. He hailed the general and his wife, lifted his cup, drained it, and returned it to the tray.
Zhang pointed at Jade Orchid. "She's quite intelligent," he said to Wu Song. "Not only does she sing, but she's very good with a needle. If you don't mind her humble origin, after a time we'll choose an auspicious day and give her to you as a wife."
Wu Song rose and bowed. "How can a man in my position accept a woman from Your Excellency's household? That would be pushing my luck too far."
The general laughed. "I've said so, and it must be done. Don't try getting out of it. I won't go back on my promise."
Wu Song drank another dozen cups, one after the next. Fearing that he might do something discourteous under the influence of liquor, he rose and thanked the general and his wife, then walked through the front hall to his room in the wing. As he opened his door, he could feel the wine stirring within him, and he knew he couldn't sleep. He changed his clothes, removed his head kerchief, took a staff, went into the garden and performed several exercises, whirling the staff above his head. From the look of the sky, it must have been about the third watch.
He returned to his room and was starting to undress when he heard voices in the rear courtyard shouting: "Thief! Thief!" Wu Song said to himself: "The general is so good to me. If there's a thief in his rear yard, I ought to lend a hand!"
He grasped his staff and strode to the rear courtyard. Jade Orchid approached him and said tensely: "A thief has gone into the garden!" Wu Song hurriedly searched among the flowers. He couldn't see a thing. As he was running out again, from the shadows someone threw a stool beneath his feet. He stumbled over it and fell. Six or seven soldiers, yelling "Catch the thief!," pounced on Wu Song and tied him up.
"It's me!" Wu Song cried in agitation. But the soldiers paid no attention. Lamps sprang to light in the large hall, revealing Zhang seated inside.
"Bring the thief here," called the general.
The soldiers, beating Wu Song with cudgels, drove him into the hall.
"I'm not a thief," he cried, "I'm Wu Song."
The general was furious. His face darkened. "Exile, your crooked heart never changed! I raised you back to respectability, never did you any harm. I even invited you to drink my wine, sit at my table! I was going to make you an official! How could you do such a thing?"
"Excellency, it wasn't me! I came to catch the thief. Why am I being held as the culprit? I have never stolen. I'm an honorable man!"
"You dare to deny it! Take him to his room and search. We'll see whether he has the booty!"
The soldiers took him to his quarters under guard and opened his willow trunk. Beneath some clothes were silver drinking vessels and about two hundred ounces of gold and silver.
Wu Song stared, gaping, and cried out he was wronged. The soldiers carried the trunk to the hall. Zhang examined its contents.
"Shameless exile! Here is the proof. How can you deny it? 'Any animal can be reborn, but the souls of men are difficult to change!' You look like an honest man but you're a habitual criminal! Your guilt is clear, no matter what you say!"
Zhang had the booty sealed, and said: "Keep him in a closed room tonight. We'll deal with the rogue in the morning!"
Wu Song groaned that he was wronged, but who would listen? The soldiers removed the valuables and locked him in a windowless room. That same night Zhang notified the prefect's office and dispensed money among clerks and scribes.
The next morning, as soon as the prefect started court, police and inspectors brought Wu Song before him and produced the booty. A confidant of Zhang's handed the prefect a letter from the general, setting forth how he had been robbed. The prefect ordered the attendants to bind Wu Song and hold him down. Warders and bailiffs placed the inquisition instruments in front of the prisoner. Before Wu Song could say anything, the prefect spoke.
"A scoundrel under sentence of distant exile, of course you'd turn thief! You saw the chance and couldn't resist. Since the proof is here, there's no point in listening to his lies. Beat him, hard!"
The jailers seized split bamboos and rained blows on the recumbent prisoner. Wu Song knew it was hopeless. He had no choice but to confess: "On the fifteenth of this month I saw many silver flagons in the residence of the general, and my greed was aroused. That night I stole them by guile and took them for myself."
"This rogue was tempted and he stole," said the prefect. "No question about it. Put a cangue on and take him to prison!"
The jailers affixed a long cangue around Wu Song's neck, led him off to the section for the condemned, and locked him in.
"Zhang set this trap to ruin me," he thought. "If I can remain alive and get out of here. I'll deal with him!"
But his legs were in fetters day and night and his wrists, were enclosed in wooden manacles. He wasn't allowed the slightest freedom.

Shi En had already been informed of what was happening, and he hurried into town to confer with his father. The old warden said: "Commandant Zhang must be behind this, getting revenge for Jiang the Gate Guard Giant. He no doubt paid General Zhang to lay a trap for Wu Song, and bribed high and low to do his bidding. I'm sure he wants to have Wu Song killed. But I've been thinking about this. Wu Song's crime does not call for the death penalty. All we have to do is buy a few clerks and bailiffs and we can protect him while he is in prison. Then we'll see what else we can do."
"The present bailiff is a man named Kang. We're very good friends," said Shi En. "Why don't I ask him to help?"
"Wu Song is being persecuted on your account. There's no better time to aid him than right now."
Shi En went to Kang's house with one hundred ounces of silver, but the bailiff had not yet returned from the prison. A member of Kang's family went to inform him of Shi En's arrival. Kang soon came home and the two friends met. Shi En told him the story in detail.
"I'll be frank with you, brother," Kang said. "This is all the work of those two pledged blood brothers with the same surname—Commandant Zhang and General Zhang. Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, who is hiding out in the Commandant's house, got him to buy over the general, and they cooked up this scheme together. All the others, high and low, have been bribed by Jiang. Every one of us has received his money. The prefect is bending over backwards to help him. They're surely aiming to have Wu Song killed.
"They haven't been able to do it legally because Clerk Ye does not agree to a death sentence. Ye is an upright and virtuous man who is strongly opposed to ordinary people being harmed. And so, Wu Song still hasn't suffered. Now that I've heard you, brother, I'll look after him in the prison. I'll see to it that he's well treated and not the least abused. Send someone to Clerk Ye quickly to plead with him to prepare the verdict quickly. That's the way to save Wu Song's life."
Shi En presented Kang with a hundred ounces of silver. The bailiff politely refused several times before finally accepting.
The friends parted and Shi En returned to the prison. He found a man who was close to Ye, and through him sent the clerk a hundred pieces of silver with a plea that he have the charge against Wu Song adjudicated as soon as possible. Ye knew that Wu Song was a chivalrous person. He wanted to aid him, in fact he had already marked the case as open to question. The prefect, having taken General Zhang's bribe, was opposed to leniency.
But burglary was not a capital offence, and so the matter dragged on, and the conspirators decided to have Wu Song killed in prison. Now that Clerk Ye had received the hundred ounces of silver and learned that Wu Song had been framed, he reduced the charges in the indictment and promised to get sentence passed the moment the preliminary detention period had ended.
The next day Shi En prepared a large quantity of food and wine and asked Kang to take him to Wu Song. They went directly to the big jail where he was incarcerated. Kang was already looking after him, and his restraints had been removed. Shi En, after dispensing twenty or thirty pieces of silver among the lesser keepers, gave Wu Song the food and drink he had brought.
"You've been framed by General Zhang to avenge Jiang the Gate Guard Giant," he whispered to Wu Song. "But don't worry. I've persuaded Clerk Ye to save you. He'll get you out of here as soon as the preliminary term is up and sentence is passed. Then we'll see."
With his fetters removed, Wu Song had been thinking of attempting a jailbreak. But Shi En's information caused him to abandon the idea. After reassuring Wu Song, Shi En returned to the stockade.
Two days later, he came again with more food and wine and money, and again Kang led him in. The fare he delivered to Wu Song, the silver he distributed among the keepers. He returned home and sent more largesse to high and low, urging them to hasten the adjudication. On his next visit, again conducted by Bailiff Kang, he brought some clothes, as well as meat and wine, and invited all the keepers to drink, so that they would be good to the prisoner. He asked Wu Song to change into fresh clothes and to partake of the wine and food.

Now that he was familiar with the routine, Shi En visited three times in a few days. He was seen by one of Commandant Zhang's confidants, who reported to his master. The commandant told the general, who sent an emissary with gifts to relay the information to the prefect. This greedy official wanted to be worthy of his bribe, and he dispatched an agent to hang around the prison and question any persons who did not belong there.
When Shi En learned of this, he decided not to risk going again. The bailiff and the keepers continued to look after Wu Song, and Shi En went often to Kang's home to get the news. Of that we'll say no more.

In the nearly two months that followed Clerk Ye made every effort to persuade the prefect. It was thus the official discovered that General Zhang had been given a large amount of silver by the Gate Guard Giant and, in conjunction with Commandant Zhang, had framed Wu Song.
"You've earned a pretty penny," the prefect thought indignantly, "and you want me to do your dirty work!" He lost his ardor in pursuing the matter.
At the conclusion of sixty days, Wu Song was brought before him, and the shackles removed. Clerk Ye read the indictment defining the crime. The prefect ordered a punishment of twenty blows and exile to the prison in Enzhou. The purloined property was returned to its original owner. General Zhang had no choice but to send a member of his household to bring it back.
Wu Song was beaten twenty strokes and tattooed with "the golden print" of a criminal. A seven-and-a-half-catty cangue was affixed around his neck, the necessary documents were drawn, two strong policemen appointed as escorts, and a time of departure designated. The prisoner and his guards set out immediately.
Because the old warden had spent money freely, and Clerk Ye had shown his concern, and the prefect knew he had been framed, Wu Song was beaten lightly. He suppressed his anger and left the town wearing the cangue, with the two guards following behind. They had gone about a //when Shi En emerged from a tavern along the highway.
"I've been waiting for you, brother," he said. His head and hand were again bandaged.
"We haven't seen each other in a long time. What's happened to you?"
"The prefect found out about my three visits to the jail, and he stationed a man inside to keep watch. General Zhang had his people patrolling outside the main gate. So I couldn't visit you any more. I could only get news at Bailiff Kang's home. Half a month ago Jiang the Gate Guard Giant returned to Happy Grove with a gang of soldiers. They beat me up and made me bring the neighbors to apologize. Then they took over my tavern and a lot of equipment. I've been in bed ever since. Today I heard you were exiled to Enzhou and brought these two padded tunics for you to wear on the road. And here is a brace of cooked geese, to eat when you get hungry."
Shi En invited the guards in for drinks, but they refused.
"This lout Wu Song is a crook," they said. "If we drank your wine, tomorrow there'd be all kinds of talk at the prefecture! Get away from us, if you don't want to be beaten!"
Clearly it was no time to argue. Shi En offered the guards ten ounces of silver, but they wouldn't take them. Angrily, they insisted that Wu Song get going. Shi En gave him two bowls of wine and tied a bundle of clothing around his waist, the geese he hung on the cangue.
"There are two padded tunics in the bundle," he said softly in Wu Song's ear, "and a small packet of silver. You'll need money on the journey. Also two pairs of hemp sandals. Be careful and alert. These knaves are up to no good."
Wu Song nodded. "That goes without saying. I know all about it. I'm not afraid of these two, or two more like them! Go home and rest, and please don't worry. I have some ideas of my own!"
Shi En kowtowed and, weeping, departed. Of that we'll say no more.
The prisoner and his escort proceeded along the highway. Before they had gone several more //, one of the guards whispered to his companion: "Any sign of the other two?"
Wu Song heard, and laughed coldly to himself. "So there are more of you rogues coming to get tough! Don't celebrate too friggin soon!"
His right hand was locked in the cangue, but his left was free, and with this he began eating one of the geese. He paid no heed to the guards. He finished the first goose by the time they had walked four or five //, then went to work on the second, holding it with his right hand and dismembering it with his left. Another five //and that goose, too, was completely consumed.
When they were still about eight or nine //from their destination, two men appeared on the road ahead, waiting with halberds and swords. They joined the prisoner and his escort and walked along with them. Wu Song observed his guards exchange significant glances with the newcomers. He was eight-tenths sure of what was impending, but he kept his own counsel and pretended to have seen nothing.
A bit further on, they came to an area of many fish ponds linked by streams and rivers. As the five men began crossing a wide-planked bridge, they passed an arch on which a placard read: "Flying-Cloud Ponds."
"What's the name of this place?" Wu Song deliberately asked.
"You're not blind," said the guards. "Can't you see the sign?"
Wu Song halted. "I have to take a piss." The two with the halberds started closing in on him. "Down you go," he cried. He lashed out with a leg and kicked one of them tumbling into the water below. The other was hastily turning when a kick from Wu Song's right foot sent him splashing to join his mate. The two guards fled the bridge in panic.
"Where do you think you're going?" Wu Song roared. He wrenched open the cangue and tore it in two, and raced after his quarry. One of them collapsed in fright. Wu Song caught up with the second and slammed him to the ground with a punch in the back. From the water he retrieved a halberd. A few stabs and the fellow expired. He then finished the other terror-paralyzed guard in the same way.
The two he had kicked into the stream had just struggled out and were starting to flee. Wu Song gave chase. He hacked one to the ground and seized the other.
"Tell the truth and live!"
"We two are apprentices of Jiang the Gate Guard Giant. He and Commandant Zhang told us to join forces with the guards and murder you!"
"Where is your master now?"
"When I left he was in the Duck and Drake Bower in the rear courtyard, drinking with the Commandant and the General. He's waiting for us to return and report!"
"So that's how it is. In that case, I can't spare you!"
Wu Song's hand rose and his blade descended. He killed the man, removed his sword, selected the best of his victims' blades for himself, and rolled the bodies into a pond. To make sure the guards were dead, he pierced them both again a few times with a halberd. Then he stood on the bridge and surveyed the carnage.
"Although I've finished these four varlets," he thought, "my hatred won't be appeased until I've killed General Zhang, Commandant Zhang, and Jiang the Gate Guard Giant!" Halberd in hand, he pondered silently. He made up his mind. He was going back to Mengzhou Town. And as a result, Wu Song destroyed greedy men and could breathe once more. Truly, the ornate hall was carpeted with corpses, the red festive candles shone on blood-steeped floors.

Now when Wu Song was treading down Jiang the Door-God and said: "If you want me to spare your life you must agree to three conditions," and the latter replied: "Just tell me what they are, I'll agree to them!", here is what Wu Song told him: "Condition number one is that you give up Happy Woods and restore it entire, with all its goods and chattels, to its rightful owner, the Young Master Shi En — incidentally, who told you to steal it from him in the first place?"
"Yes, yes, I accept," said the Door-God in a hurry.
"And number two is that you get all the bosses and leading lights of Happy Woods to come and beg forgiveness of the Young Master."
"Yes, I accept!"
"And number three, as soon as you've made restitution in full, you quit this place and take yourself back where you came from, double-quick. I don't want to see you in Mengzhou again. If you stay I shall beat you up every time I see you. As many times as I catch you, you'll get a beating, and you'll be lucky if I only half kill you. I might finish you off completely. Understood?"
"Yes, yes, yes, I accept everything!" the Door-God babbled, desperate to save his life.
Wu Song hauled him to his feet. His face was black and blue and his lips swollen; his neck was twisted sideways and blood was streaming from his temples. Pointing a finger at him, Wu Song said: "Look at you, you blackguard, you're nothing compared to the great tiger of Jingyang Pass which, with just three blows of my fist and two kicks I actually killed. You'll get exactly the treatment you deserve. So look sharp and make restitution. If I think you're dragging your feet, just the least little bit, I'll have your life!"
Now that he knew it was Wu Song he had to do with, Jiang couldn't have enough of ducking and bowing and pleading for mercy. At this very moment, the Young Master appeared at the head of the twenty or thirty stalwart troops who had been sent to lend a hand. When they saw Wu Song had already defeated the Door-God, they made no secret of their approval. Everyone crowded around him.
Wu Song made a sign to the Door-God and said: "The rightful owner is back, you can clear off now, but first tell everyone to come and apologize."
"Please come inside and sit down," the Door-God said.
When Wu Song and the others entered the inn, they found the floor was swimming in wine, while the two waiters and the woman still scrabbled at the sides of the wine vats. When the woman managed to drag herself out her face was bruised and her skirt was sopping, wet through with wine. The other waiters had vanished.
Wu Song and his friends sat down and the Door-God shouted: "You lot, look sharp, get the place cleaned up!" Next he ordered a cart. The woman's belongings were loaded onto it and she was dispatched. Then several unharmed waiters were found and sent off to the village to summon some of the bosses. When they arrived at the inn the Door-God had them apologize to the Young Master on his behalf.
Wine was brought, of the best, with some dishes; a table was laid and everyone was invited to sit. Wu Song gave the Young Master the place of honour, above the Door-God, and ordered big bowls for everybody. The wine was poured.
After several bowls, Wu Song rose to speak. "Gentlemen, when I was banished here, after killing someone in Yanggu, I heard that this establishment in Happy Woods, which had been set up as a trading centre by Mr. Shi the younger, had been misappropriated by Jiang the Door-God and a bunch of his thugs, who were thus depriving the rightful owner of his livelihood. Maybe you all think I'm working for the Young Master, but you're wrong, there's nothing between us. It is simply that I have always made it my habit to combat injustice. When I come upon something unfair I gird my loins and rush to help, without fear or favour. Today I intended to beat the life out of this Jiang and rid the world of a pest. But out of consideration for you I decided to spare him. However, I've told him he's got to clear out tonight. If he doesn't leave, next time he meets me he's going to end up like the tiger on Jingyang Pass."
When they understood that this was the Wu Song who killed the tiger of Jingyang Pass, they all expressed their regrets at Jiang's behaviour and said: "We beg you not to get excited. Just let him move out and restore everything to the owner."
Jiang was too scared to even open his mouth. The Young Master, after checking the inventory, repossessed the inn. The shamefaced Jiang thanked all present, obtained a cart, loaded his things onto it and took himself off. Of him we need say no more.
Wu Song now invited the neighbours and the celebrations went on till they were quite drunk. It was already late when they dispersed and Wu Song slept soundly till morning.
When the Warden heard that his son had regained control of the inn at Happy Woods, he mounted and rode over to thank Wu Song personally. The celebrations in Wu Song's honour continued for days. By now the people of Happy Woods all knew Wu Song's reputation and no one omitted to pay his respects. The inn was tidied up and repaired, and opened for business again. The Warden went back to the business of administering the Fortress of Peace.
The Young Master sent out spies to discover, if they could, where Jiang and his family had taken themselves off to, but their whereabouts remained a mystery. So he settled down to his work and paid Jiang no further heed. He invited Wu Song to stay on at the inn. The Young Master's business flourished, profits more than doubling. Every betting shop and stall in the place handed over money with interest. The Young Master had gained tremendous status from Wu Song, and he honoured Wu Song as he might his own mother and father. Of the Young Master and his continued management of Happy Woods we shall say no more. It was a case of:
What was obtained by force, to force again is lost;
Mostly the way of virtue's the way to gain the most.
Happy Woods once more o'erflows with happiness.
Evil requites the wicked, the innocent gain redress.
The days slipped by and soon a month had passed. The fierce heat of summer soon gave way before the autumn equinox. Fresh breezes dissipated the sultry heat. Autumn had arrived.
But to cut a long story short, one day when the Young Master was sitting in the inn chatting with Wu Song about martial arts, a couple of soldiers appeared at the inn door leading a horse. Entering, they asked the owner: "Which is Captain Wu Song, killer of the tiger?"
The Young Master recognized the speaker as one of the aides of the Mengzhou garrison commander, General Zhang Mengfang. He stepped forward and asked: "What do you want with Captain Wu?"
The officer replied: "His Excellency has heard that Captain Wu is a brave soldier. He has sent us with a horse to fetch him. Here is the order."
The Young Master examined it. Privately he was thinking: "General Zhang is my father's superior — my father is under his command and so also, as a convicted prisoner, is Wu Song. I'd better advise him to go."
So he spoke to Wu Song: "These officers have been sent from General Zhang's headquarters to fetch you. They've even brought a horse for you. What do you think you should do?"
Wu Song, always straightforward, didn't prevaricate. "Since he's calling for me, I'd better go and see what he wants." He changed his clothes and cap and accompanied by with one of the retainers mounted and rode with the officers to Mengzhou.
Arriving at the General's residence, he dismounted and followed the officers in, till they stood at the entrance to the hall where General Zhang awaited them. The General smiled to himself when Wu Song arrived. "Let him come in," he said, "I want to see him." Wu Song entered and saluted, then stood to one side respectfully with his arms crossed.
"I have heard you are a strong and valiant soldier," the General said, "the sort who fears no enemy, one who'd be loyal through thick and thin. I need such a man on my staff. Would you be prepared to serve as my personal aide?"
Wu Song knelt and thanked the General. "I am a convict from the prison camp," he said. "If you show me this enormous favour, of course I shall be your faithful servant, yours to command in any service."
General Zhang expressed his satisfaction. He ordered food and drink and plied Wu Song with wine till he was quite drunk. He had a room off the main gallery furnished for Wu Song to sleep in. Next day servants were sent to the Young Master's to fetch Wu Song's luggage. From now on Wu Song lived at General Zhang's and the General required his company at all hours, constantly inviting him into his own quarters to eat and drink. Wu Song had the run of the residence and was treated like one of the family. The General commanded a tailor to equip Wu Song with a complete set of autumn clothes.
Wu Song found all this very flattering. But he said to himself: "Apparently the General is determined to advance me. He hasn't once let me out of his sight since I came, and I've no time even to go and see the Young Master at Happy Woods, who's most likely been sending people to see me but they're not allowed in."
The fact is that since his arrival the General seemed to have taken a great fancy to Wu Song. If anyone with some official business requested Wu Song's help and Wu Song spoke to the General, the latter always agreed to everything. So people gave Wu Song gifts of gold and silver and silk and suchlike. Wu Song bought a wicker trunk and locked these gifts up in it. Of this no more.
Time sped by and soon it was the Mid-Autumn Festival. What a fine mid-autumn scene it was:
The jade disk shines coldly in the sky; the autumn breeze blows softly. On the path by the well the Wutong leaves are fallen; the pond is choked with weeds. Mournful is the cry of the first geese, anxious the music of the winter cricket. Tossing in the wind the willows are half stripped; glistening with raindrops the hibiscus flaunts its beauty. Autumn's breath even-handedly urges on the season's changes; moonlight envelopes river and hill.
To celebrate the festival, General Zhang arranged the feast in an interior court, beneath the Ducks and Drakes Tower, and he invited Wu Song. But when Wu Song saw that there were ladies present, he just drank one cup and was about to turn round and leave. The General stopped him with a shout: "Where do you think you're going?"
"Sir!" Wu Song replied. "You are feasting with the female members of your family, it is not correct for me to be here."
The General treated this as absurd. "Nonsense!" he said. "I respect you as a man of integrity and invited you on purpose to come and feast with us, like one of the family, why should you withdraw?" He told Wu Song to sit down.
"But I am a convict," Wu Song protested. "How can I sit with Your Excellency?"
"My dear fellow," the General said, "why be so difficult? There are no outsiders present, there's nothing to stop you sitting down."
Wu Song went on protesting his unworthiness and trying to leave, but the General would have none of it, and insisted that he sit down with them. In the end Wu Song saluted respectfully and seated himself as far away as possible, maintaining a respectful posture. The General told the maids to offer Wu Song wine. After half a dozen cups the General ordered more snacks and then a complete dinner was served — and repeated. All this time they chatted about martial arts.
"When real men drink, it shouldn't be from small cups," the General said. "Bring a big mug and pour for our friend here."
Wu Song was immediately served with several mugs of wine. Moonlight was now flooding through a window on the east. Wu Song was quite drunk. He had lost all his inhibitions and just kept on drinking.
The General called for one of his favourites, a girl called Yulan, to sing for them. Here's what Yulan was like:
Fair as a lotus, with cherry lips and eyebrows drawn in a curve like the blue line of distant mountains and, lying beneath, a pair of eyes bright as autumn waters. A graceful slender waist girt with a green skirt that allows but a precious glimpse of the feet. The white body delicately perfumed, the arms lightly encased in sleeves of scarlet silk. A peacock brooch to restrain luxuriant locks. Holding the ivory clappers high above her head she struts the stage.
So motioning to Yulan, the General said: "There are no outsiders here, no one but my good friend Captain Wu. Why don't you sing us some Moon Festival songs? Let us hear your voice."
Yulan picked up the clappers, curtsied and launched into a Mid-Autumn song by Su Dongpo:
When will the moon be bright again?
Cup in hand, ask the clear sky.
Who knows in the palaces of heaven what year
It is tonight? I would ride the wind there but fear
The cold of those remote and beauteous regions
Would be more than I could bear.
I shall get up and dance with shadows,

There is nothing like it among men.
The blind is pulled right up
And moonlight floods the room, banishing sleep.
Hate should not be. And why
Is the moon so often full at parting?
Men have their joy and grief, their partings and reunions,
The moon has its light and dark, waxing and waning.
It has ever been thus, that there is nothing perfect.
Let us just hope for life, and that miles apart
The sight of beauty may join our hearts.
When she had finished, Yulan put down the clappers, curtsied and stood to one side.
"Yulan, bring us a round of wine," said the General.
She took up a tray at once, while a maid filled the bowls. Then she took the wine round, offering it first to the General, then to his wife and finally to Wu Song. The General ordered the bowls to be filled to the brim. During all this, Wu Song would not raise his eyes. He received the wine where he sat apart, emptied the bowl in one go to the health of the General and his lady, and quickly put it back.
Pointing to Yulan, the General said: "This girl is clever and quick-witted, she's an excellent musician and a good hand at needlework. If you don't have any objection, I propose that within the next few days, whenever it's most auspicious, you can get married."
Wu Song jumped to his feet, bowed and said: "I am nobody, how could I possibly presume to marry somebody from Your Excellency's household? I should really be making a fool of myself."
"If I suggest it," said the general, "I mean it. There's no point in arguing. I never go back on my word."
By this time Wu Song had drunk a dozen bowls in quick succession and the wine was beginning to rush to his head. It is to be feared that he was no longer in complete control of himself. He rose to his feet and bowing to the General and his wife returned to his room off the main gallery. But when he went inside, he found the wine and food lay heavy on his stomach and he couldn't sleep. So he changed and took off his cap, picked up a club, and went to practise in the centre of the hall, under the light of the moon. After executing several movements, completing several routines, he glanced up and saw from the sky that it was well past midnight. He returned to his room and was about to undress and go to bed when he heard a cry of "Thief! Thief!" from the inner chambers of the residence. "The General has been so kind to me," he said to himself, "if there's a thief in his quarters it's my duty to go and help."
Seizing his club, he hastened to the inner chambers. Here he met the singer, Yulan, rushing out in a panic. "A thief has got in," she shouted, "he's gone into the garden!"
Club in hand, Wu Song dashed into the garden to investigate. He looked around but saw nothing. He turned and hurried back inside. But he failed to observe a wooden stool which was suddenly thrust out from the shadows, so that he tripped and fell. Immediately half a dozen soldiers appeared and shouted: "We've got him!" They fell on Wu Song and trussed him up with hemp rope.
"It's me!" Wu Song shouted. But they had no intention of letting him explain. At this moment a blaze of lamps and candles flooded the building. From the hall where he was sitting, General Zhang bellowed: "Bring him here!" The soldiers dragged Wu Song stumbling into his presence.
"I'm not the thief, I'm Wu Song," the captive shouted.
When he saw who it was the General exploded. His whole face changed. "You bloody convict!" he shouted. "So you're the thief, are you, a villain with the heart and soul of a dog! And I was fool enough to give you a leg up, to try to help you. I would have denied you nothing, why, I even asked you to drink with us, to sit and eat with us! I had plans for you, I would have given you an official post. Is this the way you repay me?"
Wu Song cried: "But sir, I've done nothing wrong! I came to catch the thief, how can you take me for the thief? I'm a man of honour, I don't do things like that!"
"Don't deny it, you shameless villain! Take him back to his room and search it for stolen goods."
The soldiers escorted Wu Song back to his room, where the wicker trunk was opened. On top there were a whole lot of clothes. Underneath they found silver wine cups and platters, a treasure trove of several hundred taels. Wu Song stood gasping in amazement, he couldn't believe his eyes. The soldiers carried the trunk back to the hall. On seeing it, the General burst out again: "You bloody convict, have you no conscience? The stolen goods have been found in your trunk, you can't deny it! It's right, what they say, 'You can't judge a man by his appearance.' On the outside you look like an ordinary human being, but inside you've the heart and soul of a thief! Now that there's proof you haven't a leg to stand on." He gave orders for the stolen goods to be put under seal and taken to the strong room for safekeeping and said he would deal with the thief in the morning. Wu Song loudly protested his innocence, but no one would listen to him. The soldiers, having disposed of the loot, placed him in a cell under guard. The General meanwhile had quickly sent someone to inform the magistrate and bribe the court officials.
Next day at dawn, when the court was already in session, with the magistrate, his assistants, bailiffs and guards all present, Wu Song was brought in. The stolen goods were produced and a confidant of the General's presented an affidavit giving details of the robbery. Having perused this document, the magistrate ordered his officers to tie Wu Song up. The gaolers then brought out the instruments of persuasion and placed them in full view. When Wu Song tried to explain, the magistrate interrupted: "This fellow is a banished convict, of course he's going to steal, no doubt the mere sight of riches was too much for him. In view of the fact that we have the stolen goods, clear evidence of the crime, there's no need to listen to his rubbish, just take him away and beat him soundly."
Each of the gaoler's assistants took a split bamboo and started raining down blows. Wu Song understood clearly that there was absolutely nothing he could do but submit and produce a confession: "On the fifteenth of this month I saw in the quarters of the General a quantity of silver wine cups and platters. My greed was aroused and I found an opportunity to purloin it under cover of night for my own personal advantage."
After this confession the magistrate said: "There you are! With this scoundrel it's simply a case of the mere sight of riches being too much for him, that's all there is to it. Take him and fit him with a cangue." The gaolers took Wu Song away, fitted the cangue and locked him away in a cell for condemned men.
When they took him down into the dungeons, Wu Song thought: "The awful thing is, it was all a trap that bastard General Zhang set for me, and I fell for it. If ever I come out of this alive he's going to be sorry!"
The gaolers committed Wu Song to the dungeons where he wore chains on his feet at all times and his hands were secured by wooden manacles, allowing him not the slightest relief.
Meanwhile, what of the Young Master? The matter had already been reported to him and he had gone hurriedly to the prison fortress to consult his father. "Obviously Captain Zhang is behind this, carrying out Jiang the Door-God's revenge on his behalf. He has bribed General Zhang and they concocted this scheme to destroy Wu Song," said the Warden. "No doubt he sent someone to pay off everyone concerned. After receiving money and gifts they wouldn't give Wu Song a chance to explain. Evidently they want him dead. But I've been thinking: Wu Song's crime does not merit the death penalty. All we've got to do is buy over a couple of gaolers and we can easily protect him whilst he's there. When he gets out we'll have to think of something else."
"The head gaoler at present is a fellow called Kang, who's a very great friend of mine," said the Young Master. "Suppose I go and ask him to help?"
"Well, it's on your account that Wu Song is suffering persecution, what better time to help him than now?"
The Young Master collected up a few hundred taels of silver and went off to see Kang the gaoler at his home. But Kang was out. The Young Master told one of his family to go to the gaol and inform him. In a little while Kang returned and spoke with the Young Master.
The Young Master told him the whole story. "I'll tell you the truth," said Kang. "All this is the doing of Captain Zhang and General Zhang. They've not only the same name, they're sworn blood brothers as well. At present Jiang the Door-God is hiding in Captain Zhang's house. He got the captain to bribe General Zhang and they cooked up this scheme between them. Jiang has bribed absolutely everybody, we've all had money from him. In the court the magistrate is quite ready to let him call the tune. They'd like to finish Wu Song off, but there's one person involved in the case, the clerk of the court, a fellow called Ye, who won't consent. That's the only reason they can't touch him. You see, this law official is an upright and honest man, he won't agree to the death of an innocent party, that's why Wu Song is still untouched. After what you've just told me, sir, I shall look after him myself, so far as the gaol is concerned. I'll go over there and make things a bit easier for him right away. In future he shan't suffer a moment's unease. What you'd better do is quickly send someone to talk to Mr. Ye and ask him to speed up the sentencing, then your man will be safe."
The Young Master took out a hundred taels of silver for Kang, but the latter refused. He refused three times before finally accepting it.
The Young Master left and returned to the fortress. He sought out someone who knew Ye well and sent him a hundred taels of silver, asking him to treat the case as urgent and get a sentence as quickly as possible. In fact Ye knew all about Wu Song's good qualities and was inclined anyway to help him. He had already classified the case as doubtful but knew the magistrate had received General Zhang's bribes and would not countenance a light sentence. However, the charge against Wu Song was one of theft, which was not a capital offence, so what they were aiming to do was to let the case drag on, while they planned a way of ending Wu Song's life in the gaol.
Now after receiving the hundred taels of silver from the Young Master and learning that Wu Song had been framed, the clerk of the court willingly reduced the charges in the indictment and agreed to help save Wu Song by procuring a sentence as soon as the preliminary detention was completed.
Next day the Young Master prepared great quantities of wine and food and got Kang to take him to the gaol and admit him to see Wu Song and give him the provisions. By this time Kang had already checked up on Wu Song and his conditions had been improved. The Young Master also took along twenty or thirty taels of silver which he distributed among the prison staff. As he took out the food and drink and encouraged Wu Song to eat, the Young Master whispered in his ear: "It's absolutely clear that the trouble you are in was all contrived to get Jiang his revenge and to destroy you. But take heart, do not despair. I've already sent a message to Clerk Ye. He knows all about you. As soon as you've served out your term here you'll be sentenced and allowed to leave and then you can take what action you like."
As soon as Wu Song's conditions were relaxed he had formed the intention of trying to escape. But when he heard what the Young Master had to say, he changed his mind.
After thus reassuring Wu Song, the Young Master returned to the fortress. Two days later he again prepared food and drink and some money, and got Kang to admit him to the prison to see Wu Song. They talked and he regaled Wu Song with food and wine. He also administered some small change in tips for the prison staff.
A few days later the Young Master once more prepared food and drink and had some clothes made, and through the good services of Kang again got himself admitted to the prison, where he invited everyone to drink and gave them money so they would take good care of Wu Song. He made the latter change his clothes and take some wine and food.
Now that he knew the way, the Young Master visited the prison three times in just a few days. He had become over-confident and his visits were observed by one of Captain Zhang's men who reported the fact. Captain Zhang passed the information on to General Zhang. General Zhang in turn sent someone carrying presents for the magistrate to report the matter to him. The magistrate, since he was corrupt and in their pay, ordered that the prison be constantly inspected and any strangers detained and questioned. The Young Master was told of this and thereafter did not dare go back again, so it was left to Kang and the other gaolers to take care of Wu Song. But the Young Master went regularly to Kang's house, where he received the news and was able to keep up with all the developments. Of this no more.
For the next two months or so, Ye did all he could to talk the magistrate round. He often explained the ins and outs of the case to him. Thus the magistrate learnt that General Zhang had received considerable sums of money from Jiang the Door-God, and that they were in cahoots with Captain Zhang to trap and destroy Wu Song, and he said to himself: "You lot have been receiving money for all this, but you want me to do the dirty work." He began to lose his enthusiasm for the job and neglected it.
When he had done nearly sixty days, Wu Song was brought forth from the prison and the court ordered the cangue to be removed. The clerk of the court read out the charges and the sentence was announced: twenty strokes of the cane and banishment to the prison camp at Enzhou, the stolen goods to be restored to the owner. General Zhang had to send one of his people to collect the stolen goods. Wu Song received the twenty strokes, had his cheeks tattooed with the golden seals and was fitted with a seven and a half catty iron-spiked cangue. A certificate was made out and two officers detailed to escort him. A deadline was fixed for his departure.
The two officers, bearing the certificate, led Wu Song from the court. The flogging he received, since the old Warden had spent his money so freely and since the friendly clerk of the court was overseeing it, and since the magistrate knew that Wu Song had been the victim of a plot, was not at all severe; in fact he got off lightly.
Wearing the cangue and closely guarded by the two officers, Wu Song left the town, inwardly seething with anger. They had gone about half a mile when they came to an inn by the highway, from which the Young Master emerged to greet Wu Song. "I've been waiting for you," he said. His head was bandaged and his arm was in a sling.
"I haven't seen you for so long," Wu Song said. "How did you come to be in this state?"
"I'll tell you," said the Young Master. "After that time when I came to visit you three times in a row, the magistrate got to hear about it and started sending people to make random checks at the gaol and General Zhang also sent men to watch the gates on every side. I couldn't come to see you again, but I got news of you at Mr. Kang's. Then a fortnight ago when I was at the Happy Woods inn, Jiang the Door-God reappeared, with a gang of thugs. They beat me up really badly and Jiang insisted that I get all the locals to come and apologize. He seized the inn again, like before, and took over all the fixtures and stock. I had to stay home, I wasn't even able to get up from my bed. But today when I heard you were banished to Enzhou I got two padded coats for you for the journey. And there's two cooked geese here as well that I want you to have."
The Young Master invited the two guards. He suggested they should all go to an inn. But the guards refused, making a great fuss about it: "Wu Song is a vicious thief, if we accepted your offer, we'd really be in hot water at the government offices. You'd better clear off, unless you want to be beaten up."
The Young Master saw it was no good. So he took out a dozen taels of silver and offered them to the guards. They would not accept. Instead they indignantly urged Wu Song to get a move on.
The Young Master ordered two bowls of wine which he made Wu Song drink, and tied a bundle round his waist and attached the two geese to his cangue for him. Then he whispered in Wu Song's ear: "Inside the bundle are the two padded coats and some loose change wrapped up in a scarf. I want you to eat well on the journey. There's also a pair of hemp sandals with eight eyelets. You must watch out during the journey. Those two bastards don't seem to harbour good intentions."
Wu Song nodded. "No need to tell me, I'd already noticed. But even if they were twice as many I wouldn't fear them. You go home and rest and please don't worry. I can handle it."
The Young Master bade Wu Song goodbye with tears in his eyes. Of this no more.
Wu Song and his two guards set out. When they had gone a mile or two, the guards began to talk quietly among themselves. "Where's them two got to then?" Wu Song heard them say. He silently considered this. "You fools, you've given it away," he thought contemptuously. "I suppose someone was going to come along and knock me on the head!"
Wu Song's right hand was secured by the cangue but his left hand was free. So he grasped the geese which were attached to his cangue and applied himself to eating, without looking at the two guards. After a mile or so he was attacking the second of the cooked geese. He held it down with his right hand and tore pieces off it with his left. Eating occupied all his attention. A mile or so more and he had accounted for both the geese. They were now about three miles from their starting-point, when two men appeared ahead of them, standing by the roadside. These two carried halberds and had swords stuck through their belts. They waited, and then, when Wu Song and his guards were passing, fell into step beside them. Wu Song was able to observe certain signs expressive of a hidden meaning passing between the guards and the two who carried halberds. He also noticed that they were embarrassed when he caught their eye, but he said nothing and pretended he hadn't seen.
Before they had gone much further they came to the edge of a vast area of rivers and fish-ponds. On all sides were desolate creeks and broad channels. The five men reached a place where the water was crossed by a bridge of broad wooden planks. There was a tall structure beside it bearing a sign which read: "Flying Clouds Quay." At this point Wu Song innocently asked: "What do you call this place?"
"Are you blind or what?" the two guards replied. "Can't you see that sign next to the bridge there, what says 'Flying Clouds Quay'?"
Wu Song came to a halt and said: "I want to wash my hands, then."
As the two with halberds approached him he gave a shout of "In you go!" and with a flying kick sent one of them sailing head over heels into the water. The other hurriedly tried to turn round, but Wu Song's right foot was already poised and it propelled him into the water with an enormous splash. The two guards were terrified and wanted to get off the bridge and run for it, but Wu Song shouted: "Where do you think you're going?" With one wrench he broke the cangue in two and hurled it from the bridge. One of the guards collapsed from shock, the other made a run for it, but Wu Song charged after him and felled him with one blow of the fist. He picked up a halberd which was floating on the water and fell on the guard, striking several blows. The guard expired on the spot. Wu Song then turned back and dealt with the one who had fainted, cutting him to pieces. The two in the water had struggled to the shore and were hoping to escape. Wu Song gave chase and cut one of them down. He shouted to the other: "If you tell me everything, I'll spare you!"
The second halberdier said: "We work for Mr. Jiang. Our master made the plan together with Captain Zhang. They sent us to help the guards, the idea was to take care of you."
"Where is your master right now?"
"When we left he was with the Captain and the General — they were all at General Zhang's house, drinking wine in the Ducks and Drakes Tower, waiting for us to go back and report."
"Well, in view of all this I find I can't let you off after all," Wu Song said. He raised his blade and brought it down again. The man was dead.
He detached the swords and took the best one. He tipped the two corpses into the water. Then he wasn't sure if they were both dead, so he picked up the halberd again and thrust it into each of the bodies several times.
Now he stood there on the bridge, looking around him and thinking: "I've killed these four stooges, but the big shots, the two Zhangs and Jiang, are still getting off scot-free. Where's the satisfaction in that?"
Halberd in hand he stood there, for a moment undecided. Then he knew what to do. He turned back and headed at full speed for Mengzhou.
If he hadn't, things would have been different. He would never have killed so many corrupt men, or released so much pent-up anger.

In the painted hall, the bodies point this way and that,
In the red light of the candles, the room is swimming in blood.

"THE first thing," said Wu Song, "is that you immediately restore all the household goods and furniture to Shi En, the 'Golden Eyed Tiger Cub.'" Jiang immediately agreed to do this.
"Secondly, that as soon as I allow you to get up you will summon all the brave heroes of this Kuaihuo Forest to come and give obeisance to Shi En."
Jiang also agreed to do this.
"Thirdly, that as soon as you have done these two things you will leave this district, and not return to it again. If I see you here again I will again beat you. And if you come ten times, I will beat you ten times. If I treat you lightly you will be nearly dead, but if I beat you thoroughly you will certainly be killed. Do you also agree to this condition?"
Jiang wanted to preserve his life so as soon as he heard this he also agreed.
Wu Song picked him up, and saw that his face was bruised and that his lips were swollen already. His head was wrested to one side, and blood was flowing from a wound in his temple. Wu Song pointed his finger at Jiang the 'Door God,' and abused him, "What a small thing you are! When I killed the tiger I only gave three blows of my fist and a couple of kicks. Be quick and hand over those plunderings. If you are a little slow I shall beat you again."

Jiang the 'Door God,' now knew that his opponent was Wu Song, and he signified his submission. While they were talking thus Shi En arrived with about twenty armed men to settle the issue by force if necessary. They were exceedingly delighted to see that Wu Song had been victorious, and they all gathered round him. Wu Song pointing his finger at Jiang the 'Door God,' said, "The original proprietor of the shop has now arrived so now send for the men to make obeisance to him."

Jiang asked them all to go and sit down in the inn. Wu Song took them all to the inn, where they found the floor was all flooded with wine. The men and the girl had managed to get out of the jars but their faces were badly besmeared, and their clothes were dripping with wine. All the other waiters had run away. Wu Song and his followers entered the inn and sat down. He told Jiang to get his things packed, ready, and put the baggage on a cart, and send them and the girl off in advance. The waiters were sent off to bring the heroes of the village to the inn to pay respects to Shi En. When they arrived they were all asked to take their seats at the tables on which was a bountiful supply of the best wine.

Wu Song told Shi En to take the seat of honor, and Jiang the 'Door God,' to sit by his side. Each man had a large cup, and after they had all drunk several cups of warm wine Wu Song spoke, "Honorable neighbors, I, Wu Song, committed murder at Yanggu County, and was banished to this place. Upon arrival here I heard people say that this inn in the Kuaihuo Forest formerly belonged to Shi En, and that it was taken from him by force, and without payment, by Jiang the 'Door God.' But you must not suppose that Shi En is my master or that I have any thing to do with him. I have always tried to punish those who are unfair to their fellow men. In my travels I would draw out my sword whenever I see any injustice. I have never been afraid of death. Today I would have given Jiang the 'Door God,' a very severe thrashing, and rid this village of an evil but out of due regard to you honorable neighbors I spare his life, on the condition that he must go to some other district this very evening. If however I ever see him return to this place I will deal with him in the same way that I treated the tiger on Jingyang Ridge."

Upon hearing this all the neighbors knew that he was Wu Song, and they now stood up and spoke in favor of Jiang the 'Door God,' "Good sir, please appease your anger. We will see that he goes, and restores the property to Shi En."

Jiang dared not say a word, but duly handed over the property to Shi En. He saluted the neighbors, put his baggage on a cart, and departed.

Wu Song drank wine with the neighbors until they were all drunk. They left in the evening when Wu Song went to sleep, and did not get up until the following morning about 9 A.M.

When Shi, the old warden, heard that his son had again got control of the Kuaihuo Forest, he rode a horse, and upon reaching the inn he thanked Wu Song for what he had done. During the following days they had bountiful feasts for celebration. In the Kuaihuo Forest there was not a single man who did not hear of Wu Song and come to congratulate him. The inn was renovated, and reopened. Shi, the old warden, returned home, but Wu Song stayed at the inn where the business was more prosperous than before. All the gambling dens and exchange shops sent greater sums to Shi En, so that he was now making double profits. Shi En paid great respects to Wu Song, and looked upon him as a parent.

After more than a month the weather got cooler, and pleasant breezes introduced the beginning of autumn. We might write a lot about this pleasant period, but we must desist. One day Shi En was discussing with Wu Song the art of fencing and hand combat, when they saw three soldiers leading a horse stop in front of the inn, and ask for the proprietor, and then also asked whether "that tiger slayer, Wu Song, was also there."

Shi En recognized the soldiers as the adjutants of Colonel Zhang Mengfang at Mengzhou. So he went outside and asked what they wanted Wu Song for.

"Our commander has ordered us to come here to invite Wu Song," said a soldier. "Here is our written order."

Shi En read the order and thought, "This Colonel Zhang is my father's superior, and my father is at his disposal. As Wu Song is a banished convict and also under his control so that he will have to go." So Shi En went inside and told Wu Song that these soldiers had an order from Colonel Zhang to take him to see that officer, that they had brought a horse for him to ride. And he asked what did he think about it?

Wu Song was a straightforward man, and at once replied, "As the Colonel wants me, I must go and see what he has to say."

So Wu Song went at once to change his dress, and taking a servant with him, mounted the horse, and set off for Mengzhou. Upon arrival at Colonel Zhang's house he dismounted, and followed a soldier inside.

When Zhang saw Wu Song he was much pleased, and told him to come forward. Wu Song saluted, and clasping both hands stood with attention at one side.

Zhang spoke, "I have heard that you are a great man, without equal in bravery, and are firm and constant with your companions whether in life or death. For some time I have been looking out for such a man as you, but do not know whether you would care to act as my confidential personal guard."

Wu Song knelt down and said, "I am a criminal. If I am to be favored by such a promotion I would, of course, like to be your servant, and wait upon Your Excellency."

Zhang was much pleased at this, and ordered a servant to bring some fruit and wine. When it arrived he poured out the wine himself, and offered it to Wu Song. Wu Song drank much wine. He also arranged for him a room quite close to his own quarter.

The following day he sent a messenger to Shi En to get Wu Song's things as the latter was going to stay at the Colonel's residence. After that Zhang often had Wu Song in his private apartments at meals, and treated him as a member of his family. A tailor was ordered to make suits of clothes for him for the autumn season. Wu Song was much pleased at these indications of good will, and knew that it was very unusual for such a high official to treat men in this way. "Since I came here I have not been a few steps away from His Excellency so that I have had no opportunity of going to the Kuaihuo Forest to visit Shi En. But he has several times sent men to see me, but they have never been allowed to come inside here."

In the yamen Colonel Zhang and Wu Song became more and more intimate as time went on. Whatever Wu Song spoke in favor of any man who had confided in him with any important affair Colonel Zhang would agree to. Therefore people gave Wu Song much silver, money, silk, etc. which he stored away in a ratten basket.

Time passed quickly, and it was soon the middle of autumn. Colonel Zhang prepared a feast in his inner apartments to celebrate the Mid-Autumn Festival, and invited Wu Song to join him. When Wu Song arrived he saw the wife and family of Zhang were there, so after drinking one cup of wine he prepared to depart, but Zhang asked where he was going. Wu Song replied, "As your wife and family are here I must act in a polite way and not stay."

Zhang laughed, but was pleased to hear this. He said, "You make a mistake! I respect you as a hero. I particularly asked you to come, and dine with me, so what difference does it make that my wife and family are also here? Please sit down."

"But I am a criminal," replied Wu Song. "So how dare I sit down in your company."

"Hero," said Chang, "why should you not associate with us? There are no strangers here, so why not sit down?"

Wu Song still wanted to go, but Zhang repeatedly pressed him to stay. At last he agreed to stop, and sat down on the edge of the chair in accordance with etiquette. A maidservant filled their cups with wine, and their conversation was about military skill. At last Zhang asked him why he drank so little wine, and he told the girl attendant to bring large silver cups for the wine. He then gave Wu Song plenty of wine, and one cup quickly followed another. The bright moonlight was streaming through the eastern window. Wu Song was now drinking to excess, and being half drunk threw decorum to the wind, and forgot his manners. Zhang sent for a young maidservant named Yulan, whom Zhang liked very much because of her singing. When she arrived he said to her, "There is nobody here except my personal bodyguard Wu Song. You can sing to us that song about the Mid-Autumn Moonlight." Yulan took her ivory castanets, and saluted. She then sang the poem by Su Dongpo:

THE AUTUMN MOON

I cannot sleep a bit tonight,
The sky's so clear with moonlight;
I roll up jeweled blinds and gaze,
On scene so vast and lovely.
The moon has light, and shadows black,
Now full, but soon a crescent;
But why not always full and round,
And perfect—never changing?
All men have pleasures—sorrows too,
And friendship mixed with hatred;
I hope for future manifest,
With beauty, virtue constant.
Bright moon sails th' empyrean blue,
And knows the ways of Heaven;
It's breast unstirred by feelings vile,
A piece of jade quite flawless.
I wish to mount the wind and fly,
To those far heights so dizzy;
And climb the pure, cold towers of jade,
And gaze on jeweled heavens.
But all! I should a shadow cast,
Upon the scene below me;
I am but human and of clay,
Must leave those heights for Chang'e.

("Chang'e" is the goddess in the moon.)

When Yulan had finished, she gave a woman's salute; put down her ivory castanets, and stood at one side.

Colonel Zhang spoke to her, "Yulan, you can fill up our cups with wine." She took a tray with wine, and a maidservant accompanied her filling the cups. She first served the Colonel, then his wife, and then Wu Song. When Wu Song was receiving his wine he bowed his head slightly as a sign of compliments. He saluted both Colonel Zhang and his wife, and then drank the wine at one draft, and returned the cup to the girl.

Colonel Zhang pointed to Yulan and said to Wu Song, "This girl is very clever. She is skilled not only in music, but is very capable at needlework. If she finds favor in your eye we could select a lucky day, and marry her to you."

Wu Song saluted and replied, "I am hardly worthy of marrying a woman from your household. Would it not also injure my prospects of a livelihood here?"

The Colonel laughed, "As I have said I must give her to you, so do not decline my proposal."

Wu Song felt that he had taken too much wine and was afraid that he might lose his manners. He got up, saluted everybody, and left. Upon entering his own room he felt that he could not sleep on account of the wine so he took off his upper garments and unwound his turban. Taking a cudgel he went out into the yard. There was bright moonlight, and he went through a few exercises. Noticing the position of the moon and stars he knew that it was about 1 A.M. So going indoors again he was just on the point of undressing when he heard cries in the inner apartments that thieves had got in. Wu Song thought that as the Colonel had treated him so well it was his duty to go and rescue him from the thieves. So seizing his cudgel he hurried off to the inner apartments, and there met Yulan in an agitated state. She shouted out, "A thief has entered the garden." So he went into the flower garden, and searched for the thief without finding him. At last he gave up the search, and was carelessly returning when in a shadow he fell over a stool that had been left there. Immediately about eight soldiers rushed forward shouting, "Here's the thief!" They seized him, and bound his hands behind his back with a rope.

Wu Song called out, "It is not I!" but the soldiers were not going to listen to anything he said. Wu Song saw that Colonel Zhang was seated in a room where there was a bright light from a large candle. Zhang called out, "Bring the thief here!"

The soldiers beat Wu Song at each step as they took him into the room where he called out, "I am Wu Song. I am not a thief." Upon looking at him Zhang was very angry, and abused him, saying, "You banished thief! You previously had the eyes, eyebrows, heart, and liver of a thief. Yet I treated you well, asked you to dine with me, and had the intention of making you an official. So how is it that you have now done this vile thing?"

"Sir, I came to try and arrest the thief," said Wu Song, "and they have arrested me by mistake. I am a most respectable person so how could I commit a theft?"

"You rascal need not offer any excuse," said Zhang. "Take him to his room, and see if there are any stolen goods there."

The soldiers took Wu Song to his quarters, and opened his boxes. At the top was his clothing, but underneath were silver drinking cups and vessels, which were worth about two hundred taels of silver. Upon seeing these Wu Song stared with astonishment as they were not his things. The soldiers took all the valuables to Zhang who said, "Banished thief! So impertinent you are! These things have been found in your boxes so what excuse can you make? There is a saying, 'It is easier to get animals reincarnated, but the souls of men never change.' Outwardly you have a honest man's appearance, but it is evident that you have the heart of a criminal." Turning to the soldiers he said, "Take the stolen things, and after sealing them up place them in the treasury for the night and tomorrow we will cross-examine this villain."

Wu Song called out, "I am being wrongly accused." But the soldiers would not allow him to say anything more. They took Wu Song away, and locked him up in a cell. Zhang sent a messenger that same night to report the affair to the Prefect, and also offered bribes to all the lower officials. Early the next morning the Prefect took his seat on the bench, and was surrounded by all the minor officials, yamen aides, and policemen. Wu Song was brought into court under arrest, and the sealed packages of the stolen goods were also brought in. A confidential secretary of Colonel Zhang handed to the Prefect a dispatch stating the details of the case agaist Wu Song. The jailers placed before Wu Song the instruments for punishment, but before Wu Song could utter a single word, the Prefect said, "This fellow was banished from a distant place, and how could he help becoming a thief. He has evidently seen valuables about, and so has harbored evil thoughts. Since the booty has been discovered in his possession so that there is no need for us to listen to his stupid talk, and we will give him a severe beating."

The jailer took the split bamboo, and dealt Wu Song a perfect downpour of blows. Wu Song knew that there was something underhand in all this, but as he saw no means of escape he confessed as follows: "On the fifteenth day of this month I saw many silver drinking cups in the yamen, and that was when I got the idea of stealing them." This forced confession was duly recorded, and handed to the Prefect who said, "This fellow was evidently led astray upon seeing so many valuables, but we won't go into that. Bring the cangue here, nail it on his neck, and take him to prison for execution. The jailer fastened on Wu Song an oblong cangue, and took him off to the jail where prisoners await execution. Upon arriving there Wu Song thought matters over. He could see no other explanation, but that Colonel Zhang had arranged this trick to get him into trouble. He thought however if he could survive this infliction he would take the matter in hand and look for revenge. In the prison both Wu Song's legs and hands were locked with chains so that he could hardly move at all.

Now Shi En heard of this affair and went to discuss it with his father. His father said, "Evidently this is the revenge of Jiang the 'Door God,' who must have heavily bribed Colonel Zhang, and then both of them have arranged this plot. They must have bribed everybody so that no one wants to hear his defense, but all hope to kill him. I think that he is not so guilty as deserving of death so we had better send money and bribe the jailers. They may alleviate the punishments, and allow him to live. Besides we must find other ways to save him."

"There is a minor officer in the prison named Kang who is my intimate friend," said Shi En, "so I have to go and talk to him."

"You are under an obligation to Wu Song so if you do not go who else would go?" said his father.

So Shi En took about two hundred taels of silver, and went to Kang's house, but the jailer had not returned from the prison. Shi En sent a servant to the prison, and in a short time Kang arrived. Shi En told him all about Wu Song.

Kang replied, "The matter has really been arranged between Colonel Zhang and his friend Captain Zhang. Jiang the 'Door God,' has been staying with Captain Zhang and requested him to bribe his friend Colonel Zhang for him to do this vile thing. Every official concerned has been bribed as well. In the prison every jailer has been paid to do this. The Prefect is willing to take the responsibility for the killing of Wu Song, but Chief Clerk Ye does not agree. Ye is a very honest and upright man, and would not punish innocent persons, so Wu Song is in no danger at present. Now that I have heard your version of the case I will see that Wu Song is well treated in the prison. You had better however send someone to explain the case to Chief Clerk Ye, and ask him to arrange for Wu Song's release."

Shi En gave Kang one hundred taels of silver, and after some declination Kang accepted it. Shi En then returned home, and found a man who was a personal friend of Chief Clerk Ye. He explained the matter, and gave him one hundred taels of silver to approach Ye about the matter.

Now Chief Clerk Ye already knew that Wu Song was a hero, and he had already a mind to save him although the Prefect had personally given him instructions to deal with the prisoner harshly. Examining the accusations he saw that even if Wu Song had stolen goods he was not deserving of death. Taking everything into consideration he decided to exempt Wu Song from the crime, especially as he had now received one hundred taels of silver through a friend of the prisoner.

The next day Shi En took a large quantity of wine and food to the prison, and was allowed by Kang to give it personally to Wu Song. Shi En also gave the jailers about thirty taels of silver and they loosened the chains binding Wu Song. Shi En told Wu Song that he had spoken to Chief Clerk Ye about his case, and he would be treated much better and that when the sentence had been served he would be released. At that time Wu Song's bonds had not been so tight so that he had even begun to think of escaping from the prison, but now that Shi En had held out hope of other arrangements he gave up that idea. Shi En spoke many comforting words to Wu Song before he left for home.

Two days later Shi En took a further supply of wine, food, and money to the prison, and after seeing the jailer Kang he was allowed to interview Wu Song again. Upon returning home he engaged a man again to visit the officials concerned, and urged them to settle the case of Wu Song as soon as possible. After a few days more Shi En again visited the prison and distributed more money, wine, and food to the jailers, and begged them still to treat Wu Song with leniency. He also brought new clothes for Wu Song to change. Altogether Shi En visited the prison three times in this way.

Now it happened that a confidential servant of Captain Zhang saw Shi En visiting the prison, and reported the matter to his master. Captain Zhang conveyed this information to his friend Colonel Zhang who passed it to the Prefect with a present of money. The Prefect was a corrupt official, and received the bribe. He deputed a man to visit the prison, and keep a watch there as to what was happening. Whenever the spy saw an outsider there he would arrest him. But Shi En got to know of this so he kept away for some time. The jailers continued to treat Wu Song well. Shi En now had to visit the home of Kang, the prison official, where he got all the necessary news.

Chief Clerk Ye, who had the case in hand, had already made up his mind as to what should be done and reported to the Prefect all the underhand management of the two Zhangs. The Prefect himself was now well aware that Colonel Zhang and his friend Captain Zhang had received plenty of money from Jiang the 'Door God,' and that was why they both were trying to injure Wu Song. The Prefect thought, "Those fellows have got the money, and expect me to do the dirty work." Accordingly he was determined not to press the case any further. At the end of the second month Wu Song was taken before the Prefect who ordered the cangue be removed. Chief Clerk Ye read out the confessions of Wu Song's guilt, and the Prefect gave judgment that he be given twenty blows with the bamboo, and be sent to the prison at Enzhou. The stolen goods were to be restored to the owner, and they were duly delivered to the messenger from Colonel Zhang. The blows were duly inflicted on Wu Song, then his face was branded with characters, and a cangue weighing about ten pounds was fastened round his neck. A dispatch was written, and handed to two strong men who had been selected to convey Wu Song to En Chow.

Now Shi En's father had bribed the men not to give heavy blows. Both the Prefect and Chief Clerk Ye knew that Wu Song was wronged and so condoned the punishment.

Wu Song suppressed his anger. After the punishment the escort set off with Wu Song walking in front. They had not gone a quarter of a //when they passed an inn at the side of the road where Shi En came out and spoke to Wu Song: "I have been waiting here for some time in order to see you before you go."

Wu Song saw that Shi En had a bandage round his head, and his hand was suspended from his neck. So he asked, "I have not seen you for a long time, but how is it that you dress like this?"

"After I visited you in the prison the third time the Prefect got to know it, and sent a spy to keep watch in the prison, and Colonel Zhang also had another spy outside the prison to watch my movements. Therefore it was not advisable for me to visit you again in the prison. So I only went to the jailer Kang's house to get news.

"About a month ago Jiang the 'Door God,' accompanied by a number of men, came to the inn at the Kuaihuo Forest and assaulted me. They also insisted upon me paying obeisance to Jiang the 'Door God,' in the presence of mediators. He then took the inn and the furniture from me again. Today I heard that you are to be banished to Enzhou, so I bring two suits of cotton clothes here so that I can give them to you personally. I have also prepared two roasted geese which I hope you will partake of before starting on your long journey." He also invited the escort to enter the inn, and dine with them. But the two men declined because Wu Song was a thief, and if the officials got to know of this affair they would be complicated. They continued that if Shi En did not want a beating he must get away at once. Shi En did not like this talk so he offered the escort ten taels of silver. They angrily declined the money, and pressed Wu Song to start. Shi En bought two cups of wine, and offered them to Wu Song. He also strapped the bundle of clothing round his waist, and fastened the two roasted geese to his cangue. He then whispered to Wu Song, "Inside the bundle are some bits of silver which you can use for your expenses on the journey. There are also two pairs of hempen shoes for you. On the way you must beware of these two ruffians.'

"You need not say anything more," said Wu Song. "I understand. Even if there were four such men I should not be afraid. You go back now, and don't worry about me. I already have a plan."

Shi En wept as he departed.

Wu Song and his escort resumed their journey, but they had gone only a few //when the two soldiers conversed in an undertone, "Those two men have not arrived yet." But Wu Song heard this remark, and laughed to himself and thought, "Those two fellows evidently will be unfortunate if they come and fight with me. One of Wu Song's hands was fastened to the cangue, but the other hand was free. With the free hand he took the roasted geese off the cangue, and ate them as he walked. He had eaten both of them before they had gone a couple of //more. They were barely three //from the town when he saw two men at the side of the road. They both had halberds in their hands, and swords in their belts. As the escort came up they fell in behind without saying a word. But as they went along Wu Song noticed that they were winking to each other, and he almost got their meaning. They had hardly traveled another //before they came to a rapid flowing river with a large pool.

There was a broad wooden bridge across the river with an gate arch at one end on which were three characters, "Feiyun Pool." Pretending not to see this he asked his escort, "What is this place called?"

The two men replied, "As you are not blind you ought to be able to see the characters on the gate arch that this is the Feiyun Pool."

Wu Song stopped on the bridge, and said, "I need to pee here."

The two armed with halberds had barely come one step nearer when Wu Song cried out "down you go!" and with one kick he knocked one into the water. The other turned to escape, but Wu Song kicked him in the back, and he turned a somersault into the water as well. The two other men escorting him were excited at this, and turned to get off the bridge, but Wu Song shouted out, "Where are you going?" At the same time he wrenched the cangue into two parts, and pursued the men. On leaving the bridge one man fell, but Wu Song ignored him and catching up to the other one hit him with his fist, and knocked him down. One of the halberds had not fallen in the water so Wu Song got this, and killed both men. Both of the men whom he had kicked into the river had by now swum to the bank, but Wu Song overtook them, and killed one of them at once. He seized hold of the other, and said, "If you tell me the truth I will not kill you."

The man said, "We are both followers of Jiang the 'Door God.' He and Colonel Zhang sent us to accompany your escort, and to kill you at the first opportunity."

"Where is Jiang the Door God, just now?"

"When we started off he was with Captain Zhang at Colonel Zhang's house, drinking wine in the Yuanyang Tower, and they told us to go there, and report the result of the plot."

"Under these circumstances I cannot forgive you," said Wu Song, and taking the halberd he killed that man also. He selected the best of the weapons, and threw the men's bodies into the river. He stayed on the bridge for some time looking round, and thought, "I've killed these four men but I'll not be satisfied until I've also killed Colonel Zhang, Jiang the 'Door God,' and Captain Zhang." He at last started off to return to Mengzhou.

Red lamp shines in drawing-room,
Sudden death has stained the floor.

129

In Ducks & Drakes Tower, the General Zhang's bloodwill spill & Spatter; The false pilgrim Wu Song travels & comes to Centipede Hill Ridge during a Night Walk

It was already dusk when he entered the town. Wu Song went straight to a stableyard abutting the wall of General Zhang's rear garden and there concealed himself. The groom was still in the residence and had not yet returned.

Soon, a door near the corner of the wall squeaked open. The groom emerged, carrying a lantern. Someone inside the residence closed the door. Hidden in the shadows, Wu Song heard the watchman's drum. It was the fourth interval of the first watch. The groom fed the horses, hung up the lantern, spread his bedding, undressed and went to bed. Wu Song made a noise outside the stable door.

"I've just retired," shouted the groom. "You're too early if you've come to steal my clothes!"

Wu Song leaned his halberd beside the door, held the sword in his hand, and rattled the door. This was too much for the groom. He leaped naked from his bed, grabbed a pole, pulled the bolt and started to open the door. Wu Song barged in with a rush and seized him. The groom opened his mouth to yell, but the sight of the sword gleaming in the lamplight turned his bones to beancurd.

"Spare me," he pleaded weakly.

"Do you know me?" Wu Song demanded.

The groom recognized his voice. "Brother," he said, "this has nothing to do with me! Spare my life!"

"Then tell the truth! Where is General Zhang?"

"With Commandant Zhang and Jiang the Gate Guard Giant. The three of them have been drinking all day in the Duck and Drake Bower."

"Is that the truth?"

"May I die of boils if I'm lying!"

"In that case I can't spare you!" With one stab Wu Song killed the groom. He kicked the body aside and slipped the sword back into its sheath.

From the bundle around his waist he took the clothes Shi En had given him, changed into them, bound them tightly, and tucked the sheathed sword into his sash. He wrapped his loose silver in a coverlet from the groom's bed, thrust the bundle into his bag, and hung the bag next to the stable entry. He removed one of the double stable doors from its socket, leaned it against the garden wall, went back in to blow out the lamp, then came out again. Grasping his halberd, he clambered up the door to the top of the wall.

There was a faint moon. Wu Song leaped down into the garden, opened the small door in the wall, went out and returned the stable door to its original position, re-entered the garden and closed the wall door, but left it unlatched.

In a nearby building a lamp was gleaming. It was the kitchen. Two maids were complaining as they heated a kettle of hot water.

"We've been waiting on them all day, and still they don't go to bed," one of them was saying. "They keep wanting tea! And those two guests are so drunk they ought to be ashamed! But instead of coming down and resting, they just talk and talk and talk!"

Wu Song leaned his halberd against the building, pulled out his bloody sword, pushed open the creaking door, and rushed in. He grabbed one of the girls by the hair and killed her with a single stab. The other wanted to flee, but her feet seemed nailed to the floor. Though she opened her mouth to scream, no sound came out. She was paralyzed with terror (Even I, the teller of this tale—to say nothing of a girl—would have been too scared to utter a peep!) Wu Song thrust with his sword and killed her.

He dragged the bodies over beside the stove and blew out the kitchen lamp. In the light of the moon, he crossed stealthily over to the main hall. As a man who had free access to every quarter of the residence, he knew his way, and proceeded quickly to the Duck and Drake Bower. On tiptoe, he mounted the stairs.

By then the attendants were weary and annoyed, and had gone off elsewhere. Wu Song could hear the voices of General Zhang, Commandant Zhang and Jiang the Gate Guard Giant. At the head of the stairs he listened. Jiang was praising the general.

"I'm very grateful, Your Excellency, for helping me get revenge. I must show my thanks further, in a substantial manner."

"I would never have done such a thing if it weren't for the sake of my dear friend Commandant Zhang. Although it's cost you a bit of money, all the arrangements have been nicely made. It must be over by this time. The wretch probably is dead. I told the guards to finish him at the Flying-Cloud Ponds. We'll know definitely when the four come back in the morning."

"Four against one," said the commandant. "A cinch! Even if he had more lives than a cat, he'd have lost them all!"

"I told my apprentices to strike at the ponds, too," said Jiang, "and to report back as soon as the deed was done."

A raging flame in Wu Song's heart spurted up madly and pierced the black sky. His right hand tightened around the sword, the fingers of his left hand spread rigid. He burst into the room. Five large flowery candles and moonlight streaming in through two windows gave plenty of illumination. A wine pitcher and flagons had not yet been removed.

Jiang, seated in an armchair, was so startled at the sudden appearance of Wu Song that his heart flew into the clouds. Quicker than it takes to say, as the big man was scrambling to his feet, the sword carved his face with such force that the chair split and overturned. Wu Song whirled, blade in hand, as General Zhang started to move. Wu Song swung, gashing his neck just below the ear. The general fell heavily to the floor. Both victims struggled for life.

Commandant Zhang was a trained military man. Although drunk, he was no weakling. When he saw the other two go down, he knew there was no escape. He picked up an armchair and raised it above his head. Wu Song stepped in to meet the charge, and pushed. Even sober, Zhang would have been no match for the mighty strength of Wu Song. He fell on his back. Wu Song bounded forward, and with one sweep of the sword cutoff his head.

The powerful Jiang was straining to rise. Wu Song's left foot lashed out and kicked him over. Holding him down, Wu Song decapitated him, turned, and did the same to General Zhang. On the table there was still meat and wine. Wu Song seized a flagon and drained it, then had three more. He cut a strip from the clothes of one of the dead men, dipped it in blood and wrote large on the white calcimined wall:

THE SLAYER IS WU SONG THE TIGER-KILLER.

He stamped the silver flagons flat and placed them inside his tunic. As he started to leave, he heard the voice of the general's wife, on the floor below, say to some servants: "Those gentlemen are all drunk. Go up, a couple of you, and help them down."

Two men began mounting the stairs. Wu Song hid and waited. They were attendants of the general, and both had taken part in seizing Wu Song the day before. He let them come up, then slipped around behind them and cut off their escape. When they entered the room and saw the three bodies lying in pools of blood, they were stricken dumb, and stared at each other in alarm. It was as if the domes of their skull had been opened in eight parts and half a bucket of icy snow poured in.

As they turned to flee, Wu Song felled one with a stab in the back. The other dropped to his knees and begged for mercy. "I can't spare you!" said Wu Song. He grabbed the man and thrust. Blood drenched the ornate chamber. Lamplight flickered over the strewn bodies.

"I might as well do this thoroughly," thought Wu Song. "Even I kill a hundred, I can only be executed once!" Holding his sword, he went down the stairs.

"What was all that racket about, up there?" the general's wife called.

Wu Song went quickly to the front of the building. "Who's that?" she wondered when she saw the big fellow come out. His sword slashed her forehead, and she fell, screaming. He held her down and tried to remove her head, but the blunted sword wouldn't cut. Wu Song looked at it in the moonlight.

"No wonder!" He went to the kitchen, got his halberd, threw the sword away, and returned to the building. There was Jade Orchid, the maid who had sung to him, leading two children. She saw her mistress lying dead, and cried out in dismay. Wu Song ran his halberd through her heart. The two children he similarly dispatched. One thrust each was enough.

From there he traversed the central hall, and bolted the main gate of the residence. He came back, found two or three more women, and killed them too, all speared to the ground.

"I'm satisfied, at last," he said to himself. "Now I can go!"

He discarded the sword sheath and left through the door in the rear wall with his halberd. In the stableyard he retrieved his rucksack, put the flattened silver flagons inside and tied the bag around his waist. Then he set out, halberd in hand.

At the town wall he thought: "If I wait till dawn when they open the gates, I'll be taken. I've got to get over the wall and leave while it's still dark." He clambered to the top. Mengzhou Town was a small place, and its crude wall was not very high. From the ramparts Wu Song probed down with the shaft of his halberd till the end touched the ground, then he leaned and vaulted to earth.

He landed beside the moat. He could see in the moonlight that the water was only a foot or so deep. Since it was the middle of the tenth lunar month, most springs were dry. Wu Song removed his shoes and stockings and knee-length leg-wrappings, tucked up his clothing, and waded across. He remembered the hemp sandals Shi En had given him, took them out of his bag and put them on.

He heard the watchman's drum beat in the town. It was the third interval of the fourth watch. "Today I got that dirty rage out of my system," he thought. "This is no place for me to hang around!" With his halberd, he marched east along a party. By the fifth watch, the darkness was fading, but it was not yet fully light.

It had been a hard night, and he was weary, the wounds from his beating were painful. He couldn't go on. He saw, nestled in a grove, a small ancient temple. Wu Song entered, leaned his halberd and removed his bag. Using the bundle for a pillow, he stretched out.

He was just closing his eyes when two long hooked poles snaked forward and pinned him down. Two other men ran in, seized and tied him.

"The rascal is nice and fat," said the four knaves. "Big brother will be pleased!"

Wu Song struggled in vain. They took his bundle and halberd and hauled him like a sheep, hustling him along so fast that his feet scarcely touched the ground. They headed for a village.

On the way, they discussed him. "Where did he get that blood all over him? Robbing someone?" Wu Song remained silent, and let them talk. After travelling four or five //, they came to a thatched building. They pushed him in. A lamp was gleaming through the small doorway of a side room. The four stripped him and tied him to a pillar.

Wu Song observed two human legs hanging from a rafter near the stove. "I've fallen into the hands of evil assassins," he muttered. "I'll die here and no one will know! If I thought this was going to happen, I would have given myself up at Mengzhou! There I'd be executed with one hack of the blade, but I'd leave a clean name to posterity!"

The four had his bundle. "Brother, sister-in-law, come quickly," they called. "We've got a fine piece of merchandise here!"

"I'll be right with you," a voice replied. "Don't do anything without me. I'll do the carving myself."

In less time than it takes to drink a cup of tea, a woman, followed by a big man, entered the room. They stared at Wu Song.

"Isn't that brother-in-law?" the woman exclaimed.

"Sure enough, it's my brother!" cried the man.

Wu Song looked. The man was none other than Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener, and the woman was Sun the Witch. The four varlets, astonished, untied Wu Song and returned his clothes. His head kerchief had been torn to shreds, so they gave him a broad-brimmed felt hat instead. It seemed that Zhang Qing had several places of business in addition to the one at Crossroads Rise. Wu Song hadn't known.

Zhang Qing invited him into the front parlor, and courtesies were exchanged. The host was shocked at his appearance.

"Whatever happened to you, brother?"

Wu Song told the whole story—from his beating of Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, to his frame-up by Jiang, Commandant Zhang and General Zhang, his terrible revenge against them all, to his final capture by the four in the temple.

The four ruffians dropped to their knees and kowtowed. "We are Brother Zhang Qing's men," they said. "The last several days we lost at gambling, and we went into the grove hoping to pick up a little business. We saw you come along the path, all spattered with blood, and go into the temple to rest. We didn't know who you were. Recently, Brother Zhang Qing has instructed us: 'Bring them back alive.' So we took you with hooks. Otherwise we might have killed you. Truly, 'We had eyes but didn't recognize Mount Taishan!' In our blunder, we knocked you about. Brother, forgive us!"

Zhang and his wife laughed. "We told them to bring in only live merchandise because we were worried. Of course they had no idea what we were thinking. If you weren't tired, brother, forty men couldn't have taken you, to say nothing of these four oafs!"

The four fervently kowtowed. Wu Song told them to get up. "Since you have no money for gambling," he said, "I'll give you some." He opened his bundle and dispensed ten pieces of silver. They thanked him profusely. Zhang Qing added another two or three ounces of his own, and the four left to divide the money.

"You don't know how concerned I've been, brother," said Zhang Qing. "After you left I was afraid you'd run into trouble, that sooner or later you'd return. So I told those louts: 'I want only live merchandise.' The slower ones they catch live all right, but the ones they can't subdue they used to kill. Now I don't let them carry knives when they go out. They can only use hooks and trip ropes. When they called me just now, I had a strange feeling, so I ordered them to wait for me. Who would have thought it was you, brother!"

Sun the Witch said: "When word got round that you beat up Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, and that you were drunk when you did it, there wasn't a traveller who wasn't amazed. We heard about it from merchants who do business in Happy Grove. We didn't know what happened afterwards. You're tired, brother. Please go to the guest-room and rest. We'll talk about what to do later."

Zhang led Wu Song to the guest-room, where he lay down and slept. Husband and wife went into the kitchen and prepared fine delicacies and excellent wine to serve Wu Song when he got up. Soon all was in readiness.

Not until the fifth watch did those who had concealed themselves in General Zhang's residence in Mengzhou Town dare to emerge. Their cries and lamentations roused servants and attendants, and brought in the military guards stationed outside. At the sight which confronted them, all raised a terrible clamor. The neighbors stayed fearfully at home.

As soon as it was light, the matter was reported to the Mengzhou authorities. The startled prefect immediately dispatched men to examine and count the bodies, determine how the murderer had entered and fled, and produce a drawing of the scene of the crimes, with specifications.

On their return they gave this report: "He entered through the stableyard, where he killed the groom and left two pieces of old clothes. He killed two maid servants in the kitchen by the stove. Beside the kitchen door was one of the murder weapons—a blunted sword. Upstairs he killed General Zhang and two of his attendants. In addition two guests—Commandant Zhang and Jiang the Gate Guard Giant—were also killed. On the white wall he wrote in blood: 'The slayer is Wu Song the tiger-killer!' Downstairs he stabbed to death the general's wife, Jade Orchid, two nursemaids, and three children. The total number of bodies is fifteen. He also stole six gold and silver drinking flagons."

The prefect ordered that all four gates of the town wall be closed and that soldiers, police and ward chiefs make a house-to-house search for the criminal Wu Song. The following day officials arrived from the Flying-Cloud Ponds section.

"We have discovered four bodies in the water," the local ward chiefs stated. "There are bloodstains from the murder beside the bridge." They handed in a formal written report.

On the prefect's order, the local county sheriff was sent to investigate, and to pull out and examine the bodies. Two were policemen from the county office. Their families encoffined them for burial and brought formal complaints before the prefect urging that the culprit be caught and made to pay with his life.

For three days the town gates were kept closed, and every house was visited, but in vain. The prefect issued documents ordering all subdivisions under the district's jurisdiction to join in the search. The details of Wu Song's place of birth, age and appearance, together with a drawing of his likeness, were circulated, and three thousand strings of cash offered for his capture. Anyone who could report his whereabouts would be rewarded. Anyone who concealed and sheltered him would be considered guilty to the same degree as the criminal. The notice was also sent to neighboring districts and prefectures.

We'll speak now of Wu Song, who rested in Zhang Qing's home four or five days. The search for him was like a fine-toothed comb, with much hue and cry. Police swept through every village and hamlet. When Zhang Qing learned of this, he talked to Wu Song.
"It's not that I'm afraid for myself to keep you here," he said. "But the police are going from door to door, very hot. If anything should go wrong, you'd have only me and my wife to blame. I know of a good refuge for you. I've mentioned it before. The question is would you be willing to go?"
"I've been considering, too. Trouble is bound to come. It's not safe here. I had an elder brother, but my sister-in-law murdered him. I've only recently come to Mengzhou, but I've already been framed for a crime. I have no home and no relations. If you know of a safe place, why wouldn't I go? Where is it?"
"It's in Qingzhou Prefecture—Precious Pearl Monastery on Two-Dragon Mountain. Brother Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk and a bold fellow called Yang Zhi the Blue-Faced Brute have turned robbers there. They control that territory. The Qingzhou army and police don't dare even glance in their direction. It's the best refuge for you. Anywhere else, you'd be caught sooner or later. Lu keeps writing and urging me to join him. But I'm very fond of this place, so I haven't gone. I'll write a letter telling him all about you. He'll surely accept you, for my sake."
"You're right, brother. I've been thinking of joining them myself. Only the time never seemed right, or the chance propitious. But now, since I've killed people, and the chase is closing in, and I've no other place to hide, it's an excellent idea. Give me a letter to take along, and I'll leave today."
Zhang Qing got paper and wrote a detailed introduction, which he handed to Wu Song, then began preparing a farewell feast. His wife shook her finger at him reprovingly.
"How can you let brother-in-law go off like this? He's sure to be taken!"
"What do you mean, sister-in-law?" queried Wu Song.
"There are notices out everywhere, offering a reward of three thousand strings of cash, with your picture and all about you. There are two golden prints plainly on your face. If you're stopped on the road, you'll never be able to deny it!"
"Cover them with a couple of plasters," suggested Zhang.
His wife smiled scornfully.
"Aren't you the clever one, speaking such nonsense! Would that fool any policeman? I have a proposal, but maybe brother-in-law won't agree."
"Why not? I'm fleeing from disaster."
Sun the Witch laughed. "I hope you won't think this is too crazy."
"I'll do it, no matter what."
"Two years ago, I knocked off a monk who came here. We stuffed our dumplings with him for several days. He left a metal hoop which had bound his long hair, a set of clothes, a black robe, a multi-colored short sash, a monk's certificate, a rosary of a hundred and eight pate-bones, and a shark-skin sheath containing a pair of fine steel knives embossed with a snowflake pattern. The blades often groan in the night. You've seen them, brother-in-law. Today, you're on the run. We'll cut your hair in long bangs like a pilgrim monk and cover the tattoos on your face. You'll carry the certificate as identification. His age and appearance were similar. Fate has been kind. Use his name on the road, and no one will presume to question you closely. How does that strike you?"
Her husband clapped his hands together. "She's right! I'd forgotten all about him. Brother, what do you say?"
"Sounds all right to me. But I'm afraid I don't look much like a man who's renounced the material world."
"We'll fix you up," said Zhang.
His wife went into another room and returned with a bundle. She opened it and took out some clothing. She told Wu Song to change all his garments, both inner and outer. He examined the monk's vestments.
"They seem to have been made for me!" He put on the robe, tied the sash, removed the broad-brimmed felt hat, let his hair down, folded the ends up, put the metal hoop on, and hung on the rosary.
Zhang Qing and Sun the Witch gazed in admiration. "This must have been ordained in a previous existence!"
Wu Song looked in the mirror and burst out laughing.
"What's so funny?" asked Zhang.
"I can't help it. Me, a pilgrim monk! All right, brother, cut my hair."
With a scissors, Zhang trimmed his hair, front and back. Since time was short, Wu Song packed his bundle and got ready to go.
"Listen to me, brother." Zhang said. "Don't think I'm trying to gain anything by this, but you'd better leave General Zhang's drinking vessels here. I'll give you silver coins instead, which you can carry on the road. It will be safer."
"You're very far-sighted, brother." Wu Song gave him all the flattened flagons and received in exchange a bag of silver pieces. This he put in his purse which he tied inside his sash.
They wined and dined together, then Wu Song bade Zhang and his wife farewell. He hung the pair of knives at his waist. It was evening, and all was in readiness. Sun the Witch had sewn him an embroidered bag for the certificate and told him to wear it inside, next to his chest, Zhang offered some final words of advice.
"Be careful on the road. Don't get into any scrapes. Go easy on the drinking. Don't quarrel with anyone. In other words, act like a monk. Nothing's worth getting excited about. You don't want people to see through you. When you get to Two-Dragon Mountain, write and let me know. My wife and I won't be here much longer. One of these days we'll pack up and join you fellows on the mountain. Take care of yourself, brother. Give our respects to Lu and Yang."
As he left the gate, Wu Song hitched up his sleeves and rocked off with stately pace. Zhang and his wife watched after him approvingly.
"The very picture of a pilgrim monk!"
Leaving the big tree at Crossroads Rise, Wu Song set forth. It was the tenth lunar month. The days were short. Before he knew it, it was dark. After travelling less than fifty //he saw a high rise before him. With a bright moon to light his way, he climbed to the top. He estimated the time to be about the first watch. On the crest of the hill he halted and looked around. The moon, rising in the east, clearly illuminated every shrub and blade of grass. He heard laughter in the grove ahead.
"Strange," he thought. "Who could be laughing on this quiet height?"
He entered the grove. Amid the pines was a cemetery temple—a thatched structure of ten or so rooms. He pushed open a small pair of windows and peered inside. A Taoist priest was embracing a girl by the window on the other side, laughing and fooling around while gazing at the moon.
Anger rose in Wu Song's heart, bile seethed in his gall. "Here is a priest withdrawn to the wooded hills, and he plays these kinds of games!" He pulled the pair of steel knives from his waist and looked at them, gleaming silvery in the moonlight. "They're fine blades," he thought, "but they haven't done a lick of business for me yet. I'll test their metal on that scoundrel!"
He hung one knife from his wrist, returned the other to its scabbard, slipped his arms out of his robe, wrapped the sleeves around his waist and tied them behind, then went to the front of the temple and knocked on the door. At this, the priest closed and locked the rear window. Wu Song picked up a stone and pounded on the portal, hard. A side door opened and an acolyte emerged.
"Who are you?" the boy yelled. "How dare you come in the middle of the night and make such a racket! What are you banging on our door for?"
Wu Song glared. "I'll dedicate my knife with this frigging acolyte, first!" he shouted.
He slashed, and there was a thud as the boy's head departed from his neck and hit the ground. From within the temple the priest roared, "Who dares to slaughter my acolyte!"
He came bounding out, a sword in each hand, and rushed at Wu Song. "Lucky I don't keep my skill locked away in my trunk," Wu Song laughed. "This really scratches me where I itch!" He drew the other knife from the sheath and whirling the pair, advanced to meet the priest. Back and forth, back and forth, the two battled in the moonlight, encased in swirls of icy vapor. More than 10 rounds they fought and the clash of their arms rang upon the heights. I of the 2 was doomed to die. In the chill glow and dim shadows a head would roll. In the murderous encounter blood would rain.

General Zhang was listening to his namesake Captain Zhang boasting about how he had accomplished Jiang the Door-God's revenge by having Wu Song done to death, and none of them had the slightest idea that the four would-be assassins had all been killed by Wu Song at Flying Clouds Quay. And Wu Song meanwhile stood on the bridge for a long while, pondering what to do. As he hesitated, his anger mounted till it seemed to fill the sky. "Until I have killed General Zhang," he said to himself, "how will I ever settle this spleen of mine?" So he went over to the corpses and took the swords from them, choosing the best and sticking it through his belt, and selected a good halberd and shouldered it, and then turned back in the direction of Mengzhou.
Night was just falling as he entered the town. The houses were already shut up, every door was locked:
At the Nine Luminaries incense fills the air and bells are being struck. A big round moon hangs in the sky, a few stars prick heaven's vault. In brigade headquarters a bugle insistently calls; in Five Drums tower the water clock drips steadily. One after another ladies steal back to their bedchambers, gentlemen close the curtains.
When Wu Song entered the town he went straight to General Zhang's and prowled along the boundary wall of the compound till he came to a place where there was a stable. He crouched down and listened. It sounded as if the groom had gone inside the residence and was still in there. As he waited, the side-door creaked open and the groom emerged, carrying a lantern, while someone shut the door from the inside. Wu Song remained hidden in the shadows. Just at that moment, listen! ... the drum beat the hour. It was half-past eight. He watched the groom climb onto the hay to hang up the lantern, then spread out his blanket, undress and lie down to sleep. Wu Song approached the stable door and started to make a noise.
"I've only just gone to bed!" the groom yelled. "If you're counting on stealing my clothes you've cocked up, mate!"
Wu Song propped his halberd against the wall, drew his sword and began to rattle the door.
This was too much for the groom. He leapt out of bed, just as he was, stark naked, grabbed a pitchfork, and then removed the beam which secured the door. Before he even had time to open it, Wu Song had given it a mighty shove and crashed through. He knocked the groom on the head and subdued him in a trice. Before the groom could cry out, in fact, he had seen the sword glinting in the moonlight, and his legs turned to jelly. He was far too terrified to do more than produce a strangled cry of "Mercy!"
"Do you know me?" Wu Song asked.
Only when he heard the voice did the groom realize it was Wu Song. "Please sir, I 'ad nothing to do with it, be merciful!" he cried.
"Just tell me the truth. General Zhang, where is he right now?"
"'E's with Captain Zhang and Mr. Jiang, they been drinking all day. They're still at it, over there in the Ducks and Drakes Tower."
"Are you telling the truth?"
"Cross me heart an' hope to die!"
"It's no good, I can't let you go!" Raising his arm, Wu Song killed him with a single cut. He kicked the body aside and returned the sword to its scabbard. Then by the light of the lantern he undid the clothes from the Young Master that he had fastened round his waist and exchanged what he was wearing for the two new items of clothing. He fastened them securely, girded on sword and scabbard and wrapped some loose silver in the groom's quilt and stuffed it in his bag which he hung up on the door. Then he propped the two leaves of the gate against the wall and after blowing out the lantern slipped out to retrieve his halberd before mounting the gate and climbing onto the wall.
There was just a little moonlight now, as Wu Song sprang from the wall down into the garden. He first opened the side-door and went to replace the leaves of the stable gate. Then he turned and went back inside again, closing the side-door so that it looked as if it was bolted, although he did not replace the beam.
Following this he headed towards a light, which turned out to be coming from the kitchen. Two maids were standing beside the soup cauldron, grumbling: "All day they've 'ad us running after them and still they don't go to bed. It's nothink but 'Bring us more tea.' And them two guests oughter be ashamed, gettin' theirselves pissed as newts like that! They don't never think of goin' off to bed, just jabber, jabber, jabber!"
While these two maids were nattering on about their grievances, Wu Song put down his halberd, drew the bloodstained sword at his waist, gave the door a mighty shove so that it opened with a groan, and charged in. He grabbed the first of the maids by the hair and killed her with one cut. The other would have run off, but her feet were as if nailed to the floor. She wanted to scream but she seemed to have lost her tongue. She was literally struck dumb.
Now, forget about two simple servant girls, had it been yours truly, I too would have been speechless, I can tell you!
Wu Song raised his arm and killed this one with one blow. He dragged the two corpses in front of the stove. He extinguished the lamp and with the aid of the moonlight streaming through the window advanced into the house.
Of course Wu Song had been a member of the household, he knew the geography. Stealthily he reached the stairway leading up into the Ducks and Drakes Tower. Feeling his way carefully he crept up the stairs. By this time all the attendants had taken themselves off, fed up with waiting. So just the three of them were there, General Zhang, Captain Zhang and Jiang the Door-God, still talking. Jiang's fawning tones reached the ears of Wu Song where he stood listening on the landing: "It's all thanks to you, sir, that I can have my vengeance. I shall never be able to repay your great kindness!"
"I only did it for the sake of my friend Captain Zhang here," the General replied. "Otherwise I wouldn't have touched the business. Well, it's cost you a penny or two, but you've the satisfaction of knowing you've settled the blighter's hash. Any time now they'll be making their move, so I think we can say he's as good as dead. Finish it off at Flying Clouds Quay, that's what I told 'em. They'll be here in the morning to make their report."
Captain Zhang chipped in: "Four of them against one, it can't possibly go wrong. Even supposing he had several lives, he'd still be a goner!"
Jiang added: "I told my people to go along too. I said to lend a hand and come back and report when it's over."
Indeed it was a case of:
Behind closed doors the truth is heard;
Revenge is waiting in the wings.
Before the cold the cricket sings,
The Reaper's call can't be deferred.
When Wu Song heard all this, the flaming pillar of rage in his heart grew ten thousand feet tall, splitting the sky's vault. With the sword brandished in his right hand, the fingers of his left hand tense, he charged into the room.
Three or four decorated candles were blazing and in several places moonlight filtered in, so the room was clearly illumined. The drinking vessels had still not been cleared away. Jiang the Door-God was sitting in a folding chair. When he saw Wu Song he had such a shock his heart, liver and lungs leapt into his mouth.
It's slow in the telling but happens in a flash. Before Jiang could offer any resistance, Wu Song brought his blade down, just the once, slashing down across the man's face and chopping right through the chair. Only as Wu Song turned and raised the sword again did General Zhang start to move his feet. But as he did so Wu Song's sword caught him, slashing from the ear to the neck and he crashed to the floor.
So these two lay there, nearer to death than life. But Captain Zhang was after all a military man of no mean ability, so although drunk he still had some fight left in him. Having seen the other two cut down, and not rating his own chances of getting away, he picked up a folding chair and moved in. But Wu Song was ready and checked the attack. Then he brought all his strength to bear. It matters little that Captain Zhang was drunk, even if he'd been stone-cold sober he'd never have matched Wu Song's phenomenal strength. He lost his balance and toppled backwards. Wu Song was onto him and cut off his head with one blow.
Now Jiang the Door-God was a pretty tough customer. He had just managed to struggle to his feet again. But Wu Song lifted his left foot and felled him again with a flying kick. He held him down and cut off his head. Turning, he cut off General Zhang's head as well. Seeing that there was meat and wine on the table, he now picked up a wine jar and drained it at a single draught. After three or four more he went to one of the bodies and cut off a piece of cloth. He dipped this in the blood and went and wrote in big characters on the whitewashed wall these words: "The tiger-killer, Wu Song, did this." He then took the drinking vessels and stamped them flat, stuffing several inside his shirt front. Before he could leave he heard the general's lady shouting: "The gentlemen upstairs are all drunk. You two, run up and assist them!"
She had hardly finished speaking when two men could be heard coming upstairs. Wu Song slipped to the side of the landing. When they appeared he saw it was two of the household servants who had previously been involved in his capture. Standing in the shadows he let them go by and then barred the door. Inside the room they immediately saw the three corpses lying in a pool of blood. They stared at each other in horror, unable to utter a sound — you know the feeling, when your scalp seems to split into eight pieces, or some one pours a bucket of iced water over you! They were about to retreat, but Wu Song had crept up behind them. His sword arm rose and fell, and one was cut down. The other knelt on the floor and begged for mercy. "It's no good, I can't let you off," Wu Song said. He held him and chopped off his head. From all this killing the pavilion was swimming in blood, bodies could be seen lying everywhere in the flickering light of the candles. Wu Song said to himself: "It had to be all or nothing; kill a hundred, you can only die for it once." Sword at the ready, he went downstairs.
"What's all the hullabaloo upstairs?" the General's wife was inquiring as Wu Song rushed in. At this monstrous sight she shrieked: "Who are you?"
But Wu Song's sword was already flying. It caught her square in the forehead and she fell with a shriek right there in front of the pavilion. Wu Song held her down but when he tried to cut off her head the sword wouldn't cut. Baffled, he saw by the light of the moon that the blade was completely blunted. "So that's why I couldn't get her head off," he thought.
He slipped out of the back door to get his halberd again and threw away the blunt sword. Then he turned and went back to the tower. A lamp could be seen approaching. It turned out to be the singing girl, Yulan, the one he'd had the trouble with before. She was accompanied by two children. When the light of her lamp fell on the General's wife where she lay dead on the floor, Yulan screamed: "Merciful heaven!" Wu Song raised his halberd and ran her through the heart. He also killed the children, a single thrust to each. He went to the central hall, bolted the main door and returned. He found two or three more young girls and stabbed them to death too. "Now at last," he said, "my heart is eased. Now it's time to stop." He threw away the scabbard, picked up his halberd, went out of the side-door, took from his shirt front the drinking vessels he had squashed and put them in the sack he had left in the stable, tying it on at his waist. And off he strode, halberd in hand. Reaching the city wall, he thought: "If I wait for the gates to open I'll be caught. Surely the best thing to do is to climb the wall now, while it's still dark, and clear off." So he leapt up onto the wall.
This Mengzhou was only a small place and the wall was of packed earth and not too high. Peering down from the parapet, he felt around with his halberd, holding it with the point reversed. Then he vaulted down, leaning his weight on the halberd. Steadying himself with the shaft, he landed beside the moat. The water gleamed in the moonlight, but it was not more than one or two feet deep. It was real October weather and everywhere the springs were dry. Standing by the moat he took off his shoes, leggings and knee guards, hitched up his clothing and waded across to the other bank. Then he remembered that in the package the Young Master had given him there was a pair of hemp sandals with eight eyelets. He took them out and put them on. As he heard the drum beat for half-past one in the morning, he told himself that finally his rage had been fully appeased. "Well," he said to himself now: " 'Tis fine to stay in Liang hall, but in the end its comforts pall'. I'd better beat it!" Halberd in hand, he took an eastward path.
As the poem says:
To wield the sword was his only intention,
But he also finds some drink on the way.

One against many, he kills his opponents;
A murderous heart makes the murderers pay.
So many angry ghosts to detain him,
What hope can he have of getting away?

That night he went on walking till after five. The sky was still dark, day had not yet dawned. It had been a hard night and Wu Song was exhausted. Besides, the wounds from his beating were hurting again and he simply couldn't take any more. When he saw a little old temple, surrounded by trees, he entered it at once, dropped his halberd, took off the pack to use as a pillow and flung himself down to sleep.

He had only just closed his eyes when two hooks were thrust into the temple from outside, pinning him to the ground, while two men charged inside and quickly subdued him, tying him up with a rope. The four villains now began to discuss him: "This bugger's good and fat. The boss'll be real pleased with 'im!"

Struggle as he might, Wu Song could not escape. They picked up his pack and his halberd and hauled him off to the village, like a sheep to market, harrying him along so fast that his feet barely touched the ground. All the way they were discussing him among themselves. "Did you see? The bugger's all covered in blood, what's 'e been up to? D' you suppose we've caught a thief?"

Wu Song kept quiet and listened. They'd not gone more than a mile or so when they came to a thatched hut. They pushed Wu Song inside. Through a doorway on one side a lamp was burning. They stripped off his clothes and tied him to a pillar.

When he looked around, Wu Song saw hanging from a beam beside the stove two human legs. "I've fallen into the hands of a bunch of real cutthroats," he thought to himself. "Now I'm going to die uselessly. If I'd known this was going to happen, I might just as well have gone to Mengzhou and turned myself in. I'd have died at the hands of the executioner, of course, but at least I'd have left a reputation behind me."

Holding the pack the four who had brought him in cried: "Boss! Mistress! Come and look! We got a lovely piece of goods here!"

There was an answering cry from inside: "Coming! Don't begin yet! I'll come and do the carving myself!" And in less time than it takes to drink a cup of tea, a couple appeared from the back, first a woman, and behind her a big man. They both took a good long look at Wu Song. "Why, if it isn't Uncle!" the woman exclaimed.

"'Course it is, it's our old friend," the man said.

And now at last Wu Song realized that these two were none other than the Gardener and the Ogress. The four who had brought him in, much chastened, hurried to undo the rope and return his clothes so that he could get dressed. His head cloth was torn so they gave him a felt hat to put on.

In fact, Zhang the Gardener had quite a number of establishments like the inn at Crossways Rise, that's why Wu Song hadn't recognized his surroundings.

The Gardener now invited Wu Song inside, and after the exchange of courtesies said with a great show of concern: "How did you get like this, my old friend?"

"It's a long story," said Wu Song. "After I left you and went to the Fortress of Peace, I received great favours from the Warden's son, the Young Master, nicknamed the Golden-Eyed Tiger. We hit it off at once and he kept me supplied every day with wonderful food and drink. He had an inn, you know, to the east of the town at Happy Woods, a most profitable place, that was pinched from him in broad daylight by a certain villain known as Jiang the Door-God, a protégé? of one Captain Zhang. The Young Master told me all this. Well, I could see it wasn't right. I beat that Jiang the Door-God up one day when I was drunk and got Happy Woods back for the Young Master, who valued me highly after this. Afterwards, this Captain Zhang bribed General Zhang and they hatched a plot. The General invited me to join his staff, but it was all a trap, the purpose being to accomplish Jiang the Door-God's vengeance. The evening of Mid-Autumn Festival, the cry went up that a thief had got in. They decoyed me into the house and meanwhile hid some silver cups in a chest of mine. Then they arrested me and handed me over to the Mengzhou court, accused of theft. I was beaten till I confessed and locked up. The Young Master managed to get in to see me by bribing everyone and I was not ill-treated after that. And then thanks to the rectitude and generosity of the clerk of the court, their plot to destroy me failed. It turned out also that the gaoler, Kang, was a friend of the Young Master's — they did all they could to let me off lightly. I was sentenced to a flogging and banishment to the prison camp at Enzhou.

"Yesterday evening when I was being taken out of town, would you believe it? — that General Zhang produced another plot. He got Jiang the Door-God to send two of his people to collaborate with the police guards in killing me. They made their move when we got to Flying Clouds Quay, a lonely spot. But I got in two kicks first and dumped the two henchmen in the water. Then I got those bloody guards, each with a halberd thrust, killing them and chucking them in the water. I reckoned I had to work off my anger, so I returned to Mengzhou. At half-past eight, after entering the stables and killing a groom, I scaled the wall and killed two maids in the kitchen. In the Ducks and Drakes Tower I killed General Zhang, Captain Zhang and Jiang the Door-God, and afterwards two attendants. I went downstairs again and dealt with the General's wife and daughters and the singer. I left at once, by jumping down from the city wall. After a mile or two I was exhausted and my wounds were hurting, I could go no further. So I went into a little temple intending to rest a while. That's when I was tied up by these four."

Wu Song's four assailants now flung themselves on the floor and said: "We works for Mr. Zhang, we does. We bin losin' a lot at the tables, see, so we went to try an' make a bit in the woods. We seed you a-comin' down the path, all drippin' with blood, like. An' then you lays down on the ground inside the temple. We 'adn't got no idea 'oo you was. But Mr. Zhang tell us only to take 'em alive, see, so we just used the 'ooks to pin you down. If 'e 'adn't give us that order, like as not we'd've done you in. Honest, we couldn't see what was starin' us in the face. We treated you 'orrible, sir. 'Ow can you ever pardon us?"

The Gardener and his wife explained happily: "We were worried, see. That's why I've been telling them to bring the goods back alive. 'Course they didn't know what was in my mind." The Gardener turned to the gang: "Listen, you lot: if our friend here hadn't been tired, forget about the four of you; if you'd been forty you still wouldn't have got near him."

In reply to this they knocked their heads on the ground.

"If it's money for gambling you want," Wu Song cried, "I can help you out." He opened his pack and took out a dozen taels of silver for them to divide. When they expressed their gratitude, the Gardener also produced two or three taels and distributed them.

"Well" said the Gardener, "You can't imagine how worried I've been. After you left I was sure you were going to get into some kind of scrape or other. Anyway, I knew you'd be back sooner or later. So I says to this ere lot, 'Every time you get hold of some goods, see that you bring 'em back alive.' You see these idiots, sometimes they can take the slower ones alive, but if someone puts up a fight they just kill him. So now I don't let them take any knives along, only the hooks and some rope. When I heard them calling just now I had some misgivings, I can tell you. I told 'em straight off not to do anything till I'd been and had a look. And who should it be then but our old mate!"

"We heard all about your beating up Jiang the Door-God," the Ogress added, "how you took him apart, even when you were drunk. Everyone said it was amazing! Some of the traders from Happy Woods told us about that, but we didn't hear what happened afterwards. You must be tired though, why not go and have a little sleep? We can talk later."

The Gardener showed Wu Song to his room so he could rest, and then they both went to the kitchen to prepare some very special dishes and wine of the best for entertaining Wu Song. Soon this was ready and nothing lacked but for Wu Song to wake up and join them. There's a poem here:

When authority sleeps the long knives awaken,
All's out of kilter when justice is far.
But forget how in palaces evil is rampant
From the rivers and lakes, deliverance is near.

Meanwhile, back in Mengzhou at General Zhang's, it was early morning before all those who had hidden dared come out. Their cries aroused the household servants and the guards on duty outside, who immediately raised the alarm when they viewed the scene. Yet no one emerged from the neighbouring houses. Not until almost full daylight did anyone go to the government office to report the incident. The governor was horrified by what he heard. He hurriedly sent to determine the number of dead and the assassin's point of entry and escape. After making sketches and diagrams the investigators returned and reported: "The murderer entered by way of the stables where he killed the stable boy and discarded two items of old clothing. He then proceeded to the kitchen where he killed two maids beside the stove and abandoned one of the murder weapons by the back door, a blunted knife. In an upper room he killed General Zhang and two of his retinue. Two visitors, Captain Zhang and Jiang, alias the Door-God, were also killed. On the whitewashed wall the murderer wrote in big characters using a rag dipped in blood, "The tiger-killer, Wu Song, did this." The body of the mistress of the house was found downstairs and outside were those of Yulan, her two attendants and three little girls — in all a total of fifteen dead. Six items of silverware were missing."

The governor immediately ordered the gates of Mengzhou closed and commanded officers of the militia and police, together with local authorities in the city and districts, to carry out a thorough search in order to apprehend the criminal Wu Song. The next day police authorities from Flying Clouds Quay arrived to report that four people had been murdered: there were blood-stains under the bridge and four corpses floating in the water. In response to this report the governor sent the sheriff to have the four bodies retrieved and examined. Two were local policemen whose next of kin prepared the bodies for burial and lodged a formal complaint, demanding that the culprit be arrested and sentenced to death. The city gates remained closed for three days while a door-to-door search was carried out; every household, every family, no one escaped questioning. The governor put out an order underlining the responsibility of all local authorities at every level — district and ward, urban and rural — to assist in the search and bring the murderer to justice. A full description of Wu Song was circulated, giving his birthplace, age, physical appearance and bearing, with sketches, and announcing a reward of three thousand in cash. Anyone with knowledge of his whereabouts was to report it immediately and would receive the due reward. Anyone found to be harbouring the criminal or giving him food would be charged as an accomplice and sent up for trial with him.

When Wu Song had been staying at the Gardener's for a few days, it became clear that the situation was far from good. Police were pouring out of the city to search the villages and countryside. In view of this, the Gardener felt obliged to say: "Listen, it's not that I don't want you to stay because I'm worried about my own skin, but this thing's really hotting up. They're knocking on every door. What I'm afraid is that if something was to go wrong, you'd blame us. But I do know of a really safe refuge for you, and I'd tell you about it right away if I thought you were prepared to go there."

"I've been thinking too," said Wu Song. "I can see they aren't going to let the matter rest, so I'll never be really safe here. As for family, I had just the one brother and he was cruelly murdered by my sister-in-law. I came here only recently and fell into a trap. I've no home or family left, so if you do know of a good place for me, I shall go there, why not? You'd better tell me where it is."

"It's in Qingzhou," the Gardener said. "There's this temple there called Temple of the Precious Pearl, on Twin Dragon Peak. Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk and a pal of his called Yang Zhi, the Blue-Faced Beast, have made themselves a stronghold there, a base for pillaging and plundering. The local militia and the anti-bandit brigade daren't so much as look them in the face, you'll be perfectly safe if you go there. Anywhere else they'd catch up with you sooner or later. Those two have often written to me and asked me to join their company and it's only because I'm attached to my own home that I didn't go. I'll write a letter for you to take, telling all about your situation, and I'm sure they'll have you, for my sake."

"You're quite right," said Wu Song. "I've been thinking that too. Only I wasn't sure the time was ripe. But I'm a murderer now, it's an established fact and I've nowhere to hide. It's the best possible plan. Please write the letter and I'll be off today."

So the Gardener penned a full account and gave the letter to Wu Song. They were in the middle of a farewell dinner when the Ogress pointed a finger at her husband and said: "You can't let him go like this, he's going to get himself caught."

"What do you mean? Why should I be caught?" said Wu Song.

"There's police notices everywhere and a reward of three thousand on your head. They've got pictures of you and all your personal details posted up everywhere. And there's the two golden seals on your face, plain for all to see. If you go ahead, it's just a foregone conclusion."

"We can always stick a couple of medicinal plasters on his cheeks," said the Gardener.

"Trust you to come up with something cock-eyed like that," said the Ogress. "How's that supposed to fool the police? I've got a better idea, only I don't know if you'll like it."

"I'm in a tight spot, I can't afford to be fussy," said Wu Song.

"Well, but promise not to get angry if I tell you," said the Ogress.

"Don't worry, I won't," said Wu Song.

"A couple of years back we had one of them travelling monks come through here. We put him down, and he did us for several days' pies. We've still got his metal circlet, a set of clothing, a black cassock, a short coloured silk sash, a certificate, a set of one hundred and eight beads in the shape of human skulls, a shark-skin scabbard with two monk's swords of snow-white patterned steel — you saw those two swords yourself, brother, often at night there's a kind of keening comes from them. Now you're in such trouble your best chance is to cut your hair and become a monk. When we've put the patches on your cheeks to hide the golden seals, this monk's certificate will be all the passport you need. He had just about your age and looks, it's like it was preordained. If you use his name and don't stop, who's going to ask questions? What do you say?"

The Gardener clapped his hands. "She's right! I'd forgotten all about that!"

It was a case of:

The pursuit is hot, he's in a spot,
He's in the tightest corner;
Now it's the best escape he's got,
To become a holy brother!

"Well brother, what do you say?" the Gardener asked.

"It's not a bad idea," said Wu Song, "only I'm afraid I don't look much like a monk."

"Let's try dressing you up," the Gardener said.

The Ogress went and fetched a bundle, from which she took a variety of clothing. They made Wu Song change everything. "It's as if they'd been made for me," said Wu Song, when he saw the things. He put on the black robe, fastened the sash, took off his hat to loosen his hair, then doubled it back and secured it with the circlet, and hung the beads round his neck. The Gardener and the Ogress both applauded the effect. "It must have been ordained in a previous life," they said. When he saw himself in a mirror, Wu Song roared with laughter. "Why are you laughing?" the Gardener asked. "I look so funny, I'm really like a monk," Wu Song replied. "Now cut my hair please."

The Gardener took the scissors and cut Wu Song's hair in front and behind.

Filled now with a sense of urgency, Wu Song packed his bag and was eager to be off at once. But the Gardener said: "Listen brother, I don't want you to think me greedy, but you'd better leave General Zhang's silver drinking vessels here. I'll give you some loose silver for them to use on the journey. It's by far the best way."

"Just as you say brother." Wu Song fetched them out and gave them to the Gardener, who gave him the equivalent in loose silver. He put this away in his purse, tied it and hung it on his belt.

When Wu Song had eaten and drunk his fill, he thanked the Gardener and his wife, hung the two swords on his belt and prepared to leave that evening. The Ogress took out the monk's certificate and stitched a special cover for it, which she made Wu Song wear round his neck, next to the skin. Wu Song thanked them both.

Just before he left, the Gardener said: "Be very careful on the journey. You must be moderate in everything. Eat and drink little, don't get into quarrels, and do all the things a monk does. Keep calm always and don't cause scandal. Write and let us know, if you can, when you get to Twin Dragon Peak. We don't expect to remain here long. I wouldn't mind betting we'll soon be packing up too and moving to the mountain to join the band. Look after yourself, brother, and please give my regards to Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi."

As he marched off, Wu Song put his hands in his sleeves and adopted the mincing gait of a monk. The Gardener and his wife exclaimed in admiration: "He's a perfect monk!" Here's the picture:

The hair in front falls in a fringe to the brows, it straggles to his shoulders at the back. The black robe envelopes him like an ominous cloud, the coloured sash binds him about like the mottled python's coils. The metal circlet glitters on his forehead like a fiery eye; the vest reveals the contours of an iron frame. The two swords give off a deadly autumn chill, the rosary of skulls wafts unease about him as he goes. Before him, the man-devouring yakshas bow down perforce, even the fierce door-gods who guard the scriptures needs must lower their gaze.

After bidding the Gardener and his wife farewell that afternoon and leaving the crossroads of the tree behind him, Pilgrim Wu chose a lonely road. It was November, when the days are short and night falls in the blink of an eyelid. He had barely gone fifteen miles when he came to a steep hill.

By the light of the moon he began to climb, step by step. He calculated it must be somewhat after seven o'clock. When he reached the top he looked about him and saw that the moon rising in the east was flooding the landscape with light. At that moment he heard laughter, coming from a clump of trees ahead. "That's odd!" he thought. "Who can be laughing on a lonely moor like this?" He headed for the trees to investigate, and there among a group of pines he found a small family shrine, composed of a dozen or so thatched rooms. In one of these a double-leafed window was flung open and revealed a man holding a woman and gazing at the moon while engaged in lustful dalliance. When Pilgrim Wu saw this, his gorge rose. "This is supposed to be a holy man, living here in the wilderness as a hermit, and look what he gets up to!" he exclaimed, unsheathing the two swords at his waist, which glittered like polished silver.

Gazing on his swords in the moonlight, he said to himself: "The blades are good, but I have yet to set them to work. Let's try them out now." He hung one of the swords on his wrist and returned the other to its scabbard. He drew back the long sleeves of his robe and tied them behind his back. Then he approached the shrine and knocked on the door. The window at the back closed at once. Pilgrim Wu picked up a stone and began hammering on the door with it. Thereupon a side-door burst open and out popped an acolyte. "Who do you think you are?" he scolded. "What do you mean by kicking up such a row in the middle of the night, banging on people's doors like this?"

Pilgrim Wu fixed the lad with a glare and shouted: "This bloody acolyte is meat for my sword!" Almost before he'd finished speaking, the acolyte's head fell, splat! on the ground. Then there was a great roar from within: "Who has the temerity to kill my acolyte?" and out leapt the gentleman who had been seen in the window. Brandishing two double-edged swords, he set upon Wu Song.

Wu Song greeted this with a great shout of laughter: "Only too happy to oblige," he bellowed. "Just what the doctor ordered!" With that he drew the second sword from its scabbard and engaged the stranger with both weapons. The battle waged to and fro, back and forth, in the light of the moon, the stranger's double-edged blades glinting frostily, Wu Song's swords filling the air with chilly light.

Long they fought, locked together as if in a lover's embrace. On they went, until the hawk had taken the hare, so to speak. It was after a dozen bouts that a piercing scream rang out over the hillside, and one of the two contestants fell. Then:

A man's head rolls among the cold shadows,
Amid baneful thickets the blood wells out.

WU SONG reached Mengzhou in the evening, and went to Colonel Zhang's house. He found no one in the yard, and hid himself there. In a short time he heard a door open, and saw a groom enter the yard holding a lighted lamp. The groom hung up the lamp, and fed the horses with hay. He then took the lamp and returned to his room where he undressed, and went to bed. Just then a watchman outside struck his drum four times indicating that it was about 10 P.M. Wu Song went to the door of the man's room, and pushed the door a little. The groom heard the noise and called out, "I am just going to sleep, and it is still a little early for you to steal my clothes."

Wu Song placed his halberd at the side of the door, and drawing a sword from his belt he again pushed the door. The groom could not stand this noise, so he sprang from his bed, seized a stick, and went to the door. Immediately Wu Song threw the door open and stepping forward he seized the groom by the hair. The groom was surprised, and was about to cry out, but seeing the sword in Wu Song's hand could only beg for mercy.

"Do you know me?"

The groom recognized the voice of Wu Song, and said, "Elder brother, I had nothing to do with it. Please spare me."

"Tell me the truth, where is Colonel Zhang now?"

"Colonel Zhang has been drinking wine all day with Jiang the 'Door God,' and Captain Zhang, and they are still drinking in the Yuanyang Tower."

"Is that really so?"

"If I do not speak the truth may I be seized by the foulest disease."
"Then I cannot spare your life," said Wu Song, and he killed the man straightway. He then changed his clothes, and put on the new suit that Shi En had given him. He took a blanket off the groom's bed, wrapped his silver inside it, and placed it near the door of the room. He next lifted a door out of its socket, and placed it against the wall. He blew out the lamp in the room, and taking his halberd he climbed up the door and over the wall.
It was a bright moonlight night. He soon found the door, and opened it from inside. He took the door reared against the wall, and put it back in its place. He then returned to the garden, and went toward the place when he saw many lamps. The light came from the kitchen, and looking inside he saw two women servants round the stove, and heard them grumbling, "We have been waiting on them all day, and yet there is no sign of their going to bed. The guests too have no sense of shame. They are almost drunk, and yet they would not go to sleep." While they were still murmuring, Wu Song leaned his halberd against the wall, drew his bloody sword, and pushing the door open, entered the kitchen. He seized one of the women by her hair, and cut off her head. The other woman seeing this was paralyzed with fear—her legs could not move, and she could not even scream. Wu Song killed her also, and then blew out the lamps. The moonlight shining through the windows enabled him to find his way about, and he crept towards the guest chamber. He knew the way. He found the ladder leading up to the Yuanyang Tower, and stealthily ascended. The men servants had already departed as they were tired of having been on duty continuously all day long. Listening at the door Wu Song could hear the three men talking together inside.
He heard Jiang the "Door God," say, "I am obliged to you for taking revenge in my behalf, and I shall fully recompense you."
"Who would like to do this but for my younger brother Captain Zhang?" said Colonel Zhang. "Though you have spent much money, yet you have well disposed of that fellow. He must be dead by now. When those four men come back early tomorrow morning we shall know how the deed was done at the Feiyun Pool."
"Four men ought to be enough to kill one man," said Captain Zhang.
"Well, I told those two followers of mine that they must get it done there, and report to us as soon as possible," said Jiang the "Door God."
Upon hearing all this Wu Song's anger was enough to burst the sky, and pushing open the door he entered the room. There were about five lamps burning, and the moonlight entered the room through windows, so there was plenty of light. On the table were many drinking vessels. When Jiang the 'Door God' saw Wu Song he was so thunderstruck that his spirit flew away to heaven. Before he could stir Wu Song struck him in the face with his sword, and he fell down. Quickly turning round Wu Song struck at Colonel Zhang, who tried to evade the blow, and was cut in the neck. Captain Zhang had military training, and although he was almost drunk, yet when he saw these two men struck down he sprang to action, and seizing a chair raised it above his head, and advanced. But as he struck Wu Song took hold of the chair, and pushing it back upset the balance of Captain Zhang who fell on the floor. In a second Wu Song was on top of him, and cut off his head. Jiang the "Door God," made an effort to get up, but Wu Song kicked him so that he turned a somersault, and Wu Song taking a sword cut off his head. Wu Song then cut off Colonel Zhang's head.
Taking a cup of wine from the table Wu Song drank it off at one draft. He then cut pieces of cloth from the clothing of the dead men, and dipping them in the blood that was covering the floor he wrote eight characters on the white wall: "The murderer is Wu Song, the Tiger Slayer." He then took the silver utensils from the table, flattened them out with his foot, and placed them in his bosom. He prepared to descend the tower, but just then he heard the mistress below call out, "The officials are evidently drunk, so you two go upstairs and assist them down." As two servants came up the ladder Wu Song hid at one side of the door, and as they entered he saw that they were the same confidential servants who had arrested him a few days before. He was in the shade, and allowed them to pass, and then stepped out behind them. The servants were so astounded upon seeing the decapitated bodies lying there in pools of blood that they could not utter a sound. The hair on their heads stood on end, and they felt as though a bucket of icy water had been poured over them. As they turned to run away they faced Wu Song who instantly killed one of them. The other one knelt down and begged for mercy, but Wu Song declined to pardon him, and killed him also. The dead were lying all about the room, and blood had been spattered over everything, Wu Song thought, "It is the same whether one kills only one or a hundred—the penalty of death is not more." He sheathed his sword, and went down the ladder. The mistress below asked what the noise upstairs was about. When she saw a big man advancing towards her she called out, "Who is that?"
Without saying a word Wu Song struck her a blow with his sword, and she screamed as she fell down. Wu Song was surprised that his blow had not been effective, but upon examining his sword in the moonlight he saw that the blade had been dulled. It was no wonder that it would not cut any more. So he went into the kitchen, and exchanged the sword for his halberd. Upon returning to the tower he saw the singsong girl Yulan with two children, and they were examining the corpse of their mistress. She called out in astonishment. He took his halberd, and drove it into Yulan's breast, and then also killed the other two children. Opening the door he entered the private apartments, and finding three women there he killed them also. Wu Song soliloquized, "I have killed enough, and will now get away." He went to the stable where he had left his things, and taking the silver cups from his bosom he made them into a bundle with his other things. Holding his halberd in his hand he strode towards the city gate. But before he reached there he thought, "If I wait for them to open the gate they may try to arrest me so I had better try and get over the wall." So he went and got on the city wall. It was an earth wall faced with bricks, and not very high. He jumped down and landed at the side of the moat. In the moonlight he could see that the water was only a few feet deep. It was then the tenth lunar month, the time when spring is dry, so there was not much water in the moat. He took off his boots, puttees, and socks, and lifting up his clothes he waded through the water to the opposite bank. He remembered that Shi En had given him a new pair of hempen shoes so taking these out of his bundle he now put them on. Just then he heard the watchman inside the city strike the hour of 4 A.M. He had been very angry, but now he found that his temper had all vanished. He felt no hankering to stay near that place so he set off at a good pace along the eastern road.
He walked until about 5 A.M. when he began to feel tired, and also felt the pain in his legs from the blows he had received some days ago. Just then he saw an old temple in a grove of trees, so he entered and finding it vacant he lay down to sleep with his bundle as a pillow. He was on the point of closing his eyes when he saw two hooked sticks reaching out to catch his clothes. At the same moment two men rushed in, seized hold of him, and bound him with cords. One man said, "This man is very fat so we can send him to our elder brother." Wu Song struggled, but could not release himself. The four persons took charge of his sword and bundle. They led him off, and took him to a near village. On the way the four persons spoke, "See! There is blood on this man. Where can he have come from? He must be a wounded bandit." Wu Song listened to their conversation, but kept quiet.
After about a //they came to a straw hut, and pushed Wu Song inside. On one side of the room was a small door leading to another room where a lamp was burning. The four persons stripped the clothes from Wu Song, and bound him to one of the pillars supporting the roof.
Looking upwards, Wu Song saw two human legs hanging from a rafter. He thought, "These people are evidently murderers, and they have me entirely in their power. If I had known of this I would rather have admitted my guilt in Mengzhou Prefecture, and submitted to execution, than have such a fate as this."
The persons examined Wu Song's bundle, and called out, "Brother and sister-in-law, come here! We have got some first-class booty," A voice in the inner room replied, "I am coming, and will open the bundle. Leave it alone." Before you could have drunk a cup of tea, the small door opened, and two persons entered. In front was a woman, and behind her a man. They stared at Wu Song, and the woman said, "Is not this our brother?" The man said, "Yes, he is my brother." Wu Song upon looking at them closely recognized the man as Zhang Qing, the "Market Gardener," and the woman was Sun Er Niang, the "Night Witch." When the four persons saw that Zhang Qing knew Wu Song they hurriedly untied the ropes, and gave clothes for him to dress. They had torn his turban so they found a felt cap for him. Zhang Qing invited Wu Song to go to the inner room, where he saluted him. When he saw the blood on Wu Song's clothes Zhang Qing was surprised, and asked, "What has happened to you?"
"That is a long story," said Wu Song. He then recited to them all the experiences he had had since he last met Zhang Qing at the Cross Road, and also related how he had been captured in the little old temple in the woods. When they heard all this the four assistants knelt and begged Wu Song for forgiveness, saying that they went to the woods to look for some booty because they had lost all their money in gambling.
Then Zhang Qing and his wife both laughed, and said, "We have been anxious for some time that these four assistants should not kill people, but rather get them alive. How could they understand our arrangement? If our younger brother had not been tired forty people of your sort would not have been able to get access to him."
"Well, never mind," said Wu Song. "As these four assistants have no money to gamble I myself will give them some money." He opened his bundle, and divided ten taels of silver between them. The four rascals thanked him for this. Zhang Qing seeing this also gave them about three taels of silver.
Zhang Qing said, "My brother, since your departure I have thought that you would escape and come here again. So I instructed my men that they were to take captives alive. As we were afraid that they would kill people, so I did not supply them with swords, but only hooks on sticks with which they could capture men. Just now when I heard that they had captured something valuable I was afraid that they might kill you so I told them to wait until I had inspected the booty. But still I never imagined that it was really you."
"We heard that you had beaten Jiang the 'Door God,'" said Sun Er Niang, "and whosoever heard the news was quite startled. The merchants from the Kuaihuo Forest who passed here could not however give us any news as to what had happened to you after that affair. But you must be very tired just now, so please go to our guest chamber, and take a rest before you tell us all about it."
So Wu Song took this advice, and went to sleep. Zhang Qing and his wife prepared food for Wu Song in the kitchen. It was all ready in a short time, and they then waited for Wu Song to eat the same.
The following morning when the servants who had not been killed found out what had happened in Colonel Zhang's quarters they did not dare to raise the alarm. It was quite daylight when they went to the Prefect's yamen, and gave the information there. The Prefect was greatly surprised at the news, and sent men to investigate the case. The reports stated how Wu Song had killed altogether fifteen persons, and had written his name in blood on the wall. The police were then instructed to closely watch the city gates, and to search for Wu Song.
The next day a report came that four men had been killed at the Feiyun Pool, and the bodies thrown in the water. He sent an official to investigate that case also, who duly reported that two of the men were the official escort for Wu Song, and the other two were servants.
For three days a careful search was made in every house in the city, and for every ten houses a letter had to be written pledging that the culprit was not hidden there. All this did not furnish any clue however. The Prefect also issued orders to all the surrounding counties and villages, giving details of the case, describing Wu Song's appearance and dress, and offering a reward of three thousand strings of cash for those who might arrest him. Anyone harboring Wu Song would be treated as a fellow criminal.
Wu Song stayed with Zhang Qing for five days, and heard the rumors and reports from outside sources. Zhang Qing also heard the news, and therefore spoke to Wu Song, "Brother, as you are aware, the officials are giving your case most urgent attention, and are searching every house in the district. I am afraid that they will at last visit this house, and then we shall all be involved. I have found a safe place for you to go to—in fact I mentioned the place to you some time ago—but I do not know whether you would care to go there."
"I have been thinking of the same thing for the last few days," said Wu Song, "and have been aware that I cannot stay here in safety. But now that my only brother is dead and I have no relatives so if you know of a safe place why should I not go there? Where is this place?"
"It is at the Lianglong Mountain in Qingzhou Prefecture. There are my brothers Lu Da and Yang Zhi who are at the head of a gang of brigands. The officials at Qingzhou are afraid of interfering with them. If you went there, there would be no danger of your being arrested again, but if you went to any other place there would be that danger. They have frequently sent me letters asking me to join them, but so far I have not been able to do so. I can write a letter stating your abilities, and they would admit you to their band."
"What you say is quite true," replied Wu Song. "I had that idea myself, but to my regret I found no opportunity of going there. Now that I have killed these people I must find a safe refuge, and your plan is an excellent one. If you will write the letter now I will leave here today."
Zhang Qing wrote a letter, handed it to Wu Song, and prepared a meal for the final leave-taking.
Sun Er Niang pointed at her husband and asked, "Why do you ask him to go in this way? If he leaves here he will meet somebody, and be arrested."
"Why should I not go?" asked Wu Song. "How do you know that I should be arrested?"
"The full details of your case have been published, and are posted everywhere offering a reward for your arrest. Your face is branded with characters so that on the way you would be detected very easily."
"We can put a plaster on his face to cover those characters," said Zhang Qing.
Sun Er Niang laughed, "You are the smartest man in the world, but you have now uttered a very foolish remark. How would a plaster deceive those officials? I have a plan, but I think our brother would not care to try it."
"I want to escape, so what is there that I would not try?"
Sun Er Niang again laughed. "Well, if I tell you, you must not misunderstand me."
"Whatever you say I will do," replied Wu Song.
Sun Er Niang said, "Two years ago a wandering monk passed this way, and I killed him and made his flesh into dumplings. I keep all his clothing, his iron head ring, his string of beads which were all carved out of human bones, and also his broad swords made of the best steel, with fine fish-skin sheaths. Now you can wear these things, and arrange your hair so as to hide the branded characters. There is also a monk's certificate which will be equal to a talisman for you. His age and appearance were about the same as yours. Would not this be a splendid disguise? You can also adopt his name, and on the road nobody would ask questions. Will you try this?"
Zhang Qing clapped his hands to show approval and said. "Wife, a good plan. I have forgotten all about that. Brother, what do you think about it?"
'It will do," said Wu Song. "I am only afraid that I should not look like a monk."
"Well, let me disguise you and then we shall see," said Zhang Qing.
Sun Er Niang went into another room, and brought a bundle. Opening it she spread out monk's clothes, and asked Wu Song to put them on.
He looked at them, and thought they would fit him nicely. He put the clothes on, rearranged his hair, and encased it with the monk's iron head ring and donned the string of beads. Both Zhang Qing and his wife applauded, and said that he looked true to life.
Wu Song took a mirror, and upon examining himself he burst into laughter.
"Why do you laugh so loudly?" asked Zhang Qing.
"I am so strange. I never expected to become a monk. Elder brother, please cut my hair."
Zhang Qing took the scissors, and cut his hair. Wu Song realized that his position was getting serious so he got his bundle ready for departure.
"Now please listen to what I say," said Zhang Qing. "You had better leave here the silver cups, etc. you took from Colonel Zhang's house, and in exchange for them I will give you silver to cover your traveling expenses."
"That is a very good suggestion," said Wu Song. He then exchanged the cups for silver, and put it in his belt. He buckled on his two knives, and was ready to start. Sun Er Niang handed him the monk's certificate with a cover to carry it in. She asked him to suspend this from his neck, and wear it next to his skin. Wu Song bade them farewell, and Zhang Qing asked him to take every care on his journey. "Be sparing with wine, and avoid quarrels with people. Act like a monk. In all transactions avoid haste, or a display of temper, or people will suspect you. When you reach the Lianglong Mountain please give us a letter. We shall not be staying here a long time as we may shortly go to that mountain retreat ourselves. Brother! Be careful! Be careful! Give our respects to Lu Da and Yang Zhi."
So Wu Song rolled up his sleeves for comfort in walking, and set out with big strides.
When he left the Crossroads it was the tenth lunar month, and the days were getting short. He had traveled about sixteen //when he was close to a high mountain range. It was evening, but as the moon was shining bright he continued his way up to the mountain. When he reached the top of the pass it was about 9 P.M. and he stopped to admire the beauty of the scene in the moonlight. In the silence he heard someone in the forest laughing. He thought, "That is strange! This is a very lonely spot, so where can the laughter come from?" He walked towards the trees and saw a temple surrounded by fir trees in a cemetery, on the side of the hill. The temple was small with about ten rooms, and one of the windows was open. Standing at the window and admiring the moonlight view was a Taoist priest who was holding a woman in his arms. This provoked Wu Song's anger, because it was improper for a priest to have a woman in a temple. He got out his broad swords, and soliloquized, "These are the best of swords, but now I am going to test your quality." He rolled up his sleeves, and sheathed one sword, but held the other sword in his hand. He went to the door of the temple and knocked. As soon as the priest heard this he closed the window. Wu Song picked up a stone, and hurled it at the door. A small door at the side opened, and a small acolyte came out and shouted, "Who are you? Why do you come and disturb us at midnight? Why do you knock at the door like this?"
Wu Song opened wide his big round eyes and shouted, "Let this stinking acolyte christen my sword!"
So saying he slashed the boy's head off. The priest instantly appeared on the scene, and called out, "Who has dared to kill my acolyte?" He leapt out towards Wu Song brandishing a pair of double-edged swords.
Wu Song laughed loudly. "I'm quite ready! I don't keep my skill in a box. This is scratching me at the itch." So saying he drew the second sword out of its scabbard, and advanced towards the priest. In the bright moonlight, their swords flashed in all directions as they fought.

One of these will lose his head,
Red blood spattered on the ground.

130
Wu Song gets drunk & beats Red Star Kong Liang; The Dandy Elegant Tiger Chivalrously Releases & treats Song Jiang with honour

Pilgrim Wu pretended to leave an opening, and the priest dashed in with his two swords. Wu Song whirled, aimed and slashed. The priest's head went rolling off to one side, his body dropped on the stone flagging.
"That girl in the temple, come out," Wu Song shouted. "I won't kill you! I only want to question you!"
The girl emerged, knelt before him and kowtowed.
"No need for that. Just tell me: What's the name of this place? What was that priest to you?"
"I'm a daughter of the Squire Zhang family at the foot of the hill. This is our ancestral cemetery temple. The priest came one day and spent the night at our house. No one knew where he was from, but he claimed to be able to tell fortunes and practise geomancy. My parents didn't want to keep him in our home, so they asked him to study the geomantic conditions in the cemetery. He sweet-talked them into letting him stay on a few days. Then he saw me, and wouldn't leave. He lived in our house for two or three months. He killed my father and mother and brother and sister-in-law, and forced me to come up to this temple with him. The acolyte was a boy he had also kidnapped, from some other village. This place is known as Centipede Hill. The priest, whose name was Wang, thought it a propitious spot, so he called himself the Flying Centipede."
"Don't you have any relatives?"
"Several families of them. But they're all farmers. Not one dared stand up to him."
"Did the knave have any property?"
"He'd accumulated about two hundred ounces of silver and gold."
"Go get it, quickly. I'm going to burn down the temple."
"Wouldn't you like some food and wine, sir?"
"Yes, if you've got any."
"Please come into the temple, then."
"You wouldn't have anyone else hidden there, waiting to do me in?"
"How many heads have I got to lose, that I'd dare try to trick you?"
Wu Song followed the girl into the temple. By the small window was a table with wine and meat. He filled a large bowl and drank. The girl collected the priest's gold and silver. Wu Song set fire to the temple. She handed him the money.
"It's yours. I don't want it," he said. "You'll need it to live on. Now get out of here, quick! Go on, go!"
The girl kowtowed and thanked him, and went down the hill. Wu Song threw the two bodies into the flames, and sheathed his knives. That same night he crossed the hill and travelled a winding road to the prefecture of Qingzhou.
For another dozen or so days he walked. Sure enough, in every town, village and hamlet were posters calling for the apprehension of Wu Song. But seeing him in his guise as a pilgrim monk, no one thought to question him.

It was the eleventh lunar month, and the weather was cold. Though he stopped frequently for food and drink, Wu Song was chilled through. As the road climbed to the top of a hill, he saw ahead a high craggy mountain. He went down the hill and walked on for another four or five //. A tavern stood by a clear stream. Behind it loomed a hill of tumbled boulders. The tavern was just a small country wine shop. Wu Song went in and sat down.
"Host," he called, "two measures of wine. You can bring some meat, too."
"We have some simple home brew, Reverend," said the tavern keeper, "but I'm afraid we're out of meat."
"Bring the wine, then. It will ward off the cold."
The host drew two measures and served Wu Song in a large bowl. He brought also a side dish of vegetables. Wu Song soon finished the wine and called for another two drafts. Again the host served, in a large bowl, and Wu Song continued drinking. He was already half drunk from his tippling on the way. Now with four more drafts, consumed quickly, and having been fanned by the wind, he could feel the wine rising to his head.
"Don't you really have anything to eat in this place?" he bawled to the tavern keeper. "Then sell me some of the meat you keep for yourself! I'll pay. I've got silver!"
The host laughed. "I've never seen a monk like you. Drinking wine and eating meat without a qualm. Where am I going to get you meat? Forget it, Reverend."
"I'm paying for what I get. Why won't you sell me any?"
"I told you. We've only got this white wine. We don't have anything else."
While they were arguing, a big fellow and three or four companions came in. The host greeted them, all smiles and bows.
"Please be seated, Second Young Master," he said.
"Have you prepared everything as ordered?" asked the big fellow.
"The chicken and meat are cooked and ready, just waiting for you."
"And my flowery-jug wine?"
"It's here."
The man and his companions walked to a table opposite Wu Song and sat down. The host brought wine in a flowery jug, opened the clay stopper, and poured the wine into a large white basin. Wu Song could see that it was a vintage brew, fresh from cellar storage. Its bouquet wafted to his nostrils. The fragrance was almost unbearable. Wu Song's throat tickled. He could scarcely restrain himself from rushing over and grabbing.
Now the host went to the kitchen and returned with a tray bearing two cooked chickens and a platter of boiled meat. He placed these before the man he called Second Young Master, along with vegetable dishes, then proceeded to ladle out wine for heating.
Pilgrim Wu looked at his lone dish of vegetables, and he flushed with anger. It was a case of "satiated eyes and starving stomach." The wine was working in him. He wanted to pound that other table to smithereens!
"Come here, host," he roared. "What do you mean by cheating your customers!"
The tavern keeper hurried over. "Don't lose your temper, Reverend. If you want more wine, just say so."
Wu Song glared. "Surly oaf! Why wouldn't you sell me flowery-jug wine and chicken and meat? I pay silver for everything."
"The wine and chickens and meat come from that gentleman's home. He's only using my place to cook and eat them."
Wu Song's craving blinded him to reason. "Farts, farts!" he bawled. "You're a stinking liar!"
"I never saw a monk behave like such a savage!"
"What's savage about me? This buck has paid for everything you've served!"
"And I've never met a monk who calls himself 'this buck'!"
Wu Song jumped up and fetched him a slap in the face that knocked him rolling to the other side of the room. Half the host's face was swollen, and it took him some time to crawl to his feet. Angrily, Second Young Master rose swiftly and shook his finger at Wu Song.
"Where's your sense of fitness, you friggin monk! Punching and kicking! Haven't you ever heard that 'He who renounces the material world leaves passions behind'!"
"So I hit him! What business is that of yours?"
"I offer you friendly advice, and you dare to get tough!"
Wu Song pushed his table aside and strode forward. "Are you talking about me?"
The big fellow laughed. "You want to fight me, friggin monk? That's putting your head in the tiger's mouth!" He beckoned. "Come outside, dirty pilgrim! I'll talk to you there!"
"You think I'm afraid?" Wu Song shouted. "That I don't dare fight?" He rushed to the door. The big fellow strode out, and Wu Song followed.
Eyeing Wu Song's bulk, Second Young Master was wary. He struck a defensive pose and waited.
The pilgrim monk stepped up and grasped his hands. The man strained to throw him. By what could he do against such enormous strength? With a twist, Wu Song pulled him against his chest. Then with a thrust he flipped him to the ground as easily as turning over a baby. The big fellow hadn't been able to raise a finger in his own defence.
The three or four village men who were his companions watched, trembling, not daring to come to his aid. Wu Song planted one foot on his recumbent foe and pounded him with twenty or thirty blows of the fist where it hurt, then lifted him up and heaved him into the stream. The companions exclaimed in dismay. Confusedly, they waded in and hauled him out. Supporting him, they made off in a southerly direction. The host, his face paralyzed from the slap, could scarcely walk. He went and hid himself in a rear room.
"So you're all gone! Fine," said Wu Song. "Now I can do some eating and drinking!"
He scooped a bowlful of wine from the large white basin. The pair of chickens and the platter of meat had not been touched. He tucked in with both hands, and in half a watch he had polished off eight-tenths of the food and wine.
Drunk and satiated, the sleeves of his robe tied behind his back, he left the tavern and followed a path by the stream. He staggered and blundered along, buffeted by the north wind. About five // from the tavern a yellow dog came out from behind an earthen wall and started barking at him. Wu Song was drunk and quarrelsome. How dare that yellow cur trail after him and bark?
With his left hand he pulled out one of his knives and gave chase. The dog yapped at him from the bank. Wu Song thrust and missed. The force of his charge sent him plunging into the stream. He was so drunk he couldn't rise. The yellow cur stood and barked.
It was mid-winter. Although there were only two or three feet of water in the stream, it was icy cold. At last Wu Song managed to crawl out, dripping wet. He saw his knife, glittering in the water where he had dropped it. He squatted to pick it up, and tumbled in again. This time he couldn't find his feet. He lay in the stream, rolling helplessly.
From around a screen wall on the bank a gang of men emerged, led by a big strapping fellow. He wore a broad-brimmed felt hat and a padded tunic of gosling yellow. In his hand was a staff. The dozen or so men behind him all carried wooden rakes and cudgels. They heard the dog barking. One of them pointed at Wu Song.
"That varlet of a pilgrim in the stream is the one who beat up Second Young Master! He couldn't find you, Elder Brother, so he went back to the tavern with twenty or thirty vassals to nab him! But the lout's right here!"
Before the man had finished speaking, the younger brother Wu Song drubbed was seen approaching in the distance. He had changed his clothes and was carrying a halberd. Behind him were twenty or thirty vassals, armed with spears and staves, whistling fiercely as they searched. When they reached the screen wall they discovered Wu Song.
"There's the oaf who pounded me, brother!" the young fellow said to the man in gosling yellow.
"Take him to the manor and give him a good going over!" the elder brother directed.
"Get him!" shouted the younger man.
Thirty or forty fellows charged into the water. Poor Wu Song, drunk, was no match for them. He hastily tried to get up. But they all pounced on him and dragged him by his heels from the stream. They hustled him around the wall on the bank. There stood a large manor, enclosed by high whitewashed walls. Surrounding the grounds were weeping willows and tall pines.
The men pushed him into the manor, stripped him, took his knives and bundle, and tied him to a big willow. "Get some vines and flay the wretch," they cried.
They had hit him four or five times when a man emerged from the manor house. "Who are you brothers beating there?" he queried.
The two big fellows clasped their hands together respectfully. The elder said: "Today, Teacher, younger brother went with three or four neighbor friends to that tavern on the path ahead for a few drinks. This scoundrel of a pilgrim picked a quarrel, beat up younger brother and threw him in the stream. His face and head were cut and battered. If his friends hadn't hauled him out he might have frozen to death. He came home, changed his clothes, got some men and went hunting for the churl. That dirty pilgrim had finished off all the meat and wine, and was soused to the ears. He collapsed in the stream outside our front gate. We've brought him here to beat him. He's obviously not a real monk. There are two criminal tattoos on his face that he's covered with his hair. He must be an escaped prisoner on the run. We'll get the truth out of the scoundrel and turn him over to the authorities!"
"What's the use of questioning him," exclaimed the younger brother who'd been pummeled. "That rascal has hurt me all over. I'll be lucky if I can leave my bed in two months. Beat the rogue to death, I say, and incinerate him! That's the only way I'll be able to breathe freely again!"
He raised the vines.
"Wait a moment, young brother," said the man they called "Teacher."
"Let me take a look at him. He seems like a brave fellow."
Wu Song was beginning to sober up. He knew what was going on, but he kept his eyes closed. He let himself be beaten without uttering any sound. The man examined his back.
"Strange," he mused. "Those look like recent marks of the stripes a prisoner is given on discharge." He came around to the front of the captive, grasped his hair and pulled his head up. "But this is my brother, Wu the Second!" he cried.
Wu Song opened his eyes and gazed him. "Brother!" he exclaimed.
"Untie him, quickly," the man shouted. "He's my brother!"
The man in the gosling yellow tunic and the young fellow who had been trounced were startled. "This pilgrim is Teacher's brother?" they asked.
"He's the one I've so often told you about—Wu Song who killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge. How did he become a wandering monk?"
The two brothers hastily unbound Wu Song. They gave him dry clothing and helped him into the manor hall. Wu Song started to drop to his knees and kowtow. Surprised and happy, the man stopped him.
"You're not quite sober yet, brother. Sit a while and talk."
Wu Song was overjoyed to see him. The effects of the wine were soon half gone. Hot water was brought to that he could wash and rinse his mouth, and he was given a potion to sober him up. Then he kowtowed.
The man he greeted was none other than Song Jiang, known as the Timely Rain, of Yuncheng City.
"I thought you were at Lord Chai's manor," said Wu Song. "What are you doing here? I'm not seeing you in a dream?"
"After you left, I remained there for half a year. I was afraid my father would be worried, so I sent my brother Song Qing home. Later I received a letter from them saying that, thanks to the efforts of Constables Zhu and Lei, no more pressure was being put on the family, but that I was still wanted and there were notices out for my arrest. The search, however, was not very intense. Squire Kong, of this manor, several times sent an emissary to my home to inquire about me. He met Song Qing who told him that I was at the manor of Lord Chai. So Squire Kong dispatched a man to bring me here. This section is called White Tiger Mountain, and the manor belongs to Squire Kong. The young fellow you fought is his youngest son. Because he's hot-tempered and belligerent he's known as Kong Liang the Flaming Star. The one in the gosling yellow tunic is the squire's eldest son. His name is Kong Ming, and he's called the Comet. Both are fond of spears and staves, and I've taught them a bit, so they call me 'Teacher.' I've lived here half a year now. These last few days I've been thinking of going to Fort Clear Winds. I was just about to leave. While I was still at Lord Chai's I heard how you killed the tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and that you were made a constable in Yanggu County, and later killed Ximen Qing in a fight and were exiled. But where, I didn't know. How did you become a pilgrim monk, brother?"
"After parting with you at Lord Chai's manor I killed the tiger of Jingyang Ridge and delivered it to Yanggu County town. The magistrate made me a constable. Later, my shameless sister-in-law took Ximen Qing for a lover and poisoned my brother. I killed them both and surrendered myself to the magistrate. He turned me over to Dongping Prefecture. The prefect was lenient and exiled me to Mengzhou ..."
Wu Song went on to tell of his meeting with Zhang Qing and his wife at Crossroads Rise, how he met Shi En, and fought Jiang the Gate Guard Giant, and killed General Zhang and fourteen others, how he returned to the home of Zhang Qing, why Sun the Witch disguised him as a wandering monk, how on Centipede Hill he tried out his knives on Wang the priest, how he got drunk in the village tavern and beat up the younger Kong ... He told Song Jiang the whole story in detail.
The Kong brothers listened in amazement. They dropped to the floor and kowtowed. Wu Song quickly returned the courtesy. "I'm afraid I roughed you up a bit," he apologized. "Forgive me."
" 'We had eyes but didn't recognize Mount Taishan!' It's we who need to be forgiven!"
"Since you are so kind, please have my certificate and letter and luggage dried. And don't lose my two knives and that rosary."
"You needn't worry, sir," Kong Ming replied. "I've already instructed people to attend to it. As soon as everything is in order your belongings will be restored to you."
Wu Song thanked him. At Song Jiang's request, Squire Kong came out and met Wu Song. The old man spread a feast in his honor. Of that we'll say no more.
That night Song Jiang asked Wu Song to share his room, and they talked long of all that transpired during the previous year. Song Jiang was very pleased. The next morning Wu Song rose at daybreak, washed and rinsed, went to the central hall and had breakfast. Kong Ming kept him company. Kong Liang, in spite of his aches and pains, also attended him. The squire ordered that sheep and pigs be slaughtered and another feast prepared.
Several neighbors and relatives came from the village to pay their respects that day, as did several retainers of the Kong family. Song Jiang was glad to see his friend so honored. After the banquet was over and the guests had departed, he spoke to Wu Song.
"Where are you planning to settle?"
"As I told you last night, brother, Zhang Qing the Vegetable Gardener has written a letter of introduction so that I can join the band of Lu Zhishen the Tattooed Monk in the Precious Pearl Monastery on Two-Dragon Mountain. He's going there himself, later."
"Good. I recently received a letter from home saying that Hua Rong, Commandant of Fort Clear Winds, has heard that I killed Yan Poxi, and has been sending messages urging me to spend some time with him. The fort isn't far from here, and I'd been meaning to go, but bad weather has held me back. Why don't we go together?"
"I'm afraid that's not a good idea, brother. I've committed such serious crimes that even a general amnesty wouldn't clear me. That's why I've decided to become a bandit on Two-Dragon Mountain. Besides, I'm disguised as monk now. Travelling together would be awkward. People might get suspicious. There could be trouble, and you'd be implicated. I know we're brothers to the death, but it might involve Commandant Hua Rong as well, and that would be bad. I'd better just go to Two-Dragon Mountain and be done with it. If Heaven pities me, and I don't die, and I receive a pardon, there'll still be time for me to seek you out again."
"As long as you haven't lost your desire to serve the emperor, Heaven will surely protect you! Since you've made up your mind, I won't try to dissuade you. But stay here with me a few days, first."
The two remained at Squire Kong's manor for ten days or more, then announced that they were setting forth. The old squire wouldn't hear of it. He kept them another four or five days, but Song Jiang was determined, and he had no choice but to give them a farewell feast.
The next morning Wu Song was presented with a newly made pilgrim's robe. His certificate, letter, head hoop, rosary, knives and gold and silver were all returned. He and Song Jiang were each given in addition fifty ounces of silver to spend on the road. Song Jiang tried to refuse, but the squire and his sons forceably put the money into their bundles.
Now Song Jiang's garments and weapons were in order. Wu Song was wearing his pilgrim's garb, with the hoop on his head and rosary around his neck, the knives in their sheaths. He collected his bundle and tied it to his waist.
Song Jiang took up his halberd, hooked on his sword, donned his wide-brimmed felt hat and bid farewell to Squire Kong. The two sons directed vassals to carry the luggage. They themselves saw the guests off more than twenty // down the road before taking their leave.
Shouldering his pack, Song Jiang said: "There's no need for these vassals to accompany us any farther. Brother Wu Song and I will go on from here."
The Kong brothers bid them farewell, and returned to the manor with the vassals. Of that we'll say no more.

Song Jiang and Wu Song chatted as they walked, and at evening they rested for the night. They rose early the next morning, made breakfast, then marched forty or fifty // till they came to a market town called Lucky Dragon. Here the road forked, and Song Jiang asked one of the inhabitants: "Which way to Two-Dragon Mountain, and Fort Clear Winds?"
"Those are two different directions. The west road will take you to Two-Dragon Mountain. If you want to get to the Fort, you have to take the east road and cross Clear Winds Mountain."
Song Jiang turned to Wu Song. "Brother, we part here. Let's have three farewell cups, first."
"I'll accompany you down the road a piece."
"No, don't. 'Though you see a friend off a thousand //, sooner or later you must part.' Just concentrate on your own long journey ahead. Get there as soon as possible. After you've joined the band, go easy on the drinking. If the imperial court pardons you, urge Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi to surrender, too. Some day you may be sent to fight along the frontier. You'll earn honors for your future wife and children, and leave behind a good name when you die. You won't have lived in vain. I myself am a man of no talents. Though I'm loyal to the emperor, I cannot advance. But you, brother, who are so courageous, will surely do big things. Don't forget your stupid brother's words. I hope we shall meet again."
Wu Song listened carefully. They downed several cups in a tavern, paid, left the tavern and proceeded to the fork in the road at the end of the town. Wu Song kowtowed four times. There were tears in Song Jiang's eyes.
"Remember what I've told you, brother," he exhorted. "Don't drink too much. Take care of yourself!"

Wu Song strode off along the western road. Reader, please note: He was heading for Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi, to join their band on Two-Dragon Mountain. Of that we'll say no more.

Song Jiang took the eastern road to Clear Winds Mountain. Wu Song was still in his thoughts. After travelling for several days, he saw a high mountain in the distance. It was oddly shaped, and thickly covered with trees. Song Jiang gazed at it appreciatively a long time. Then, anxious to cover ground, he pushed on steadily, without bothering to seek a resting place.

Before he realized it darkness began closing in, and he looked around in alarm. "If it was summer," he thought, "I could sleep in a grove. But it's mid-winter, with chill winds and frost. The night will be very cold. And there may be ferocious beasts, tigers and leopards. If I can't cope with them, I'm liable to lose my life!"

He continued east along the road for about a watch, growing more and more worried. He couldn't see, and stumbled over a trip-cord. Immediately, a bell tinkled among the trees. Fourteen or fifteen robbers, who had been lying in ambush, came yelling out. They seized Song Jiang and bound him, taking his halberd and bundle. Lighting torches, they escorted him up the mountain. He could only bemoan his fate. Before long, they reached the stronghold.

In the light of fires Song Jiang could see a log palisade enclosure, in the middle of which was a main hall. Here stood three armchairs draped with tiger skins. Behind this building were a hundred or so thatched huts. The robbers trussed Song Jiang up like a dumpling and tied him to a pillar.

"The big chieftain has just retired," said one of the robbers on service in the hall. "Don't report to him now. When he sleeps off his drinks, we'll ask him to come, and give him a broth of the heart and liver of this ox to sober him up! And we'll all be able to eat fresh meat!"

"What rotten luck," thought Song Jiang. "To have to suffer a fate like this just because I killed a painted hussy! I never dreamed I'd leave my bones here!"

The robbers lit lamps and candles, illuminating the room. Song Jiang was frozen stiff, but he couldn't move. He stared around, then lowered his head and sighed.

About the third watch, four or five robbers emerged from the rear of the hall. "The big chieftain is up," they announced, and turned the lamps still brighter. Song Jiang stole a glance at the man who appeared. On his head was a turban, bound in place by a red silk ribbon. He wore a date-red padded tunic. He seated himself in the middle armchair.

This bold fellow was from Laizhou Prefecture, Shandong Province. His name was Yan Shun and he was known as the Elegant Tiger. Originally, he had been a dealer in sheep and horses. But he went broke, and took to the greenwood and became a bandit.

Now, seated in the middle armchair, he was completely sober.

"Where did you get this ox, boys?" he asked.

"We were lying in ambush behind the mountain when we heard the bell ringing in the grove," they replied. "This ox, travelling alone with a bundle on his back, had stumbled over our trip-cord. We brought him here for your sobering-up broth."

"Fine. Invite the other two chiefs to join me."

The robbers went and soon returned from the side of the hall with two audacious men. The one on the left was short, with burning eyes. He came from the Huaihe River valley and his name was Wang Ying. He was known in the gallant fraternity as the Stumpy Tiger. A carter by trade, he had been unable to resist temptation on the road, and had robbed a merchant. He escaped from prison after his arrest and fled to Clear Winds Mountain. He and Yan Shun took the mountain over when they turned bandit.

The man on the right had a clean fair complexion, and his face was adorned with a mustache and a goatee. He was tall, slim, broad-shouldered, and handsome. His head was bound with red silk. He came from Suzhou, and his name was Zheng Tianshou, But because of his good looks he was known as the Fair-Faced Gentleman. He had been a silversmith and since childhood, had been very fond of spears and staves. Eventually, he drifted into the gallant fraternity. While passing Clear Winds Mountain he met and fought the Stumpy Tiger fifty or sixty rounds, with neither able to best the other. Yan, impressed by his skill, invited him to join them as third in command.

All three chieftains took their seats. "Let's get started, boys." Wang the Stumpy Tiger urged. "Cut out this ox's heart and liver and cook us three portions of sour and peppery sobering-up broth!"

A robber brought a large bronze basin filled with water and set it down in front of Song Jiang. Another robber, rolling up his sleeves, held a shiny pointed carving knife. The first robber scooped up water with his hands and splashed it on Song Jiang's chest. Cold water drives the hot blood away, so that the heart and liver, when removed, are crisp and tasty.

The robber then flung some water in Song Jiang's face. The captive sighed. "What a pity that Song Jiang should die here!"

Yan Shun heard him. "Stop!" he shouted to the robbers. "Did that fellow say something about 'Song Jiang'?"

"He said: 'What a pity that Song Jiang should die here.' "

Yan rose from his chair. "You fellow. Do you know Song Jiang?"

"I am Song Jiang."

Yan came closer. "Which Song Jiang are you?"

"From Jizhou Prefecture. I was clerk of the Yuncheng County magistracy."

"Not Song Jiang the Timely Rain from Shandong Province? The one who killed his concubine and fled, Song Jiang of the gallant fraternity?"

"Yes. But how did you know?"

Astonished, Yan grabbed the knife from the robber and cut Song Jiang's bonds, then draped over his shoulders his own date-red padded tunic, carried him to the middle chair and carefully sat him down. He shouted to Wang and Zheng, and all three knelt and kowtowed. Song Jiang hastily returned the courtesy.

"Not only don't you kill me, but you treat me with such decorum! What's the meaning of this?"

The three remained kneeling. "I ought to gouge my eyes out with that knife," cried Yan. "Imagine not recognizing a good man! If I hadn't seen you, if I'd asked a few less questions, I might have finished a noble warrior! Heaven was good and fortunately you spoke your great name, or I'd never have known! In the ten years and more I've been in the greenwood I've often heard chivalrous men tell how just and generous you are, helping those with hardships, saving those in danger. I cursed my luck that I never had a chance to pay my respects. Today, Heaven has let us meet. I'm happy with all my heart!"

"What virtue or ability have I, to deserve such kindness?"

"You're considerate and kind to men of talent, a companion of courageous men, you're famed far and wide! Who wouldn't admire you? The stronghold in Liangshan Marsh is flourishing. Everyone has heard. People say it's due mainly to you. Why do you come here, and alone?"

Song Jiang told how he rescued Chao Gai, killed Yan Poxi, how he lived with Lord Chai and Squire Kong for a long time, and why today he was seeking Hua Rong at Fort Clear Winds. The three chieftains listened delightedly. They presented him with clothes, ordered the slaughter of sheep and horses, and gave him a feast that very night. They ate until the fifth watch, when attendant robbers helped Song Jiang to bed.

The next morning he rose early and related his adventures on the road. He told too of how heroic Wu Song was. Slapping their thighs regretfully, the three leaders said: "We have no luck! It would be fine if he came here. Too bad he's gone to that other place!"

But enough of idle chatter. Song Jiang stayed six or seven days on the mountain, and they wined and dined him every day. Of that we'll say no more.

It was the beginning of the last lunar month, a time when Shandong people visit their family graves. A robber scout came up the mountain and reported: "There's a sedan-chair on the road, with seven or eight men behind carrying two boxes. They're on their way to a cemetery to burn paper ingots."

Stumpy Tiger was a lecherous fellow. A sedan-chair was almost sure to have a woman in it. He assembled forty or fifty men to go with him down the mountain. Neither Song Jiang nor Yan Shun could stop him. Flourishing spears and swords, off went the gang, beating brass gongs. Song Jiang and the remaining two chieftains sat drinking in the stronghold.

Stumpy Tiger was gone two or three watches. A far-ranging scout returned and said: "Chieftain Wang caught up with the party on the road. The seven or eight soldier escorts ran away. He captured the woman in the sedan-chair. The only thing of value was a silver incense burner."

"Where has he taken the woman?" asked Yan.

"To his house on the rear of the mountain."

Yan laughed.

"So brother Wang lusts after women," said Song Jiang. "That's not how a bold man should behave."

"In everything else, he's quite forward-looking, but he does have this failing," Yan admitted.

"Both of you come with me while I speak with him."

Yan and Zheng followed Song Jiang to Wang's place on the rear slope of the mountain. They pushed open the door. Stumpy Tiger had his arms around a woman and was pleading with her. He thrust her aside when he saw the three men enter, and invited them to be seated.

Song Jiang turned to the woman. "In whose household are you, madam? What is it that brings you out wandering idly around in times like these? Anything important?"

The woman advanced shyly and curtsied to each of the three. "I am the wife of the Commandant of Fort Clear Winds. This is the first anniversary of my mother's death. I was on my way to burn paper money at her grave. I would never dare to wander idly around. I beg you, great chieftain, save my life!"

Song Jiang was astonished. He thought: "But I'm on my way to join the commandant of the fort. Can she be Hua Rong's wife? How can I save her?"

"Why hasn't your husband Commandant Hua Rong gone together with you to the cemetery?" he asked.

"Commandant Hua Rong is not my husband."

"Didn't you just say you're the lady of the Commandant of Fort Clear Winds?"

"The fort has two commandants—a civil and a military. Hua Rong is the military commandant. My husband, Liu Gao, is the civil commandant."

"Her husband is Hua Rong's colleague," Song Jiang thought. "If I don't rescue her, it will look bad when I get there."

To Stumpy Tiger, he said: "I have a suggestion. I wonder whether you'd be willing to accept it?"

"I'll hear anything you have to say, brother."

"In the gallant fraternity, anyone who 'wastes his marrow' is a joke. This woman is an entitled lady by decree of the imperial court. For me and gallantry's sake, let her return to her husband. What do you say?"

"Listen to me, brother. I've never had my own woman here in the stronghold. Those big-hat officials are the cause of all the trouble in this world. Why should you care about her husband? Indulge me in this, brother."

Song Jiang dropped to his knees. "If it's a wife you want, I'll get you a fine one. I'll pay for the wedding and give you a girl who'll serve you well. But this woman is the wife of an official who is a colleague of a friend of mine. You must let her go as an expression of goodwill."

Yan and Zheng helped Song Jiang to his feet. "Please get up, brother. There's no problem," they assured him.

"In that case, I sincerely thank you."

It was obvious to Yan Shun that Song Jiang was determined to save the woman. Heedless of the wishes of Stumpy Tiger, Yan shouted for the sedan-chair bearers. The woman kowtowed to Song Jiang worshipfully.

"Thank you, great chieftain," she cried.

"Don't thank me, lady," he replied. "I'm not a chieftain here. I'm just a traveller from Yuncheng County."

The woman left the stronghold, carried by the two bearers. Their lives spared, the men flew down the slope, regretting only that they hadn't been born with two more legs each!

Stumpy Tiger Wang maintained an embarrassed, morose silence. Song Jiang pulled him to the front hall and said: "Don't be upset, brother. Come what may I'm going to get you a bride who will give you joy. I'm a man of my word."

Yan and Zheng laughed. Wang was annoyed, but he couldn't very well show it. Song Jiang had him tied up by the code of chivalry. He smiled politely and accompanied Song Jiang to the center of the stronghold, where a feast was laid. Of that we'll say no more.

When the soldiers escorting the sedan-chair had its occupant snatched from them, they returned to Fort Clear Winds and reported to Commandant Liu: "Your lady has been kidnapped by the bandits on Clear Winds Mountain!"

"Idiots! You abandoned her!" Liu lambasted them with a big cudgel.

"There were only half a dozen of us, and thirty or forty of them! What chance did we have?"

"Bullshit! If you don't get her back, I'll have every one of you thrown into prison!"

There was no way out. The escort pleaded for another seventy or eighty soldiers, armed them with spears and staves, and set forth. When they had covered half the distance, they saw the sedan-chair racing towards them.

"How were you able to get away?" they asked Commandant Liu's wife.

"When I told them who I was, they were scared stiff! They kowtowed and told the bearers to bring me back."

"Lady, have mercy on us! Tell the commandant we fought and rescued you. Otherwise, we'll all be beaten!"

"I know what to say, never fear."

The soldiers thanked her and formed an escort around the sedan-chair. On the return trip, they were impressed by the speed of the bearers.

"When you two carry a chair in town, you waddle along like ducks," they said. "What makes you so fast today?"

"We're really pretty tired, but those knuckle-raps on the back of the skull drive us forward."

The soldiers laughed. "You must be seeing ghosts. There's nobody behind you."

Only then did the bearers turn around. "Aiya!" they exclaimed. "We were running with such gusto we were drumming the backs of our heads with our own heels!"

The soldiers roared. They convoyed the sedan-chair into the fort. Commandant Liu was delighted.

"Who was responsible for your rescue?" he asked his wife.

"After those scoundrels seized me, I wouldn't succumb to their wiles, and they were going to kill me. But when I said I was the commandant's lady, they were afraid to touch me, and hastily kowtowed. Then our men came and fought and brought me home."

Liu rewarded the seventy or eighty soldiers with ten bottles of wine and a large pig. Of that we'll say no more.

Song Jiang remained in the mountain stronghold another six or seven days. But he was anxious to join Hua Rong, the military commandant. The three chieftains could not persuade him to stay. They gave him a farewell feast and presented him with gold and other valuables, which he put into his pack.

The morning of his departure he rose early, washed and rinsed, had breakfast, tied on his belongings, and said goodbye to the three chieftains. Carrying wine and tidbits, they insisted on seeing him off for twenty or more li down the slope. When they reached the highway, they filled the cups for a final toast. The chieftains hated to let him go.

"You must come and stay with us on your way back from the fort!"

Song Jiang shouldered his pack and took up his halberd. "We'll meet again," he assured them. He bid the chieftains a courteous farewell.

If it were I, the teller of this story living in those days, I would have grabbed him around the waist and pulled him back to the stronghold by force! Anything to prevent him from joining Hua Rong! He nearly died without even having a place for burial! Truly, the bumpy roads we travel are all part of Heaven's plan. Can the gales and storms we encounter be sheer accident then? Whom did Song Jiang meet after joining Commandant Hua Rong?

When those two had fought a dozen bouts, Wu Song, the false pilgrim, sold the stranger a dummy. He deliberately allowed him to come in with both weapons at once, then dodged aside and, taking careful aim, struck a blow — just one. The stranger's head fell one way and his body slumped on the stone path.

"You there, inside! Young woman! Come out!" Wu Song shouted. "I won't harm you, I only want you to tell me what's going on."

The woman emerged from the hut and prostrated herself.

"No need for ceremony," Wu Song said. "Just tell me, what place is this? What's the relationship between you and that priest?"

Weeping, she replied: "I am the daughter of Squire Zhang who lived at the bottom of the hill. This is our family shrine. I don't know where the priest is from. He came to spend a night with us and said he was an expert in magic and fengshui. My parents made the mistake of letting him stay at the manor and asked him to come here and inspect the siting of our shrine. He took them in completely and they allowed him to stay on. Then one day he saw me and after that he refused to leave. Within a few months he brought about the death of both my parents, and my family, and forced me to live here with him. The acolyte was kidnapped also. This place is called Centipede Hill. The priest decided the fengshui was good here, so he started calling himself 'Taoist Wang, the Flying Centipede'."

"Don't you have any other relatives?" Wu Song asked.

"A few, but they're just farmers. They wouldn't dare argue with him."

"Does he have any valuables?"

"He collected two or three hundred taels of silver."

"Then you'd better go and get it, because I'm going to set fire to the shrine."

"Do you want something to eat and drink, Father?" she asked.

"I wouldn't say no, if there is anything."

"Then please come inside."

"You haven't got someone lying in wait for me in there, have you?"
"I wouldn't dare! I've only got one life!"
Wu Song followed the woman into the building and saw a table beside the window loaded with food and drink. He took a big bowl of wine and polished it off. Then, when the woman had collected up all the valuables, he started a fire inside. The woman offered the bundle of gold and silver to him, in return for sparing her life.
"I don't want your stuff," he said. "You'll need that to live on. Go on now, take yourself off!"
She thanked him humbly and set off down the hill. Wu Song dragged the bodies into the fire to cremate them, stuck his swords back in their scabbards and left that same evening, following a winding path across the hills towards Qingzhou.
He travelled for ten days or so, and everywhere he came to, every village, wayside inn, market town or local centre, there were posters advertising Wu Song as "wanted." Despite this, because of his disguise no one questioned him on the road.
It was December and the weather bitterly cold. One day he had bought wine and food for the journey, but fighting the cold was still a problem. He climbed a small hill and saw a high mountain ahead which looked exceedingly steep and dangerous. Descending from his vantage point, he marched on another mile or two till he saw an inn. There was a stream running past the gate and behind the house a wilderness of scattered rocks and broken ground. It was this kind of remote country inn:
The door faces a stream, at the back are beds of reeds and water chestnuts; beside the rough perimeter fence plum trees display their ivory blossoms; in front of the window pines sway their gnarled green limbs; on the dark tops of tables and chairs, china cups and bowls are ranged. The yellow clay walls are decorated with pictures of tipsy gods and poets; a blue pennant dances in the winter wind; two lines of verse welcome the customers. The mere smell of a place like this makes the horseman yearn to call a halt, the sailor to head for harbour.
So Pilgrim Wu descended from his vantage point and hastening to the inn entered and sat down. "Landlord, bring two measures of wine!" he called. "I'll order food later."
"I'll tell you the honest truth, Reverend. The only wine we've got is some plain country brew, and as for meat, we're right out of it."
"Bring me the wine, then. It'll do to keep the cold out."
The landlord went and got the two measures of wine, which he poured into a large bowl for Wu Song, and gave him also a dish of cooked vegetables as a stopgap. Wu Song finished the wine in a trice and called for more, which the landlord supplied, again in a large bowl. Wu Song concentrated on drinking. He had been half drunk on the way, even before he climbed the hill. Now, with these additional four measures and the effect of the north wind, the wine rose to his head. He began to kick up a row: "Landlord, are you quite sure you haven't got anything else? If not, then please give me something from your own table. Of course I'll pay you for it."
The landlord grinned. "I've never seen a monk like you," he said. "You think of nothing but eating and drinking. But where do you suppose I'd get anything? Not a hope, Father!"
"I wouldn't take your food without paying, why won't you sell it to me?"
"I told you already, I've only got this ordinary wine, what else can I sell you?"
While this discussion was in progress, a tall man walked into the inn, followed by two or three others. Here's how this gent struck Wu Song:
His headdress is the red of a fish's tail, his gown the green of a mallard's head. On his feet he wears a pair of strong boots, about his waist is knotted a length of red cloth. He has a round face and big ears, broad lips and a determined set to his chin. He is well-built and his age is about twenty-five. This young gentleman is proud and heroic in his bearing and not at all given to venery.
When the tall gent and his pals walked into the inn, the landlord greeted them effusively: "Please, sir, please, take a seat."
"Have you done what I ordered?" the newcomer asked.
"The chicken and the meat are all ready," the landlord replied. "We were just waiting for your arrival, sir."
"How about my special bottle of Qinghua wine?"
"It's right here, sir!"
The tall gent took his party to the table opposite and sat down at the head, while his companions seated themselves lower down. The landlord fetched a bottle of special wine, removed the stopper and poured it into a big white jug.
Wu Song was watching all this out of the corner of his eye. He could tell it was fine vintage wine from the bouquet wafted towards him on the breeze. When he smelt it, Wu Song's throat really began to feel dry and he found it hard to resist slipping closer to grab some. At this point the landlord went off to the kitchen and returned with a pair of roast chickens and a plate of selected meats which he placed before the newcomer. He added some dishes of vegetables and began to ladle out the wine into cups. When Wu Song compared this with what was in front of him, a miserable plate of boiled vegetables, there was nothing he could do to control his anger. For indeed, the eyes were fed but the stomach stayed empty. The wine he had drunk, too, was having its effect. He crashed his fist down, shattering the table, and shouted: "Landlord, come here! What a cheating bastard you are!"
The landlord remonstrated: "Please calm yourself, Father. If you want more wine, you've only to ask."
Wu Song glared at him and shouted: "You've got no principles, you bastard. All that vintage wine and chicken and meat and stuff, why wouldn't you sell it to me? I offered you good money."
The landlord said: "The wine, the chicken and the meat are all what the gentleman brought himself, he's only paying for the table."
But Wu Song was still hungry, he wasn't interested in explanations. "Bollocks! Bollocks!" he bellowed.
"I've never seen a monk as wild as you!" the landlord protested.
"What do you bloody well mean by calling me wild?"
"And I never heard a monk using such language!"
This was too much for Wu Song, who leapt to his feet and thrust his five fingers in the landlord's face, dealing him a blow which sent him reeling. The tall man sitting opposite was furious when he saw this. One half of the landlord's face was completely swollen and for a long time he was unable to rise. The stranger jumped up and pointing to Wu Song said: "You bastard, you're certainly not obeying the religious rule, you're far too ready with your fists and feet. I thought a monk was supposed never to give way to his emotions!"
"Okay, so I hit him, what's it to do with you?" Wu Song said.
The man said angrily: "For your own good, I'm warning you, priest. Keep a civil tongue in your head!"
This so enraged Wu Song that he overturned the table. "Who the hell do you think you're talking to!" he bellowed.
"You lousy beggar," the other answered, undismayed. "Are you looking for a fight? That's really tempting fate, you know!" Then, pointing his finger at Wu Song, he went on: "Come outside then, priest, and let me teach you a lesson!"
"Do you think I'm scared? Do you really think I won't hit you?" Wu Song shouted, and took up a position near the door. The other man slipped through the door and Wu Song followed him. But when the man saw how big and strong Wu Song was, he opted for discretion and took up a defensive stance. Wu Song charged straight in, blocking his opponent's defensive blow. The other was thinking to repel him by main force, but he reckoned without Wu Song's massive strength. With a jerk Wu Song grappled him to his chest, then with a twist he had him over, as easily as someone up-ending a little child. The man did not get in a single blow or kick. When his companions saw this, their hands shook and their legs went limp, no one dared to intervene. With one foot on the man's chest, Wu Song raised his fist and let it fall. After twenty or thirty blows he dragged the man to his feet, and threw him into the stream in front of the door. There was now a great uproar from the man's companions; chaos reigned. Finally they went down to the stream and fished their friend out. Supporting him, they disappeared in a southerly direction. The landlord, meanwhile, who had been knocked senseless and half paralysed by the blow, escaped into the back of the house and hid.
"All right," said Wu Song, "since you've all gone, I may as well take some sustenance!" He took a bowl and started ladling out the wine into a cup and set about some serious drinking. The chickens and the meat on the table were still untouched. He didn't bother with chopsticks, but tore off chunks with both hands and wolfed them down. In less than an hour he had eaten most of it. Now full, and not a little drunk, with the sleeves of his robe knotted behind his back, he left the inn and marched off along the bank of the stream. But the north wind tired him and his legs could scarcely carry him, so he veered this way and that along the path. He was scarcely more than a mile from the inn, skirting the side of an earthen wall, when a yellow dog appeared and started barking at him.
So there was Wu Song, with this big yellow dog yapping at his heels. He was very drunk and needed no excuse for a quarrel. This dog that went on barking and barking infuriated him, so he drew the sword from his left-hand scabbard and bounded after it. The dog fled along the bank of the stream, still barking. Wu Song struck out at it, but he struck empty air. He used such wild force that he went head over heels into the stream and couldn't get out.
The winter moon was in the heavens and it was the dry season, but although there were only a few inches of water, it was unbearably cold. When he managed to crawl out, drenched to the skin, he saw his sword lying in the water. He bent down to fish it out and splash! in he fell again! He was still floundering about in the water when on the other bank, beside the perimeter wall, a bunch of people appeared. The foremost of them was a tall man with a felt hat, a goose yellow surcoat, carrying a staff, and behind him came a dozen or so fellows with pitchforks and peeled staves. One of these pointed and said: "That there bugger in the stream's the one as hit little brother. Little brother were looking for you just now, but 'e couldn't find you. So 'e went and got up a party of twenty, and they buggered off to the inn to nab 'im. But 'e's turned up here!" He had scarcely finished speaking when the man who had been beaten appeared in the distance. He had changed his clothes and now carried a halberd. There were twenty or thirty retainers with him, complemented by a bunch of lads from the village. Wielding clubs and spears they advanced behind their leader with much shouting and whistling as they searched for Wu Song. When they reached the earthen wall, they saw him. The leader pointed and shouted to the man with the goose yellow robe: "That's him, that's the damned priest who beat me up!"
"Tie him up and take him up to the manor for a good thrashing," said the man in goose yellow.
"Move!" shouted the leader of the other party. His followers obeyed. The wretched Wu Song was too drunk to escape. As he still struggled to climb out he was seized and dragged onto the bank. They took him to a big manor house on the other side of the stream, surrounded by a whitewashed wall, shaded by hanging willows and stately pines and set in a walled compound. They dragged him inside, stripped him naked, took his swords and his bundle, tied him to a big willow tree and sent for a rattan cane to flog him.
They had just applied the first few blows when someone emerged from the manor and asked: "Who's that you're beating there?"
The two gentlemen joined their hands in greeting and said: "Let us tell you what happened, master. We went with two or three friends and neighbours to have a drink at the inn down the road and this damned monk came and picked a fight with us. He beat younger brother up badly and chucked him in the stream. His face was all cut and he could have died of the cold if his friends hadn't rescued him and brought him back. After he'd changed his clothes and got together a party he went to look for the monk. The bastard had finished off our food and wine and got himself drunk and fallen in the stream. So we brought him here to give him a good thrashing. Now you can see he isn't a monk at all; he's got a couple of golden seals on his face, only the crafty bugger had combed his hair down to hide them. He must be an escaped criminal on the run. We're going to get to the bottom of this first and then we'll send him off to the police for them to deal with."
The one who had been beaten interjected: "What's the point of questioning him? The blighter really hurt me. I won't get over it for months. Surely, the best thing is to kill him. We can burn the body and then I'll be properly revenged." So saying, he raised the cane and was about to resume the beating. But the other man stopped him: "Don't beat him, brother. Let me have a look at him first. It sounds as if he might be a good fellow."
By this time Wu Song was beginning to sober up. He could hear all right, but he kept his eyes tight closed, and when they beat him he didn't utter a sound. Walking around him, the other man saw the wounds on his back. "Hallo!" he said, "this looks like an official flogging, and the scars are still fresh." He came round to the front of Wu Song, stretched out his hand and lifted the hair to take a good look. Suddenly he exclaimed: "Why, isn't it my old friend, second brother Wu?"
Now Wu Song opened his eyes wide and saw the other. "Well, if it isn't my friend!"
"Quickly, untie him!" the other man shouted. "He's my brother!"
The man in the yellow robe, and the other who'd been beaten, got quite a shock. "How can this monk be your brother, master?" they stammered.
"He's the one I've so often told you about, the one who killed the tiger of Jingyang Pass. He's Wu Song. I didn't know he'd become a pilgrim."
The two brothers hurriedly untied Wu Song and sent for some dry clothes for him. Then they escorted him into the thatched hall. When Wu Song wanted to prostrate himself, the other man, who was obviously overjoyed, raised him up and said: "You still haven't quite got over your hangover, brother. You'd better sit down for a bit and talk."
The pleasure of this meeting did much to sober Wu Song up. Hot water was called for, so he could wash and he was given a pick-me-up. Then he ceremoniously expressed his thanks and they began to chat of old times.
Now this person was none other than that famous native of Yuncheng, Song Jiang the Just.
"I thought you were at Mr. Chai's," Wu Song said. "What are you doing here? Or am I dreaming?"
"After you left Mr. Chai's I stayed there six months. But I didn't know how things were at home, I was afraid my father might be in trouble. First I sent my younger brother, Song Qing, back to see. Later I received a letter from home which said, 'Thanks to the good offices of Sergeants Zhu and Lei, there has been no more trouble with the law. Only you are still "wanted" and there's a general warrant out for your arrest.' The business had in fact calmed down.
"Meanwhile a certain Squire Kong from these parts had been sending for news of me. After my brother returned home and told them I was at Mr. Chai's, Squire Kong sent someone to Mr. Chai's to take me back to his place. This place where we are is called White Tiger Mountain, and this is Squire Kong's estate. That young fellow you had a fight with is the squire's younger son. He's Kong Liang, and because his nature is impetuous and he is always getting into fights, they call him Red Star. The fellow in yellow is the elder son; he goes by the name of Kong Ming, nicknamed Blazing Comet. They're both very keen on fencing, so I've been giving them a few lessons, that's why they call me master. I've been here six months and I'm planning to move on to Windy Fort. I was thinking of setting off in the next few days. I heard all about your exploits when I was at Mr. Chai's, how you killed the tiger on Jingyang Pass and became a captain in Yanggu, and I heard that you'd fought and killed Xi-men Qing. But I don't know where you were banished to or how you became a monk."
"Yes, after I left Mr. Chai's and said goodbye to you," Wu Song explained, "I came to the Jingyang Pass and killed the tiger and had it taken to Yanggu where the governor made me captain. And then my sister-in-law behaved disgracefully — she had an affair with this Xi-men Qing and poisoned my brother. I killed them both and gave myself up to the authorities. At first my case was dealt with in the district, but then it was transferred to Dongping, where Governor Chen came to my rescue and had me banished to Mengzhou." He went on to tell how he ran into the Gardener and his wife, the Ogress, at the crossroads, how in Mengzhou he made the acquaintance of the Young Master and beat up Jiang the Door-God, and later killed General Zhang and fourteen others and escaped to the Gardener's again. He explained why the Ogress advised him to dress as a monk, how he tried out his swords on Centipede Hill, killing Wang, the Taoist and how he got drunk at the village inn and beat up the younger Kong. All his affairs, from beginning to end, he recounted to Song Jiang. The two Kong brothers listened spellbound. When he finished, they humbly prostrated themselves. Wu Song hurriedly returned the compliment, saying: "My behaviour was disgraceful, forgive me, please forgive me!"
The two brothers said: "We couldn't see what was staring us in the face! It's all our fault."
"Since you're so kind," said Wu Song, "might I ask you to have my certificate dried and the letter and my luggage and clothes. And I wouldn't want to lose those two swords or the beads."
"Don't worry about all that," the brothers said. "We've already sent someone to fetch your things and it will all be restored to you."
Wu Song thanked them. Then Song Jiang invited Squire Kong to come and meet Wu Song. Squire Kong ordered wine and arranged a banquet. Of this no more.
That evening Song Jiang invited Wu Song to share his room and they talked far into the night about the things which had happened during the past year or more, and Song Jiang received much pleasure from it. Wu Song was up at dawn next day. After washing and rinsing his mouth he went and breakfasted in the main hall. Kong Ming kept him company. Kong Liang, or Red Star, though still sore from the beating, also helped entertain him. Their father, Squire Kong, ordered goats and horses killed and arranged a banquet. During the day some neighbours and relatives from the village came and visited. There were also some retainers who came to pay their respects, to Wu Song's great satisfaction. After the banquet, Song Jiang asked Wu Song: "Where are you planning to go after this?"
"As I told you last night," Wu Song said, "the Gardener has written me a letter so I can go to the Temple of the Precious Pearl on Twin Dragon Peak, where Lu Zhishen, the Flowery Monk has joined a band. The Gardener intends to go to the mountain himself later on."
"That's good," said Song Jiang. "To tell you the truth, I had a letter from home recently in which they said that the commander of Windy Fort, Colonel Hua Rong, 'the Archer,' keeps writing and asking me to go and stay with him, ever since he heard about my killing Yan Poxi. We're not far from Windy Fort here, and for several days I've been thinking of going. The only reason I haven't started yet is the weather looked uncertain. Sooner or later I'll go, so why don't we go together?"
"I'm afraid it might not bring you luck if you took me along." Wu Song said. "You see, my crime is very serious, it won't easily be forgiven. That's why I think that to go to Twin Dragon Peak and become an outlaw is my only way out. Besides, dressed as a monk I couldn't very well travel with you, it would make people suspicious. And if there was some kind of fracas, you'd be implicated. Anyway, we're friends till death. I just don't think it's a good idea to compromise Colonel Hua's fort, that's all. You'd better let me go to Twin Dragon Peak. If fate favours us and death does not intervene, there may be an amnesty and it will be time enough then for me to come and see you."
"Since you're so faithful to the emperor, heaven will protect you. And as you've obviously made up your mind, I won't try to dissuade you. But do stay and keep me company a few days longer before you go."
So they both stayed another ten days at Squire Kong's on White Tiger Mountain. And when they did finally make up their minds to leave, the squire was most reluctant to let them go. He managed to detain them a few more days, but after that Wu Song was determined to get going and Squire Kong had to content himself with organizing a farewell banquet. He entertained them for a whole day, and the following morning a new set of monk's clothing was presented to Wu Song, together with the black robe, the monk's certificate he was supposed to carry, the letter, the circlet for his hair, the set of beads, the swords and some other valuables. And everyone contributed fifty taels of silver for his travelling expenses. He put on the circlet, attached the beads to his belt, strapped on the two swords, packed his bag and tied it to his belt. Likewise Song Jiang took up his halberd, stuck the sword through his belt, and donned his felt hat. They both bade farewell to Squire Kong. The two sons ordered some retainers to carry the luggage and accompanied them for the first five miles or more of the way before saying farewell. Then Song Jiang slung his pack on his back, saying: "There's no need for the servants to come any further. We'll go on now by ourselves." The two Kong brothers said goodbye and returned to the manor. Of them no more.
We now follow Song Jiang and Wu Song as they continue their journey, chatting along the way, marching on till evening and then stopping for the night. Next day they rose early, ate and departed. They travelled ten miles or more after breakfast and came to a place called Dragonsborough, situated at a crossroads. Song Jiang asked the people there: "We want to get to Twin Dragon Peak and Windy Fort, which road should we take?"
"They're both in different directions," was the answer. "If you want to go to Twin Dragon Peak you take this road leading westwards. If you want Windy City, you take the road which heads east, past Windy Mountain."
Song Jiang listened carefully and then said: "Dear brother, we have to part now, so let's drink three farewell cups together first."
Parting is the theme of a poem attributed to Huan Xisha:
Parting's hard, when the time comes to shake hands and go. All those shared scenes of mountain and forest draw to a close. Your heart is lonely, your resources are exhausted. When you break your journey grief weighs your spirit down, in the rest house there's nothing to do but sit and twiddle your thumbs. The long evening passes in solitary contemplation, slowly, oh so slowly.
Pilgrim Wu said: "I'll go with you a little way and then turn back."
"There's no need," said Song Jiang. "As the saying is, 'You can go with your friend a hundred miles, but in the end you still must part.' Remember you've got a long way to go yourself. Try to get there as soon as possible. Once you've joined the company, be moderate in your drinking. If there's an amnesty, you can try to persuade Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi to give themselves up. Maybe you'll be sent to serve on the frontier, win yourself a good name with your sword and be able to establish a family. That way you'll know you haven't lived in vain. I myself have but little talent and although people can trust me, I shall never be successful. But you are such a great hero, you will certainly perform great and memorable deeds. Please do not despise my words. We shall meet again one day, I hope."

After these words they drank a few more cups, then paid the bill. When they left they walked together till the edge of the town, and at the crossroads Wu Song prostrated himself four times. Song Jiang was sentimental from the wine and was most loath to say goodbye. Again he said to Wu Song: "Dear brother, do not forget what I said. Be moderate in your drinking. And look after yourself! Do look after yourself!"

Pilgrim Wu Song now took the road to the west. For the reader's information, he went straight to Twin Dragon Peak and joined up with Lu Zhishen and Yang Zhi. We shall leave him there.

Song Jiang meanwhile after saying goodbye to his friend turned east and set his course for Windy Mountain. He missed Wu Song. After a few days' travel he saw Windy Mountain, looming in the distance. Here's what it was like:

On all sides jagged ridges; dangerous peaks all around. Gnarled and ancient pines harbour eagle's nests; from forked branches of old trees dangle twisted vines. Waterfalls that hang in the air produce a cold blast that gives you goose pimples; amid the play of green shadows light dazzles the eye producing fearful visions. The sound of water carries from deep channels; the woodcutter's axe rings out; crowded peaks rear up, mountain birds call; herds of tailed deer leap through the thorns; packs of foxes howl as they roam in search of prey. This has to be either a monk's place of retreat, or a robber's lair.

Song Jiang saw that mountain looming before him. It was a wonderful sight, all covered in thick forest, a delight to the eye. Feeling he could never have enough of looking at this scenery, he continued on for several stages without thought of finding somewhere to stay the night. When he realized that it was getting late he began to be worried. "If it was summer, I could spend the night anywhere in the woods," he thought. "But unfortunately it's the middle of winter. It's wild weather and the nights are bitterly cold, I'd never survive. Besides, suppose I should meet some danger-ous wild animal, how could I defend myself? Most probably I would lose my life." So he took a little path to the east. After walking about two hours, he was so preoccupied that he failed to notice a rope stretched across the path close to the ground and it tripped him. A bell rang out through the forest and four or five men who were waiting in ambush leapt out shouting and overpowered him. They took his halberd and pack and after lighting torches they dragged him off up the mountain. All Song Jiang could do was lament his fate. Soon he was a captive in the mountain fortress.

When he looked around him by the light of the torches, he found he was surrounded by a wooden palisade. In the middle was a thatched hall. Three chairs with tiger-skin covers were placed on a dais and beyond there were over a hundred thatched huts. His captors took Song Jiang, trussed up like a festival dumpling, and tied him to one of the main pillars. Some soldiers who were in the hall said: "The chief is still sleeping, don't go and tell him now. Wait till he's slept off his wine, then you can invite him. We'll cut out this big idiot's heart and liver to make the chief a pick-me-up soup, and we can all have some fresh meat."

Bound to his pillar, Song Jiang was thinking to himself: "My God, what a fate! and all because I killed a strumpet! How my whole life is changed into bitterness! Who would have thought my mortal span was destined to finish here!" He saw the soldiers lighting many lanterns and candles. His whole body was numb with cold, he hadn't the least freedom to move; all he could do was gaze helplessly around him, lower his head and sigh.

About eleven to twelve o'clock some soldiers appeared from behind the hall and shouted: "The chief's getting up!" They turned the lights up higher in the hall. Watching out of the corner of his eye, Song Jiang saw this chief enter. His hair was bound in an oval bun and covered with a red silk turban, he wore a robe of burgundy cloth. He seated himself on the middle one of the three chairs with tiger-skin covers. Here's what he looked like:

Round-eyed, with brown hair and whiskers quite sandy;
His stature's heroic, his spirit the same.
In rivers and lakes they call him the Dandy.
Although in reality Yan's his true name.

This stalwart was a native of Laizhou in Shandong and his name was Yan Shun. He was nicknamed the Dandy. He had once been a dealer in livestock, until he lost his capital and was obliged to take to the greenwood and turn robber. So having awoken from his drunken sleep, the Dandy took the middle one of the three chairs and said: "Where did you get this great ox from, boys?"

"We were just setting up an ambush behind the mountain when we heard the bell go off among the trees," they replied. "It was this poor idiot, marching all alone with a pack on his back. He'd blundered into the trip-rope. So we thought we'd bring him here, chief, to make you a pick-me-up."

"Excellent," said the Dandy. "Quickly then, go and tell the other chiefs to join me."

A moment later two men were seen approaching the hall one from each side. The one on the left was little more than five feet tall, but he had piercing eyes. If you'd like to know more about his appearance, here you are:

Dressed in a robe of blue patterned silk,
Haughty of mien but in nature most coarse.
Covetous, lustful, strong as an oak,
Wang is his name but he's known as Short-Arse.

This gentleman was from the Huai Valley and his name was Wang Ying. Because he was so small the rivers and lakes fraternity had dubbed him "Short-Arse." He had once been a carter, but seeing so many riches on the road gave him ideas and he robbed a merchant, got sentenced for it, escaped from prison and took refuge on Windy Mountain. He and the Dandy had taken over the mountain as a base for robbery.

The man on the right was exceptionally pale and clear complexioned. He had a moustache and a little pointed beard. He was a fine figure of a man, tall and slender, with broad shoulders. He wore a red turban. Want to know what he was like? Here you are then:

A robe of pure gold and dark glossy green,
A supple wolf's waist, girded so tightly.
Though as fearsome a robber as ever was seen,
He's known to the others as Gentleman Whitey.

He was from Suzhou and his name was Zheng Tianshou. Because of his pale complexion people called him "Whitey." He had been a silversmith, but from childhood was addicted to fencing with spear and staff, and drifted into the rivers and lakes way of life. Happening to pass Windy Mountain, he ran into Short-Arse, and the two of them fought half a dozen evenly poised bouts. The Dandy, seeing the newcomer was talented, invited him to join them on the mountain, so Whitey took the third chair.

When the three chiefs were seated, Short-Arse said: "Come on now, lads, give us a real good pick-me-up! Let's have this great Ox's heart and liver out double-quick! We'll have 'em in a sweet and sour soup."

One of the soldiers brought a big brass basin full of water and placed it in front of Song Jiang, while another soldier rolled up his sleeves and brandished a sharp knife, of the kind specially adapted to scooping out hearts. The man with the water plunged both hands in and splashed water on the area around Song Jiang's heart — a person's heart, you understand, is a region where the blood is hot; cold water disperses the hot blood, so that when you take the heart and liver out it's particularly crisp and delicious. When the soldier also sprinkled water on Song Jiang's face, the latter heaved a sigh and said: "O wretched Song Jiang, your life must end here!"

The moment the Dandy, with his own ears, heard those two words, he shouted to the soldier to stop splashing the water: "What's that he said about 'Song Jiang'?" he asked.

"He said 'O wretched Song Jiang, your life must end here'," replied the soldier.

The Dandy rose to his feet and said: "You there, do you know Song Jiang?"

"I am Song Jiang," came the reply.

"Which Song Jiang are you?" said the Dandy, approaching closer.

"I am Registrar Song Jiang of Yuncheng in Jizhou."

"You don't mean to say you are Song Jiang of Shandong, the Opportune Rain, the one who killed Yan Poxi and fled to the rivers and lakes?"

"You know all about that then? Yes, I am he."

Appalled, the Dandy seized the soldier's knife and cut the bonds. Then he tore off his own burgundy robe and wrapped it around Song Jiang. He placed him on the middle one of the tiger-skin chairs and ordered Short-Arse and Whitey at once to get down on their knees. All three knocked their heads on the ground. Song Jiang slipped off the chair to return the compliment. "Why are you honouring me like this, instead of killing me? What does it mean?" he asked, bowing to the ground.

The three chiefs remained kneeling there together. "I would like to take that knife and gouge my own eyes out, for failing to recognize a great man," the Dandy said. "If I hadn't been and looked for myself, and made these inquiries, we could easily have finished off a righteous man. I thank my stars that you were impelled to speak out your own name, for how else would I have learnt the truth? I have frequented the rivers and lakes and roamed the greenwood for many a year now, and I know well your reputation for bravery and generosity, for helping the needy and supporting the oppressed; but it had never been my fortune to meet you face to face. Today heaven has ordained our meeting and my dearest wish is fulfilled."

Song Jiang replied: "What poor talent can I lay claim to, that you should so overestimate my worth?"

"It is well known how you respect men of honour and receive heroes, you are renowned throughout the known world. Who does not honour you? How the stronghold in the Marshes of Mount Liang has prospered in recent times everybody knows, and people say it is all due to your efforts. What I would like to know, however, is why are you alone and what brings you here?"

One after another, Song Jiang told them about the rescue of vChao Gai, the killing of Yan Poxi, the sojourn with Mr. Chai and Squire Kong and how he was now heading for Windy Fort to find Colonel Hua, the Archer — to the manifest delight of the three chiefs. Afterwards they had clothes brought for him and then goats and horses were slaughtered and they feasted until dawn. At the end of the evening soldiers were called to help Song Jiang to bed.

They were up betimes and Song Jiang recounted more of his adventures on the road, and when he told of the prowess of Wu Song, they stamped their feet and lamented: "Just our luck! If only he'd come to us, how splendid that would be! Why did he have to go there?"

But enough of all this. Suffice it to say that Song Jiang stayed about a week on Windy Mountain and every day he was entertained with drinking and feasting.

It was now well into the last lunar month and in Shandong it's the custom to visit graves on the twenty-fifth. Some of the robbers came up from the foot of the mountain and reported: "There's a sedan chair coming along the main road, with an escort of half a dozen soldiers, and they're carrying two boxes, looks like they're heading for a grave site to burn paper money."

Now Short-Arse was a great lady's man. When he heard this report, he assumed the sedan chair must be carrying a lady, so he mobilized thirty or forty troops and prepared to set off down the mountain. There was nothing Song Jiang or the Dandy could do to dissuade him. Off they went, brandishing pikes and beating a gong. Song Jiang, the Dandy and Whitey went on with their drinking.

When Short-Arse had been gone four or five hours, one of the scouts returned and reported: "The soldiers ran off before Chief Wang got to them. The sedan chair was taken, with a lady inside. There was only a silver incense burner, nothing else of value."

"Where have they taken the lady?" the Dandy asked.

"Chief Wang has taken her to the hut on the mountain," the man replied.

The Dandy laughed. But Song Jiang said: "I suppose our friend Wang Ying has designs on her, but that's not the behaviour of a gentleman."

"Our friend has difficulty in controlling himself, it's his one big failing," said the Dandy.

"Then let's all three of us go and reason with him," said Song Jiang.

So the others took Song Jiang to Short-Arse's place on the mountain. They pushed open the door and found Short-Arse trying to make love to a woman. When he saw them he thrust the woman away immediately and asked them to sit down.

"Whose wife are you, madam?" Song Jiang asked. "What business causes you to be abroad in such a season?"

Blushing, she took a step forward and offered her humble respects before replying: "I am the wife of the governor of Windy Fort. My mother passed away and this is her anniversary, so I was on my way to burn offerings on her grave. Obviously I would not be travelling if it were not needful. I implore you to spare my life!"

Song Jiang received a shock. "Here I am, on my way to stay with Colonel Hua, and this must be his wife," he said to himself. "Obviously I'm obliged to help her!"

He asked her: "Why didn't your husband, Colonel Hua, accompany you to the grave?"

"I am not Colonel Hua's wife," she replied.

"But you just said you were the wife of the governor of Windy Fort!"

"But you see, recently Windy Fort has been given two governors, a civil one and a military one. Colonel Hua is the military governor. My husband is the civil governor, Governor Liu Gao."

Well, Song Jiang was thinking to himself, if her husband is a colleague of Colonel Hua's and if I don't rescue her, it certainly won't look very good when I arrive there tomorrow. So he turned to Short-Arse and said: "There's something I'd like to say to you, my friend, but I don't know if you're prepared to listen."

"Say whatever you like," said Short-Arse.

"In general, a hero indulging in fornication provokes ridicule. And from what this lady says, she is the wife of an important official. Don't you think, for my sake, and for the sake of chivalry, you might let her go, so she can be reunited with her husband?"

Short-Arse replied: "Listen here, I've never had a woman of my own to be my consort here; besides, it's these high and mighty officials who grab all the women nowadays, why are you so concerned about her husband? Can't you just indulge me in this little thing?"

Song Jiang went down on his knees and said: "If it's a wife you want, I can find you a much better one later. Only this woman is the wife of an official who is my friend's colleague, so please, just let her go!"

The Dandy and Whitey helped Song Jiang up, saying: "Get up, please, this is a simple concession to make!" Song Jiang thanked them profusely.

Seeing Song Jiang was so serious about wanting to rescue the woman, the Dandy didn't wait to hear Short-Arse's wishes, he simply gave the order for the sedan chair bearers to take her away. The woman herself, when she heard this, bowed down before Song Jiang as reverently as someone laying out candles before a shrine, intoning: "Thank you, Great Sir!"

"It's not me you must thank," said Song Jiang. "I'm not the chief here, I'm just a visitor from Yuncheng."

She left at once after expressing her thanks. The two chair bearers, glad to get away with their lives, bore her off down the mountain, flying along as if they were only sorry their parents had endowed them with no more than one pair of legs.

Short-Arse was much out of countenance, but he said nothing. Song Jiang drew him aside into the main hall and tried to console him: "Dear friend, do not be upset. Come what may, I shall find you a wife who will completely satisfy you. I always keep my word."

The other two started laughing. Short-Arse was still angry, but Song Jiang treated him with such ceremony that he could not show his feelings and he joined in the laughter. The feasting now continued on the mountain. Of this no more.

Now when their mistress was snatched, the soldiers from Windy Fort had to return to the fort and report to Governor Liu that the bandits from Windy Mountain had taken their mistress. Governor Liu was furious when he heard this, and swore at them for their incompetence and for abandoning their mistress. He beat them ferociously. "But there's only a few of us," they protested, "how could we stand up against thirty or forty of them?"

"Shut up!" he shouted. "If you don't go and get her back I'll have you thrown into dungeons and tortured!"

Well, there was no escape for them, nothing for it but to enlist seventy or eighty troops from the fort and set off with spears and staves to do their best to rescue her. To their surprise, when they were half way there they met the two bearers racing down the mountain with their mistress. "How did you escape?" they asked.

"The blighters carried me off to their mountain stronghold," she replied. "But when they heard I was Governor Liu's wife, they were so scared they quickly paid their respects and told the bearers to take me back."

The soldiers said: "Please have pity on us and tell the Governor we rescued you, to save us from punishment."

"That story suits me all right," she said.

The soldiers prostrated themselves in gratitude and then closely surrounding the chair they set off. When they saw how fast the bearers went, the soldiers said: "In the city you two generally carry the chair at a snail's pace. How come you can go so fast now?"

"Actually we're exhausted," the bearers said, "but these blows on the back keep driving us on."

"Are you seeing ghosts or something? There isn't anyone behind you!"

Only then did they dare turn round and look. "Aiyo!" they exclaimed. "We were running so fast we must have been kicking ourselves on the back of the head!" This provoked general laughter.

Pressing round the chair they all arrived at the fort. Governor Liu was delighted. "Who rescued you?" he asked his wife.

"When those blighters kidnapped me I resisted their advances so they were going to kill me. But when I said I was the governor's wife they didn't dare, in fact they couldn't wait to pay their respects. Then these fellows came and delivered me by force."

When Governor Liu heard this he ordered a dozen bottles of wine and a pig to be brought as a reward for the soldiers. Of this no more.

As for Song Jiang, after saving the lady he stayed another week at the mountain stronghold, but then he wanted to go and find Colonel Hua and began to say his farewells. Since they could not persuade him to stay, the three chiefs laid on a little farewell celebration, and each gave him some money, which he wrapped in his bundle. The day he was leaving he rose early and washed and rinsed his mouth, breakfasted, packed his things, said good-bye and set off down the mountain. The three chiefs, bringing wine, nuts and food, accompanied him more than five miles in the direction of the main road. They all drank before the final parting.

Still reluctant to see him go, they said: "Brother, on your return from Windy Fort, you have to come and see us again at the stronghold."

Song Jiang, luggage on his back and halberd in hand, simply said: "We're sure to meet again." Then he saluted and left them.

Now, had yours truly been present at that time, I'd have taken him by the shoulder or grasped him round the waist, forcibly to restrain him. For just because he insisted on going to stay with Colonel Hua, Song Jiang all but met with an untimely death and no decent burial! But indeed,

Troubles are sent by Heaven to try us,
Who can predict life's ups and downs?

WHILE the two men were fighting Wu Song suddenly made a feint, and his opponent lunged forward. Wu Song stepped to one side avoiding the blow, and at the same moment brought down his sword, and cut off his opponent's head. He shouted, "You, woman, inside there come here! I will not kill you. I only want to ask you a few questions."

The woman came forward and kneeling down saluted Wu Song.

"You need not salute me," said Wu Song. "What is this place called? Who is this man?"

The woman cried, "I am the daughter of Old Zhang who lives at the foot of the hill. This temple is in our ancestral graveyard. I do not know where this man came from, but he came to our house and asked us to let him stay there for the night. He said that he was skilled in the arts of feng shui, and had good knowledge of telling fortunes. My father and mother did not want him to stay with us, so they asked him to come to this temple and examine the spiritual nature of the surroundings. One day he saw me, and so was unwilling to depart. He stayed here for three months, and killed my parents, my brother, and my sister-in-law. He then coerced me to stay here with him. The boy here was kidnapped by him from some other place. These hills are the Wugong Ridge. This man thought that the land situation here was auspicious. He said his name was Wang, a Taoist priest, and gave himself the nickname, 'The Flying Centipede.'"

"Have you any relatives about here?"

"I have several relatives, but none of them dared say anything to this man."

"Had he any money?" asked Wu Song.

"Yes, he had accumulated about two hundred taels of silver."

"You go and pack it up. I am going to burn this temple down."

The girl asked Wu Song whether he wanted to eat or drink.

"You can bring the food here," replied Wu Song.

"Please come inside and dine there."

"I am afraid there may be other men who might plot to kill me."

The girl said, "I have only one head, so how dare I attempt to cheat you?"

Wu Song followed the girl inside, and saw near the window a table loaded with food and wine. While he had drunk for a time, the girl brought in the silver and offered it to Wu Song. He would not accept it, and told the girl to take it for herself. The girl knelt, saluted, and taking the silver departed down the mountain.

Wu Song set the place on fire, and threw the two corpses in the flames. He then sheathed his swords, and followed the road across the mountain towards Qingzhou prefecture.

During the next ten days he passed through many villages, hamlets, and towns, and noticed that the proclamation about himself was posted upon the walls. But on account of his disguise as a monk nobody suspected him.

It was now the eleventh lunar month, and the weather was getting quite cold. One day as he ascended a small ridge he saw in the distance a high mountain which appeared to be steep and difficult to cross. After going about two //further he came to an inn. It was built under a cliff, and in front of the door was a pure mountain stream. Near the inn were a few houses. He entered and called for wine and meat.

The innkeeper replied, "I will not deceive you, Reverend, I have no meat left, and I have only plain vegetables and wine."

The innkeeper brought a bowl of wine, and some cooked vegetables. Wu Song had soon finished the wine, and asked for some more. On the road he had already had some wine so when he had taken this he began to feel tipsy. He called out, "Waiter, have you nothing else for me? If you have any meat left for your own family, please give me a part to eat, and I will pay you for it."

The innkeeper laughed and said, "Strange! You are a monk yet you ask for wine and meat. But I have no meat, so I cannot help you."

"I do not want it on credit so why don't you let me have it?" asked Wu Song.

"I have already told you that I have no meat, and only wine. I have nothing else."

Just then a big man entered the inn followed by four villagers, and the innkeeper welcomed them with a smiling face, and asked them to be seated.

"Have you done what I told you?" asked the man.

The innkeeper replied, "The chickens and meat are already cooked, and prepared for you."

"And where is the special wine I ordered?" asked the man.

"It is also here."

The man and his followers sat down at a table facing Wu Song. The innkeeper brought in a jar of wine, and removing the clay with which it was sealed, he poured out the wine into a jug. Wu Song saw that the wine jar had been kept in store for mellowing a long time, and the flavor of it was wafted towards him. He felt a great desire to taste the liquor. Just then the innkeeper brought in a tray loaded with roasted chicken, and another tray of lean cooked meat. He placed these before the men, and began to serve them with the wine. Turning to the small quantity of vegetables on his own table, Wu Song could not avoid being angry. Seeing such a big spread of food, and feeling very hungry he brought his fist down on the table and called out, "Waiter! Here! Why you insult your guest?"

"Reverend! do not worry," said the innkeeper (hurrying to him). "If you want more wine you need not make such a noise."

Wu Song glared at him, and shouted, "How unreasonable you are! Why don't you allow me to buy some of the wine and meat? I can pay for it."

"The wine and meat was sent here by this man himself, and they only come here to dine."

But Wu Song would not listen to this as he wanted something to eat, so he swore at the man; "Farts! Farts! You're giving me farts!" The waiter replied, "Your manners are very rude seeing that you are a monk."

"Why do you talk about manners when I have already offered to pay for what I eat." He then slapped the waiter's face, who staggered to one side.

The man at the other table, seeing this, was angry. He saw that the waiter could not get up. He pointed at Wu Song and said, "You are a damned monk, but you do not carry out your principles well. Why do you hit people in this way? A monk ought not to display temper in this way."

"I hit him, it has damned nothing to do with you," replied Wu Song.

"I give you some good advice," said the man. "Why do you reply in this bellicose manner?"

Now Wu Song was highly excited, overturned the table, and stepping forward shouted, "What did you say?"

The man laughed, and said, "Do you want to fight with me, you stupid monk?" He beckoned with his hand. "You crook. Come here, and talk with me." "Do you think I am afraid of you?" asked Wu Song, and straightway went toward the door. The man stepped out of the door, followed by Wu Song. When Wu Song came outside the man noticed that he was of big build and not to be despised. Wu Song advanced in a fighting attitude. The man tried to kick at Wu Song who however was too quick, and avoiding the kick he seized hold of the man's hand, and pulled him forward. He then pulled him sideways and pushed him down just as though he was a small boy. The man's companions were looking on at this, but did not dare to interfere, and stood there trembling. Wu Song placed his foot on the man, and then hit him about forty times with his fist in unimportant places. He then lifted him up, and threw him into the brook. The companions rushed into the water, and rescued him. They brought him to the bank, and then they all walked off along the road.

The innkeeper was still holding his sore head in a room at the back. Wu Song entered and said to himself, "Well, they have all gone, so I will now have a drink." He took the jug of wine, and had a good drink. He then seized the two chickens, and without using chopsticks ate them with his fingers. He had nearly finished all the food and wine in an hour and being quite full he left the inn, and went on his way by the side of the brook. But there was now a very strong head wind so that he found it difficult to walk against it. He struggled on about two //when he came to an earth wall where a yellow dog rushed out and began barking at him. Wu Song was partly drunk, and felt annoyed at the dog barking, so he took his sword from his belt and attempted to hit the dog with it. But the dog always escaped his blows, and pursuing it to the bank of the stream Wu Song struck another blow, missed his footing and fell into the water, not being able to get up. The dog stood still on the bank, barking at him, but he could not get on his legs again. It was winter-time, and although the water was only about two feet deep it was very cold. At last he struggled up, and stood with the water dripping from his clothes. His sword was lying in the water and it seemed to be very bright and clear. He stooped down to pick it up, but fell into the water again, and could not get up. While he was tumbling there a number of men came out of the house, and stood on the bank. With them was a very big man, wearing a felt cap, and a yellow silk jacket. In his hand was a stick, and about ten men, who were with him, were also armed in the same way. When they saw Wu Song, they cried out, "Here is the crook who attacked our young master who has just gone to the inn with thirty men to capture him." Just then they heard whistles being blown, and the band of thirty men joined the others on the bank. A big man spoke to the man in the yellow silk jacket, "This is the very monk who attacked me." The man spoken to was his brother, and replied, "Arrest him and bring him into our farmyard where we will punish him."

The men seized Wu Song and dragged him out of the stream and went along. Now Wu Song was really drunk and could not struggle. They took him into the yard of a big farmstead which had high whitewashed walls surrounded by fir and willow trees. They stripped him of his clothes, and then beat him severely with a bundle of rattan canes. When they had beaten him about five blows a man came on the scene, and asked, "Whom are you beating?" The brother explained and added, "We suspect that he is really not a monk. He is branded on his face with two lines of characters, which had been hidden by his hair. He is evidently an escaped convict. We will ask him where he comes from, and then send him under arrest to the officials."

The younger brother interposed, "We won't ask any questions. He hurt me severely, and it will be at least a month before I can recover. It would be better to beat him to death, and then burn his body. Then I shall feel that I have had my revenge." He seized the bundle of canes to continue the beating, but the stranger interposed saying, "Sir, please wait until I have had a look at him. He looks like a fine fellow."

Now Wu Song had heard all this, and understood it, but he did not utter a word, and kept his eyes closed.

The stranger examined Wu Song's back, and saw there the scars from the previous beating. "How strange! These stripes must be from a punishment he has recently received." He then went to the front, and lifting up Wu Song's long hair had a good look at his face. He exclaimed, "Is this not my younger brother Wu Song?"

Wu Song now opened his eyes and replied, "Are you not my elder brother?"

"Release him at once," said the stranger. "This is my younger brother."

The brothers were surprised at this turn of events, and asked, "How can this fellow be a brother of yours?"

The stranger replied, "Have I not told you many times about Wu Song who killed a tiger on Jingyang Ridge? This is he. I do not understand yet how he has got into this situation."

The brothers released Wu Song at once, gave him his clothes, and then they all went into the hall. Wu Song attempted to kneel down to give a kowtow, but the stranger stepped forward and prevented this, saying, "Younger brother, the wine is still upsetting you. Please sit down, and we will talk together." Wu Song was much pleased at seeing this man, and as he still felt slightly tipsy, he asked for some cold water to wash his hands and face in, and also rinse his mouth. After this he felt better, and after saluting his friend he sat down.

The man was no other than Song Jiang of Yuncheng County.

"I thought you were living with Squire Chai," said Wu Song. "How is it that you are here? It seems like a dream to see you now."

"After your leaving us," said Song Jiang, "I stayed with Squire Chai for about half a year. I did not know how affairs were at home, and as my father might be anxious on account of our long absence, I at last decided to send my brother Song Qing home. After this, a letter arrived from home stating that due to the good care of Inspectors Zhu and Lei there was no more trouble at my home, and only I myself was wanted. An official proclamation had been issued to all places urging my arrest. The case, however, was now almost forgotten. Old Kong had however often made inquiries about me at my home and upon my brother's return, had found out where I was. He therefore sent for me from Squire Chai's home to this place. This is called 'Baihu Mountain,' and this farmstead belongs to Old Kong. The man you fought with is Old Kong's second son. He is very hot tempered, and has the nickname 'Fiery Star,' his name is Kong Liang. The other man with the yellow silk jacket is Kong Ming, the eldest son of Old Kong, and has the nickname 'Restless Star.' They were both very eager to learn fencing, so they asked me to be their teacher. I have been here for about six months. I would like to go to the Qingfeng Fortress and have been thinking of starting the last two days. While I was with Squire Chai, I heard about your killing the tiger on Jingyang Ridge, and that you became a Drill Instructor at Yanggu County, and that you killed Ximen Qing there. But afterwards, I could not find out your whereabouts. How is it that you are now wearing a monk's dress?"

Wu Song then told what had happened to him since leaving Squire Chai's home, and how he had killed so many people. How he had adopted the disguise of a monk's dress, and had fought with Old Kong's son. When Kong Liang and Kong Ming heard the account of the adventures of Wu Song, they both were surprised and kowtowed to him. Wu Song at once raised them up, and said, "It is my fault that I attacked you."

The brothers replied, "We were at fault for not recognizing your eminence. We ask for your pardon."

"Now that you know me, I hope that you will help me in drying my monk's certificate and letters, recovering all my baggage, swords, clothes, etc.," said Wu Song.

Kong Ming replied, "I will attend to that, and see that you get them all back."

We need not say how they all went to explain matters to Old Kong, and were entertained by that gentleman.

That evening Song Jiang invited Wu Song to share his room, and during the night they talked about the affairs of the previous year. Wu Song rose early the next morning, and after washing his face and mouth went into the hall for his breakfast. Kong Ming was there, and dined with Wu Song. Kong Liang was also there, and although he was not recovered from his pain, yet he waited upon Wu Song.

Old Kong gave orders for a pig and goat to be killed, and prepared a feast. That day many of the relatives of the family, and also the neighbors, visited and paid respects to Wu Song.

That evening after the feast Song Jiang asked Wu Song where he intended to find refuge. Wu Song explained that he had a letter from Zhang Qing introducing him to Lu Da at the Lianglong Mountain, and that he wished to join the brigands there.

Song Jiang thought that was all right. He said, "I have today received a letter from Hua Rong, commander of Qingfeng Fortress, stating that he knew that I had killed Yan Poxi, and urging me to seek refuge at his town. This place is not far from Qingfeng Fortress, and I am thinking of going there. But as the weather has been trying these few days, I have not set out on the journey. How would it be if we went there together?"

Wu Song replied, "I am afraid that it would not do for us to live there because as you know I am a convicted criminal. I must avoid trouble by joining the brigands at the Lianglong Mountain. Moreover, as I am now a monk it would not look well for you to travel in my company. It would only arouse suspicions, and you might also get involved. We shall be true to each other till death shall separate us, but I should not like to get you into trouble with the commander of Qingfeng Fortress. I had better go by myself to the Lianglong Mountain. If Heaven takes pity on me I may escape death, and if I am afterwards given an official post, then we may be reunited."

"As you have those ideas," said Song Jiang, "you will eventually return to the Emperor's court, and Heaven will watch over you. I will not attempt to dissuade you, but we can spend a few days here in each other's company."

These two friends stayed about ten days at Old Kong's farmstead. At the end of that period, however, Old Kong was unwilling to let them go, so they stayed about three days more. Then as they were decided to go, Old Kong prepared a feast. He gave Wu Song a new suit of monk's clothes, and also fifty taels of silver. He also presented Song Jiang with the same but as the latter refused to accept them, Old Kong put them in his baggage. Upon their departure Old Kong sent servants to carry their baggage for some distance, and both Kong Ming and Kong Liang also accompanied them for about seven //on their way. Song Jiang at last asked the two brothers to come no further, but return home. This they did, and the servant also returned.

Wu Song and Song Jiang traveled together, and the following day when they had gone about twenty //, they came to a market town called Ruilong, where the road divided. So Song Jiang asked a man, "We are going to the Lianglong Mountain and also Qingfeng Fort. Which of these roads must we take?" The man replied that the western road would lead to the Lianglong Mountain, while the eastern road lead to Qingfeng Fort.

"Young brother," said Song Jiang, "we must separate here, but before we go let us take a parting cup of wine."

"I will come with you for a day's journey on your road," said Wu Song, "and then come back here." "That will not do," said Song Jiang. "There is an ancient saying, 'Accompany a person three hundred //, and yet there is bound to be a parting at last.' You had better go your own way from here. When you become a brigand, try avoid drinking too much wine. I hope you will urge and advise Lu Da to surrender to the Emperor's official, if there is such an opportunity. Later on, if you are sent to the frontier you can accomplish meritorious deeds for the Emperor and thus get your wife and children rewarded by heritage. You can get a good name, and have your actions recorded in history, and so your life would not be lived in vain. I have no ability, and although I am loyal there is no hope of promotion for me. You are a brave hero, and can do great things yet, but please do not forget me."

They then went into an inn and drank a parting cup. They proceeded to the place where the road divided, and there they took leave of each other. Song Jiang could not avoid weeping when they parted. He again asked Wu Song not to forget what he had just said—avoid drinking too much wine.

Song Jiang traveled along the eastern road, and within a few days, he approached the Qingfeng Mountain. It was odd looking, covered with dense forest. He enjoyed the scenery very much, and was so engrossed that he did not even inquire about a resting place. But when evening was drawing nigh, he began to feel anxious and thought, "If it were summer, I could sleep in the forest, but as it is now midwinter, the nights are exceedingly cold, and I must find some shelter. Moreover, here there will be wild animals, poisonous snakes, and tigers, so that I shall be in danger of death." He continued on his way, but after about two hours more, it was so dark that he could not see the road, and soon he fell into a trap which caused a bell to ring. Very soon about fifteen men came on the scene, and arrested him. They took his halberd and bundle, lit a torch, and took Song Jiang up the mountain to their stronghold. Looking round, he saw that the place was protected by a wooden fence, with a large straw shed in the middle. Inside the shed were three chairs covered with tiger skin. On all sides were smaller straw sheds. The soldiers tied him up to a post. Several soldiers in the big hut called out, "Our chief is asleep so that you cannot see him just now. When he awakes, we can take this fellow's liver and heart and make an excellent soup. We shall soon have some fresh meat."

Song Jiang thought, "I am a most unfortunate fellow! I killed a girl, and am now in this awkward predicament. But who would have expected me to die in such a place as this." The soldiers now began to light the lamps. Song Jiang was exceedingly cold, and sighed at his bad fate. About midnight three or four soldiers came from behind the big shed and said, "Our chief has now got up." They went to the lamps, and trimmed the candles. The chief soon came, and Song Jiang stealthily looked at him. His hair was dressed in a knob on the top of his head, and was covered in a red silk turban. His gown was of bright red silk. He sat down in one of the chairs covered with a tiger skin. His name was Yan Shun, and his nickname was 'Elegant Tiger.' His family was at Laizhou in Shandong province. Previously he had been a horse dealer, but had lost all his money and so had become a bandit.

"Where did you capture this fellow?" he asked. The soldiers told him how this had happened.

"That is good," said Yan Shun. "Go and tell the other two chiefs to come here, and partake of this fellow."

A soldier went, and in a short time the two chiefs arrived. One of them was a dwarf, but had very brilliant eyes. His name was Wang Ying, and his nickname was 'Stunted Tiger.' He was a Lianghuai man, and had previously been a porter. He had once been arrested and imprisoned because he had killed a passenger on the road and robbed him of his property. But later he had escaped from the jail. He had joined Yan Shun at the Qingfeng Mountain, and taken to brigandage.

The other chief had a white face, with a beard and mustache. He was broad shouldered but rather lanky. He wore a brown silk turban, and had a distinguished appearance. He was a Suzhou man. His name was Zheng Tianshou, and his nickname was 'White Faced Squire.' Previously he had been a silversmith, and from his youth had been skillful with the cudgels, and had always been fond of strolling about. Once he had happened to meet Wang Ying, the 'Stunted Tiger,' and they had fought for about fifty bouts without either being victorious. Yan Shun had been watching this fight, and had admired Zheng's skill so he invited him to come and join them as brigands.

The three chiefs sat down, and 'Stunted Tiger' spoke, "Be quick, and let us have this fellow's liver made into sour soup for us three."

A soldier brought a large bowl of water, and placed it in front of Song Jiang. Another soldier rolled up his sleeves, and took a knife for cutting out the heart. The first named soldier opened Song Jiang's dress, and poured cold water over his bosom. The water was used to force the hot blood from the heart, and make the heart and liver tender when taken out. The cold water was splashed in Song Jiang's face so that he gasped, and cried out, "What a pity that Song Jiang should die like this!"

When Yan Shun heard the name Song Jiang, he at once told the soldier to stop splashing the water on the man. He then asked, "What did that man say?" When the soldier repeated it, Yan Shun got up and asked, "Do you know Song Jiang?"

"I am Song Jiang."

"Which Song Jiang do you mean?" asked Yan Shun.

"I am Song Jiang who was a clerk in the yamen at Yuncheng County."
"Are you the Song Jiang sometimes called 'Welcome Rain' who killed Yan Poxi, and then escaped?"
"How do you know that?" asked Song Jiang. "I certainly am that person."
Yan Shun was astonished. He took the knife from the soldier, and cut the ropes binding Song Jiang. He then took the bright red silk gown he was wearing, and put it on Song Jiang. He lifted him up, and seated him in his own chair. He then summoned the other two chiefs, and they all three went down on their knees and kowtowed to Song Jiang.
Song Jiang arose and also gave them a kowtow. He asked, "Why have you gentlemen not killed me? Why do you pay such respects to me?"
"I feel that I ought to gouge out my own eyes because they failed to recognize you," said Yan Shun. "I did not even ask you any questions so that I was almost on the point of killing a hero. If Heaven had not luckily moved you to say your name we should not have found out who you are. I have acted as a brigand for ten years, and during my travels I have heard that you distributed money in good cause and assisted people in distress. Only I have been so unfortunate that I could not pay you the respects earlier. Now I am contented that Heaven has arranged for us to meet today."
"What virtuous acts have I done that you should now regard me in this manner?" asked Song Jiang.
"Elder brother, you befriend great heroes," said Yan Shun. "Your name resounds in all parts, and where is the man who would not respect you? Just now matters at Liangshan Marsh are prospering, and that is known in all quarters. It has been said that all the prosperity there has been due to your assistance. I did not expect you to turn up at this spot."
Song Jiang then told all the details of his adventures with Chao Gai, his murdering of Yan Poxi, and how he was now on his way to the Qingfeng Mountain to find Hua Rong. All the chiefs were very glad to hear all this, and gave Song Jiang clothes to put on. They had a sheep and a pig killed, and that night they entertained Song Jiang to a feast. The next day Song told them all about Wu Song, and what that brave hero had done. The chiefs felt much regret that Wu Song had gone to somewhere else without calling at their place.
It was the custom in Shandong province to visit the family graves during the first ten days of the last month of the year. One day a soldier reported that in the valley below there was a sedan chair followed by about eight men, who were carrying two boxes, and they were evidently going to a grave to offer sacrifices. 'Stunted Tiger' was a lecher, and when he heard this report, he at once assumed that there might be a woman in the sedan chair. He summoned about fifty soldiers to follow him down the mountain. Song Jiang and Yan Shun were opposed to this expedition, but could not stop it. The bandits seized their weapons, and striking a gong they set off down the mountain. The other three were left behind, drinking wine.
About three hours later, a scout reported to Yan Shun that 'Stunted Tiger' had attacked the eight soldiers who had all run away, leaving the sedan chair in which was a woman. There were only incense sticks in the silver box.
"Where has the woman been taken to?" asked Yan Shun. "'Stunted Tiger' has taken her into his own room," was the reply. Yan Shun laughed. "Then our brother Wang Ying must be lustful, which is not creditable to a hero," said Song Jiang.
"He is very brave on all occasions," said Yan Shun, "but he has just that one fault." "Let us go, and give him some good advice," said Song Jiang. So they all three went to 'Stunted Tiger's' quarters, and upon pushing open the door they saw that he was embracing a woman, and was making solicitations. When he saw his friends he pushed the woman away from him, and asked them to be seated.
"Lady, what family do you belong to?" asked Song Jiang. "What urgent business have you that brings you to this place?"
The woman blushed, and gave three feminine salutes. "I am of the family of the commander of Qingfeng Fortress. My mother is dead so I seized this opportunity to visit her grave, and offer sacrifice to her spirit. I would not think of coming here on an idle trip. I beg you to save my life!"
Song Jiang was startled on hearing this, and thought, "I was going to seek refuge with Colonel Hua Rong, the commander of Qingfeng Fortress and this woman perhaps is his wife. Why should I not save her?" So he again asked, "If you are the wife of Hua Rong how is it that he did not accompany you to the grave?"
"I will tell you," said the woman. "I am not his wife."
"But just now you said you were the wife of the magistrate," said Song Jiang.
"You do not understand," said the woman. "At Qingfeng Fortress there are now two chiefs—one military and the other civil. The military commander is Colonel Hua Rong. The civil magistrate is Liu Gao, who is my husband."
Song Jiang thought, "Her husband is a fellow officer of Hua Rong. If I do not help her it will not look well for me to go and see my friend Hua Rong." He turned to 'Stunted Tiger,' and said, "I have something to say to you, but I do not know whether you will like it or not."
'Stunted Tiger' said, "Elder brother, please say what you have to say."
"If a hero commits debauchery everybody is ashamed of him," said Song Jiang. "This woman says she is the wife of an official appointed by the Imperial Court. What do you think if you take into account my friendly advice and the rules of common decency, and let her go to rejoin her husband?"
"Brother, listen to me," said 'Stunted Tiger,' "I have not a wife to accompany me at the stronghold, moreover in the present generation, many wives are monopolized by one person. Better leave this matter alone, and let me have this woman."
Song Jiang knelt down and kowtowed. He said, "Sir, if you want a wife, I will look round, and find you a very good one. I will endow her with wedding presents, and you can marry her. But this woman is the wife of an official, who is a comrade of my friend, so we must have some consideration of his feelings, and let this woman go."
Yan Shun and Zheng Tianshou both raised Song Jiang up, and said, "Elder brother, please get up. This matter will be easily arranged."
Song Jiang said, "Thank you for not standing in the way of this being done."
Yan Shun saw that Song Jiang was determined so without asking 'Stunted Tiger' whether he agreed or not, he ordered the captive sedan chair bearers to take the woman away at once.
The woman upon hearing this order saluted Song Jiang, and expressed her thanks many times.
"Lady," said Song Jiang, "do not thank me. I am not a leader at this stronghold, but merely a guest from Yuncheng County."
The woman again expressed her thanks, and then entering the sedan chair, she was quickly borne down the mountain by the two bearers whose lives had been spared. They almost flew down the mountain as though they had very many legs.
'Stunted Tiger' was disappointed, and also ashamed.
Song Jiang took him to the front hall telling him not to worry. "I will certainly get you a wife later on, and then you will be able to enjoy yourself. You can depend upon me keeping my promise."
Upon this both Yan Shun and Zheng Tianshou laughed.
'Stunted Tiger' had been balked of his prey by the rules of decorum, but although he was angry he dared not say a word.
The soldiers reported the seizure of his wife to the Magistrate Liu Gao. He was very angry, and abused them for their dereliction of duty. He had them beaten as punishment.
They stated that they were outnumbered as there were about forty of the bandits.
"Nonsense!" said the magistrate. "If you do not now go and recapture my wife, I will have you all put in prison."
The men had no escape so they asked other soldiers to join them, and altogether about eighty soldiers started off to rescue the magistrate's wife. They had not gone half the distance on the return journey when they met the two bearers carrying the sedan chair with the lady inside.
"How did you get away from the mountain?" asked they.
"Those fellows who seized me," said the lady, "were quite upset when I told them that I am the wife of Magistrate Liu, and they at once ordered the chair bearers to take me down the mountain again."
The soldiers replied, "Lady, we pray you to say that we rescued you, and so save us from further punishments."
"I know how to speak to the magistrate," she said.
They all saluted and expressed their thanks. They all escorted the chair and went along. But the chair bearers still walked very quickly so the soldiers asked them, "In ordinary days you walked like ducks or geese, so how is it you hurry so much now?"
"We really cannot walk fast," said the chair bearers, "but we are afraid that those terrible fellows will catch us up and give us a beating."
The escort laughed and said, "Have you seen a demon? Where are the men following you?"
The chair bearers now dared to look round, and seeing nobody pursuing them they exclaimed, "Ai Ya! We have had no time to look behind before, because our heels were kicking our backs as we raced along."
When they reached the yamen the magistrate was very much pleased to see his wife again, and asked her who had rescued her.
"When those bandits seized me they made vile solicitations, but I did not listen to them, and they were going to kill me. When they heard however that I was your wife they were immediately startled and saluted me. When all these soldiers arrived on the scene, they rescued me, and brought me back."
When the magistrate heard this he ordered ten jugs of wine and a roasted pig to be given to the soldiers as a reward for their efforts.
After the woman had left the mountain Song Jiang stayed there about ten days, and then expressed his desire to visit Colonel Hua Rong. The three chiefs of the bandits did not want him to go, but at last they prepared a feast, and made him presents of much silver.
Song Jiang bid them good bye. The three chiefs accompanied him down the mountain for about seven li where they drank the parting cups of wine, and before separating they urged Song Jiang to come and visit them again on the mountain when he left the magistrate's protection. This, Song Jiang promised to do. If the author were living at that time, he would not have allowed Song Jiang to depart and face death again in the Hua Rong's service.

Why should people look for trouble,
Which is not like changing clouds?

131

Song Jiang goes to see the lights at Night & Views the Hill of Lanterns' Display; Hua Rong Turns Topsy-Turvey Clear Winds Fort, Rong Makes a Row at Qingfeng Town, & fights with his colleague

Clear Winds Mountain was not far from Qingzhou, a hundred li or so. The fort was located in Clear Winds Town, because here the road divided into three forks leading to three bandit-controlled mountains. The town, inhabited by 4000 or 5000 households was separated from Clear Winds Mountain by a ride of only a stage or more. That day the 3 bandit chieftains returned to their mountain lair and Song Jiang travelled on alone, his pack upon his back, following the winding road to Clear Winds Town. There he asked for Hua Rong's residence. "Headquarters of the fort's in the centre of town," said his informant. "Civilian Commandant Liu lives in a small enclosure to the south, Military Commandant Hua lives in a small enclosure to the north."
Song Jiang thanked the man and proceeded to the northern enclosure. Guards standing at the gate asked him his name, then went in to report. Soon a young officer came out. He enthusiastically hauled Song Jiang inside, while shouting for the guards to carry his pack and halberd and sword, and led him to the main hall where he invited him to be seated on a cool bamboo couch. He dropped to his knees, kowtowed four times, then rose.
"I've thought of you often in the five or six years since we parted, brother," he said. "I heard that you killed your tramp of a mistress. There were notices out for your arrest all over. I was on pins and needles. I must have written a dozen letters to your manor, inquiring. Did you ever receive them? Today Heaven is kind, and we're able to meet again. I never felt so relieved in my life!"
Once more Hua Rong kowtowed. Song Jiang raised him to his feet. "Don't be so courteous, brother. Please sit down, and I'll tell you the rest of my story."
Hua Rong seated himself respectfully slightly at a bias, and Song Jiang related in detail how he killed Yan Poxi, took refuge with Lord Chai, met Wu Song at Squire Kong's manor, and of his capture at Clear Winds Mountain and his encounter with Yan Shun.
"You've had your share of troubles, brother," said Hua Rong. "How fortunate that you could come here now. Stay a few years and then we'll see."
"If my brother Song Qing hadn't written urging me to go to Squire Kong's manor I would have called on you sooner."
Hua Rong asked Song Jiang to the rear hall and summoned his wife to pay her respects, and then his younger sister. He supplied his guest with a change of garments and shoes and stockings, and a bath of fragrant water, after which he laid a feast of welcome.
During the meal Song Jiang told how he rescued the wife of Commandant Liu. Hua Rong frowned.
"What did you do that for? It would have been a good chance to shut her mouth permanently!"
"You amaze me! I thought I was doing something for the sake of your colleague. And I had to offend Wang the Stumpy Tiger and practically force him to let the woman go. I don't follow you."
"I don't mean to gossip, brother, but Clear Winds Fort defends a vital area of Qingzhou Prefecture. If I were in sole command here, the bandits wouldn't be so free with their raids, I can tell you! But this greedy, contemptible Liu has been made my superior. He's only a civilian official, and he has no ability besides. He's been squeezing the rural property-holders from the day he took office. He has no respect for the law. There's nothing he won't do. I'm the military commandant, but I'm under him. He makes me furious. I'd like to kill the dirty beast! Why did you have to save the rascal's wife! She's a nasty piece of business, always egging him on to evil deeds, encouraging him to harm people, to be hungry for bribes. What if she suffered insults and humiliation? Brother, you saved a bad woman!"
"No, that's wrong. You know the old saying: 'The knot of hatred should be opened, not tightened.' He's your colleague. Although he has shortcomings, you should overlook his faults and praise his virtues. You mustn't be so narrow-minded."
"You see things very clearly, brother. When I meet him in the office tomorrow I'll tell him how you rescued his wife."
"Behaving in this manner will be a manifestation of your own merits."
All day Hua Rong and his wife and family wined and dined Song Jiang. In the evening they prepared a bed and canopy for him in a room off the rear hall, for his night's rest. The next day they again served him sumptuous meals. To be brief, it went on like this for four or five days. Hua Rong directed several of his most trusted men—a different one each day—to show Song Jiang around the bustling market section of the town, and the temples and monasteries in the outskirts. He gave them money for expenses.
In the market section there were a few small brothels and tea-houses and wine shops, needless to say. Song Jiang and his guide wandered idly through the brothels, then went to the suburbs to look at a Taoist temple, after which they returned to a wine shop in town and drank. The guide tried to pay, but Song Jiang insisted on footing the bill. He said nothing about this to Hua Rong. His guide was very pleased. He was able to pocket the expense money, and had a pleasant time to boot. Song Jiang followed the same procedure with each of the other guides, always paying his own way. He was, as a result, well-liked in the fort.
A month went by. Winter was drawing to a close and the new year commencing. Soon it was Lantern Festival time.
The town residents talked over how they would celebrate it. They all chipped in, went to the King of Earth Temple and erected in front of it a framework of a turtle-shaped hill on which they hung six or seven hundred colored lanterns, and topped it all off with bunting and streamers. In the temple courtyard, there were various games. People also built trellises and suspended pretty lanterns in front of their homes. In the market section of town every shop had its own entertainments and amusements. While not as lavishly celebrated as in the capital, the festival to the local people seemed like heaven on earth.
On the fifteenth of the first lunar month—Lantern Festival Day, Song Jiang was drinking with Hua Rong in the fort. The weather was clear and fine. Around mid-morning Hua Rong got on his horse, rode down to headquarters and mustered several hundred soldiers. He instructed them to go into town that evening and keep order. He also selected a roster to guard the gates of the fort.
Early in the afternoon he returned and asked Song Jiang to lunch.
"I hear there's a lantern display in town tonight," said Song Jiang. "I'd like to see it."
"I wish I could go with you. But I'm too busy. I can't get away. There will be two or three attendants to keep you company, though. Come home early. I'll be waiting here to celebrate the festival with you with a few cups of wine."
"Of course."
As the day drew to a close, a round bright moon floated up from the east. Song Jiang strolled out with three attendants. In town he saw the fancy lanterns hanging from lattices in front of every door. Many showed story pictures. Some were cut-outs of lovely flowers—white peony, hibiscus, lotus.
Holding hands to keep together in the crowds Song Jiang and his escort went to the King of Earth Temple and admired the hill of lanterns, then walked south along a winding street. After proceeding six or seven hundred paces they saw ahead a bevy of glowing lanterns and a throng of merry-makers before the gate of a high-walled compound. Gongs brayed, music tootled, people cheered. They were watching a troupe of dancers in comic masks.
Song Jiang was short and couldn't see over the heads of the crowd. The attendants knew some of the performers, and they pushed a path through the onlookers to give Song Jiang an unobstructed view. The chief comic did an exaggerated imitation of a rustic's walk, and Song Jiang roared with laughter.
Inside the open gate, Civilian Commandant Liu, his wife and several other women were observing the show. When Liu's wife heard Song Jiang laugh, she looked and recognized him in the light of the lanterns. She pointed him out to her husband.
"That short swarthy fellow laughing there is one of the bandit chieftains on Clear Winds Mountain who kidnapped me!"
Startled, Liu shouted to six or seven of his guards to grab the short dark man who was laughing. Song Jiang heard him and quickly left. But before he had passed a dozen houses, the soldiers caught up, seized him, pulled him into the compound, tied him up, and took him into the hall. When the three men who had been escorting Song Jiang saw that he was arrested, they ran back to inform Hua Rong.
Commandant Liu, seated in his hall, ordered that the prisoner be brought forward. The guards swarmed up with Song Jiang and forced him to kneel.
"You're a Clear Winds Mountain thieving robber! How dare you come here to see the lanterns?" barked Liu. "Now that you're caught, what have you got to say for yourself?"
"My name is Zhang San. I'm a merchant from Yuncheng County, an old friend of Commandant Hua Rong. I arrived here only a few days ago. I've never been a robber on Clear Winds Mountain."
Liu's wife came out from behind a screen. "You're lying," she shrilled. "Don't you remember you insisted I call you 'chieftain'?"
"You're mistaken, madam. I told you that I was a merchant from Yuncheng, that I had also been seïzed by the bandits and couldn't leave the mountain."
"In that case what are you doing here, looking at lanterns?" Liu demanded.
"Up there you sat on the middle chair as big as life," the woman insisted. "Even when I called you big chieftain you paid no attention to my pleas!"
"How can you have forgotten, madam? I rescued you, and made them let you go! Yet now you say I'm a brigand!"
The woman pointed at Song Jiang in a rage. "If you don't give these crooked types a good drubbing they never admit anything!"
"Absolutely right," said Liu. "Get split bamboos and beat this knave," he shouted.
Song Jiang was flailed severely in two storms of blows. Blood flowed from his lacerated flesh.
"Chain him," Liu directed, "and tomorrow put him in a cage cart! We'll send this 'Yuncheng Tiger' Zhang San to the prefecture for disposition!"

Hua Rong was shocked when Song Jiang's escort rushed back and reported. He hastily penned a missive which he dispatched to Liu with two of his trusted officers. They waited at the gate of Liu's compound while the sentry went in and announced: "Two men from Commandant Hua with a letter."
Liu directed that they be brought in. The couriers handed him the message. He tore open the envelope and read:

Hua Rong respectfully greets his colleague and brother: A poor relation of mine, Liu Zhang who came recently from Jizhou, while viewing the lanterns unintentionally offended Your Excellency. I beg you to restrain your wrath and release him. I will be extremely grateful. Please forgive my clumsy writing.

Liu Gao angrily tore the letter to shreds. "That Hua Rong is too discourteous! He's an appointee of the imperial court. How can he consort with bandits, and try to pull the wool over my eyes! The knave of a prisoner says he's Zhang San from Yuncheng County. Hua Rong says he's Liu Zhang from Jizhou. He needn't think he can beguile me! Just because he says the man's name is Liu—the same as mine—does he imagine I'll let him go?"
The commandant ordered that the messengers be thrown out. They were hustled through the compound gate, and immediately returned to Hua Rong and reported.
"My poor brother Song Jiang!" Hua Rong exclaimed. "Get my horse ready immediately!" He donned his armor, tied on his bow and quiver of arrows, grasped his spear, and mounted. With forty or fifty men, bearing spear, and staves, he set out directly for Liu Gao's compound.
The guards at the gate didn't dare stop them. At the sight of Hua Rong's forbidding visage they took fright and fled. Hua Rong rode up to the main hall, dismounted, and stood, spear in hand, his soldiers arrayed behind him.
"Commandant Liu, please come out," he called. "I have something to say to you!"
Liu was terrified. Hua Rong was a military man. He didn't dare face him. When Liu still failed to emerge after several minutes, Hua Rong thought a moment, then ordered his men to search the compound's wings. They made a quick sweep and found Song Jiang in a side room. He was in chains and suspended by a rope from a rafter. His legs were torn and lacerated from his beating. The soldiers cut him down, broke off the shackles, and carried him out. Hua Rong ordered them to take him home.
He got on his horse, spear in hand. "Commandant Liu," he cried. "Though you're the senior officer here, you have no right to treat me like this! Who doesn't have relatives? How dare you seize a cousin of mine, drag him into your residence, and label him a brigand? You've gone too far! I'll settle with you later!"
Leading his soldiers, he returned to his own enclosure to look after Song Jiang.
Liu promptly mustered two hundred men and ordered them to go to Hua Rong's and bring Song Jiang back. Among these were two captains. Although skilled in arms, they were no match for Hua Rong. But they could not disobey Liu Gao. And so they marched with their company to Hua Rong's enclosure. The soldiers at the gate reported their arrival. It was still early in the morning. The two hundred men stood gathered outside the gate, not daring to enter. They all were afraid of Hua Rong.
When the day was fully light, the large double doors swung open, revealing Commandant Hua Rong seated inside his hall, a bow in his left hand, an arrow in his right. Liu's men crowded towards the gateway. Hua Rong raised his bow.
"You men," he shouted, "don't you know that 'the culprit must pay for his wrong, and the debtor for his debt'? Liu Gao has sent you here. Don't risk your necks for him! You two captains are new. You haven't seen my skill. I'm going to give demonstration of now to use a bow and arrow. Then any of you who want to show your mettle for Liu Gao, come ahead, if you have the nerve! My first shot will be at the knobbed cudgel of the painted door god on the left."
He fitted the arrow, stretched his bow and, with a yell, let fly. The arrow slammed into the knob of the cudgel. The two hundred men were amazed. Hua Rong selected a second arrow.
"Watch, you men! This one is for the tassel on the helmet of the door god on the right."
The arrow whistled swiftly towards the tassel and hit it squarely. Both arrows stuck into the opened double doors. Hua Rong pulled a third arrow from the quiver.
"And this is for the heart of that captain in white!"
"Aiya!" the man exclaimed. He turned and fled. The rest of the company, yelling, followed hastily.
Hua Rong ordered that the gates of the enclosure be shut. He went to the rear hall to see Song Jiang. "I was late, brother," he apologized, "and they made you suffer!"
"That doesn't matter. The only thing that worries me is that Liu Gao will probably try to get back at you. We'll have to make plans of our own."
"I don't care if it means giving up this post! I'm going to have it out with him!"
"I never dreamed that woman would return evil for good and tell her husband to have me beaten! I was going to give my real name but then I thought that matter of Yan Poxi would cause trouble. So I said I was Zhang San, a merchant from Yuncheng. That pig of a Liu Gao wanted to send me, under the name of Zhang San, to the prefecture in a cage cart, and have me executed as a bandit chieftain from Clear Winds Mountain! If you hadn't rescued me, I could never have talked him round, even if my lips were of bronze and my tongue of iron!"
"I thought as a man of letters he'd surely sympathize with someone of the same name. That's why I wrote you were Liu Zhang. Who would have thought he'd be so lacking in feeling? Well, you've been rescued and brought home. Now we can wait and see."
"You're wrong, brother. Though you've saved me by your military skill, you have to give this a lot of thought. 'Beware of hiccuping when you eat, and stumbling when you walk,' as the ancients say. You've openly snatched a prisoner away from him. And when he sent men to take me back, you frightened them off. Do you think he'll let it go at that? He's sure to send in a written report. I'd better take refuge on Clear Winds Mountain tonight. Tomorrow, you deny any knowledge of my affairs. It will seem like a mere squabble between civil and military administrators. If he captured me again, you wouldn't have a leg to stand on."
"I'm a man of simple courage. I have none of your wisdom and farsightedness, brother. But will you be able to travel with your wounds?"
"It doesn't matter. There's no time to lose. Once I get to the foot of the mountain I'll be all right."
Ointments and poultices were applied to Song Jiang's injuries, and he ate meat and drank wine. He left his pack in Hua Rong's care. Toward dusk, on Hua Rong's instructions, two soldiers saw him off to beyond the gates of the fort, and from there Song Jiang made his way through the night alone. Of that we'll say no more.

Liu Gao's men came straggling back. They said: "Hua Rong is very brave and fantastically skilled! None of us dared get within range of his bow!" And the two captains added: "If one of his arrows hits, it lets daylight right through you! We couldn't approach him either!"
That knave Liu was, after all, a civilian official, and very crafty. "Because of this attempt to seize Song Jiang, Hua Rong is sure to let him leave for Clear Winds Mountain tonight," he mused. "Tomorrow, he'll deny knowing anything about it. If I take it up with higher authorities, they'll assume it's just a tiff between civil and military administrators. How am I going to cope with him? I'll send twenty or thirty soldiers five /down the road to lie in wait for Song Jiang. If Heaven is kind and I nab him, I'll keep him quietly locked up here and send a man to the prefecture immediately with a request that the military command come and get him. They'll arrest Hua Rong at the same time and execute them both! Then I'll rule Fort Clear Winds alone, and won't have to take any more guff from those oafs!"
He picked twenty or so men and, armed with spears and staves, they set out the same night. Around the second watch they returned with Song Jiang, his hands tied behind his back. Liu Gao was delighted.
"Just as I expected! Lock him in the rear yard. No one is to know about this!"
Liu wrote a formal accusation which he dispatched to Qingzhou Prefecture by two trusted envoys, travelling through the night at flying speed.
The next day Hua Rong, who assumed that Song Jiang had already reached Clear Winds Mountain, sat at home thinking. "There's nothing he can do about it," he said to himself, meaning Liu Gao. He made no inquiries, and Liu pretended to be unaware of anything unusual. Neither mentioned the matter.
In Qingzhou the prefect was holding court. His family name was Murong, his given name was Yanda, and his younger sister was a concubine of the emperor. With this backing he rode high in Qingzhou, harming the people, abusing his colleagues, and doing pretty much as he pleased. He was about to adjourn for breakfast when his police officers handed him the complaint from Commandant Liu alleging bandit activities. The prefect was startled.
"Hua Rong is the son of a military commander who has made great contributions to the nation. How could he be conspiring with the brigands on Clear Winds Mountain? That's a serious crime. Can it be true?"
He summoned the commander of the prefectural army and directed him to go and investigate. Huang Xin, the commander, highly skilled in weapons and much respected by the people of Qingzhou, was known as the "Suppressor of the Three Mountains." There were three dangerous mountains under the jurisdiction of the prefecture: Clear Winds, Two-Dragon, and Peach Blossom. All were rife with bandits. Huang Xin boasted he would capture every one of them. Hence his nickname.
On receiving his orders from the prefect, he mustered fifty stalwart men, put on his armor, and mounted his horse, lethal blade in hand. The company arrived at Fort Clear Winds that same night and proceeded directly to Liu Gao's enclosure. Huang Xin dismounted and was led by Liu into the rear hall. Courtesies were exchanged, wine and food were served. His men were also taken care of. Then Song Jiang was brought out for the commander's examination.
"There's no need to question him," said Huang Xin. "Make a cage cart and put the varlet in it!"
A red hand was tied around Song Jiang's head and a paper pennant inserted reading: "Zhang San of Yuncheng, chieftain of the Clear Winds Mountain bandits." No one paid any attention to Song Jiang's denials. He could only submit to their will.
"Does Commandant Hua Rong know you've captured Zhang San?" asked Huang Xin.
"We caught him during the second watch and have kept him hidden here. Hua Rong thinks he's gone. He's sitting peacefully at home."
"In that case, it will be easy. Tomorrow morning lay a feast of mutton and wine in the main hall of the fort, and conceal forty or fifty men all around. I will personally invite Hua Rong to attend. I'll say 'Prefect Murong has heard that you civil and military administrators are not getting along and has sent me to bring you together over wine and make peace.' In that way I'll get him to the hall. When you see me fling down my cup, that will be the signal to grab him! I'll take them both with me back to the prefecture. How does that sound?"
"Very shrewd," said Liu appreciatively. "You make it 'as simple as catching turtles in a jug.' "
That night the plan was finalized. At dawn the following day they hid soldiers in the tents left and right of the big hall, and preparations were made as if for a feast. After breakfast Huang Xin got on his horse and went with only two or three attendants to call on Hua Rong. The sentry at the gate announced his arrival.
"What does he want?"
"He told me only to say: 'Commander Huang is calling.' "
Hua Rong went out and welcomed him. The commander dismounted. Hua Rong invited him in and courtesies were exchanged.
"What business brings you here, Commander?"
"Orders from the prefect. He's heard that you and the civil administrator aren't getting along, but doesn't know why. He's afraid some private squabble will affect public affairs, so I've been sent to invite you two to a feast and make peace between you. It's all laid out in the big hall of the fort. I've come to fetch you."
Hua Rong smiled. "Would I presume to be rude to Liu Gao? He's my superior. It's just that he's always finding fault. I never expected the prefect to be disturbed. And you've been troubled to come all the way to my humble home! I don't know how to apologize!"
Huang Xin leaned close and said in a low voice: "The prefect is on your side. If there ever should be any need to lead troops into action, what use would Liu Gao be? He's only a civil administrator. You just play along with me."
"I'm grateful, Commander, for your concern."
Huang Xin requested him to get on his horse and ride with him to the fort Hua Rong politely urged the commander to have a few cups of wine first.
"After we've smoothed this over, we can drink all we please," said Huang Xin.
Hua Rong ordered his steed, and the two rode out side by side. At the fort they dismounted. The commander took him by the hand and they entered the hall together. Liu Gao was already waiting. The three men met and Huang Xin called for wine. Attendants led Hua Rong's horse away and closed the gates of the fort.
Hua Rong didn't know it was a plot. He considered Huang Xin a regular military official, and didn't suspect him of any evil design. The commander raised his cup and turned to Liu Gao.
"The prefect has heard that there is some discord between you two. He's quite worried and has sent me here to patch things up. He hopes you'll put your responsibility to the imperial court above all else, and that if you have any disagreements in the future you'll discuss them calmly."
"I'm a man of no talent, who knows only a little administrative procedure," said Liu Gao. "I'm very sorry the prefect is upset. There's no conflict between us here. That's just a rumor."
Huang Xin laughed. "Excellent!"
Liu Gao drank. Huang Xin filled a second cup and addressed Hua Rong.
"In view of what Commandant Liu says, I'm sure it's only idle talk. Please join me in this round."
Hua Rong drained his cup. Then Liu Gao poured wine for Huang Xin.
"A toast to you, Commander, in thanks for coming to our humble place. Drink it down."
Huang Xin accepted the cup. Holding it in his hand, he looked around. About a dozen soldiers came into the hall. He flung the vessel to the floor. From the rear there rose a mighty clamor. Forty or fifty stalwart soldiers swarmed out of the tents on both sides of the hall, seized Hua Rong and pressed him down.
"Tie him up," shouted Huang Xin.
"What crime have I committed?" protested Hua Rong.
Huang Xin laughed. "You dare to complain! You're in league with the bandits on Clear Winds Mountain, in defiance against the imperial court! That's your crime! It's only out of consideration for your past prestige that I'm not arresting your wife and family as well!"
"Where's your proof?"
"I'll show you proof. I'll let you see your spoils and one of your bandit cronies. Nobody's wronging you. Guards! Bring him here!"
A cage cart containing a man with a red headband and a paper pennant was rolled in. It was Song Jiang. Hua Rong gaped. They stared at each other, speechless.
"This has nothing to do with me," said Huang Xin. "I'm acting on the charges of Liu Gao, the complainant here."
"It doesn't matter who's accusing him," said Hua Rong. "This man is my relation, from Yuncheng Town. If you insist that he's a bandit, we'll argue it out in court!"
"In that case I must take you along to the prefecture. You can do your arguing in person."
The commander told Liu Gao to muster 100 soldiers for an escort.
"You tricked me into coming, Commander," said Hua Rong. "Although you've arrested me when we get to court, the case will still have to be argued. We're both military officials. Don't strip me of my clothes, but let me ride in a cage cart too."
"That's easy. I grant your request. And I'm asking Commandant Liu to come with us to the prefecture so we can get this straightened out. We want no one wrongfully executed." Huang Xin and Liu Gao mounted their horses. With 50 prefecture soldiers, plus 100 from the fort, guarding the 2 cage carts they set out for Qingzhou. And as a result, leaping flames consumed hundreds of homes, knives and axes took nearly 2000 lives. Truly, provocation brings trouble to the provoker, and injury rebounds against the injurer.

Now Windy Mountain was no great distance from Qingzhou, a mere thirty miles or so in fact. And Windy Fort was situated at a main crossroads in Qingzhou district, at the place called Windy City. Windy Fort had been established here at Windy City for the very reason that this crossroads connected three dangerous mountain regions. It contained a garrison of three or four thousand, and was just one stage away by road from Windy Mountain.
On the day in question the three chiefs returned to their stronghold on the mountain, while Song Jiang went on alone. With the pack on his back, he made his way to Windy City. On arrival there he asked one of the inhabitants where he could find Colonel Hua.
"The garrison headquarters is right here in the town," the man answered. "There's a compound on the south which is the residence of the civil chief, Mr. Liu. Colonel Hua's residence is in the compound to the north."
Song Jiang thanked his informant and directed his steps north-ward. The guards at the main gate asked his name and went inside to report. Immediately a young officer rushed out, pulled Song Jiang to one side and prostrated himself. Here's what he looked like:
White teeth, red lips, bold eyes, strongly drawn eyebrows, the waist narrow but the shoulders broad as an ape's. He knows how to manage a mettlesome steed or skilfully launch a hawk. He can split the willow twig at a hundred paces and the strength of his arm is wondrous to behold; he bends the bow round as the autumn moon and his feathered shaft scatters the winter stars. The Archer they call him: this scion of great leaders is actually Hua Rong.
The young officer who appeared was indeed none other than Colonel Hua, the military commander of Windy Fort. After his most respectful greeting, Colonel Hua ordered his men to take Song Jiang's luggage, halberd and sword and escort him into the main hall. Here, after inviting Song Jiang to take a comfortable seat, he prostrated himself again four times, before rising and saying: "It's, let me see, nearly six years now since we parted and I've thought of you many a time. I heard that you killed a harlot, there are notices up everywhere demanding your arrest. When I learnt you were in such trouble I felt as if I was sitting on a mat full of pins. I wrote many times to your home to ask about you, I don't know if you got the letters. But now at last heaven has rewarded me, it is my great good fortune to have you come here. This meeting makes me happy for life." He prostrated himself yet again.
Song Jiang raised him up, saying: "Please brother, this courtesy is excessive. Be seated, I beg of you, and let me tell you my story."
Colonel Hua sat down opposite, and Song Jiang recounted the killing of Yan Poxi, the sojourn with Mr. Chai, the meeting with Wu Song at Squire Kong's, his capture by the Windy Mountain band and meeting with the Dandy … and so on. He left nothing out. Afterwards Colonel Hua said: "To think that you've been through so much! I'm so glad you've come here now. You can stay with me a year or two, we'll have plenty of time to decide what to do later."
"If my younger brother had not written urging me to go to Squire Kong's, it was always my intention to come and spend a little time with you," said Song Jiang.
Next Colonel Hua invited Song Jiang to sit in the inner hall while his wife came and paid her respects, followed by his younger sister. Then he sent him off to change his clothes, including his shoes and stockings, and bathe in scented water, while a feast was being prepared in the inner hall.
At the banquet that day, Song Jiang gave Colonel Hua a full account of how he had rescued Governor Liu's wife. Colonel Hua scowled when he heard this and said: "That was a mistake. What did you go and rescue the woman for? What an opportunity to shut her mouth!"
"How strange!" Song Jiang said. "I heard she was the wife of the governor of Windy Fort. It was for the sake of your colleague I insisted on her release, that's why I refused to listen to the protests of Wang Ying. So what's all this?"
Colonel Hua said: "You don't understand. Don't think I'm boasting, but this Windy Fort is strategically vital for Qingzhou and if I was in sole command you'd never have all these bandits from far and near creating mayhem here. But now I've got this miserable louse over me as civil governor! He's not only a civilian, he's also totally incompetent. Since he took office all the local property owners have been swindled and the law's been turned upside down, he'll stop at nothing. I'm a soldier and deputy governor, and every day that fool does something to drive me crazy. I could kill him, the dirty bastard! Why the hell did you rescue his wife? That woman is evil, I tell you, she drives her husband on to every kind of shamelessness, ruining good men, indulging in bribery and corruption … the cow deserves to be humiliated! Yes, you should never have rescued the bitch!"
Song Jiang rebuked him for this tirade: "Brother, you're wrong there. Remember the old saying, 'Resentment should be purged, not fed.' You and he are colleagues, even if he has some faults, you should ignore the failings and see the good side. You really shouldn't be so prejudiced!"
Colonel Hua relented: "I'm sure you know best, brother. Next time I see Mr. Liu at the office I'll tell him how you rescued his lady."
"I expected no less of your generosity, brother."
Colonel Hua and his family continued to ply Song Jiang with food and drink from dawn to dusk. In the evening a bed was set up for him in a room off the inner hall. Next day the feasting went on. But we will not bore you with any more of this.

For the next week or so Song Jiang continued to enjoy Colonel Hua's hospitality in the fort. Colonel Hua had in his employ a number of personal aides. One of these gentlemen, in turn, was given each day an amount of money for incidental expenses and charged with taking Song Jiang around to witness the activity on the streets of Windy City, to see the beauty spots, the palaces, monasteries and temples, and to visit places of entertainment. From now on one of these aides always accompanied Song Jiang, keeping him entertained with visits to the town.

It goes without saying that in Windy City there were quite a few brothels, teahouses and wineshops. One day, after Song Jiang and his companion had spent a little time in one of the pleasure houses and been to see some temples and monasteries on the outskirts, Taoist and Buddhist, the aide suggested a drink at one of the wineshops in town. When they were leaving, the aide took out money to pay. But Song Jiang refused to let him and paid with his own money, and when he returned he did not tell Colonel Hua about this. Song Jiang's drinking companion of course was delighted: he'd saved his money and he'd also had a very good time. A different companion was allotted to take Song Jiang out each day and every time it was Song Jiang who paid. Soon there was no one in the fort who did not love and honour him.

It was almost a month after Song Jiang came to Colonel Hua's. Winter was ending and spring just beginning and the lantern festival was almost upon them. The townsfolk busied themselves discussing the placing of lanterns and making preparations for the festival. A collection was taken up, and in front of the temple of the Lord of Earth a small turtle mountain was constructed — the top was festooned with coloured streamers and hundreds of decorated lanterns. Inside the temple itself all kinds of events were organized. Everyone erected stands in front of their door, all vying to exhibit the most splendid display of lanterns. Every imaginable activity was on offer in the city and although it obviously could not equal the capital it still seemed a very heaven on earth.

Song Jiang was drinking with Colonel Hua in the compound on the day of the lantern festival. The weather was splendid, clear and sunny. In the morning Colonel Hua rode over to the barracks to give instructions for a hundred or so troops to keep order in the town in the evening, assigning a body of men to each of the four gates. Before noon he returned to the fort and invited Song Jiang to have a snack.

"I've heard there are to be illuminations in the town tonight," said Song Jiang. "I'd like to see them."

"I would take you myself," said Colonel Hua, "but unfortunately I'm on duty, so I'm not free to go with you. You'd better go to see the illuminations with some of my people and come back early. When I get home I'll drink a few cups with you to celebrate the festival."

"Splendid!" said Song Jiang.

Soon it was evening and a bright moon was rising in the east. Song Jiang with two or three of Colonel Hua's personal aides strolled along the bank of a stream. When they reached the centre of town they saw the illuminations: on the stands before each house coloured lanterns were hung, painted with many a famous tale. There were lanterns too decorated with paper cut-outs in the likeness of peonies, hibiscus and lotus flowers and in all manner of wondrous shapes. Walking hand in hand our friends came to the turtle mountain. Then they saw:

Amid the stones of the mountain two dragons play in water; sunset clouds illume a solitary crane gliding through the sky. Lotus lamps and plum blossom lamps cast pools of coloured light; lamps in the shape of water-lily and hibiscus create a host of dancing colours. Silvery moths vying in brilliance flutter in pairs around perfumed spheres, silvery trees try to outshine each other like patterned banners or jade curtains. Local airs and country rhythms are shouted out under the coloured lanterns; girls of the silk trade stroll and laugh together in the flickering light of the candles. Though it may lack the elegance of fine music, this celebration of nature's bounty has many years of tradition behind it.

After admiring the turtle mountain, they wandered off towards the south. Another five or six hundred paces brought them to a particularly brilliant display of lights where a small group of people were gathered at the gate of a high walled compound, whence a lot of noise was proceeding. Amid the sound of gongs and fifes, the spectators were applauding. It was a group of masked dancers. Song Jiang was rather short and he couldn't see through the crowd, so his companions, who knew some of the performers, cleared a path through the crowd for him. At this moment some piece of rustic clowning by the dancers made Song Jiang guffaw.

Now it so happened that Governor Liu and his wife with several other ladies were watching within this compound. When the governor's wife heard Song Jiang laughing, she recognized him by the light of the lamps and pointed him out to her husband, saying: "That short dark fellow there, he's one of the blighters who kidnapped me the other day on Windy Mountain."

Governor Liu reacted immediately. He called half a dozen of his attendants and told them to apprehend the dark fellow who was laughing. Song Jiang heard the order and made to leave. But he had hardly passed more than ten houses when they caught up with him, pouncing and carrying him off, as the black hawk seizes a red swallow, or the merciless tiger devours a little lamb. They took him inside the compound, bound him with four ropes, and dumped him in front of the courtroom. His four companions, seeing him arrested, rushed back to inform Colonel Hua.

Governor Liu was waiting in the courtroom and ordered the prisoner to be brought in. They shoved him forward in front of the bench and forced him to his knees. Governor Liu shouted: "You, a brigand from Windy Mountain, how dare you come here brazenly to see the lights? Now you're caught, have you anything to say for yourself?"

Song Jiang replied: "I am a merchant from Yuncheng. My name is Zhang, Third Brother Zhang. I am an old friend of Colonel Hua's. I only arrived a few days ago. I was never a robber on Windy Mountain."

At this point the wife slipped out from behind the screen and shouted: "Who are you expecting to fool, you cheeky devil! Have you forgotten how you wanted me to call you big chief?"

"With respect, madam, you must be mistaken," Song Jiang replied. "Don't you remember that I told you then I was a merchant from Yuncheng and was a captive there, not at liberty to leave the mountain?"

Governor Liu said: "If you were a captive, held there by force, how were you able to come and see the lights?"

The woman added: "You liar! When you were up there on the mountain you sat among the leaders as bold as brass and I had to call you chief! What sort of a captive is that?"

"Madam," said Song Jiang, "have you forgotten that it was I who secured your release? Why are you so determined to make me out a bandit?"

The woman was furious. She pointed at Song Jiang and scolded: "The lousy beggar, beating's the only thing he'll understand!"

"Quite so!" said the Governor, and called for split canes to be brought.

After two successive floggings, Song Jiang's wounds all opened, his skin split and fresh blood poured out. Then manacles were called for to secure him, and a prison cart, which was to take Third Brother Zhang from Yuncheng next day to the provincial court.

Now his companions had rushed back to inform Colonel Hua, who was devastated when he heard and immediately wrote a letter which he sent with two able members of his staff to Governor Liu's. The guards at the gate went inside and reported that there was a letter from Colonel Hua. Liu Gao ordered the bearers to be admitted and they presented the letter. The Governor broke the seal and opened it:

Hua Rong respectfully greets his colleague and begs to inform the Governor that his cousin Liu Zhang recently arrived from Jizhou, on going to witness the illuminations, had the misfortune to offend in some way. If the Governor will pardon him, Hua Rong will be eternally grateful. Hua Rong begs the Governor to overlook the inadequacy of his style.

That put the lid on it. Liu Gao tore the letter into little pieces and yelled: "That bastard Colonel Hua doesn't know what's what! He's supposed to be a government official. Yet he's in league with the bandits, and what's more, he's lying to me. The prisoner has already confessed to being Third Brother Zhang, the Yuncheng bandit, how can he be called Liu? Really, it's too much! Does he imagine I'll let him off just because he says his name is Liu, the same as mine?"

He told the guards to throw the bearers of the letter out. Unceremoniously ejected, they returned to the fort in great haste and told Colonel Hua what had happened. "My poor friend!" Colonel Hua exclaimed. "Bring my horse!" He donned his best uniform, slung his bow over his shoulder, grasped his spear and galloped off to Governor Liu's residence, accompanied by thirty or forty men all fully armed. When the guards saw him they dared not stand in his way. His expression was terrible and it struck so much fear into them that they fled in all directions. Colonel Hua charged in and dismounted in front of the courtroom, spear in hand, while his troops deployed. "I wish to speak to Governor Liu!" he bellowed.

Liu Gao heard and was so terrified his spirit fled, his senses scattered. He had a healthy respect for Colonel Hua's martial prowess and had no intention of coming out to meet him. Seeing the Governor would not come out, Colonel Hua waited there a little while, then ordered his men to search the buildings on either side. The search soon revealed Song Jiang in a side-room off the main hall, where he had been hung from a rafter, all trussed up and loaded with padlocks, his legs flayed and bleeding. Some of them freed him, cutting the ropes and smashing the padlocks. Colonel Hua ordered him to be taken home at once. Colonel Hua mounted again and brandishing his spear shouted out as follows: "Governor Liu, you are supposed to be an official, what call have you to insult Hua Rong? Doesn't everyone have relatives? What do you think you're playing at, dragging my cousin into your house and calling him a bandit? What a nerve! You haven't heard the last of this!" At the head of his troop he galloped back to the fort, to take care of Song Jiang.

Now when Governor Liu realized that Colonel Hua had freed the prisoner, he immediately detailed several hundred men to go to Colonel Hua's and seize him again. Amongst these men were two new instructors. Although they were relatively skilled with arms, they could not match Colonel Hua's military art, but they did not dare disobey Liu Gao. At the head of their troops, they rushed to Colonel Hua's fort. The guards went in to report this arrival. It was not yet light, and the two hundred or so soldiers remained milling about at the gate. No one wanted to be first to enter since they feared Colonel Hua's prowess.

When it got lighter, it was seen that the gates were wide open, and Colonel Hua was revealed sitting in the courtroom. In his left hand he held a bow, in his right a drawn arrow. As the crowd pressed about the gate, Colonel Hua raised the bow and shouted: "You there, you men, haven't you heard that there's a cause of every wrong, a collector of every debt? Liu Gao sent you here, but do you really want to die for him? You two instructors are not yet familiar with my skill. I'm going to give you a little demonstration with the bow. After that, if you really want to die for Liu Gao, then feel free to just step inside. I am now going to put an arrow through the knob on the end of the weapon of the door-god on the left." He fitted an arrow, bent the bow to its limit and wham! the arrow struck the very middle of the knob on the end of the door-god's weapon. Everyone seeing this trembled. Colonel Hua took a second arrow and cried: "Now everyone watch while I shoot the red tassel on top of the head of the door-god on the right." Another arrow whizzed off and flew straight to its target. The two arrows now stuck quivering in the two leaves of the door. Colonel Hua took a third arrow and shouted: "Now watch my third arrow. This one is destined for the head of the instructor dressed in white!"

With a cry of "Aiya!" this individual turned and fled. The rest followed, amid a tumult of shouts. Colonel Hua ordered the gates closed and retired to the inner hall to see Song Jiang. "I failed you, brother," he said, "allowing you to suffer this injury."

"It's nothing," replied Song Jiang. "But I am afraid that scoundrel Liu Gao won't leave you alone now. We ought to devise a plan of some sort."

"I'd give up this post for the sake of having it out with that louse!"

"Who would have thought that the woman would return hatred for kindness, inciting her husband to give me such a beating! I should have given my true name in the first place. Only I was afraid that the Poxi affair was known, that's why I said I was Third Brother Zhang, a merchant from Yuncheng. Still, it was a bit much of Liu Gao, trying to turn me into Third Brother Zhang the bandit from Yuncheng and send me up to the district court in a prison cart! He got it into his head I was the chief of the Windy Mountain bandits and from then on all the talk was of beating and execution. If you hadn't come to my rescue, nothing I said could have shifted him, I'd never have convinced him, not in a month of Sundays!"

"And my idea, you see, was that since he's a scholar he ought to respect somebody with the same name, that's why I wrote 'Liu Zhang.' It didn't occur to me he could be so lacking in human feelings. But now you're safely here and we'll have plenty of time to decide what to do later."

"I think that's a mistake," said Song Jiang. "Since you rescued me by force the whole affair needs careful thought. Remember the old saying, 'When you eat beware of choking, when you walk watch out for tripping up.' You've openly robbed him of his prize, he immediately sent troops to get me back and you scared them off, I don't see how he can let the matter rest. He'll certainly report you. I'd better leave tonight, then you can repudiate me and it'll just look like the usual difference of opinion between the military and the civil arm. Even supposing he does capture me again, he'll have nothing on you."

Colonel Hua said: "I'm just a soldier, I'm afraid … I don't have your logic and foresight. Only I'm afraid with your wounds you won't be able to travel."

"That won't stop me," said Song Jiang. "One shouldn't delay in an emergency. I can hold out till I reach the mountain."

That afternoon ointment was applied to Song Jiang's wounds and he ate some food. His luggage he left at Colonel Hua's. At dusk two soldiers escorted him out of the camp. He started his journey that same night. Of this no more.

Meanwhile Liu Gao's men had struggled back to the barracks one by one. "Colonel Hua is such a tough nut, no one wants to get within reach of his arrows," they said. "Give him an arrow and he'll shoot you as full of holes as a sieve," the two instructors added. "That's why no one can get near him."

But not for nothing was Liu Gao a scholar. His mind was deep and devious, and he was full of schemes. Here is what he had worked out: "After this incident, I think we can count on Colonel Hua's sending the bandit straight off to Windy Mountain tonight. And tomorrow he'll come to me with excuses. So even if it went to court, it would look like a difference of opinion between the civil arm and the military. That way I'd never be able to get even with him. But tonight I'll send a score of men to set an ambush at the second milestone. If heaven favours me and we catch him, I'll have him quietly locked up here and send someone in secret to the provincial court to request a military escort to come and get him. They can take Colonel Hua in at the same time, and they'll both be finished off together. That way I'll be left in sole command of Windy Fort. I won't have to put up with that fellow's insolence any longer."

That very evening he dispatched a troop of around twenty well-armed men. At approximately nine o'clock they returned with Song Jiang, tightly bound. "Just as I hoped," Liu Gao gloated. "Now take him and lock him up in the inmost court and don't breathe a word to anyone." He made out an official report at once, carefully sealed and marked urgent, and entrusted it to two of his most reliable men to deliver by night to the Qingzhou district court.

Next day, Colonel Hua, assuming Song Jiang had got away to Windy Mountain, sat at home and considered things. "I don't see that there's anything he can do," he said to himself. So he gave the matter no further thought. Liu Gao also kept quiet. Nothing was said on either side.

Now the court was actually in session in Qingzhou. The governor had the double surname of Mu-Rong, and the given name Yanda, and he was an elder brother of one of the concubines of the current emperor, Huizong. Relying on the influence of his sister, he made his own rules in Qingzhou, riding roughshod over the people, intriguing against friends and colleagues and in general doing exactly as he liked. He was just on the point of going home for breakfast when his assistants came in with the urgent letter from Liu Gao. It concerned a case of banditry. What he read shocked him: "Colonel Hua is the son of a high-ranking official," he said. "What's he doing consorting with the bandits of Windy Mountain? It's a most serious crime, certainly not something to be condoned." He summoned the commander of the district militia and ordered him to Windy Fort.

This commander was General Huang Xin. On account of his notable military ability, the people of Qingzhou went in awe of him and referred to him as the Tamer of Three Mountains. For there were in the district of Qingzhou three dangerous mountains: Windy Mountain, Twin Dragon Peak and Mount Peachblossom. These were all areas to which bandits and outlaws resorted, and Huang Xin was always boasting that he would put down the gangs on all three. Hence his nickname, the Tamer. After reporting to the court and receiving the Governor's order, the Tamer chose fifty seasoned troops and equipped himself for battle. That same evening, brandishing his double-edged sword, he set off for Windy Fort. He dismounted in front of Liu Gao's office. Liu Gao received him and took him into the inner hall. After the exchange of courtesies a banquet was organized and the troops were suitably regaled. Afterwards Song Jiang was brought out for the Tamer to see. "No need for questions," said the latter. "Get a prison cart at once and shove the scoundrel inside." A piece of red silk was bound round Song Jiang's head and a paper pennant stuck in it bearing the words, "Third Brother Zhang, the Yuncheng bandit, leader of the Windy Mountain rabble." Song Jiang dared not protest, he was obliged to submit to their will.

"Does Colonel Hua know that you've got Zhang?" the Tamer asked Liu Gao.

"I took him at night, at nine o'clock," Liu Gao replied. "I locked him up secretly here in the residence. Colonel Hua must think he's got away because he's just sitting at home doing nothing."

"In that case it's easy. Tomorrow lay in plentiful supplies for a feast in the main hall of the fort and set an ambush of fifty or so men all around it in advance. I will go myself to Colonel Hua's residence and personally invite him to attend. The reason I'll give as follows: 'His Excellency, Governor Mu-Rong has heard that the military and civil authorities are not in accord and has sent me with express orders to arrange a meeting.' Once we've lured him into the hall I shall give the signal by dashing my cup to the floor. Then we go into action and capture him."

The plan was agreed on that night, and early next morning the ambush was set in the rooms on either side of the main hall, while the semblance of a feast was created in the hall itself. The Tamer then mounted and rode to Colonel Hua's residence, taking only a few men with him. When the guard reported, Colonel Hua asked: "Why has he come?"

"The word is that General Huang Xin has some special business with you," the man replied.

This was enough to bring Colonel Hua out to receive him. The Tamer dismounted and Colonel Hua asked him in. After the exchange of formalities, Colonel Hua asked: "May I inquire, General Huang sir, what business brings you here?"

"I have the honour to bear the Governor's commission. He told me that for some unknown reason the civil and military authorities here are not in accord. He fears that your personal animosity may cause you to neglect your public duties. He has sent me to organize a feast so that the two of you may be reconciled. This has already been arranged in the great hall, so I request you to mount and accompany me thither."

"Of course I would not think of intriguing against Liu Gao," said Colonel Hua easily. "He also has an official appointment here. It's just that he is always finding fault with me. But it was far from my intention to upset the Governor. And now I have given you all the trouble of coming here. How can I make amends?"

The Tamer, bending his ear and speaking very softly, said: "The Governor puts his trust in you alone. If there are any military emergencies, Liu Gao is only a civilian, he would be no use for dealing with them. All you need to do is follow my advice."

"I am deeply grateful to you, sir," Colonel Hua said.

The Tamer suggested they leave at once, but Colonel Hua said: "Please honour me, sir, by accepting some wine before we go."

"Before a conference a cup or two of wine is not a bad idea," the Tamer said.

Finally Colonel Hua called for the horses and they rode together to the main compound where they dismounted and taking Colonel Hua by the hand the Tamer led him into the main hall. Here they found Liu Gao already waiting for them. Now the three were assembled, Liu Gao ordered wine and the servants took Colonel Hua's horse away and closed the main doors. Colonel Hua was completely unsuspecting. Confident in the fact that the Tamer was a soldier, he assumed he could not possibly harbour any ill intentions.

The Tamer, holding a cup of wine, now spoke to Liu Gao as follows: "The Governor has heard that the civil and military authorities do not see eye to eye and he is most concerned. He has sent me here to bring the two of you together. Whatever happens he hopes that the two of you will always put your duty to the Emperor first and act in accord if the need should arise."

Liu Gao said: "Call me a fool if you like. No doubt it's due to my lack of experience as an administrator that I have caused the Governor this distress. In fact there's no real quarrel between us, it's just gossip."

The Tamer smiled approvingly and said: "That's splendid."

Liu Gao drank the wine and the Tamer poured another cup and said to Colonel Hua: "In view of what Mr. Liu has just said, that it is mere idle gossip, nothing more, I would like you to drink this cup."

Colonel Hua took the cup and drank it. Then Liu Gao took another cup and filled it and said to the Tamer: "Please do us the signal honour of drinking." The Tamer took the cup and raised it in his hand and looked very deliberately around him. At this moment a small group of soldiers effected an entry and the Tamer dashed the cup to the floor. Immediately there was a sound of cheering outside and on both sides of the hall forty or fifty hardened troops were revealed. In a moment they had overpowered Colonel Hua. "Tie him up!" the Tamer shouted.

"But what have I done?" Colonel Hua cried.

"You'd best keep quiet!" said the Tamer with a sneer. "You're a villain and you're in league with the Windy Mountain bandits, traitors to the Emperor one and all, that's what! Because of your former reputation, I've tried to keep it quiet. Lucky for you I haven't brought in all your family."

"Where is your evidence?" Colonel Hua cried.

"I'll give you evidence all right! I'll show to you a true and indubitable villain, you shall know all. Guards, bring him out!"

A moment later a prison cart, complete with paper banner and red inscription, was rolled into the room. In it was Song Jiang! The two men stared at each other, dumbstruck.

"Anyway, it's out of my hands," the Tamer roared, "because the accuser is Liu Gao!"

"But that's nothing, it's nothing," Colonel Hua protested. "This is my relative. He's from Yuncheng. You can't make him out to be a bandit. Take the matter to court and let the court give judgement."

"All right, I shall do just that. I'm sending you up to the district capital for trial. You'll get your judgement there." He told Liu Gao to assemble an escort of a hundred men.

Colonel Hua said: "General Huang, you tricked me into coming here. All right then, you've got me, so send me to the court and let them decide. Only since I'm a soldier like yourself, please allow me to keep my uniform and just send me in a prison cart."

"No problem," said the Tamer. "It shall be as you say. And Liu Gao shall go too to give evidence. He shall not be allowed to harm the prisoners in any way."

The Tamer and Liu Gao mounted their horses and with the two prison carts, surrounded by a thirty or forty man military escort and a hundred guards from the fort, travelled with all dispatch to Qingzhou district court. And this was to have an important result:

In the conflagration a hundred households will burn;
Amid the swords and axes two thousand lives are lost.

And truly it is as they say,

Trouble's cause is trouble's target, so hold your horses,
Malice seeks who malice uses, so watch your step.

THE Qingfeng Mountain was only about thirty li from the Qingzhou Prefecture. In the prefecture was Qingfeng Town which had three roads leading to it from three wild mountains, and for which reason a military station was established there. The town had about five thousand families.
Song Jiang traveled along one of these roads by himself, and upon reaching the town he inquired for the residence of Colonel Hua Rong. He was told that the yamen was in the center of the town. The residence of the military officer was on the north side, and that of the civil official on the south side of the main road.
Song Jiang went to the military residence, and found several soldiers at the entrance. They asked for his name, and one then went inside to report his arrival. In a short time Hua Rong came out and led Song Jiang to a hall where he asked Song Jiang to be seated on a divan and gave four salutes with the hands.
He then said, "I think it must be about six years since we separated, and during that period I have often thought of you. I heard that you had killed a loose woman, and the officials issued the usual proclamation for your arrest. When I heard of the case, I felt very uneasy and although I wrote several letters to your home I do not know whether you have received them. Now today I have the pleasure of meeting you, and am exceedingly delighted, and my anxiety has vanished."
Song Jiang asked the magistrate Hua Rong to be seated, and offer no further obeisance. He then told him all about his affairs, and how he had been detained at the Qingfeng Mountain.
"Elder brother," said Hua Rong, "you have experienced many difficulties. I am much pleased that you have come here. You can stay here for a few years with safety."

"While I was living with Old Kong I received a letter from my younger brother telling me to come here. But even had I not received such a letter I would have come all the same."
Hua Rong asked Song Jiang to come into his private apartments where he introduced him to his wife—Cui. He then introduced his sister also. After this Song Jiang was asked to take a bath and to change his dress for dinner. During the meal Song Jiang told Hua Rong all the details of how he had assisted the wife of Magistrate Liu to escape from the bandits, stronghold.
"It would have been much better if you had not interfered," said Hua Rong frowningly.
"Is that not rather strange?" asked Song Jiang. "When I heard that she was the wife of your colleague I thought it better to restrain 'Stunted Tiger,' and allow the woman to escape. Why do you now speak like this?"
"You do not understand. I am not boasting, but this is a very important place. If I were in sole charge here the brigands, near or far, would not dare to disturb the district. But recently this very stupid fellow was appointed to take the senior post. He was a civil official but illiterate, and as soon as he arrived he started to extort money from all the wealthy people. He never observed the Imperial laws. As I was his assistant, he took every opportunity of insulting me, so that at times I felt much regret that I could not have killed him. Oh! Why did you save his wife from ill-treatment? That woman has not a noble character and is always egging on her husband to do wicked things, to injure the people, and to squeeze money. It would have been much better had you allowed the bandits to rape her. You made a mistake in rescuing such a bad woman."
"I think you are wrong," said Song Jiang. "There is an ancient saying, 'If enmity is not settled amicably there is no end to it.' He is your colleague so if he has a small fault you should overlook it, and dwell more on his good points."
"Elder brother," said Hua Rong, "your exposition is very clear. When I meet Magistrate Liu in his yamen, I will explain to him how you saved his wife."
"If you do that it will show your goodness to him."
After that for some time Hua Rong and his wife entertained Song Jiang at many feasts. Hua Rong had several confidential servants, and every day one of these was appointed to attend to Song Jiang's needs. Hua Rong gave them money, and they conducted him for strolls round the town to see the temples and sights. Song Jiang did not want them to pay for any wine, etc. they had, and he always paid these expenses himself, but he never told Hua Rong that he had done this. The companions liked this arrangement as they could keep for themselves the money advanced by Hua Rong, so they respected Song Jiang and loved him much.
Song Jiang had stayed with Hua Rong for about a month when it happened to be the Lantern Festival. It was on the 15th of the first month of the year and the people subscribed money, and erected an imitation mountain in front of the temple dedicated to the God of the Earth. The scenery was covered with festoons, and was illuminated by about seven hundred lanterns. There were also lanterns exhibited at every house, and inside the temple were all kinds of amusements. The whole town was happy with festivities. Though this place could not be compared with the Capital City, yet it was considered the Heaven on Earth in that vicinity.
At this feast, Song Jiang had dined with Hua Rong. It was a very fine day, and about 11 A.M. Hua Rong mounted his horse, and went to his yamen. He gave orders that in the evening a hundred soldiers should patrol the streets, and preserve order, and that other soldiers should guard the barriers outside the town. About 3 P.M. he returned home, and dined with Song Jiang. The latter mentioned that he wished to have a look of the display of lanterns in the town that evening. Hua Rong stated he would have liked to accompany him, but his official duty would not allow him to do that. He would, however, depute two or three men to go with Song Jiang. He would wait for his early return for dinner.
In the evening the moon rose in the east, and it was a full moon. Song Jiang started off for a stroll accompanied by three confidential servants. There was a brilliant display of lanterns in the form of peonies, mimosas, and lotus flowers of all sizes cut out of paper. They visited the God of the Earth's temple, saw the imitation mountain with its illuminations, and then strolled off towards the south side of the town. They had only gone about 700 paces, when they came to a house with a big display of lanterns, and a big crowd of people outside the front gate. Gongs were sounding, and the crowd was applauding. Song Jiang saw that there was a masquerade inside the courtyard, but as he was of short stature the crowd in front obstructed his view. His companions however asked the people to make room, and so Song Jiang got a good view. The actors displayed awkward manners, and Song Jiang could not avoid laughing at the exhibition. Now it happened that the magistrate and his wife were inside the courtyard with some other women watching the show, and when Song Jiang laughed, Madame Liu looked in his direction, and at once recognized him. She pointed at Song Jiang and said to her husband, "That dwarf fellow who is laughing is the chief of the bandits who seized me on the Qingfeng Mountain." Magistrate Liu was surprised at this, and ordered about seven of his attendants to arrest the small man who was laughing at the gate. Song Jiang had however heard the order, and went away at once. He had not gone far, when the soldiers caught up to him, and seizing him took him inside the courtyard where they bound his arms with ropes. When his companions saw that he had been arrested they hurried off, and reported it to commander Hua Rong.
Magistrate Liu took his seat on the bench at once, and Song Jiang was brought in, and made to kneel.
"You are one of the bandits from Qingfeng Mountain," said Magistrate Liu. "But how dare you come here to look at the show of lanterns? Now that you have been captured what have you got to say?"
"I am a native of Yuncheng County," said Song Jiang. "My name is Zhang San, and I am a friend of Colonel Hua Rong. I have been here for several days, and I am not a bandit on the Qingfeng Mountain."
The magistrate's wife was standing behind a screen at the back of her husband, and when she heard this she came forward, and spoke to Song Jiang herself. "You cannot get out of it. Have you forgotten how I addressed you as the chief?"
"Lady, you are mistaken. At that time did I not tell you that I had been captured by the bandits, and could not leave the mountain?"
"If you were a traveler, and were captured, how could you leave the mountain and come here to look at the lanterns?" asked Magistrate Liu.
"When you were in your stronghold," interjected Madame Liu, "you sat on the middle chair, and had an ostentatious manner. When I addressed you as the chief you paid no attention at all."
"Lady," replied Song Jiang, "have you forgotten that I did my best, and obtained your release? Why do you now accuse me of being a bandit?"
Madame Liu was angry at this, and pointing at Song Jiang she cursed him, "You prevaricator! You will not admit it unless you are thrashed.'
The magistrate agreed to this, and at once gave orders for Song Jiang to be beaten with the split bamboo. This was done, and Song Jiang was severely beaten so that he was soon covered with blood. He was then bound with chains, ready to be conveyed in a prisoner's cart to the Prefectural Town under the name: "Zhang San, The Tiger, from Yuncheng County."
Colonel Hua Rong was upset when he got the report of the arrest of Song Jiang. He immediately wrote a note to his colleague Magistrate Liu, and sent a confidential servant with it. The letter was duly delivered and read by Magistrate Liu as follows: "I, Hua Rong, have a relative named Liu Zhang who arrived from Jizhou a few days ago. He went to see the lanterns, and may have offended you. I beg you, sir, forgive him and release him, and I will come to express my regrets in person. Moreover, I wish you to excuse me for this improvident note as no disrespect is intended."
Magistrate Liu was very angry upon reading this, and tore the letter into pieces. He said, "Colonel Hua Rong is entirely wrong. He is an official appointed by the court, and yet he associates with bandits, and also tries to deceive me. The prisoner said himself that his name was Zhang San and that he came from Yuncheng County, whereas this letter names him Liu Zhang, and says he came from Jizhou. But he will not deceive me. He thinks that I will be inclined to let the man go because he uses my name Liu." After saying this, he dismissed the messenger without an answer.
When Hua Rong heard of this, he was very much excited, and ordered his horse to be got ready. He changed his dress, and armed himself with a bow and arrows. He summoned about fifty soldiers armed with cudgels to accompany him and set out to visit his colleague. Upon reaching the yamen the guard at the gate saw that Hua Rong was very angry, and being afraid ran away. Hua Rong dismounted in front of the hall, and his soldiers drew up on both sides. He held a spear in his hand, and called out, "I request Magistrate Liu to come here, and speak with me."
Magistrate Liu hearing this, was panic-stricken. He was afraid to go outside to meet Hua Rong who was a military officer. Hua Rong waited a little time, and then he ordered his soldiers to search the buildings on both sides for Song Jiang. They soon found him tied to a beam, with both feet fastened with chains, and his legs showing traces of the beating he had had. The soldiers broke the chains, and released Song Jiang. After mounting his horse again, Hua Rong called out, "Magistrate Liu, what are you going to do? Where is there a family without some relatives? What is your idea in keeping my relative in your home and falsely accuse him of being a bandit? That is a great insult to me! I will talk to you tomorrow." He then departed with Song Jiang and his soldiers.
Magistrate Liu was very angry at this, and ordered two hundred soldiers to proceed to Hua Rong's quarters, and bring the prisoner back. The Drill Instructors in charge were skilled with the spear and sword, but were not the equal of Colonel Hua Rong. Although they did not like the job, yet they dared not decline to go.
The soldiers reached Hua Rong's yamen while it was still dark. They paraded in front of the gate, but no one dared to enter. They were all afraid of Hua Rong. Now as the day was breaking, they saw that the gates were open, and upon looking inside they could make out Hua Rong seated in the main hall. In his left hand, he held a bow, with an arrow in his right hand. He saw the soldiers standing outside the gate, and lifting the bow he shouted to them, "You soldiers are not concerned in this quarrel. I will settle it with Magistrate Liu himself. He sent you here, but you need not fight for him. You two Drill Instructors have been newly appointed, and you do not yet know my military skill. Today, I will give you a display of that, and afterwards if there is any man who wishes to fight with me he may enter without fear. I will now shoot an arrow at the cheek of the God drawn on the door." Thereupon he lifted the arrow to the string; stretched the bow to the full extent; called out "Go!" and the arrow flew and struck the drawing of the Door God in the exact spot as predicted. The soldiers were struck with awe.
Hua Rong took another arrow, and shouted out again, "Soldiers! Now watch an arrow hit the tassel on the helmet of the Door God on the right-hand side of the door." The arrow whistled through the air and struck the exact spot. The two arrows were still sticking in the leaves of the door, Hua Rong shouted again, "Soldiers! Now watch my third arrow strike the breast of your Drill Instructor who is dressed in white uniform." The man referred to, called out "Ai Ya!" and turning, ran away. Upon seeing this the soldiers took to flight likewise.
Hua Rong gave an order for the gates to be closed, and went to see Song Jiang in the room at the back. He said, "Elder brother, you have suffered too much owing to a fault on my part."
"It does not matter to me," said Song Jiang; "I am only afraid that he will not put up with you. We must devise some scheme to get out of this trouble."
"I no longer wish to be an official," said Hua Rong; "I must settle this dispute with that fellow."
"I did not expect that woman to return my generous act with enmity," said Song Jiang, "and she even asked her husband to beat me. I did think of giving my true name, but I did not do so because I was afraid that he would then remember the murder of Yan Poxi. I did not anticipate that Liu Gao would be so unreasonable as to arrest me, and put me in a prisoner's cart. He wanted to charge me with being the chief of the bandits so that I might be executed. If you had not rescued me, I should have been tongue-tied, and could not have said anything."
"I wrote your name as Liu," said Hua Rong, "because that was also his name, and as a scholar, he might let you go on that account. I never thought he turned out to have no feelings. Now that I have rescued you I will settle the dispute with him by and by."
"You are wrong," said Song Jiang. "Now owing to your influence, I was rescued. There is an ancient saying, 'When eating food, beware of choking; when going a journey beware of stumbling.' You rescued me by force, so he sent soldiers to arrest me again, and as that failed the matter cannot rest as it is. He will certainly report it to his superior. So this evening I must escape to Qingfeng Mountain, and remain in hiding there. You can pretend to have no knowledge of the event, and 'bury the case in a pigeonhole.' They have no proof if I escape now, and the higher official will ascribe the case to a petty personal quarrel between civil and military authorities."
"I am only a soldier," said Hua Rong, "and am without your farsightedness. I am afraid that you are so severely injured that you cannot walk far."
"Never mind that. As matters are urgent there can be no delay. I will walk slowly towards the bandits' retreat." He had his wounds dressed, left his things with Hua Rong, and set off at once.
When Magistrate Liu's soldiers returned he heard them report what a terrible fellow Hua Rong was and that nobody dared to go and face his arrows. Both the Drill Instructors also said, "Who did that would soon have a hole in his body. We are not keen on that."
Magistrate Liu was a civil official so he could consider things from other phases. He anticipated that Hua Rong would allow Song Jiang to escape to the mountain, and then come to discuss matters. "I have not sufficient evidence so that it will only end in a wrangle between us. Tonight I will dispatch about twenty soldiers to a place about two li on the road to the mountain, and keep a lookout there. If we succeed in capturing him he must be brought here secretly and imprisoned. Then I will report the matter to the Prefect, and ask him to send soldiers to take charge of both Song Jiang and Hua Rong. Then I shall have sole control of this county, with no more molestation from those fellows."
That evening he dispatched about twenty soldiers to lie in wait on the road. Two hours before midnight, the soldiers returned having arrested Song Jiang. Magistrate Liu was very pleased at the success of his plans, and said, "I was quite correct in my estimate of what he would do. Place him in the jail at the back of my quarters, and see that not a single person gets to know of this." That night, he wrote a dispatch, and sent it with two confidential servants to Qingzhou Prefecture.
The next day Hua Rong thought that Song Jiang would have arrived at the mountain stronghold and took no more care of Liu Gao.
The Prefect of Qingzhou was Murong Yanda, and his sister was a concubine of the Emperor Huizong. Relying on his sister's influence at the court he did outrageous things at Qingzhou Prefecture. He injured the people, and insulted his colleagues. On this day he had sat at an early court, and was just on the point of going to breakfast when the urgent messengers from Magistrate Liu arrived. He read the dispatch, and was surprised. He said, "Hua Rong is the son of a meritorious minister so how is it that he associates now with bandits? It is a very serious crime, but how can I know whether the charge is true or not?" He sent for Colonel Huang Xin who was highly skilled in military drill. He was in charge of the defenses of Qingzhou Prefecture, and had got the nickname of 'Supressor of Three Mountains.' These three mountains were in that prefecture, and were the Qingfeng Mountain, Lianglong Mountain, and Taohua Mountain. These three mountains were the resorts of bandits. He had boasted that he would capture all the bandits, and that was how he got his nickname.
Upon reaching the hall, the Prefect told him about the report, and gave him orders. Colonel Huang Xin put on his mailed coat, and took his sword; mounted a horse and set out at once with about fifty soldiers for Qingfeng Town. Upon arriving there, he was well received by Magistrate Liu who entertained him in his own private quarters. The prisoner Song Jiang was sent for so that Huang Xin should see him.
"I do not want to ask him any questions," said Huang Xin. "Have a cart prepared, and put the prisoner inside it." This was duly done, and Song Jiang had not said a word.
"Does Hua Rong know that you have arrested Song Jiang?" asked Huang Xin.
"He was arrested during the night," replied Magistrate Liu, "and has been kept secretly in prison since then. Hua Rong is at home, and thinks Song Jiang has got to the mountain."
"That makes our task easy," replied Huang Xin. "We must prepare a feast at the headquarters, and invite him to partake of it with us. We will lay around the hall an ambush of fifty soldiers. When he comes I will give a signal by throwing my wine cup on the floor, and the soldiers then come forth and seize him. What do you think of that plot?"
"That will do splendidly," replied Magistrate Liu. "It reminds me of catching a turtle in a jar."
The next day, the hall was prepared for feast, and tents were erected on both sides of the hall for the ambush. After breakfast Huang Xin mounted his horse, and accompanied by about three men went to visit Hua Rong. Upon the servant reporting the arrival of Huang Xin, Hua Rong asked what Huang Xin had come there for, and the servant replied that it was a friendly visit. Hua Rong went outside, saluted Huang Xin, and when they had taken their seats in the hall Hua Rong asked, "Upon what official business have you come to see me?"
"The Prefect ordered me to come to see you because he had heard that the relations between you and the civil administrator here were not amicable. So he told me to prepare a feast, and invite both of you to conciliate you."
"How can I dare to cheat Magistrate Liu?" asked Hua Rong. "He is my superior officer, but he has frequently tried to find fault with me. I never thought that the Prefect would know about it. How can I thank you for troubling to come all this distance?" Huang Xin leaned forward, and whispered to Hua Rong. "The Prefect is quite well aware that you are the better, and more useful man, and he thinks that the magistrate here is not up too much. It will be all right if you come along with me now."
"It is very kind of you to say that," said Hua Rong. "But before we go, let me offer you some wine."
"It would be better if we drink wine after you two have talked matters over."
Hua Rong agreed to this, and they both mounted their horses and went off. Upon reaching the headquarters they dismounted, and Huang Xin taking Hua Rong by the hand led him into the hall. Magistrate Liu was there waiting for them. Huang Xin ordered a servant to bring the wine. The servants outside had taken Hua Rong's horse to the stable, and had shut the gate of the yamen. Hua Rong had no suspicion of a plot, and trusted Huang Xin because he was also a military officer.
When the wine was served Huang Xin took a cup, and offering it to Magistrate Liu said, "The Prefect feels uneasy to hear that you two officials here do not see eye to eye, so he instructed me to come here as mediator. We must always understand that Imperial affairs are of the first importance, and discuss matters amicably."
"I have not much ability," said Magistrate Liu, "but I understand a little of the rules of propriety. It is my fault indeed, if I have given the prefect any cause for anxiety. We two have had no disputes, so somebody must have circulated false statements about us."
"Splendid!" said Colonel Huang Xin.
Magistrate Liu drank his wine, and Colonel Huang Xin then handed another cup of wine to Hua Rong, and said, "As Magistrate Liu says this there must be somebody that have made these false reports. In that case, please drink this wine."
Hua Rong took the wine, and drank it. Magistrate Liu then poured out some wine, and offered it to Huang Xin saying, "I am sorry to have troubled you to come so far to this our humble place. Please drink this wine."
Colonel Huang Xin took the cup, and looked around. Instantly several soldiers came to the hall. He threw the cup on the floor, and at once there arose a shout. Soldiers from all sides entered the hall, and arrested Hua Rong. Colonel Huang Xin ordered them to bind Hua Rong's hands, and the latter called out, "What is the charge against me?"
Colonel Huang Xin laughed, and said, "You need not shout! You have joined the bandits of Qingfeng Mountain to plot rebellion against the Imperial Court. You know what the charge will be. But because of our previous acquaintance, I will not implicate your family."
"But where is the proof of what you say?" asked Hua Rong.
"You shall see the proof," said Colonel Huang Xin. "I will not be unjust to you." Turning round, he ordered, "Bring the man here!" In a short time, a prisoner's cart was wheeled into the hall, and Hua Rong saw Song Jiang therein. Hua Rong was startled, and could not say another word.
"This has nothing to do with me," called out Huang Xin. "Magistrate Liu made the accusation against you."
"Never mind!" said Hua Rong. "This man is a relative of mine. He is a native of Yuncheng County. You accuse him of being a bandit, so he will answer that charge in the proper court where there will be discrimination."
"I am going to take you both to Qingzhou Prefecture," said Huang Xin, "and there the matter will be thoroughly gone into."
He then asked Magistrate Liu to provide an escort of a hundred soldiers. Hua Rong spoke to Colonel Huang Xin, "Colonel, you tricked me to come here and have me arrested but I may even at the Imperial Court have explanation about this matter. I must ask you to allow me to retain my military uniform while I am being conveyed in the prisoner's cart."
"I can easily agree to that," said Huang Xin. He then told Magistrate Liu that he also had to proceed to Qingzhou, and state his accusation there. The two then mounted their horses, set out for Qingzhou, accompanying the 2 prisoners in 2 captive carts, and with an escort of about 150 soldiers.

As you have prepared the bed,

You must lie on it contented.

This affair caused 100 houses to be burnt down and 2000 people to be killed in an armed conflict.

132

The Suppressor of the 3 Mountains fights a battle, Embroils, & Makes a Great Stir in the Qingzhou Prefecture road; the Thunderer comes to the field of desolation, Wanders in the Dark Amidst the Devastated Village, & Traverses a Field of Rubble

The mounted Huang Xin carried his lethal blade. Liu Gao, also on horseback and wearing armor, held a pitchfork in his hand. Their host of a hundred and fifty bore cudgels and staves and tassel-bedecked spears, and at their waists were swords and knives. Two rolls of the drums and a crash of the gongs, and the convoy guarding Song Jiang and Hua Rong left Fort Clear Winds and started towards the prefecture of Qingzhou.

Before they had gone forty li they saw ahead a large forest. As they neared a gap in the mountains, one of the advance guard—a soldier from the fort—pointed and exclaimed: "Men are watching us from among those trees!"

The entire procession immediately halted.

"Why have you stopped?" Huang Xin demanded, from his horse.

"People in that forest ahead are looking at us."

"So what! Keep going!"

They drew nearer the forest. Suddenly twenty or thirty gongs began crashing in unison. The fort soldiers, panic-stricken, turned to flee.

"Stand where you are!" barked Huang Xin. "Spread out." To Liu Gao he said: "Guard the cage carts!"

Liu was speechless with fright. He could only stammer to himself: "Heaven, save me from disaster. Aiyaya! I pledge a hundred thousand scriptures! Thirty prayer services! Only save me!" His face was like a ripe melon—alternately green and yellow.

Huang Xin was a military officer, and he wasn't lacking in courage. He beat his horse forward and looked. On four sides of the forest nearly five hundred bandits were arrayed in ranks. All were fierce-visaged stalwarts. Their heads were wrapped in red cloth, they wore padded tunics, with sharp swords at their waists and long spears in their hands. They had the company completely surrounded.

Three bold fellows bounded out of the woods, one in black, one in green, one in red. All wore head kerchiefs emblazoned with gold swastikas and had swords at their waists. They stood, halberds in hand, blocking the road. The man in the middle was Elegant Tiger Yan Shun. On his right was Stumpy Tiger Wang Ying, on his left was the Fair-Faced Gentleman Zheng Tianshou. They shouted at Huang Xin.

"All travellers must stop here and pay three thousand ounces of gold, or they can't go on!"

Huang Xin, from his horse, yelled back: "Where are your manners, knaves? You're talking to Suppressor of the Three Mountains!"

The three glared. "We don't care who you are! Unless you pay three thousand ounces of gold you can't get through!"

"I'm a prefectural commander on an official mission! I don't have to buy your permission to travel!"

The bold trio laughed. "The emperor himself couldn't pass here without paying three thousand ounces of gold! If you haven't got it, leave your prisoners as security. We'll return them to you when you bring the money!"

Huang Xin was furious. "How dare you scoundrels act so high and mighty!" He shouted for his drums and gongs to sound, clapped his horse, and charged directly at Yan Shun, waving his sword.

All three bandit leaders raised their halberds and engaged Huang Xin. The commander, on horseback, fought them valiantly a dozen rounds, but three against one were too many. Liu Gao, trembling, was unable to move forward. Seeing the pickle Huang Xin was in, Liu got ready to run. Huang was afraid he'd be taken by the trio and that his reputation would be ruined. He pulled his horse around and returned at a gallop, pursued by the three halberd-wielding chieftains. Huang Xin had no time to consider the unit under his command. On flying steed he raced back alone to Clear Winds Town.

At this, his soldiers cried out in dismay. They abandoned the cage carts and scattered. Liu Gao desperately yanked at his horse's bridle and flailed three times with his whip. The animal broke into a run, but a trip-rope across the road quickly brought horse and rider tumbling down. A swarm of bandits seized Liu and captured the cage carts. Hua Rong, who had already pried his cage open, jumped out and snapped his bonds. He broke open the other cart and rescued Song Jiang. Several of the bandits grabbed Liu Gao and tied his hands behind his back. They also caught his horse and three or four other mounts. They stripped Liu of his garments and gave them to Song Jiang, who was naked. The captured horses were first led up the mountain, then the three chieftains and Hua Rong and some bandits escorted the bound and stripped Liu Gao back to the stronghold.

Not having had any news of Song Jiang for some time, the three chieftains had sent a few competent scouts into Clear Winds Town to inquire. "Commander Huang Xin threw down his cup as a signal," they were told, and had Hua Rong and Song Jiang arrested. They're both in cage carts, "and will be taken to Qingzhou."

This was reported to the three chieftains, who came down with their men. They made a wide flanking sweep and were waiting on the road when the soldier convoy arrived. The small paths were covered as well. As a result Hua Rong and Song Jiang were saved and Liu Gao captured. All now returned to the mountain lair.

That night at the second watch hosts and guests gathered in Righteousness Hall. After Song Jiang and Hua Rong were seated in the middle, the three chieftains sat down opposite and prepared to serve them with food and drink.

"Boys," Yan Shun called to his men, "drink and be merry!"

Hua Rong thanked the brave trio. "You've saved the lives of my brother and me and avenged our wrongs! We can never repay you! My only worry is my wife and younger sister. They're still in Fort Clear Winds. Huang Xin is sure to seize them. How can they be rescued?"

"Don't worry, Commandant," said Yan Shun. "I doubt whether Huang Xin will dare to take your lady. Even if he does, he'll have to pass here on his return to the prefecture. Tomorrow my two brothers and I will go down the mountain and bring your lady and sister here to you." He ordered a scout to slip into town first and investigate.

"I'm very grateful," said Hua Rong.

"And now bring that varlet Liu Gao to me," said Song Jiang.

"He's tied to the main pillar," said Yan Shun. "We'll cut out his heart and present to you as a gift!"

"I want to slice him open personally!" said Hua Rong.

"Knave," cried Song Jiang, "there was never any enmity between us! Why did you listen to your wicked wife and injure me? Now we've caught you! What have you got to say?"

"What's the use of talking?" exclaimed Hua Rong. He plunged a knife into Liu's chest and carved, then placed the man's heart before Song Jiang. Bandits dragged the corpse to one side.

"We've killed this dirty beast, but his whore of a wife is still alive," said Song Jiang. "Our vengeance hasn't yet been satisfied!"

"Set your mind at ease, brother," said Wang the Stumpy Tiger. "When I go down tomorrow, I'll capture his woman. This time I'll keep her for myself."

Everybody laughed. They feasted that night, then all retired. The next morning they rose and discussed their attack on Fort Clear Winds.

"The boys had a hard day, yesterday," said Yan Shun. "We'll let them rest, today. Tomorrow morning, we'll go down. That will be time enough."

"You're right," said Song Jiang. "The men and horses must regain their strength. We mustn't be too hasty."

When Huang Xin reached Clear Winds he hurried to the fort, mustered soldiers and mounts and posted a tight guard at each of the four gates. Then he wrote a dispatch and ordered two officers to deliver it at flying speed to Prefect Murong.

The prefect, on receiving reports from Clear Winds and learning of the emergency, summoned his court that same night. He was greatly alarmed when he read Huang Xin's dispatch. It said: "Hua Rong has rebelled and is involved with bandits on Clear Winds Mountain. There's no guarantee the fort can stand. The situation is critical. First-rate generals must be sent immediately to hold the territory!"

He summoned General Qin, commander of all the armed forces in the prefecture, to come at once for an urgent military conference. Qin, whose given name was Ming, was from Kaizhou on the other side of the mountains. Because of his irascible temper and booming voice he was known as Thunderbolt. Qin was descended from a long line of military men. His weapon was a wolf-toothed mace, and when he plunged into battle, ten thousand men couldn't withstand him.

Qin presented himself before the prefect and the two exchanged courtesies. Murong showed him Huang Xin's dispatch.

"Those brigands have got their nerve," growled Qin Ming. "Have no fears, Your Excellency. I'll get my forces ready. If I don't take those bandits I swear you'll never see me again!"

"Move quickly. They're liable to attack Fort Clear Winds."

"There will be no delay. I'll muster my men tonight. We'll leave first thing in the morning."

Pleased, the prefect directed that wine and meat and dry rations be prepared and kept in waiting outside the city for the troops on their departure. Qin Ming was enraged to learn that Hua Rong had rebelled. He mounted and rode back to headquarters. There he mustered a hundred cavalrymen and four hundred foot soldiers. He ordered them to assemble outside the city and get ready to march.

In a monastery courtyard in the outskirts the next day, Murong had muffins steamed, large bowls laid out, and wine heated. Each soldier was to be given three bowls of wine, two muffins and one catty of cooked meat. Everything was in readiness when the detachment was seen emerging from the city. On a crimson banner in the lead were the words: General Qin, Commander of Infantry and Cavalry.

Qin Ming in his armor was indeed a splendid sight. When he saw Murong waiting to encourage the troops, he ordered a soldier to hold his weapons, dismounted and went forward to be received by the prefect. Courtesies were exchanged, and Murong faced the general, wine cup in hand.

"May all go well and you return victorious!"

Food and drink were dispensed among the troops, a signal cannon was fired. Qin Ming took his leave of the prefect, and vaulted into the saddle. He spread his forces in march formation. Bearing halberds and hatchets, they headed for Fort Clear Winds. The town of Clear Winds was southeast of Qingzhou, but it was quicker to go directly south and skirt around Clear Winds Mountain. Soon they were north of the mountain on a small road.

Bandit scouts reported their advance. The brigand chieftains had been getting ready to attack Fort Clear Winds when they heard the news: "Qin Ming is leading a force of men and horses this way!" They exchanged frightened glances.

"Don't be alarmed," said Hua Rong. "As the old saying goes: 'When the enemy approach swiftly, they must be stopped in their tracks.' Give the men food and drink, and do what I say. We'll use force first, then guile." He softly outlined his idea. "How does that strike you?"

"Excellent," said Song Jiang. "Exactly the way to do it!"

He and Hua Rong worked out the details, then each bandit went to prepare for his own particular task. Hua Rong selected a good horse and armor, and got his bow, arrows and iron spear in readiness.

Qin Ming and his men pitched camp for the night ten li from the foot of the mountain. They rose at dawn the next day and had breakfast. A signal cannon was fired, and the march quickly resumed. The general chose a broad open area and deployed his forces in battle positions. Then he sounded his drums.

A thunderous crash of gongs responded from the mountain, and a brigand troop came rapidly down the slope. Qin Ming reined his mount and glared, wolf-toothed mace athwart his body. Surrounded by a horde of bandits was Hua Rong. Gongs crashed again when they got to the foot of the slope and arrayed themselves in battle formation. Iron spear in hand, Hua Rong, from his horse, hailed the general respectfully.

"Hua Rong," Qin Ming shouted, "your family have been military commanders for generations, appointed officers of the imperial court. You were made commandant of the fort, put in control of a large area, and were paid and supported by the government. When were you given less than your due? But now you're consorting with brigands and rebelling against the court! I've been sent to arrest you! If you're wise, you'll get off your horse and submit! Don't make me bloody my hands and soil my feet!"

"Hear me, General," said Hua Rong with an apologetic smile. "I never wanted to rebel against the imperial court. It was all the doing of that scoundrel Liu Gao—making something out of nothing, using his official position for private revenge, forcing me to turn my back on home and country and take refuge here! I hope you will investigate, General, and straighten this out!"

"Dismount and be bound! What are you waiting for? Your fancy words are only meant to deceive my soldiers!" Qin Ming shouted for his drums left and right to thunder. Flourishing his wolf-toothed mace, he charged.

Hua Rong laughed. "A good man makes allowances for you, and you don't even know it. Just because I addressed you politely as a superior officer you thought I was afraid of you!" With levelled spear he spurred his horse forward.

The two men fought for nearly fifty rounds, neither vanquishing the other. Hua Rong executed a feint, wheeled his mount around and rode toward his bandits at the foot of the mountain. Qin Ming pursued furiously. Hua Rong rested his spear in his saddle rings, and reined in his horse. He fitted an arrow to his bow, pulled the string taut, then twisted around and let fly. The arrow neatly sheared the big red tassel from the top of the general's helmet, to give him a hint.

Startled, Qin Ming abruptly checked his mount. By the time he recovered himself enough to resume the chase, the bandits had all noisily swarmed back up the mountain. Hua Rong, on another path, also returned to the stronghold.

Qin Ming was enraged. "That dirty bandit is very rude!" he thought. He shouted for the drums and gongs to sound, and followed up the slope.

Yelling, the troops, climbed behind him, with the infantry in the lead. They crossed two or three crests when suddenly, from the cliffs above, they were deluged with logs, rocks, bottles of lime and molten metal. The advance guard, unable to get away, suffered forty to fifty losses. The remainder were forced to retreat.

Very angry, Qin Ming led his horse down the slope and sought another path to the top. He was still searching at noon when, on the west side of the mountain, gongs crashed and a band of men bearing red flags sprang out from among the trees. Qin Ming immediately led his troops in a charge. But the gongs fell silent and the red flags disappeared. And the road on which his adversaries had come was not a true road at all, but only a few wood-cutters' paths, and even these were blocked with felled criss-crossed trees.

The general was about to have them cleared when a soldier reported: "Gongs on the east side of the mountain and a force coming with red flags!"

At the head of his men, Qin Ming galloped to the eastern slope. The gongs had ceased and the red flags were gone. The general looked everywhere for a path up the mountain. But all the trails were blocked with trees and brushwood.

Another scout reported: "Gongs on the western slope! And men with red flags again!"

Qin Ming clapped his mount and raced to the scene. The men had vanished, and so had their flags.

The general ground his teeth almost to powder. He was fuming with rage. Again the pounding of gongs shook the earth in the east. Again Qin Ming charged east with his detachment. And again there was not a bandit or red flag to be seen.

His chest swelling with fury, the general decided to send scouts up to seek a path. A clamor once more arose in the west. Qin Ming's anger spurted to the heavens. With his entire force he rushed westward. But nowhere on the mountain, above or below, could they see a single bandit. Qin Ming shouted for his men to find paths on both sides and start up.

"None of these are real paths," one of the soldiers explained. "But on the southeast side there's a good road that goes to the top. We'd have serious casualties if we tried to climb here."

"Since there's a road, we must reach it tonight." Qin Ming marched rapidly southeast with his infantry and cavalry.

The light was beginning to fade, and men and horses were tired. Everyone was longing to reach their destination, where they could pitch camp and eat. But then on the mountain they saw torches dancing, and gongs wildly crashed. Qin Ming turned angrily and went up with a cavalry troop of fifty. They were met by a shower of arrows from among the trees. Several soldiers were wounded. The general had no choice but to lead his troop down again.

He directed his men to eat a meal, and not bother about anything else.

Just as they lit their fires, eighty or ninety bandits carrying torches came marching down the mountain, whistling shrilly. Qin Ming hastily went after them. The torches were extinguished. Although there was a moon, it was obscured by clouds, and its glow was dim.

Qin Ming lost all control of his temper. He ordered his soldiers to light torches and set fire to the woods. Through the mountain gap the strains of flute and drum drifted down. Qin Ming ran his horse up and looked. In the light of a dozen torches he saw Hua Rong and Song Jiang on a summit drinking wine. The general, unable to get at them, could only rein in his mount and curse.

Hua Rong laughed. "Calm yourself, General. Go back and rest. Tomorrow, you and I will battle to the death!"

"Rebellious brigand, come down! I'll fight you three hundred rounds right now!"

"You're weary, General. Defeating you today would be too easy. Come back tomorrow."

Qin Ming was mad with rage. He wanted to find a path up, yet he feared Hua Rong's skill with a bow. He could only curse impotently. Suddenly he heard a clamor among his troops below. Hurriedly, he rode down. Fiery cannon-balls and flaming arrows were winging into them from the opposite slope. Twenty or thirty bandits were shooting at them from the shadows behind. Soldiers yelled, horses whinnied, and all crowded into a deep ravine for shelter.

By then it was nearly midnight, and the troops were groaning bitterly. Suddenly they were engulfed in a torrent of water, which came sweeping down, and they struggled for their lives. As they were crawling out, they were hooked by barbed poles and hauled up the mountain. Those who were unable to escape the water drowned in the rushing stream.

Qin Ming's brain was bursting with rage. He noticed a side path and urged his steed up. Before he had travelled fifty paces, horse and rider fell into a pit. Fifty brigands, who had been hiding in ambush, hooked him with their poles and hauled him out. They stripped him of his armor, clothes and helmet, bound him with ropes, retrieved the horse, and led their prizes up the slope.

The entire operation had been planned by Hua Rong and Song Jiang.

First they had the bandits keep Qin Ming running back and forth, east and west, till men and mounts were exhausted and didn't know what to do. Next, they dammed two brooks with sacks of earth. Late at night, when the soldiers and horses were forced to take shelter in the ravine, they released the pent-up waters and finished them off. More than half of Qin Ming's five hundred men were drowned in this manner. A hundred and sixty or seventy of the remainder were captured, along with seventy or eighty good horses. Not a single soldier got away. Finally, they trapped Qin Ming and his steed in the pit.

By the time bandits brought Qin Ming to the stronghold, it was already light. Five bold warriors, seated in Righteousness Hall, saw the men lead up the bound captive and detain him within the entry. Hua Rong left his armchair, hurried over, untied Qin Ming, supported him into the hall, then dropped to his knees and kowtowed. The general at once returned the courtesy.

"I am your prisoner, a man you can pulverize to death," he said. "Why do you greet me so respectfully?"

Hua Rong, still kneeling, replied: "Our men didn't recognize you and discomfited you by mistake! Please forgive us!" He presented Qin Ming with garments of silk and satin, and the general put them on.

"Who are these gallant leaders?" Qin Ming asked.

"This is my blood-brother Song Jiang, formerly clerk of Yuncheng County. These three are the chieftains here: Yan Shun, Wang Ying and Zheng Tianshou."

"I have heard of these three, of course. And isn't County Clerk Song known in Shandong Province as Song Jiang the Timely Rain?"

"That is my humble name," said Song Jiang.
Qin Ming hastily kowtowed. "I've long known your fame. I never thought I'd have the honor of meeting you today!"
Song Jiang at once returned the courtesy. Qin Ming noticed that he moved his legs awkwardly.
"Is there something wrong with your legs?" the general queried.
Song Jiang told him of his adventures from the time he left Yuncheng until Liu Gao had him beaten. Qin Ming shook his head.
"We heard only one side of the story and made a lot of mistakes. Let me go back and tell Prefect Murong about this."
Yan Shun begged that he stay with them a few days, and ordered that sheep and horses be slaughtered and a feast be laid. The captured soldiers were concealed in buildings on the rear of the mountain, but they too were given food and wine. After the general had downed a few cups, he rose to his feet.
"Since you are good enough not to kill me, sirs, return my armor, horse and weapons, and let me go back to the prefecture."
"You would be wrong to do that, General," said Yan Shun. "You've lost all of your five hundred men. How can you return? Prefect Murong would surely condemn you as a criminal. Better to remain in our crude mountain fortress for a while. Although it's beneath your talents, why not stay on with us permanently? Gold and silver we share and share alike, and we give clothing in complete sets. Wouldn't that be preferable to being persecuted by the big-hat officials?"
Qin Ming walked to the entry of the hall. "I was born a man of the great Song empire, and I shall serve it as a ghost when I die. The court commissioned me a general and gave me the rank of Commander of Infantry and Cavalry. They've treated me very well. How can I rebel and become a brigand? Kill me and be done with it!"
Hua Rong hurried after him and took his arm. "Don't be angry, brother. Please listen to me. I am the son of a high court official myself. But I had no choice. I was forced into this. If you're not willing, we wouldn't dream of insisting. Please be seated. When the meal is over I will get your armor, helmet, horse and weapons and return them to you."
Qin Ming still held back, and Hua Rong continued to exhort him. "You've expended strength and spirit a whole day and night, General. You must be exhausted. And how will your horse be able to travel unless it is fed?"
"That's true," thought Qin Ming. He went back into the hall and resumed his seat. The five bold gallants apologized to him and toasted him by turns.
The general was indeed weary, and his hosts' considerate treatment softened his reluctance. So he relaxed and drank until he was bleary. Then he was helped into bed and he slept. The others went about their various affairs. Of that we'll say no more.
Qin Ming slept right through till mid-morning the following day. He jumped out of bed, washed, rinsed his mouth, and announced he was leaving. "Wait until after breakfast," his hosts urged, "and we'll see you off down the mountain." But the impetuous Qin Ming insisted on departing at once. Food and wine were hastily served. The general dressed in his helmet and armor. His horse was led out and his wolf-toothed mace brought. Men were sent on ahead to attend him below.
The five bold gallants saw him off down the mountain and bid him farewell. Qin Ming's horse and weapons were returned. He mounted and, holding his wolf-toothed mace, left Clear Winds Mountain and set out rapidly for Qingzhou in the broad light of day.
When he was about ten li from the town—it was then late morning—he saw much smoke in the distance, but no travellers on the road. A strong suspicion rose in his mind. Soon he reached the outskirts of the town. Here, what was formerly a community of hundreds of families had been completely burned out. Everywhere were disorderly heaps of tiles and rubble. Scorched bodies of men and women lay without number.
Shocked, Qin Ming raced his horse across the debris to the town wall and shouted for the guards to open the gates. The bridge over the moat was up, and the top of the wall was lined with soldiers, flags, log sections and ballista stones. The general reined in his steed.
"Lower the bridge," he shouted. "Let me in!"
The men on the wall had seen him coming from afar. Now they beat the drums and yelled. "I am commander Qin Ming! Why don't you let me in?"
Prefect Murong appeared on the battlements. "Rebellious brigand," he cried. "Have you no shame! You came last night with men and attacked the town! You slaughtered many innocent people and burned scores of homes! And today you try to trick us into opening the gates.' The imperial court treated you very well, but you have behaved outrageously, you scoundrel! I have already reported you to the court. Sooner or later we'll catch you and pound you to bits!"
"You're mistaken, Your Excellency! My forces were defeated and I was taken up the mountain by those rascally bandits. I've only just got away from them. How could I have attacked the town last night?"
"Don't I know your horse, armor, weapons and helmet? Everyone on the wall clearly saw you directing red-turbaned bandits in murder and arson! You can't deny it. If you were defeated and captured, how is it that not a single one of your five hundred soldiers came back and reported? You'd like to beguile us into opening the gates so that you can get your family out? We executed your wife this morning! If you don't believe me, look at this!"
A soldier held out a spear. Dangling from the end of it was the head of Qin Ming's wife. The general was an emotional man. Rage filled his chest. Speechless, he could only bitterly lament. Arrows rained down on him from the wall. He had to withdraw. He gazed at the fire-gutted homes. In some places wood was still burning.
As Qin Ming rode through the rabble he seriously considered killing himself. But after thinking a long time, he let his horse wander back along the road on which he had come. Before he had gone ten li he saw a band of mounted men riding towards him from a grove. The five bold fellows in the lead were none other than Song Jiang, Hua Rong, Yan Shun, Wang Ying, and Zheng Tianshou. They were followed by nearly two hundred bandits. Song Jiang bowed in the saddle.
"Didn't you return to Qingzhou, Commander? Where are you going, out here alone?"
"Some villain rejected by Heaven and Earth—who deserves to be cut to pieces!—disguised himself as me, attacked the town, levelled homes and slaughtered the people! As a result my whole family was executed, and I have nowhere to go! If I could find that rogue I'd pound him till my wolf-toothed mace broke to pieces!"
"Calm yourself, General! I have a suggestion, but this isn't a good place to talk. Please come to our stronghold and we'll confer there. If you permit us, we'll go now."
Qin Ming had no choice but to acquiesce, and all rode to Clear Winds Mountain.
During the journey, no one spoke. They dismounted at the pavilion outside the gates of the lair and entered on foot. Bandits had already laid out wine and tidbits in Righteousness Hall. The five gallant men invited Qin Ming in and asked him to be seated in the middle. Then they knelt before him. The general hastily returned the courtesy. Song Jiang spoke first.
"We hope you won't blame us, General. Yesterday, we tried in vain to convince you to remain with us, but you were determined to leave, and so I thought of a plan. I had one of our men put on your armor and helmet, take your wolf-toothed mace, and ride your horse to Qingzhou Town with a band in red turbans and kill many people. Yan Shun and Stumpy Tiger Wang went with reinforcements of another fifty, and made it appear that you were trying to bring out your family. We committed all this murder and arson to compel you to give up any hope of ever going back. Today, we present ourselves before you for punishment."
Qin Ming was furious. He longed to throw himself on Song Jiang. But then he realized that, first, this had been fated. Second, he had been put at a disadvantage by their abject courtesy. And third, he couldn't vanquish them single-handed anyway. He was forced to swallow his rage.
"You meant well, brothers," he conceded, "but you injured me grievously! You caused my whole family to be killed!"
"If we hadn't acted the way we did, would you have given up the idea of returning?" said Song Jiang. "Hua Rong has a younger sister who would make you a fine wife. She's virtuous and clever. I would be delighted to sponsor the match and provide all your household furnishings. What do you say?"
This love and respect touched the general's heart, and he agreed. Everyone insisted that Song Jiang sit in the center, with Qin Ming, Hua Rong and the other three bold fellows occupying seats of lesser rank. Heartily, they ate and drank, and discussed the forthcoming attack on Fort Clear Winds.
"That's easy," said Qin Ming. "You brothers don't have to worry. Huang Xin was under my command. Whatever he knows about arms, I taught him. What's more, we're on excellent terms. Tomorrow I'll go to the fort, get them to open the gate, talk privately with Huang Xin, and persuade him to join us. I'll bring out Hua Rong's family, capture Liu Gao's termagant wife, and avenge the hurts you have suffered. This will be my entrance gift. How does that strike you?"
"We are privileged to have so generous a man as a colleague," exclaimed Song Jiang.
When the feast was over, all retired. They rose early the following morning, breakfasted, and made ready. Qin Ming mounted and went down the slope. Wolf-toothed mace in hand, he raced to Clear Winds.
From the day he arrived in the town Huang Xin mobilized the soldiers and the people, kept the forces in the fort on continuous alert, and closely guarded the gates. But he dared not go forth to give battle. Though he frequently sent emissaries to Qingzhou to inquire, the prefecture show no sign of sending him any reinforcements.
Now, a man came in and reported: "Commander Qin Ming is here, alone, on horseback. He wants us to open the gate and let him in."
Huang Xin mounted and galloped to the portal. Sure enough, there was only a single rider. Huang Xin ordered his men to open the gate and lower the drawbridge. He welcomed the general, rode with him to the main hall and invited him in. Both dismounted, entered the hall and exchanged courtesies.
"What brings you here, alone, General?" asked Huang Xin.
Qin Ming told how he had lost his men and horses, then said: "Song Jiang the Timely Rain from Shandong is generous and chivalrous. He befriends every good fellow under the sun and is respected by all. Today, he is on Clear Winds Mountain, where I have joined their band. You have no wife and family. If you heed my advice, you'll join up too. It's better than forever taking abuse from civilian officials."
"Since you are there, Excellency, how can I refuse? I never heard that Timely Rain is on the mountain. How did he get there?"
Qin Ming laughed. "He's the 'Zhang San' of Yuncheng you were escorting to the prefecture the other day. He was afraid to give his real name because of another case he's involved in. So he called himself Zhang San."
Huang Xin stamped his foot. "Had I known he was Song Jiang, I'd have let him go on the road! I didn't recognize him and heard only Liu Gao's version of the story. I nearly caused his death!"
While the 2 were conferring in the hall, a soldier entered. "Two columns of foot soldiers and cavalry beating drums and gongs are advancing swiftly on the town!" Qin Ming and Huang Xin mounted and rode out to confront the foe. At the gate, they saw beneath a huge cloud of dust that blocked the sun an approaching host whose fierce aura obscured the heavens. 2 columns of troops were closing in on the town. 4 gallant men had come down from the mountain. How did Qin Ming and Huang Xin meet the foe?

So there was General Huang Xin, the Tamer, on horseback, sword in hand, and Governor Liu riding beside him, dressed in armour and bearing a trident, together with an escort of one hundred and fifty or so seasoned troops armed with tasselled spears or staves, and short swords stuck in their belts. A double roll of the drums, a clash of cymbals, and they were off on their mission to deliver Song Jiang and Colonel Hua to Qingzhou.
They had not travelled much over ten miles from Windy Fort when they were confronted by a forest. They had reached a defile through the mountains, and the guards pointing ahead said: "There are lookouts among the trees," and refused to go on.
"Why have you stopped?" the Tamer asked, looking down from his horse.
"There's men concealed in the forest there, watching," he was told.
"Pay no attention to them, just keep going," the Tamer ordered.
But as they were about to enter the forest, dong! dong! — twenty or thirty big gongs sounded all together. The troops began to panic, they were on the point of fleeing.
"Stop!" the Tamer ordered. "I want you to spread out!" To Governor Liu he shouted: "Guard the prison carts!"
Liu was too terrified to make an answer. "Heaven help us, heaven preserve us!" was all he could get out, together with mumbled promises to pay for a thousand copies of the classics and endow three hundred temples, if only heaven would spare him. Terror had turned him part green and part yellow, like a ripe melon.
The Tamer, however, was a real soldier, by no means devoid of courage. He spurred his horse forward to investigate: hundreds of enemy troops were pouring out of the forest on all sides, each one tall and strong, all with fierce expressions and blazing eyes, their heads bound with red cloths, all wearing padded robes, with swords in their belts and long spears in their hands. In no time at all they had surrounded the convoy. Three heroes now leapt out of the forest. One wore black, one green and one red. Each had a head scarf emblazoned with a gold swastika and carried sword and halberd. There they stood, blocking the way. The one in the middle was Yan Shun, the Dandy; Short-Arse Wang was in the lead; and bringing up the rear was Whitey Zheng Tianshou.
They now cried in unison: "Travellers must halt here and pay the toll of three thousand ounces of gold, before they are allowed to proceed."
"You villains!" the Tamer shouted down at them. "This is intolerable! Can't you see the Tamer of Three Mountains is here?"
All three glared at him. "Oh that's who you are, is it?" they said. "But you still have to pay the toll, otherwise you're not allowed to pass."
"I bear the Emperor's commission and I am travelling with a prisoner, what's this nonsense about a toll?"
"Who cares about your Emperor's commission? If you were the Emperor himself riding in state you'd still need the gold. If you haven't got it, you can leave your prisoners here as a gage while you go and fetch it."
"You scum! How dare you!" shouted the enraged Tamer, and ordered the drums to be beaten and the gongs sounded. Then he slapped his horse and brandishing his sword charged the Dandy. Acting as one, the three heroes levelled their halberds and attacked the Tamer. Since all three of them came at him at once, the Tamer needed all his strength and energy just to fight ten bouts. What chance had he of prevailing against the three of them? As for Liu Gao, he was a civilian and he had no thought of joining in. Given the strength of the opposition, his one idea was to flee. The Tamer now began to fear he would be taken, to his eternal dishonour. He was obliged to turn his horse and gallo back the way he had come, while the three chiefs pursued him, halberds levelled.
Mindless now of his troops, the Tamer galloped right back into Windy City. When the troops saw the Tamer turn his horse, they let out a great cry, abandoned the prison carts and fled in all directions. Only Liu Gao remained. Seeing the situation had turned so ugly, he frantically pulled his horse's head round and gave it three blows with his whip. The horse broke into a gallop but immediately ran into a trip-wire and came crashing down. The enemy rushed forward and seized Liu Gao. They also captured the prison carts.
Colonel Hua had quickly broken out of his prison cart and snapped his bonds. He then smashed the other cart and rescued Song Jiang. Some of the troops held Liu Gao while others caught his horse and three other horses that had been pulling the carts. They stripped Liu Gao and gave his clothes to Song Jiang, and sent the horses on ahead to the mountain. The three heroes, together with Colonel Hua and the troops, carried the bound and naked Liu Gao back to the mountain retreat.
The way all this came about was like this: the three heroes, in the absence of any news from Song Jiang, had sent some of their men down the mountain to reconnoitre in Windy City, where they heard people saying: "The Tamer threw his cup on the floor as a signal and Colonel Hua and Song Jiang were seized, flung into a prison cart and bundled off to Qingzhou." It was this news that caused the three to muster their troops and march in a flanking movement to block the main road ahead of the party, whilst posting scouts along all secondary routes. By these means they came to rescue our two friends, capture Liu Gao and return with them all to the mountain.
It was evening when they reached the mountain retreat, after nine o'clock. They all went to the assembly hall. Colonel Hua and Song Jiang were asked to join the company and the three hosts feasted them, pressing food and wine upon them most liberally. The Dandy ordered wine for all the troops. Colonel Hua expressed his gratitude to his rescuers: "You have saved our lives and repaired the injustice done to us. Song Jiang and I will never be able to repay you for this. One problem remains: I still have my wife and younger sister in Windy City, and the Tamer is sure to seize them. How can we rescue them?"
The Dandy said: "Don't worry, Colonel, I don't imagine the Tamer will dare to touch your wife; if he does, she will probably be brought along this road. Tomorrow we'll go down and get your wife and sister back for you." He sent men down at once to reconnoitre.
"I am deeply obliged to you," said Colonel Hua.
Song Jiang now said: "Bring me that scoundrel, Liu Gao."
"Tie him to the pillar," the Dandy said. "We'll cut out his heart and liver for your gratification."
"I'll do it with my own hands," Colonel Hua said.
"You bastard!" Song Jiang said to Liu Gao. "I never did you any harm or gave you cause to hate me, why did you listen to that bitch's slanders? Now we've got you, what have you to say for yourself?"
"No point in asking." Colonel Hua said, and plunging his knife into Liu Gao's breast ripped out his heart and presented it to Song Jiang. The soldiers cleared away the corpse.
"Well, this piece of filth is dead now," said Song Jiang, "but that bloody wife of his lives on, that's one score still unsettled."
"Don't you worry about that," said Short-Arse. "I'll go and get her myself tomorrow. This time she has to be mine." Everyone laughed.
They went on drinking, and in the end all retired to rest. When they rose next day, they discussed how to attack Windy Fort. The Dandy said: "The men had a tough time yesterday. Today they'd better rest. It'll be time enough if we go tomorrow."
"That's reasonable," said Song Jiang. "Men and horses need rest to regain their strength, there's no point in rushing things."
We shall now leave them to their preparations in the mountain retreat, and join the Tamer. After he galloped back to the barracks in Windy City, he immediately reinforced the guards at the four gates. Then he composed a report and told the two instructors to ride post haste and deliver it to Governor Mu-Rong.
Hearing that urgent news of a military crisis had come, the Governor went into session at once. This is what he read in the Tamer's report: "Colonel Hua is a traitor, he has joined the Qingzhou bandits. At this moment Windy City is indefensible, the situation is desperate, please send a competent general at once to secure the place." Horrified, the Governor sent for General Qin, divisional commander of Qingzhou, to come at once to discuss the military situation.
This General Qin was a native of Kaizhou beyond the mountains. His given name was Ming, but because of his volatile temper and his raucous voice people called him Thunderclap. He was from a long line of famous warriors, and his weapon was a wolf-tooth mace, which he wielded with irresistible ferocity. On receiving the Governor's summons, he hurried to the government office. Respectful greetings completed, the Governor handed him the Tamer's report and bade him read it.
"Those bandits are getting too confident by far," the General said, "but don't you worry, I'll raise a force immediately and I promise I'll capture the buggers, or else never see you again!"
"If you delay, General," the Governor said, "I'm afraid Windy Fort will fall."
"Who'd think of delaying in a situation like this?" the General said. "I shall raise an army at once and in a few days' time we'll be off."
The grateful Governor ordered wine and food and dry provisions to be taken to the city boundary for the troops.
The news that Hua Rong was a turncoat had enraged General Qin Ming. He mounted his horse and galloped round to his headquarters where he mustered a force of a hundred cavalry and four hundred foot and ordered them to parade outside the city, prior to embarking on the campaign. Meanwhile Governor Mu-Rong had some bread made in a temple garden outside the city; big bowls were also laid out and a quantity of wine warmed. Each man got three bowls of wine, two rolls and a slice of meat. It was all just ready when the troops began marching out of the city. Here they came in their neat ranks:
The banners and pennants dance like flames, the pikes and lances are thick as a field of hemp. Divided into ranks of eight, the column advances like a great snake, sufficient indeed to instil fear in the heart of god or demon. Dark green or fiery red are the tassels on their weapons, embroidered in rich hues the standards that they bear. A tumult of horses' hooves approaching and receding — the whole world seems threatened; to which side will victory belong?
It was still early in the day when General Qin Ming paraded his troops and led them forth from the city in orderly ranks, under a red banner which bore the words "General Qin Ming, commander in chief." Governor Mu-Rong watched Thunderclap riding out in full battle array and indeed it was a glorious sight:
A fluttering flame is the plume on his helm,
His surcoat's the reddest you'll find in the realm;
His linked armour glitters like stars in the sky,

His boots are dark green, like the mountains so high.
An avenging Fury, he straddles his mount,
The flash of his breastplate's like cash beyond count.
His cudgel is cruel but prettily made,
When angry his eyes seem to start from his head;
His character's sudden as thunder in spring.
This is the picture of General Qin Ming.
Well, as Thunderclap rode out from the city, he found Governor Mu-Rong waiting beyond the city wall to reward the troops. He quickly handed his arms to a soldier and dismounted to speak with the Governor. After an exchange of courtesies, the Governor took a cup and spoke some words of encouragement to the General: "Make sure you turn the situation to good advantage and come back quickly, singing a song of victory!"
When the troops had been treated, a signal gun was fired and Thunderclap bade the Governor farewell. He sprang into the saddle, the ranks formed up and at his command, shouldering their weapons, they marched on Windy Fort.
Now Windy Fort lay south-east of Qingzhou, but to go due south, skirting round the side of Windy Mountain, was deemed quicker. Before long they were travelling along a small road just north of the mountain.
Meanwhile in the mountain retreat on Windy Mountain the scouts had made a thorough reconnaissance and returned to make their report. Everyone was ready for their attack on Windy Fort, when the news came in: "Thunderclap is on his way with a big army!" They all stared at each other in horror. But Colonel Hua said: "There's no need for anyone to be afraid. They always say that in an emergency, when the enemy's almost upon you, the best thing is to put up a good fight. Let the troops have as much food and drink as they can take. Now, here's what we must do. First we must fight hard, and secondly we must use our heads. We shall do so ... and so .... What do you say to that?"
"It's a great plan," said Song Jiang. "That's just what I would have recommended." Having laid their plans, Song Jiang and Colonel Hua dismissed the troops so that each could make his own preparations. For himself, Colonel Hua selected a reliable mount, a good set of armour, bow and arrows and an iron spear. All were then ready and waiting.
Meanwhile Thunderclap had been leading his troops towards Windy Mountain and had arrived within two or three miles of it. Here they encamped. They were up at dawn. When they had breakfasted a signal gun was fired and they set off in the direction of Windy Mountain. They chose their route across a wide empty space so that the troops could spread out. When their drums began to beat, immediately in response a shattering crash of gongs sounded on the mountain and enemy troops began to pour forth. Thunderclap reined in his horse, rested his wolf-tooth mace and stared. Colonel Hua was advancing down the mountain, his troops pressing about him. When they reached the bottom, gongs were sounded again and the men formed ranks. Colonel Hua on horseback raised his iron spear and shouted a salute to Thunder-clap. The latter merely replied: "Colonel Hua, you come from a family of military men, serving the Emperor. You have been appointed commander of a fort, with a wide jurisdiction. You draw a salary from the government. What cause have you ever had for complaint? Yet now you consort with brigands! You're a traitor to the Emperor and I've been sent to arrest you. You'd better dismount and submit to being bound, it will save us all a lot of unpleasantness."
Colonel Hua brushed this aside: "General, be so good as to hear what I have to say. Do you really think I would betray the Emperor? The fault lies entirely with Liu Gao, who with absolutely no justification turned a private vendetta into a public cause, and so persecuted me that I now have no home to go to, no country I can call my own. If I take refuge here, temporarily, it is because I am obliged to. I beseech you to look into the affair and lend me your help."
"Get off your horse and surrender, what are you waiting for?" Thunderclap responded. "Cut the talk, you're just trying to confuse us." With that he called for the drums to be beaten again, whirled his mace about his head, and charged Colonel Hua.
"Thunderclap, you're a fool," Colonel Hua sneered. "Can't you see I was just giving you a chance? I spoke respectfully because you're my commanding officer, don't imagine it was because I'm afraid of you." So saying he levelled his spear and charged Thunderclap.
There under Windy Mountain the two of them fought a desperate battle. Truly it was an irresistible force meeting an immovable object. They really tested each other, those two warriors:
A pair of raging tigers from the southern mountains, two green dragons of the northern sea. When a dragon is angry its horns bristle with menace, when the tiger is enraged its teeth and claws are terrible to behold; terrible the teeth and claws, like silver hooks embedded in a fuzzy velvet ball, menacing the horns; like a blur of yellow leaves shaking on a gold tree. The weapons whirl and clash, the steel spear tip never far from its target; the combat surges to and fro, the wolf-tooth mace displaying a thousand tricks. When the wolf-tooth mace strikes down it misses the head by only a hair's breadth. When the steel spear darts towards the heart it stops but half a finger's breadth away. The wielder of the spear affrights the firmament; the owner of the dancing wolf-tooth mace rages like lightning rending the clouds. One is the awesome general, upholder of the state, the other is the black star, protector of the nation's boundaries.
Well, they went on fighting and after forty or fifty bouts there was nothing to choose between them. Eventually Colonel Hua dodged aside and turning his horse back towards the mountain vanished along a narrow trail. Thunderclap rode furiously in pursuit. Colonel Hua laid his spear in the rest and reined in his horse. He took the bow in his left hand, selected an arrow and bent the bow into an arc, twisted round and let fly. The arrow, as if to deliver a warning, struck the red tassel off Thunderclap's helmet. This stopped him in his tracks. He recovered quickly and set spurs to his horse, eager to close for the kill. But the enemy troops had all disappeared up the mountain, while Colonel Hua had taken a different path back to the mountain retreat.
When he saw they had all disappeared, Thunderclap was more furious than ever. "These bloody bandits, the nerve of them!" he roared. He ordered drums and gongs to be sounded for an attack up the mountain. The troops advanced cheering, the infantry leading the way. They had negotiated several ridges, when suddenly wood and stone missiles, bottles of lime and molten metal began to rain down on them from the slopes above. The troops in front were unable to pull up in time and fifty or more were killed. The remainder had to beat a retreat.
Thunderclap was a hot-headed man, and a fire had now been lit in his brain that nothing would do to extinguish. After reaching the bottom with his troops, he began looking for another way up. This search continued till midday, when gongs rang out on the western flank of the mountain and a bandit column emerged from the trees and undergrowth. But when Thunderclap charged to encounter them, the gongs ceased and the bandits disappeared. And when Thunderclap looked for the way they had come, there was no proper road there at all, only some woodcutters' paths, and even these were blocked with a tangle of tree trunks and branches and offered no practicable route.
He was just about to order his men to open up a path when some soldiers arrived and announced: "There's gongs being struck over to the east and an enemy column is advancing there."
Thunderclap marshalled his forces and raced over to the eastern end of the mountain. But when he arrived the gongs were silent and the enemy had disappeared. Thunderclap galloped about in all directions searching for a route, but all he found was a tangled mess of felled trees and branches blocking the paths.
At this point scouts returned and reported: "There's gongs and enemy troops over to the west." Thunderclap slapped his horse and galloped back to the western end of the mountain, but when he got there, no drums, no enemy. Well, as you know, Thunder-clap was not a patient man; by now he was grinding his teeth together as if he intended to grind them to powder.
Just then, from where they were on the western side of the mountain, infuriatingly, they heard the gongs sounding with redoubled vigour over on the east. They raced back to the east, but there was not a bandit to be seen. The bandits had all vanished into thin air.
Fuming with anger, Thunderclap was just about to order his men to force a route up the mountain, when shouting was heard over to the west.
Thunderclap's fury knew no bounds. Frantically goading on his troops he raced westwards. They searched high and low, but not a soul did they see! "Look for a way up the mountain!" Thunderclap commanded.
"There's no proper route on this side," one of his men said. "The only real way up's over there on the south-east. If we try and get up this way, we'll get ourselves into serious trouble."
"We'll take the proper road then, and we'll do it right away," said Thunderclap. He chased his men to the south-east.
It was getting dark by now. The troops were worn out with marching. When they reached the bottom of the mountain all they wanted was to make camp and eat. At this point torches were seen moving about high up on the mountainside, and a cacophony of drums and gongs began to sound. All Thunder-clap's anger was renewed, and he ordered a detachment of fifty horse into the attack. They were met with a hail of arrows from the tree line above and many of them were hit. Thunderclap had to withdraw. He told the troops now just to concentrate on preparing food. But the fires had hardly been lit when eighty or ninety torches were seen moving down the mountain, amid a shrill sound of whistling. Thunderclap was just about to go after them when suddenly the torches all went out at the same time. Although there was a moon that night, it was masked by clouds and only a glimmer of light filtered through. But Thunderclap was now too angry to sit still, so he ordered his men to light torches and burn the trees down. Just then drums and fifes were heard somewhere up the mountain. Thunderclap galloped towards the sound. Then he saw that on the summit a dozen or more torches had been lit. Up there Colonel Hua and Song Jiang were revealed, drinking together.
